Rosbrough, John (rose-bruh), clergyman, b. in Scotland in 1714; d. in Trenton, N. J., 2 Jan., 1777. He came to this country about 1740, and after the death of his wife taught for some time and then entered Princeton, where he was graduated in 1761. He studied theology under the Rev. John Blair, and was licensed to preach on 16 Aug., 1763. His history of New Jersey was published in 1774, N. J., where in October, 1764, he was called to Mansfield, Oxford, and Greenwich, and was ordained at the latter place on 11 Dec. For five years he remained with this parish, but in 1769 he was transferred to the Forks of Delaware, Pa., where he remained for the rest of his life. During the Revolutionary war he joined with his neighbors in the formation of a military company, and on reaching Philadelphia was commissioned chaplain of the 5th battalion of the Northampton county militia. He served during the campaign in New Jersey, and was taken prisoner in Trenton by a party of Hessians, who brutally murdered him. See “Rosbrough: A Tale of the Revolution,” by the Rev. John C. (vile, D. J.) (Easton, Pa., 1880).

Roscho, Juan German (ros-cho). Venezuelan statesman, b. in Caracas in 1769; d. in Caracas in 1821. He was graduated in law at the University of Caracas in 1795, joined the revolutionists in 1810, and was elected deputy to the congress of 1811, edited the manifesto of the confederation of Venezuela, assisted in forming the Federal constitution, and in 1812 was appointed a member of the Federal executive. On the surrender of Gen. Miranda to the Spanish general, Montevideo, Roscio and other members of the executive were sent as prisoners to Cadiz. In 1814 he and three others escaped, and took refuge in Gibraltar, but the governor delivered them up to the Spanish.
ROSE, Aquila, poet, b. in England in 1685; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Aug., 1753. He is described by Benjamin Franklin in his “Autobiography” as “an ingenious young man of excellent character, much respected in the town, secretary to the assembly, and a pretty poet.” His writings were issued as “Poems on Several Occasions, by Aquila Rose; to which are prefixed some other Pieces writ to Him, and to his Memory after his Death. Collected and published by his Son, Joseph Rose” (Philadelphia, 1740).

ROSE, Chauncey, philanthropist, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., 24 Dec., 1794; d. in Terre Haute, Ind., 13 Aug., 1857. He was educated in the common schools of his district, and during the autumn of 1817 visited the states of Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama, looking for a place in which to reside and engage in business. After spending the winter in Mt. Sterling, Ky., he settled in April in Terre Haute, and soon afterward moved to Parke county, where for six years he devoted his attention to milling. In 1825 he returned to Terre Haute and entered business, becoming one of the most successful merchants of that region. His profits were judiciously invested in land, and he acquired a large fortune. He was active in securing railway transportation in Indiana, and was the principal promoter of the Terre Haute and Indianapolis railroad. On the death of his brother John, he found that the will, if it were executed under the laws of New York, would not accomplish the clearly defined intentions of the testator. He accordingly instituted legal proceedings to have it set aside, and after six years of litigation succeeded in doing so. The estate was then valued at $1,500,000, which he became sole heir. Although legally entitled to the money, he at once endeavored to carry out his brother’s wishes and expended about $1,500,000 in charities, principally in New York. Besides other sums, he contributed $120,000 to endow an academy in Wethersfield, and his gifts for philanthropic purposes in Terre Haute and vicinity exceeded $1,000,000. Among the special objects of his interest were the Providence hospital, the Free dispensary, and the Rose orphan asylum, which he endowed with sufficient money to assure its permanency. His chief benefaction was the building and equipment of Rose polytechnic institute (of which the principal building is shown in the accompanying illustration), to which he left the greater part of his estate, so that this institution has a productive capital, exclusive of the buildings, of at least $500,000. In 1874 it was organized as the Terre Haute school of industrial science, with Rose as president. He was a member of the board of managers, and in 1875 it assumed its present designation. Its chief purpose is to provide higher education in mechanical engineering, and it is the only separate school of its character in the western states.

ROSE, Ernestine Louise Lasmund Potovsky, reformer, b. in Peterkoff, Poland, 18 Jan., 1810; d. 3 Aug., 1892. She was born of Jewish parentage, in a remarkably humble family. In 1829 she visited England, became a disciple of Robert Dale Owen, and soon afterward married William E. Rose. In 1836 she came to New York and circulated the first petition for the property rights of married women, there being in 1837 a bill pending in the New York legislature on this subject. Mrs. Rose lectured in the chief cities of the United States, and was a delegate from the National woman suffrage association to the Woman’s industrial congress in Berlin on 9 Nov., 1869. Later she attended all of the woman’s-rights conventions, and she had repeatedly addressed legislative assemblies. She had lived for some time in France and England, and frequently spoke on religious topics, temperance, and various philanthropic causes.

ROSE, George Maclean, Canadian publisher, b. in Wick, Scotland, 14 March, 1829; d. in Toronto, 10 Feb., 1898. He was educated at the Presbyterian academy in his native place, and learned the printing trade in the office of the “John O’Grad’s Journal.” In 1851 he came to Canada, and in 1853, with his brother Henry, he established a small job-printing office in Montreal. In 1860 the partnership was dissolved, and George, removing to Upper Canada, aided in founding the Merrickville “Chronic.” and was also city editor of the London “Prototype.” Since 1858 he had been in the printing business in Toronto and Montreal as manager or proprietor, and with his brother Daniel he carried on the most extensive publishing and printing establishment in the Dominion. Mr. Rose had long been an active temperance reformer in the United States as well as in Canada. He was president of the Toronto board of trade in 1882, and for five years a director of the Ontario bank. He edited “Life of Henry Ward Beecher” (Toronto, 1887) and “Cyclopedia of Canadian Biography” (1888).

ROSE, Sir John, bart., Canadian statesman, b. in Dorchester, Ontario, 16 Feb., 1819; d. in London, 24 Aug., 1888. He was educated at King’s college, Aberdeen, and accompanied his parents to Canada, and settled with them in Lower Canada. He took an active part in suppressing the rebellion of 1837, taught for a time in the eastern townships, afterward studied law in Montreal, was admitted to the bar in 1842, and soon had the largest commercial practice in the city. Mr. Rose was a member for Montreal in the Canada assembly from 1851 till 1861, and for Centre Montreal from 1861 till the union, when he declined to be a candidate for that constituency, and was elected for Huntington, which he continued to represent until his retirement in 1869. He was solicitor-general for Lower Canada from November, 1851, till August, 1854, a member of the executive council of Canada from 6 Aug., 1858, till June, 1861, and became receiver-general, 6 Aug., 1858. He was a second time solicitor-general for Lower Canada from 7 Aug., 1858, till 10 Jan., 1859, and commissioner of public works from 11 Jan., 1859, till 12 June, 1861, when he retired, owing to feeble health. In 1864 he was appointed by the British government a commissioner for the settlement of claims that arose under the Oregon treaty with the U. S. government. He became a member of the privy council, 30 Nov., 1867, and held the portfolio of minister of finance from that date until his retirement from public life in 1869. He was a delegate to London, England, during the sitting of the colonial conference in 1867, representing the Province of Prince Edward Island, and interest of Lower Canada, and again in 1868 as minister of finance on public business. He was requested by the governor-general, on behalf of the British government, to make a confidential examination into the alleged grievances of the province of Nova Scotia relative to the financial terms that were granted it on its entering the Dominion, and recommended the extension of large financial concessions to the province. In 1869 he was selected by the government of Canada to confer with the U.S. government on the subject of reciprocal trade, fisheries, copyright, patent laws, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and the extradition of criminals. In 1869 he removed to England, where he became a partner in the banking firm of Morgan, Rose and Co., London, and was for several years afterward recognized as the unofficial representative of Canada in the British isles. Sir John Rose was requested in 1870 by the British government to go on a confidential mission to the United States, which led to the treaty of Washington. Since his residence in London he had been a member of various royal commissions, and was chairman of the finance committee of the Colonial and Indian exhibition of 1886. He was appointed by the Prince of Wales a trustee of the Royal college of music, and became a member of the council of the duchy of Cornwall, and on 24 July, 1885, its receiver-general. In consideration of his public services he was created in 1870 a knight commander of the order of St. Michael and St. George, admiral of the navy, knight grand cross of the same order in 1878, created a baronet of the United Kingdom in 1872, and made a privy councillor in 1886. In 1843 he married Charlotte, daughter of Robert Emmet Temple, of Rutland, Va., and after her death he married (2 Jan., 1887) Julia, Marchioness of Tweedale.

ROSE, Thomas Elwood, soldier, b. in Bucks county, Pa., 12 March 1838. He was educated in the common schools, entered the National army as a private in the 12th Pennsylvania regiment in April, 1861, became captain in the 77th Pennsylvania in October of the same year, was engaged at Shiloh, the siege and battles of Corinth and Murfreesboro', became colonel in January, 1863, and fought at Liberty Gap and Chickamauga, where he was taken prisoner. He escaped at Weldon, N. C., was retaken the next day, and sent to Libby prison, Richmond, Va., on 1 Oct., 1863. He immediately began preparations to escape. With the aid of Maj. Archibald G. Hamilton, of the 12th Kentucky cavalry, he cut a hole in the solid ma- sonry of the kitchen fire-place large enough to ad- mit a man’s body into the cell. Before his escape, implements being a broken jack-knife and an old chisel found in the prison, and their time of work- ing between the hours of 10 p.m. and 4 a.m. This having been completed, a working-party of fifteen men was organized, under the command of Col. Rose, who undertook the most dangerous and arduous part of the task. They cut through the stone wall of the cell, and dug a tunnel fifty feet long through an earthen embankment, emerging at a point where the sentry could not see them, where they discharged the ammunition of the work occupied nearly three months, and during much of the time Col. Rose and Maj. Hamilton worked alone. On the night of 9 Feb., 1864, the tunnel was completed, and 105 soldiers escaped, of whom 48 were retaken, including Col. Rose. Rose was suffering from a broken ankle, and was in sight of the National lines when he was recaptured. He was again confined in Libby prison, and let loose on 30 April, 1864, and was ordered to Columbus, Ohio, where he was formally exchanged on 20 May, 1864, rejoined his regiment, and served with it from June, 1864, until the close of the war, participating in the engagements around Atlanta and in the battles of Columbus, Franklin, and Nashville. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers "for gallant and meritorious services in the late war" on 22 July, 1865, and major and lieutenant-colonel in the regular army on 2 March, 1867, for Liberty Gap and Chickamauga. He became captain in the 11th infantry in 1866, and in 1870 was transferred to the 10th infantry.

ROSEBRUGH, Abner Mulholland (rose-brow), Canadian physician, b. near Galt, Ont., 8 Nov., 1835. He was educated at Victoria college, Toronto, and studied medicine in New York and London. He practised successfully in Toronto, and in 1863 revived the Free dispensary of that city, which had been closed for want of funds, establishing it upon a firm basis, and in 1867 he organized the Toronto eye and ear infirmary. He has devoted his attention to medical electricity and ophthalmology, and delivered lectures on the latter subject at Victoria college in 1870-1. In 1864 he invented a new demonstrating ophthalmoscope, and in that year he photographed the living fundus oculi. In 1865 he photographed the inverted retinal image of an object placed in front of the eye. In 1878 he, in association with a friend, Mr. G. Black, anticipated Van Rysseghere in rendering practical the simultaneous transmission of telephone and telegraph signals over the same line. He has published "An Introduction to the Study of the Optical Defects of the Eye" (1866); "Chlo- roform and a New Way of Administering It" (New York, 1893); "A Hand-Book of Medical Electricity" (1888); and a pamphlet on "Recent Advances in Electro-Therapeutics" (1887).
in a general action, the Confederate army retreated to the line of Duck river, and the Army of the Cumberland occupied Murfreesboro'. This battle was one of the bloodiest in the war, and resulted in a loss of 9,511 by the National forces and 9,236 by the Confederates. As soon as Vicksburg was beyond the reach of possible succor from Bragg, by a brilliant flank movement Rosecrans dislodged him from his entrenched camps at Shelbyville and Tullahoma, and in fifteen days, 24 June to 7 July, 1863, drove him out of middle Tennessee. As soon as the railway was repaired, he occupied Bridgeport and Stevenson. From 7 July till 14 Aug, while troops were bridging the road and rolling-stock in order, supplies pushed forward, and demonstrations made to conceal the point of crossing Tennessee river. From 14 Aug till 1 Sept. he crossed the Cumberland mountains and the Tennessee river, and, threatening Bragg's communications, compelled him to withdraw from imperilled Chattanooga. 9 Sept., and retire behind the Chickamauga until Gen. James Longstreet's arrival with his corps. Rosecrans concentrated his forces with the utmost dispatch to meet the inevitable combat. The battle was opened on the 19th by an attempt to gain possession of the road to Chattanooga, continued through the day, and resulted in Rosecrans defeating the attempt Gen. Stephen Lee's corps, re-enforced by Gen. Richard W. Johnson's and Gen. John M. Palmer's divisions, firmly upon that road: but during the night Longstreet came up, and was immediately given command of the Confederate left. On the following morning the contest was renewed by a determined attack on the National left and centre. At this moment, while the national left was broken, and J. Wood's division was withdrawn, leaving a gap in the centre, into which Gen. Longstreet pressed his troops, forced Jefferson C. Davis's two brigades out of the line, and cut off Philip H. Sheridan's three brigades of the right, all of which, after a gallant but unsuccessful effort to stem the charge, were compelled to fall back at the first good standing-ground in rear of the position they had lost. The two divisions of Horatio P. Van Cleve and Davis, going to succor the right centre, were partly shattered by this break, and four or five regiments were scattered through the woods, but most of the strugglers stopped with Sheridan's and Davis's commands. The remainder, nearly seven divisions, were unbroken, and continued the fight. The gallant Gen. George H. Thomas, whose orders the night before, reiterated a few moments before this disaster, were to hold his position at all hazards, continued the fight with seven divisions, while Gen. Rosecrans undertook to make such dispositions as would most effectually avert disaster in case the enemy should make an attempt to break the national right. TheDovey road; and capture the remaining commissary stores, then in a valley two or three miles to the west. Fortunately, this advance was not made, the commissary-train was pushed into Chattanooga, the cavalry, ordered down, closed the ways behind the National right, and Gen. Thomas, after this most decisive fight, returned the next night to Rossville in pursuance of orders from Gen. Rosecrans. On the 22d the army was concentrated at Chattanooga. The battle was a victory to the Confederates only in name; for Chattanooga, the objective point of the campaign, remained in the possession of the National forces. The total National loss, in killed, wounded, and missing, was 16,179; the Confederate lost 17,304.
crans was relieved of his command on 23 Oct., and he was assigned to the Department of the Missouri in January, 1844, with headquarters at St. Louis, where he conducted the military operations that terminated in the defeat and expulsion from the state of the invading Confederate forces under Gen. Price. He was placed on waiting orders at Cincinnati on 10 Dec., 1864, mustered out of the volunteer service on 15 Jan., 1866, and resigned from the army on 28 March, 1867, after receiving the brevet of major-general in the regular army for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Shiloh. Later in 1867 he was offered the Democratic nomination for governor of California, but declined it. He was appointed minister to Mexico on 27 July, 1868, and held that office until 26 June, 1869, when he returned to the United States, and declined the Democratic nomination for governor of Ohio. Subsequently he resumed the practice of engineering, and in 1872-3 was engaged in an effort to initiate the construction of a vast system of narrow-gauge railways in Mexico, at the instance of President Juarez. He became president in 1871 of the San Jose mining company, and in 1878 of the Safety powder company in San Francisco. He was also intrusted with a charter for an interoceanic railway from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific, made by a committee of the state legislature of Mexico, which was signed by him when envoy to Mexico, and he was requested to use his influence to induce American railway building skill and capital to undertake the work. He memorialized congress to cultivate friendly and intimate commercial relations with Mexico, and to encourage and assist the material progress of that country; and at the instance of American and English railway builders and of President Juarez, he went to Mexico. He had for fifteen months so ably discussed in the newspapers the benefits of railway construction to Mexico that the legislatures of seventeen of the Mexican states passed unanimous resolutions urging their national congress to enact the legislation advocated, and the governors of six other states sent official recommendations to the same effect. In 1879 Gen. Rosecrans declined the Democratic nomination for congress from Nevada. He was elected as a Democrat to congress from California, served from 5 Dec., 1881, till 4 March, 1885, and was appointed register of the U. S. treasury in June, 1885, which office he held many years. For a full account of the Tennessee campaign of Gen. John M. Cist's "Army of the Cumberland" (New York, 1892): "Rosecrans's Campaign with the 14th Army Corps, or the Army of the Cumberland," by W. D. Bickham (Cincinnati, 1865); and Van Horne's "History of the Army of the Cumberland" (2 vols., Cincinnati, 1875).—His brother, Sylvester Horton, R. C. bishop, b. in Homer, La., 5 Jan., 1846, graduated from Ohio, 5 Sept., 1863, was ordained to the presbyterate in the diocese of Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1845. A letter from his brother, Gen. Rosecrans, announcing the conversion of the latter to the Roman Catholic church, turned his thoughts in the same direction. He became a Roman Catholic in 1845, and entered St. John's college, Fordham, N. Y., where he was graduated in 1848. He was admitted to the diocese of Cincinnati, and was sent by Bishop Purcell to study theology in the College of the Propaganda, Rome, where he received his doctor's degree in 1851. He was ordained in 1852, and returned immediately to the United States. For several months after his arrival he acted as pastor of the Church of St. Thomas in Cincinnati, and he was then appointed one of the pastors at the cathedral, which post he held till 1859. A college was opened in that year for the education of Roman Catholic youths, of which Dr. Rosecrans was made president. He continued to reside in this institution until made bishop of Columbus. He also edited the "Catholic Telegraph," and spent much time in instructing the theological students of his diocese. On 53 March, 1862, he was consecrated as auxiliary of the archdiocese of Cincinnati, under the title of bishop of Pompeiopolis. In 1868 the diocese of Columbus was divided, a new see was erected at Columbus. Dr. Rosecrans was nominated first bishop, and took possession of his see on 3 March of the same year. Shortly afterward the Academy of St. Mary's of the Springs was founded near Columbus, and the bishop began St. Mary's cathedral, one of the first buildings in the city. He also erected St. Aloysius's seminary, and through his initiative numerous other schools were founded. He was taken suddenly ill on Sunday, 20 Oct., 1878, as he was about to enter his cathedral for vespers service, and died on the following day. Bishop Rosecrans's life was one of great simplicity and self-denial. He lived in the orphan asylum, taught daily in the Academy of the Sacred Heart, and went several times weekly to St. Mary's of the Springs for the same purpose. All that he had he gave to the poor, and he was often obliged to walk long distances, even when in delicate health, because he had not the money to pay his car-fare. All the money that was in his possession at his death was two silver half-dollars.

ROSECRANS, Christian, lawyer, b. near Bremen, Germany, 10 Aug., 1853; d. in New Orleans, 5 Sept., 1878. His early education was limited to the elementary branches, and at sixteen he left his native land on board the bark "Jupiter" for New Orleans, having secured his passage by the sale of his services for a stated period after his arrival, which was in July, 1829. He was employed for several years in a printing-office, and in 1823, with a partner, established and edited the first literary journal published in Louisiana. It was called "The Haleyon," and, failing to prove remunerative, was abandoned for the study of the law. Mr. Roselius supporting himself at this period by teaching. His legal studies were pursued in company with his friend, Alexander Dimity, in 1827. He was admitted to the bar of the district court of the United States in 1828. Elected a member of the bar of the supreme court of Louisiana in 1830, and was subsequently admitted to practice in the court of chancery, Louisiana supreme court, and United States supreme court. He has been pronounced one of the ablest and most noted of the members of the bar of Louisiana, and is highly esteemed by the profession for his unselfish character and talents. He was admitted to practice before the supreme court of the United States in 1851. In 1841 he was appointed attorney-general of the state and served for a term of two years. During the same decade he was honored with an invitation to become the law partner in Washington of Daniel Webster, which he, however, declined, preferring to remain in the south. For many years he was dean of the faculty of the University of Louisiana, and for the last twenty-three years of his life professor of civil law. In 1869 he was offered the highest place in the reconstructed supreme court of the state; but he declined to accept the appointment unless the court should be secured from military interference.
Mr. Roselius possessed one of the finest private libraries in the south. It was particularly rich in the Latin classics, of which he was a constant reader, in his boyhood. Studying law at the University of Pennsylvania, he became a devoted student. He conversed equally well in English, French, and German. His house and spacious grounds at Carrollton, a suburb of the great city, was noted for its generous hospitality, and his return to his native city. During the civil war he served on the staff of Gen. John F. Reynolds in the Army of the Potomac. He has delivered numerous addresses before various literary and chartable associations, including one before the Pennsylvania historical society on the "Life and Public Services of Gen. John F. Reynolds" (Philadelphia, 1868), and contributed frequently to periodicals.
He is the author of "The German Soldier in the Wars of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1881).

ROSENTHAL, Lewis, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 10 Sept., 1856. He was graduated at Dar-mouth in 1877, went to Paris, and was for four years a journalist and tutor. He has been a fre-cquent writer for magazines and the daily press, and has published "America and France; the Influence of the United States in France in the Eighteenth Century" (New York, 1882).

ROSENTHAL, Max, artist, b. in Turck, Russian Poland, 23 Nov., 1863. In 1884 he went to Paris, where he studied lithography, drawing, and painting with M. Thurwanger, with whom he came to the United States in 1895, which country he has since visited. He made the chromolithographic plates for what is believed to be the first fully illustrated book by this process in the United States, "Wild Scenes and Wild Hunters." In 1894 he drew and lithographed an interior view of the old Masonic temples in Philadelphia, the plate being 22 by 25 inches, the largest chromolithograph that had been made in the country up to that time. He designed and executed the illustrations for various works, and during the civil war followed the Army of the Potomac, and drew every camp, up to the battle of Gettysburg. These drawings he reproduced at the time. Up to 1894 he did miscellaneous works, including about 200 lithographs of distinguished Americans, for various periodicals. After 1894 he turned his attention to etching, and has since 1896 executed portraits of eminent Americans and British officers, together with numerous large plates, among which are "Storm Approaches," after the painting by Henry Moser, illustrations for several of Longfellow's poems, and original etchings entitled "Paris, the Shepherd's Maiden," and "Marguerite." He is a member and a few years ago elected to the National Academy of Design in New York, and one of the founders of the Sketch Club.—His son, Albert, artist, b. in Philadelphia, 30 Jan., 1863, studied art under his father and at the Pennsylvania academy. He turned his attention to etching, and has become widely known for his work, which,
like that of his father, includes numerous portraits of American historical characters. He is a member of the Academy of fine arts, the Sketch club, and the Art students' union.

ROSENTHAL, Toby Edward, artist, b. in New Haven, Conn., 15 March, 1848. He removed with his family to San Francisco in 1853, and began his studies for the profession of an artist at the Academy of Fine Arts in 1864. The following year he went to Munich and became a pupil at the Royal college of art, where he studied under Carl Ruopp, and later (1868-74) again at the academy, under Carl von Piloty. He gained medals at Munich in 1870 and 1883, and in Philadelphia in 1876. Excepting some visits to his home, his professional life has been spent in Europe. His more important works are "Loving Offering" and "Spring's Joy and Sorrow" (1868);
"Morning Prayers in Bach's Family," which was bought by the Saxon government, and is now in the museum of Leipsic (1870); "Flame" (1874);
"Young Monk in Refectory" (1875); "Forbidden Loneliness." "Who laughs Last laughs Best," and
"Girls' Prancing-School Alarmed" (1877); A Sister's Private Life in a Convent, Philadelphia, 1880; "Trial of Constance de Bevelf" (1883); Departure from the Family" (1885); and "Dancing
Lesson during the Empire." "Out of the Frying Pan into the Fire," executed in 1871, is one of the most popular of his works, and has been frequent-lv engraved. He has also painted some sixty portraits, in Europe, and, during his visits in 1871 and 1874-80, in San Francisco. Very few of his works have been exhibited in this country.

ROSIER, James, explorer, b. in Norfolk, England, about 1555; d. about 1635. He was graduated at Cambridge, and was engaged by Lord Arundel, of Wardour, to accompany Capt. George Waymouth on his voyage, during which Rosier explored the coast of Maine and Penobscot river.
On his return he published "A True Relation of the most prosperous voyage made this present year by Captaine George Waymouth in the Discovery of the Land of Virginia: where he discovered 60 miles of a most excellent River; together with a most fertile land," written by James Rosier, "a Gentleman employed on the voyage" (London, 1614).
In 1625 he published a work in 4 vols. of 4 sheets, "Purchas his Pilgrimes" (1625), also in Portland, Me. (1887).

ROSS, Alexander, British soldier, b. in Scotland in 1742; d. in London, 29 Nov., 1827. He took the army as an ensign in the 30th foot in February, 1769, served in Germany, came to this country as a captain in May, 1775, and was present at the principal battles of the war of the Revolution. He became brevet major in 1781, was aide-de-camp to Lord Cornwallis, and represented him as commissioner to arrange the details of the surrrender of Yorktown. He afterward served as depot adjutant-general in Scotland, went thence to India, and served in a similar capacity while Cornwallis commanded in that country. He attained the rank of general in 1801. He published "Correspondence of Charles, First Marquis Cornwallis: Edited with Notes" (London, 3 vols., 1859). This work throws much light on the services of the marquis in this country.

ROSS, Alexander, author, b. in Nairnshire, Scotland, 9 May, 1785; d. in Colony Gardens (now in Winnipeg, Manitoba, Red river settlement, British North America), 29 Oct., 1825. He came to Canada in 1805, taught in Glengarry, U. C., and in 1819 joined John Jacob Astor's expedition to Oregon. Until 1824 he was a fur-trader and in the services of the Hudson bay company. About 1825
he removed to the Red river settlement and was a member of the council of Assiniboia, and was sheriff of the Red river settlement for several years. He was for fifteen years a resident in the territories of the Hudson bay company, and has given the result of his observations in the works "Adventures of the First Settlers on the Oregon or Columbia River; being a Narrative of the Expedition fitting out by John Jacob Astor to establish the Pacific Fur Company, with an Account of some Indian and Animal adventures," published, 1849; "The Fur-Hunters of the Far West, a Narrative of Adventures in the Oregon and Rocky Mountains" (2 vols., 1855); and "The Red River Settlement, its Rise, Progress, and Present State" (1856).—His son, James, b. in Red river settlement, Manitoba, 9 May, 1855; d. in Winnipeg, Manitoba, 29 Sept., 1871, was educated at St. John's college, Red river, and at Toronto university, where he was graduated with honors in 1876. In 1858 he taught as assistant master in Upper Canada college, Toronto. In 1859, returning home, he was appointed postmaster, sheriff, and governor of the jail at Red river, was connected as part proprietor and editor with the "Nor'-wester" in 1864, subsequently as associate editor of the Manitoba Times, and was also a writer on the Toronto "Globe." He was afterward admitted to the bar of Manitoba, in 1870 was appointed chief justice of the provisional government under Louis Riel, and is said to have drawn up the petition of right. He was opposed to Riel's violent and arbitrary acts.

ROSS, Alexander Colman, merchant, b. in Zanesville, Ohio, 21 May, 1812; d. there, 25 Feb., 1883. He became a merchant in his native place, sang in a church choir, and in the presidential canvass of 1840 was a member of a Whig glee-club. A friend having suggested that the tune "Little Pigs" would be a suitable chorus for a political song, Ross set himself to compose the song, and one Sunday during sermon-time produced "Tippencanoe and Tyler Too." This was sung by his glee-club at a mass-meeting in Zanesville, and at once became popular. When he went to New York in September, to buy goods, he sang it at a great meeting in Lafayette hall, the audience took up the chorus, after the meeting it was repeated by crowds in the streets and about the hotels, and thenceforth it spread over most of the country, in which Gen. Harrison was said to have been sung into the White House. From a boy Mr. Ross was interested in scientific inventions, and he is said to have produced the first daguerreotype ever made in this country. He was one of the most enterprising business men in Zanesville, and accumulated a large property. See "Our Familiar Songs, and Those who Made Them," by Helen K. Johnson (New York, 1881).

ROSS, Alexander Milton, Canadian naturalist, b. in Belleville, Ont., 13 Dec., 1832; d. in Montreal, 27 Oct., 1897. He attended school till eleven, when the death of his father compelled his removal. He evinced a great love for natural history at an early age. In his boyhood he migrated to New York city, and after struggling with many adversities became a compositor on the "Evening Post," William Cullen Bryant, its editor, was much interested in him, and remained his friend ever afterward. During this period he became acquainted with Garibaldi, who was then a resident of New York; and in 1854 Ross was instrumental in securing a pension for Garibaldi from the Italian government. In 1851 he began the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. Valentine Mott, in New York, and after four years of unremitting toil, working as a compositor during the day and studying hard at night, he received his degree of M.D. in 1855. Soon after his graduation he was appointed a surgeon in the forces in Nicaragua, under William Walker. In 1856 he became actively engaged in the anti-slavery struggle in the United States, becoming a personal friend of John Brown. During the civil war he served for a short time as a surgeon in the National forces under Surgeon General of the army, Dr. A. Lincoln as confidential correspondent in Canada, where he rendered important services to the U.S. government, receiving the thanks of the president and Sec. Seward. At the close of the war Dr. Ross offered his services to President Juarez of Mexico, and received the appointment of surgeon in the Mexican army. After the overthrow of the empire he returned to Canada and began to collect and classify the fauna and flora of that country, a work that had never before been attempted by a native. He has collected and classified hundreds of species of birds, eggs, mammials, reptiles, and fresh-water fish, 3,400 species of insects, and 2,000 species of Canadian flora. After his return to Canada he became a member of the College of physicians and surgeons of Ontario, and was one of the founders of the society for the diffusion of physiological knowledge in 1881. Dr. Ross had been appointed treasurer and commissioner of agriculture for the province of Ontario, and he had removed from Montreal to Toronto. He was knighted by the emperor of Russia, and by the kings of Italy, Greece, and Sardinia in 1876, and by the king of Portugal in 1877. He was appointed consul in Canada by the kings of Belgium and Denmark, and received the decoration of the "Academie Francaise" from the government of France in 1879. He was a member of many scientific societies, and the author of "Recollections of an Abolitionist" (Montreal, 1867); "Birds of Canada" (1875); "Butterflies and Moths of Canada" (1873); "Flora of Canada" (1873); "Forest Trees of Canada" (1874); "Ferns and Wild Flowers of Canada" (1877); "Mammals, Reptiles, and Fresh-water Fishes of Canada" (1878); "Vaccination a Medical Delusion" (1885); and "Medical Practice of the Future" (1887).

ROSS, David, congressman, b. in Maryland about 1777. He was a delegate from that state to the Continental Congress in 1787, and again in 1789. He was also elected in the Congress of the United States in 1787, voted on the motion to amend the article passed on 29 Aug., 1786, making it read "that the proceedings of congress do not authorize the secretary of the United States for the department of foreign affairs to enter into any stipulation with the minister of his Catholic majesty." He also voted on 31 July, 1787, to oppose a resolution of thanks to John Adams for his services as minister to England, and on 13 Oct., 1787, voted for Mr. Pierce Butler's motion that it was the desire of congress to entertain the friendship existing between the United States and his "Catholic majesty. There is no record of his death.

ROSS, Edmund Gibson, senator, b. in Ashland, Ohio, 5 Feb., 1826. His ascendency at an early age to a printer, received a limited education, and in 1847 removed to Wisconsin, where he was employed in the office of the Milwaukee "Sentinel" for four years. He went to Kansas in 1856, was a member of the Kansas constitutional convention in 1859, and served in the legislature until his death. He was also editor of the Kansas "Recorder" and the Kansas "Tribune," which was the only free-state paper in the territory at that ROSS, Frederick Augustus, clergyman, b. in Cobham, Cumberland co., Va., 25 Dec., 1796; d. in Huntsville, Ala., 13 April, 1888. He was educated at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., entered the Presbyterian ministry, emancipated his slaves, and from 1825 till 1851 was pastor of a church in Kingsport, Tenn., where he had a large and active congregation. In 1828 he labored as an evangelist in Kentucky and Ohio. At the division of the Presbyterian general assembly in 1837-38 he adhered to the new school branch, and in 1855 became pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Huntsville, Ala., holding this charge until 1857 and continuing pastor emeritus until his death. With James Gallaher and David Nelson he edited a monthly publication entitled "The Calvinistic Magazine," founded in 1836, and he published a book entitled "Slavery as ordained of God" (Philadelphia, 1857).

ROSS, George, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Newcastle, Del., in 1739; d. in Lancaster, Pa., in July, 1778. His father, George (1676-1754), left the Presbyterian ministry for that of the Church of England and came from Scotland to Delaware about 1703. He very soon rose to prominence, becoming one of the pillars of the Episcopal church in the American colonies and acting as chaplain to several of the proprietors of Pennsylvania. The son at the age of eighteen began the study of the law, and on his admission to the bar, in 1754, settled in Lancaster, Pa.

He was a member of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1768-70, and appointed by the convention that assembled, after the dissolution of the proprietary government, to prepare a declaration of rights. Mr. Ross was elected to the 1st general congress at Philadelphia in 1774, and continued to represent his state until June, 1777, when, through failing health, he resigned his seat. On this occasion, the citizens of Lancaster having voted him a piece of plate worth £150, he declined the gift on the ground that "it was the duty of every man, especially of every representative of the people, to contribute by every means within his power to the welfare of his country without expecting pecuniary rewards." On first entering congress he was appointed by the legislature to report that body a set of instructions by which his conduct and that of his colleagues were to be guided. He was among the foremost leaders in the provincial legislature in expounding measures for the defence of the community against British aggression, and in 1775 drew up a reply to a message of Gov. Penn that deprecated any defensive measures on the part of the colonies. He was also the author of the report urging vigorous method for protecting the city of Philadelphia in a state of defense. On 14 April, 1779, he was appointed judge of the court of admiralty for Pennsylvania, which post he held until his death three months later. Judge Ross possessed a benevolent disposition, which often led him to espouse the cause of the Indians and to save that people from the oppression of the laws that were practiced on them by the whites. As a lawyer he was early classed among the first of the profession, and as a judge he was learned and upright, and remarkable for the ease and rapidity with which he despatched business. He was the last man of the Pennsylvania delegation to sign the Declaration of Independence.—His half-brother, Mr. John Ross, was a member of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1743 and 1744, and the Pennsylvania senate, 8 May, 1756, was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, 27 Aug., 1755, and so rapidly rose in his profession that in 1743 he was the chief rival of Andrew Hamilton before the courts. In 1744 he engaged in the manufacture of pig-iron in Berks county with John Lesher, and he continued his interest in the same until his death. In 1781, Great Britain was fully at war with France, and he was consulted by the governor and council in relation to a law for recording warrants and surveys, and thus render the title to real estate more secure. In 1760 he took part in the organization of St. Paul's Episcopal church, and was its first warden. Alexander Graydon says: "Mr. John Ross, who loved ease and madeira much, better than liberty and strife, declared for neutrality, saying that, "let who would be king, he well knew that he should be subject"; and John Adams writes of him in his diary, 25 Sept., 1755, as "a lawyer of great eloquence and heretofore of extensive practice, a great Tory, but now they say beginning to be converted." He was a friend and correspondent of Benjamin Franklin, and an early member of the American Philosophical Society.

ROSS, George William, Canadian statesman, b. near Nairn, Middlesex co., Ont., 18 Sept., 1841. His family came from Ross-shire, Scotland, in 1832. He was educated at his native place and at the Toronto normal school, and taught from 1851 till 1871, when he was appointed inspector of public schools for the county of Lambton. He was active in the movement for the creation of county model schools, and did much to perfect them when they were established, preparing the syllabus of lectures, and serving for a time as inspector of model schools. He was a member of the central committee of examiners from 1876 till 1880, Mr. Ross was elected to the Dominion parliament in 1872, re-elected by acclamation in 1874, and chosen again in 1878 and 1882, but he was unseated in October, 1883, for bribery by agents during his canvass. He was appointed minister of education for Ontario, 23 Nov., 1883, elected to the legislative assembly of Ontario, 15 Dec., 1883, and re-elected in 1886. Mr. Ross has been for many years active in the temperance and prohibitory movements in Canada. He was an honorary commissioner at the Colonial and Indian exhibition in London, England, in 1885. He has edited the Strathroy "Age" and the Sault Ste. Marie "Expositor," and was also one of the conductors of the "On-ROSS, Henry Howard, lawyer, b. in Essex Co., N. Y., 9 May, 1760; d. there, 14 Sept., 1838. He was graduated at Columbia in 1808, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, practised in Essex for fifty years, and was elected to congress as a Whig, serving from 5 Dec., 1825, till 3 March, 1827. In 1817 he was a county judge, and in 1848 was a presidential elector. He was adjutant on the staff of Gen. John E. Wool at the battle of Plattsburg, 11 Sept., 1814, and was afterward appointed major general of the state militia. The University of Vermont gave him the degree of A. M. in 1813.

ROSS, James, senator, b. in York county, Pa., 12 July, 1762; d. in Alleghany City, Pa., 27 Nov., 1847. He entered the school of the Rev. Dr. John McMillan and accepted the post of teacher of Latin. In 1782 Mr. Ross became a student at law, was admitted to the bar in 1784, went to Washington, Pa., where he practised until 1795 he removed to Pittsburg. In 1789 Mr. Ross was elected one of the members of the convention to frame a new constitution for the state. The ability that he displayed in this body gave him a reputation which, with his firmness, candor, and wisdom, as a counsel and lawyer, secured his election to the U. S. senate, in April, 1794, for the unexpired term, ending 3 March, 1797, of Albert Gallatin, who had been thrown out because he had not been for nine years a citizen, as required by the new Federal Constitution. In 1797 he was again elected to succeed himself. To Senator Ross undoubtedly belongs the chief credit of the peaceful ending of the whiskey insurrection. On 17 July, 1794, Gen. Neville, the chief excise officer, was attacked, and his house and other property were destroyed. At a tumultuous meeting of the people at Washington, Pa., a rally of armed men was called to be held on 1 Aug., at Braddock's Field. Mr. Ross, in a powerful speech, alone opposed the will of an excited populace. He was told that he had that day destroyed all chances of future political forethought. He, nothing daunted, attended the Braddock's Field meeting and also that of the delegates from western Pennsylvania and Virginia at Parkinson's Ferry. By his personal appearance and arguments a party was formed, which, if not very numerous, included many citizens of note, several of whom had been active on the other side. While he was at Parkinson's Ferry a messenger from the capital brought Senator Ross the information that he had been appointed by Washington the chief of a commission to compose the insurrection. Senator Ross more than prepared the way for his colleagues, and the insurrection was virtually at an end before they joined him. Mr. Ross had been for several years intimate with Gen. Washington, being consulted as counsel, and now, at the president's request, became his attorney in fact for the sole management of his large estates in western Pennsylvania. While still in the senate, he was nominated, in 1799, as governor of the state. The nomination was esteemed to be equivalent to an election, but Mr. Ross refused to canvass the state in his own behalf and the defeat of the next election. Ross was again nominated and was again unsuccessful. The same disposition to defend the right, regardless of personal consequences, that had induced him, as a boy at Dr. McMillan's school, to volunteer against marauding Indians, that had separated him from friends and neighbors during the whiskey war, that in the senate had urged war against Spain, to protect the Mississippi for the use of the west, induced him to befriend the cause of a party of friendless negro slaves who had escaped from their masters and found refuge in Philadelphia. Impassioned oratory gained the case. The "Port Folio," published in Philadelphia in 1816, says that Mr. Ross received the thanks of the Abolition society; but the generous act diminished his popularity. In 1808, for the third time, he was nominated for governor, and was again unsuccessful. With this election the power of the Federalists in Pennsylvania was broken, and with it the political life of Mr. Ross came to an end. He declined to connect himself with other parties; only as a Federalist would he hold public office. Except a short sketch in the "Port Folio" for 1816, there is no published life of Mr. Ross; his political greatness consists of extracts from his speeches.

ROSS, James, Canadian educator, b. in Pictou, N. S., in July, 1811; d. in Dartmouth in 1885. His father, who came from Scotland in 1795, was pastor of the Presbyterian church at Pictou for nearly forty years. The son was educated at the Pictou academy, and had charge of the grammar-school at Westmoreland, Nova Scotia, and of the Pictou banner. After completing a course in theology he was licensed to preach in 1835, and became pastor of the congregation to which his father had ministered at Pictou. In 1842 Mr. Ross became editor of the "Presbyterian Banner." He afterward was professor of Hebrew and biblical criticism in Dalhousie college, and upon the opening of the theological department in 1848 was called to it. After Truro college was amalgamated with Dalhousie college Mr. Ross was appointed its president, and also acted as a professor of ethics.

ROSS, John, merchant, b. in Tain, County Ross, Scotland, 29 Jan., 1726; d. in Philadelphia in March, 1800. He early removed to Perth, Scotland, and entered into mercantile pursuits, but in 1762 came to Philadelphia, where he became a shipping merchant. At the beginning of the difficulties with the mother country he espoused the cause of the colonies, and was a signer of the non-importation agreement of the citizens of Philadelphia in 1765. He presided at the meeting of the mechanics and tradesmen of the city that was held on June. 1774, and consider a letter from the representatives of New York and New York, to the committee to reply to the same. On 16 Sept., 1773, he was appointed master-mate of the Pennsylvania navy, which office he resigned, 23 Feb., 1776, on account of the importance of his commercial affairs. In May, 1776, he was employed by the committee of commerce of congress to purchase clothes, arms, and powder for the use of the army. This induced the establishment of agencies in Nantes and Paris, and repeated visits to France during the war. In this duty he advanced or pledged his credit for £20,000 more than he was supplied with by congress, much to his embarrassment and subsequent loss. He was on terms of familiar intercourse with Washington, Franklin, and Robert Morris, and there are several entries in the diary of Gen. Washington, during the sittings of the convention to frame the United States constitution, of engagements to dine with Mr. Ross at his country place, the Grange, named after the home of Lafayette.

ROSS, Sir John, British explorer, b. in Balsaroch, Scotland, 24 June, 1777; d. in London, England, 30 Aug., 1856. He was the son of a clergyman. His early voyages were made in a small whale-boat. His vessel was very often injured by the batteries of Bilbao, Spain, receiving a pension of £150 per annum. In 1817 he was offered the command of two vessels for an arctic expedition to ascertain the existence of a northwest passage, and on 25 April, 1818, he sailed in the "Isabella," accompanied by Lient. William E. Parry in the "Alexander." He returned to England in November of that year, and was made post-captain on 7 Dec., 1818. In May, 1829, he sailed in the steamer "Victory," equipped by Sir Felix Booth, sheriff of London, and was accompanied by a small tender of sixteen tons, the "Kiesenstein." In September, 1830, he became ice-bound in the Gulf of Botnia, and he abandoned his ship on 29 May, 1832. In August, 1832, he was rescued from the ice and returned in a whaling expedition. He arrived in London in 1833, and was knighted, 24 Dec., 1834, and made companion of the bath. From 1839 till 1845 he was consul at Stockholm, and in 1850 he commanded the "Felix," a vessel of ninety tons, in search of Sir John Franklin, returning in 1851, in which year he became rear-admiral. His publications include "Narrative of a Voyage of Discovery made under the Orders of the Admiralty for the Purpose of exploring Baffin's Bay, and inquiring into the probability of a N. W. Passage" (London, 1819); "Observations on "Voyages of Discovery and Research within the Arctic Regions," by Sir John Barrow (1819; 2d ed., 1846); "Treatise on Navigation by Steam" (1828); "Narrative of a Second Voyage in Search of a Northwest Passage, etc., including the Reports of Capt. James Clarke Ross and the Discovery of the Northern Magnetic Pole" (1825); "Memoirs and Correspondence of Admiral Lord de Sauny" (2 vols., 1829); "Arctic Expedition, with a Summary of the Searching Expeditions for Sir John Franklin" (1850); and a "Narrative of a Voyage to Chili, and Towards the South Pole" (1855). The Failure of the Searching Expeditions sent out by the Government and Others for the Rescue of Sir John Franklin (1855).—His nephew, Sir James Clarke, explorer, b. in London, England, 15 April, 1800; d. in Aylesbury, Buckinghamshire, England, 3 April, 1862, entered the navy in 1812, and accompanied his uncle on his first arctic expedition in 1818. From 1819 till 1827 he was with Capt. Parry in his voyages in search of a northwest passage, and also in his expedition of 1827. He was appointed commander on 8 Nov., 1827, sailed with his uncle in 1829, was absent four years, and discovered what he believed to be the northern magnetic pole. On his return to England he was made post-captain, 28 Oct., 1834, crossed the Atlantic in 1836 to search for Frank Water on Chili, and returned in 1838 engaged in a magnetic survey of Great Britain and Ireland. In April, 1838, he was appointed to command the "Erebus," and in September of that year, in company with the "Terror," sailed for the Antarctic seas to make magnetic and meteorological observations and investigations. After a successful voyage of four years, in which much valuable information regarding this region was gained, he returned to England in September, 1843. In January, 1845, he was appointed to the "Enterprise" and made an unsuccessful voyage to Baffin Bay in search of Sir John Franklin, going as far as Barrow Strait. In 1841 he was presented with the founder's gold medal of the London geographical society, and he also received a gold medal from the Geographical society of Paris, was knighted in 1844, and received in that year the degree of D. C. L. from Oxford. He was the author of "A Voyage of Discovery and Research in the Southern and Antarctic Regions during the Years 1839-43" (2 vols., London, 1847).

ROSS, John, or Kouweskouwe, Indian chief, b. in the Cherokee country, Ga., about 1790; d. in Washington, D. C., 1 Aug., 1866. He was a half-breed, and at an early age acquired a good English education. In 1817-18 Georgia attempted to induce the Cherokees to remove west of the Mississippi river, and for this purpose a liberal bribe was offered to Ross, who became chief of his tribe in 1828, by William McIntosh, a half-breed Creek; but this was refused and the Creek was publicly disgraced. The proceedings of the Georgia legislature with reference to the Cherokees in 1829 led to an appeal on the part of the Indians to the supreme court of the United States to declare them the agent. This resulted in a decision in their favor, but Georgia refused to obey, and aggressions upon the Indians increased. In 1835 a treaty was concluded between an agent of the United States and the Cherokees, a portion of the latter agreeing to surrender their lands and remove west within two years, while nearly 1,200 remained to become citizens of the states in which they resided, and are known as the Eastern band. Against this treaty Ross and more than 15,000 of his tribe protested in an appeal which was written by Ross and addressed to the president of the United States, saying that the treaty had been obtained fraudulently. The government sent a force under Gen. Winfield Scott, to compel its fulfillment. The Cherokees yielded, and, with Ross at their head, removed to their new home, a moderate allowance being made to them for their losses. Ross continued to be chief of the Cherokees. He at first resisted all movements connected with the civil war, issuing a proclamation of neutrality on 17 May, 1861, but on 20 Aug., 1861, he called a council at Talequah and formed an alliance with the Confederate states. His wife and daughter were held as hostages until the fall of Fort McKenney when an attempt was made to raise a Confederate flag over the council-house her opposition was so spirited that the act was prevented. Political questions originating in the sale of lands in Georgia divided the Cherokees into two parties, between which bitter enmity existed. One of these factions has been always known as the "Ross party," and was headed by William J. Ross, the son of John, who was appointed U. S. agent to the confederated tribes of the Indian territory. Ross was the author of a "Letter to a Gentleman in Philadelphia" (1836). By the act of 3 March, 1883, the Eastern band of Cherokees was authorized to institute a suit in the court of claims against the United States to determine its rights to stocks and lands held by the United States in trust for the Cherokees, arising out of the sale of lands west of the Mississippi, and also of the permanent annuity fund, to which suit the Cherokee nation west was made a party defendant. Judgment was rendered against the Eastern band, which was affirmed by the U. S. supreme court on 1 March, 1886, the decision determining the status of these Indians, whose condition became more unsettled.

ROSS, John, Canadian statesman, b. in the County Antrim, Ireland, 10 March, 1818; d. near Toronto, Canada, 31 Jan., 1871. He came to Can-
Ross, with his parents in infancy, and was educated at the district school, Brockville. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1829, and soon attained reputation as a practitioner and as a supporter of the Liberal party. In 1839 Mr. Ross was elected a member of the legislative council. He declined an executive office in the government, but in 1851 accepted that of solicitor-general. In 1852 he went to England to superintend the completion of the contracts for the construction of the Grand Trunk railway, and he was afterward president of this road for ten years. On his return to Canada he was attorney-general and speaker of the Legislative council till April, 1856; and in the beginning of 1858 he was appointed receiver-general in the administration of John A. Macdonald, retaining office until his colleagues were out of power in August of the same year. He resumed office a few days later as president of the executive council in Cartier's administration. At the time of the confederation he became a member of the Dominion senate. He was engaged in journalism at one time, and established a newspaper that advocated his favorite political reforms.

Ross, Sir John, British soldier, b. at Stonehouse, Cumberland, England, 18 March, 1829. He entered the army in 1846 as 2d lieutenant in the rifle brigade. He was present at the battles of the Alma and Inkerman in 1854, as adjutant of the 3d battalion, and was made a companion of the bath. He commanded the Bengal troops in the Perak expedition of 1875-6, and in 1878 was chosen to lead the brigade of Indian troops that was sent to Malta during the Eastern crisis. On his return to India he commanded the Calcutta district brigade, until he was given charge of the reserve division of the Afghan field force, under Sir Frederick Roberts, with which he participated in the operations in the Cabul to Candahar campaign. In charge of his services on this occasion he received the Afghan medal and star and was made a knight-commander of the bath, and received the thanks of parliament. In 1881 he was appointed to the command of the Poona division of the Bombay army, which he relinquished in 1886, when he was promoted lieutenant-general. In the spring of 1888 Sir John was appointed general officer commanding the forces in Canada, and in May of the same year he was sworn in as administrator of the government of Canada, pending the arrival of the newly appointed governor-general, Lord Stanley, of Preston.

Ross, John Jones, Canadian senator, b. in St. Anne de la Pêche, 16 Aug., 1852. He was educated at Quebec college and became a physician. Dr. Ross represented Champlain in the Canada assembly from 1861 till the union, when he was reappointed for that constituency to the Dominion parliament and the legislative assembly. In 1867 he resigned his seat in the latter on his appointment to the Legislative council of Quebec. He continued to represent Champlain in the Legislative council till 1874, when he retired. Dr. Ross was a member of the executive council of Quebec and speaker of the legislative council from 27 Feb., 1873, till August, 1874. He was reappointed on 27 Jan., 1876, and held office till March, 1878, when the ministry was dismissed by the lieutenant-governor. He again became a member of the executive council and speaker of the legislative council, 31 Oct., 1879, and was commissioner of agriculture and public works from July, 1881, till March, 1884. Dr. Ross was minister of education from 1878 to 1883. After the resignation of the Moussan ministry he formed an administration on 23 Jan., 1884, becoming premier and commissioner of agriculture and public works. He and the members of his administration resigned in January, 1887, and in April of the same year he was appointed a member of the Canadian Senate. Dr. Ross is also president of the Provincial medical physicians' association of Quebec and a member of the Agricultural council of Quebec, and was elected vice-president of the North Shore railway company in 1875.

Ross, Lawrence Sullivan, soldier, b. in Bentonport, Iowa, 27 Sept., 1838. He was graduated at Florence Wesleyan university, Florence, Ala., commanded Texas frontier troops under Gen. Samuel Houston, and became colonel of the 6th Texas regiment of cavalry in the Confederate army on 24 May, 1862. He was made brigadier-general 21 Dec., 1863, and led a brigade in Wheeler's cavalry corps of the Army of Tennessee. In 1886 Gen. Ross became governor of Texas.

Ross, Leonard Fulton, soldier, b. in Fulton county, Ill., 18 July, 1833. He was educated in the common schools of Illinois and studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1854. In 1846 he joined the 4th Illinois volunteers for the Mexican war, became 1st lieutenant, and was commissioned for his services at Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo, commanding the body-guard of Gen. James Shields while making a difficult reconnoissance. He also bore important despatches from Metamora to Gen. Zachary Taylor and to Gen. Robert Patterson in Victoria, Mexico. After the war he resumed his practice, and was probate judge for six years. He was chosen in May, 1861, colonel of the 17th Illinois regiment, which he raised, and served with it in Missouri and Kentucky, bearing himself with great gallantry at Fredericktown, Mo., 21 Oct., 1861, where his horse was shot under him. In 1862 he was in command of Fort Donelson, Tenn. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 25 April, 1862, after commanding a brigade since the capture of Fort Donelson, Tenn., 16 Feb., 1862. After the evacuation of Corinth, 30 May, 1862, he was promoted to the command of a division and stationed at Bolivar, Tenn. In 1867 he was appointed by President Johnson collector of internal revenue for the 9th district of Illinois. He has been three times a delegate to National Republican conventions, and was twice a defeated candidate for Congress. Since 1866 he has given his attention to farming and has been interested in various agricultural societies. He has imported fine stock into this country, and now (1898) has a large farm in Iowa. His brother, Lewis W., was a representative in Congress in 1869-70.

Ross, Robert, British soldier, b. in Ross Trevor, Devonshire, England, about 1766; d. in North Point, Md., 12 Sept., 1814. He was graduated at Trinity college, Dublin, became an officer in the 20th foot, served in Holland, Egypt, and the peninsula, and was selected by the Duke of Wellington to command the corps that was sent to this country in 1814. He arrived in Chesapeake bay with 3,500 men from Wellington's army, and was re-enforced by 1,000 marines from Sir George Cockburn's blockading squadron. The entire force landed at Benedict, on the Patuxent, near Washington. Ross advanced with caution, and, joining Cockburn, marched to Bladensburg, where he defeated the American army, consisting mostly of undisciplined militia, on 24 Aug., 1814, and burned and sacked Washington. He was killed while leading the advance toward Baltimore, Md.

ROSSEL, Elisabeth Paul Edouard (Rossel), Chevalier de, French navigator, b. in Sens, 11 Sept., 1765; d. in Paris, 20 Nov., 1829. He entered the marine guards in 1789, served under De Grasse in the West Indies, fought at Yorktown in October, 1781, and afterward served under Vaudreuil till the conclusion of peace in 1783. He was attached under D'Entrecasteaux to the station of the Indian ocean in 1785, became lieutenant in 1789, and was flag-captain during the expedition in search of La Pérouse (q. v.) in 1791-93, of which he assumed command in 1794 after the death of the two commanders. After publishing, at the expense of the government, the narrative of D'Entrecasteaux's expedition, he succeeded Flérier (q. v.) in 1811 as member of the longitude office, and in 1812 Bougainville (q. v.) in the institute. He was brevetted rear-admiral in 1822, and became, on 31 Dec., 1826, keeper of the logs and charts in the navy department, a post which he held up to the time of his death. He was one of the founders of the French geographical society in 1821, and its first president.
His works include "Instructions nautiques pour les côtes de la Guyane" (Paris, 1809); "Voyage de D'Entrecasteaux à la recherche de La Pérouse";
(2 vols., 1809); "Signaux de jour, de nuit et de brume" (2 vols., 1819-21); and "Instructions pour la description nautique des côtes de la Martinique." (6 vols., 1819-22.) He was also one of the chief editors of the "Collection des voyages et découvertes des Espagnoles dans l'Amérique du Sud" (10 vols., 1810).
His name has been given to a small island in the Pacific ocean south of America.

ROSSER, Leonidas, clergyman, b. in Peters-bury, 31 July, 1815; d. in Ashland, Va., 25 Jan., 1892. He was graduated at Wesleyan, and entered the New York conference of the Methodist church.
In 1839 he was transferred to the Virginia con-cference, where he had since been stationed, and was presiding elder of the districts of Fredericksburg in 1852-3, Norfolk in 1853-6, Lynchburg in 1856-8, Richmond in 1865-9, and Randolph Macon in 1877-81.
Dr. Rosser was delegate to the general conference of the Methodist church several years from 1850 till 1866, and during the civil war was general missionary to the Confederate army. In 1855 the degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Emory and Henry college, and during 1878-9 he edited the Richmond "Christian Advocate." His publications include "Baptism," its Nature, Obligation, Mode, Subjects, and Benefits (Richmond, 1843); "Experimental Religion, embracing Justification, Regeneration, Sanctification, and the Witness of the Spirit" (1854); "Class-Meetings" (1855); "Recognition in Heaven" (1856);
"Reply to Howell's "Evils of Infant Baptism"" (1856);
and "Open Communion" (1858).

ROSSER, Thomas Lafayette, soldier, b. in Campbell county, Va., 15 Oct., 1836. He entered the U. S. army in 1854, was appointed to the academy in Richmond, and was graduated in 1859. After leaving the service he was given command of a regiment of cavalry and attached to the Army of Northern Virginia. He attained the rank of brigadier-general on 10 Oct., 1863, and was given command of the Virginia cavalry in the Shenandoah valley. In this capacity he served under Gen. Jubal
A. Early when the latter was ordered to command the Confederate forces in the valley of the Shenandoah, and was present at the battle of Cedar Creek. Gen. Rosser was conspicuous for his services in this campaign, and was constantly opposed by Gen. George A. Custer, who had been his class-mate at the military academy.
In November, 1864, he was made a major-general of cavalry. After the war he turned his attention to engineering, and had charge of the Da-Kota, Yellowstone, and Missouri divisions of the Northern Pacific railroad from 1870 till 1879. He held the office of chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific railroad, president and general manager of the New South mining and improvement company, and consulting engineer of the Charleston, Cincinnati, and Chicago railroad company. Gen.
Rosser served in the war with Spain.

ROSSITER, Thomas Pritchard, artist, b. in New Haven, Conn., 29 Sept., 1817; d. in Cold Spring, N. Y., 17 May, 1871. He was educated in New Haven, and subsequently began the study of art with Daniel Jocelyn. About 1838 he began to practise his profession in his native city, but in 1840-1 he studied in London and Paris. During the next five years he studied in Rome, sketching and painting during the summers in Italy, Germany, and Switzerland. On his return to the United States he published himself in New York, where he was chiefly engaged on his scriptural pictures, "Mi-namin dancing before the Hosts," "Return of the Dove to the Ark," In 1853 he went
again to Europe, making an extended tour.
In December of the same year he opened a studio in Paris, where he remained about three years. During this time he produced "Joan of Arc in Prison," "Venice," "Wise and Foolish Virgins," and many other works. At the Universal exhibition of 1855 he received a gold medal for his "Venice in the 5th Century" (1854), and at the salon of the same year he was awarded a medal of the third class.
From 1856 till 1860 he was in New York, after which he removed to Cold Spring, where he resided until his death. He painted a large number of pictures, mostly historical or scriptural subjects, and also numerous portraits. Besides those already mentioned, he painted "The Representative Merchants," "The Home of Washington," painted in conjunction with Mignot (1858); "The Discoverers" (1859); "Washington's First Cabinet;" and a series of pictures on the "Life of Christ." He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1859, and an academician in 1849.
students he served in the defense of Paris when Napoelon retired to Elba, and on the restoration of the empire he applied for a commission, which would have been granted but for the defeat at Waterloo. In 1816 he came to Louisiana and settled at Natchez, Miss., and soon afterward he studied law with Joseph J. Davis. After his admission to the bar in 1820, he became chairman of the legislature, the population being largely French, and soon attained a profitable practice. In 1826 he was elected to the state senate, and four years later he was nominated for congressman, but was defeated. He then removed to New Orleans, and continued there in the practice of his profession until 1838, when he went to Europe. On his return he was appointed judge of the supreme court, but soon resigned to engage in agricultural pursuits. In 1840, when the reorganization of the court was effected, he again accepted a seat on the bench. On account of his ample knowledge of both civil and commercial law, he took rank among the foremost judges that Louisiana has ever possessed. It is said of him that "for clearness of diction and logical perspective in his presentation of legal principles, and for the facts of the case in hand, his decisions will stand comparison with those rendered by the fore-nest jurists in the land." On the formation of the provisional Confederate government he was appointed its commissioner to Spain, and remained abroad until after the civil war. He then resumed his practice, and devoted his energies to the restoration of his proprietary local principles.

ROSTAING, Just Antoine Henri Marie Germain, Marquis de, French soldier, b. in the town of Vaucouleurs, near Montbriçon, France, 24 Nov., 1740; d. there in September, 1826. He was first attached to the household of the "grand dauphin," and afterward was first page to Louis XV. After serving in Germany as a cavalry officer, he joined the musketeers in 1729, and became colonel of the Auxerrois regiment. He was transferred to the command of the Gâtinois, and ordered to this country under the command of Rochambeau, where he remained from 1780 till 1783. For his bravery in the attack on St. Lucia, and at the siege of Yorktown, he received the cross of St. Louis, and in 1792, went to France as a delegate to the constituent assembly, and on 20 March, 1792, was commissioned lieutenant-general. Shortly afterward he retired to his estates, where he spent his remaining days.

ROTH, Arthur (roch), architect, b. in Boston, 13 May, 1869; d. in Beverly, 15 Aug., 1894. He was graduated at Harvard in 1871, studied architecture in the Massachusetts institute of technology, and for five years in the École des beaux arts in Paris. While he was in France he had charge of the restoration of the Château de Chenonceau. In 1880 he became senior member of the firm of Rotch and Tilden, in Boston, and since that time he had built various churches and the Memorial Library building at Amherst, Mass., gymnasiums of Bowdoin college and Phillips Exeter academy, Associates' hall, high-school, and academy in Milton, Mass., the art schools and art museum of Wellesley college, and many private houses and business blocks throughout the United States. Mr. Rotch had exhibited water-colors in the Paris salon, the London academy, the New York academy of design, and elsewhere. He was chairman of the visiting committee of fine arts of Harvard university, and one of the corporation of the Massachusetts institute of technology. In conjunction with his brother and sisters he founded, as a memorial to his father, who married a daughter of Abbott Lawrence, the Rotch travelling scholarship, which annually sends a student of architecture to Europe for two years' study and travel.

ROTH, Charity Rodman, philanthropist, b. in Newport, R. I., 31 Oct., 1786; d. in Kendal, Ohio, 8 Aug., 1844. She was the daughter of a wealthy furnishier, and married Thomas Rotch, of Nantucket, in 1799. For some time she lived in that town, but in 1801 she settled in Hartford, and in 1811 falling health led her to take up her residence in Kendal, Ohio. Her husband died in 1825 and bequeathed to her his personal property to be disposed of as she should decide. She determined to found a school for orphaned destitute children, and a few years after her death the fund that she left reached the sum of $290,000. The interest of this money was subsequently applied to the purchase of a farm of 185 acres near Massillon, Ohio, on which was erected, at a cost of $8,000, a building for educational and dwelling purposes. In this institution boys are thoroughly instructed in the art of husbandry and girls in culinary duties and the mak-ging of spinning-apparel. The course is four years in length.

ROTH, John, clergyman, b. in Sarum, Prussia,
3 Feb., 1726; d. in York, Pa., 22 July, 1751. He was educated in the Roman Catholic church, but in 1748 united with the Moravians. In 1756 he was despatched to Pennsylvania, and three years later he entered the Moravian house mission, serving for seven years in Pennsylvania and Ohio. Returning to Pennsylvania in 1773, he was employed in rural congregations till his death. Roth made a special study of the Unami dialect of the Lenape language, and composed in it an extensive religious work, "Ein Versuch der Geschiehten unserm Herrn u. Heylandes Jesu Christi in das Deutscherische Übersetzer der Unami, von der Marter- Wache an bis zur Himmelfahrt unserm Herrn, im Yahr 1770 u. 1772 zu Tschecchjeschquäu-ning an der Susquehanna," which is still in manuscript.—His son, Joux Lewis (1753-1841), was the first white male child that was born in Ohio.

ROTHERMEL, Peter Frederick, artist, b. in Necsopack, Pa., 18 July, 1817; d. in Grassmere, Pa., 15 Aug., 1896. He had received little education, after studying land-surveying, took up the study of art at the age of twenty-two. He was instructed in drawing by John R. Smith, and subsequently became a pupil of Bass Otis in Philadelphia. During 1856-9 he was in Europe, residing for about two years in Rome, and visiting also the principal cities in England, France, Germany, Belgium, and Italy. He afterwards lived in Philadelphia, where he was elected a member of the Pennsylvania academy, of which institution he had been director from 1847 to 1855. He possessed much facility of composition, and had produced a large number of works, including "De Soto discovering the Mississippi" (1844); "Embarkation of Columbus in the Pennsylvania academy; "Christian Martyrs in the Coliseum;" and series of paintings illustrative of William H. Prescott's "History of the Conquest of Mexico" (about 1850): "The Virtuoso" (1855); "Vandyke and Rubens"; "King Lear" (1856); "Patrick Henry before the Virginia House of Burgesses"; "St. Agnes" (1858); "Paul at Ephesus"; "Paul before Agrippa"; "St. Paul preaching at Mars Hill to the Athenians"; and "Triumph of Peace"; "Battle of Gettysburg" (finished in 1871); in Memorial Hall, Fairmount park, Philadelphia; "The Landsknecht" (1857); and "Bacchantes" (1884). Very many of his paintings have been engraved.

ROTHROCK, Joseph Trimble, physician, b. in McVeytown, Pa., 9 April, 1839. He was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1864 and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1868. Dr. Rothrock began practice in Centre county, Pa., but in 1870 removed to Wilkesbarre, making a specialty of diseases of the eye and ear, and in 1876 established the North Mountain school of physical culture in Luzerne county, also during the same year he was appointed by the American philosophical society local examiner for the examination of the newly chartered legacy, and so has been able to contribute largely toward developing the growing forestry sentiment in Pennsylvania. In 1877 he was called to the chair of botany in the University of Pennsylvania, which he has since held. During the civil war he entered the army as a private in the 13th Pennsylvania cavalry, and became a captain in the 29th Pennsylvania cavalry. In 1863-66 he was associated with the exploring party of the Western Union extension telegraph in British Columbia, and in 1873-75 he was botanist and surgeon to the Geographical and geological exploration and survey west of the 100th meridian under Lieut. George M. Wheeler. He is a member of the American philosophical society and of the society of natural science. Before his appointment in vol. vi. of Lieut. Wheeler's reports, he is the author of various papers in medical journals, and of botanical memoirs.

ROTOURS, Jean Julien Augot (ro-toor), Baron des, French colonial governor, b. in the castle of Rotours, Orme, 2 June, 1715; d. in Paris, 28 March, 1814. He entered the navy, 11 June, 1731, took part in the expedition against Dominica, and, assisted in the engagement at Cape Français, 21 June, where, although bearing a flag of truce, he was taken prisoner by the negroes, but after released, and went on an American merchant-vessel to Philadelphia, where he was furnished the means of returning to France. He was promoted commander in 1780, and captain in 1784, and in 1786-91 made a successful campaign in the West Indian waters, for which he was created baron, 25 May, 1789. Afterward he was despatched with a corvette to protect the French fisheries on the coast of Newfoundland, when a difficulty with England threatened to end in war, and was promoted rear-admiral in 1781. Rotours was appointed governor-general of Guadeloupe in 1791, arrived there in 1792, but the following year his corps was incorporated with Palaski's, and he received good service at Warren Tavern and in central New Jersey. Toward the beginning of 1781 he was called away to France on account of family matters, but he returned in time to participate in the victory of Yorktown, and brought with him a supply of clothing and ammunition. He took part in the campaign of 1782 in the south, and was very severe in his denunciation of Gen. Gates on account of the defeat at Camden. On 26 March, 1783, he was made brigadier-general by congress and became a member of the Society of the Cincinnati. After the conclusion of peace he returned to France, where he lived in private till 1788, when he was elected one of the twelve deputies sent by the province of Angoumois, and there for the preservation of its privileges. The king, being irritated by his inconsiderate zeal, committed him to the Bastille for a few weeks. On his release in 1789 he bitterly denounced the principles of the revolution, and planned to unite the provinces of Brittany, Angoumois, and Poitou, and to raise an army to operate with the allies. His plans were approved by the council of ministers, and on 5 Dec., 1791, and he was appointed high royal commissioner in Brittany. On 5 March, 1792, the chiefs of the confederation met at his castle, and everything was in readiness for action, when the plot was revealed to the legislative assembly, and troops were sent to secure Rosarie. He eluded them for some days, but was made general of the national guard, on which occasion he fell ill after a short illness in the castle of Guimaras. His papers, which he had buried in an iron box six feet below the surface of the soil, were discovered by accident, and their contents caused the arrest of the whole family of Guimaras, of which twelve members were sent to the scaffold. A few weeks later the great uprising of Les Chouans was organized in Vendée on the plans that were left behind by La Rosarie. He was a man of great ability, urban and polished in manners, and an eloquent and persuasive speaker.

ROUSARD, Charles (pseud.), West Indian poet, b. in the Island of St. Martin in 1751; d. in Paris in 1779. He went in his youth to Paris, where he studied philosophy. His first verses attracted the attention of Voltaire, who complimented the young poet. In 1781 he became librarian of the navy department at Paris, which post he held till his death. His works include "Chants du soir et du matin" (1774); "Les quatre saisons" (1775); and "Le cycle de la conquête," an original work in prose. His poetry narrates the Spanish conquest of America (1783).

ROUFTORT, Augustus Louis, soldier, b. in Paris, France, 10 Dec., 1796; d. in Harrisburg, Pa., 2 Aug., 1878. He came with his father to Philadelphia, Pa., about 1805, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1817, and, after a short service in the marine corps in Washington and Philadelphia, resigned on 18 Aug., 1818. He was then professor of mathematics at Mount Airy college, Germantown, till 1826, and from that time till 1834 superintendent of a military school in that town, where many young men were prepared for West Point. He was reappointed in the army by Gen. Jackson as military store-keeper of ordnance in 1834, and served at Frankford arsenal till 1841, with the rank of captain. Meanwhile he had become an active Democratic politician, and was in the legislature in 1843-4, and harbor-master of Philadelphia in 1845-8. He had been made captain of Pennsylvania militia in 1820, and in 1843 had risen to the rank of brigadier-general, in which capacity he showed much vigor and prudence in suppressing the native American riots in 1843. He was connected with military schools from 1843 till 1856, and from 1853 till 1866 was mayor of Harrisburg, where he won reputation by his success in maintaining order during the crisis of the Confederate invasion. After this he engaged in literary pursuits till his death.

ROUND, William Marshall Fitts, author, b. in Pawtucket, R. I., 26 March, 1814. He received an excellent education in the public schools, but was not graduated, owing to ill health. In 1832 he was appointed U. S. commissioner to the World's fair that was held at Vienna in 1853, where he had charge of the New England department, and on his return he devoted himself to journalism and literature. He gave attention to the subject of prison reform, and in 1853 became corresponding secretary of the Prison association of New York. In 1856, with Franklin B. Sanborn, Francis Wayland, and others, he reorganized the National prison association of the United States, and was elected its secretary, and in 1866 he was sent as a delegate from the United States to the International penitentiary congress in Rome, Italy. Mr. Round laid out in 1857-8 the general scheme for the Auburn system of reform, and was an influential member for unruly boys, based upon the principles that have dominated the similar institution at Mettray in France and the Ruhenhans near Hamburg in Germany. His books include "Achesah, a New England Life-Study" (Boston, 1876); "Child Marion Alired" (1876); "The Call of the Wild" (1875); "Hall: the Adventures of a Clodhopper" (1878); and "Round Rock" (1880).

ROUNDS, Sterling Parker, printer, b. in Berkshire, Vt., 27 June, 1828; d. in Omaha, Neb., 17 Dec., 1887. At twelve years of age he removed with his parents to what is now Kenosha, Wis., and soon entered the printing-office of the "Southport American." He became in 1843 foreman in the state printing-office at Madison, afterward was in printing-offices at Milwaukee, Racine, and Buffalo, and migrated to Chicago in 1851. Here he engaged in the printing business, and soon afterward opened a printers' warehouse, which was kept in stock everything that was needed in the trade. In 1856 the business was extended by the addition of the printers' electrotypes foundry, and the first number of "Round's Printer's Cabinet," still in existence, was issued. Extending his business still further, he engaged in the manufacture of printing presses, the first that were made in this State. Rounds was appointed printer to the U. S. in 1881, but he removed to Omaha in 1885 and was identified with the "Republican" till his death.

ROQUETTE, Francois Dominique, poet, b. in New Orleans, La., 2 Jan., 1810; d. there, 10 May, 1890. He studied at the Orleans college, and then followed classical studies at the College de Nanteres in France. In 1828 he returned to the United States and studied law with William Rawle in Philadelphia. The active practice of his profession being uncongenial, he returned to France and had since devoted himself to writing. Besides his contributions to "L'abeille de la Nouvelle Orleans," the "Propagateur Catholique," and other journals, he has published "Les Mesachieens," (Paris, 1845); "13 Mardis a l'Hotel de Ville," "Mesachieens," and "Fleurs d'Amerique: Poésies nouvelles" (New Orleans, 1857). He has also written in French and English a historical work on the Choctaw nation.

His brother, Adrien Emmanuel, author, b. in New Orleans, La., 13 Feb., 1813; d. there, 15 July, 1887, was educated at the College de Nanteres, and spent ten years thereafter in the capitals of Europe. His chief works were the above-mentioned, but becoming interested in the Choctaw Indians, who were located in the parish of St. Tammany, he devoted his attention to their welfare. Determining to spend his life among them, he settled in their midst, learned their language, and, fixing it in print, taught the Indians to read and write. As the work progressed he became interested in the religious welfare, and in 1835 presented himself for orders in the Roman Catholic church. He continued among the Indians, who called him "Chatah-iona," during the troublesome times of the civil war, when their territory was alternately overrun by the soldiers of both armies. Abbe Rouquette worked in their behalf until the very end of his life, when failing health compelled him to return to New Orleans, where he spent his last days tenderly cared for by the Sisters of Charity at the Hotel Dieu. His scholarly attainments were universally recognized, and his poetry, written in the emotional and sentimental style of Chateaubriand, was commended by Sainte-Beuve and other French critics. His works include "Les Savanes, poésies américaines" (Paris, 1841), in which he is compared to Kentucky, and the best of his efforts, "Wild Flowers, or Poetical Poetry" (New Orleans, 1849); "La Thibetide en Amerique, on apologie de la vie solitaire et contemplative" (1852); "L'Antoniade, ou la solitude avec Dieu, poème cronitique" (1869); "Poèmes patriotiques" (1860); and "Catherine Teche-kwita" (1875). In 1853 he translated into French the select poems of Estelle Augusta Lewis, and also edited "The Life and Times of the Choctaws from Countries." His last work was a satire on George W. Cable's "Grandissimes," entitled "Critical Dialogue between Aboe and Caboe on a New Book, or a Grandissime Ascension," edited by E. Junius.

ROUS, John, naval officer, b. probably in Massachusetts; d. in Portsmouth, England, 5 April, 1799. He had command of the expedition from Massachusetts that in 1744 cut out a fleet of French vessels from the harbor of Fishhote, Newfoundland, and laid waste all the French posts on that coast. In 1745 he had "The Shirley" in the expedition against Cape Breton, and assisted in the capture of the French frigate "Vigilant" as she was approaching the coast. After the reduction of Louisbourg he was sent to England with despatches, and for his services was commissioned, 11 July, 1745, royal post-captain. He commanded the fleet that conveyed the expedition against the French in the Bay of Fundy, and afterward destroyed their forts and houses on St. John's river. Two years later he had the frigate "Winchebeau" in the unsuccessful expedition against Louisbourg, but was successful in the capture of a French sloop of sixteen guns after a stout resistance. Subsequently he had command of the "Sutherland," with which he participated in 1758 in the siege of Louisbourg, and in 1759 in that of Quebec. Capt. Roux was a member of the colonial council in 1754.

ROUSSEAU, Lovell Harrison, soldier, b. in Lincoln county, Ky., 4 Aug., 1808; d. in New Orleans, La., 7 Jan., 1869. He received but little schooling, and in 1828 his father, leaving a large family in reduced circumstances, on becoming of age he went to Louisville, Ky., and began the study of law. Subsequently he removed to Bloomfield, Ind., where in February, 1841, he was admitted to the bar. In 1844-5 he was elected to the Indiana legislature, of which he became an active member. He raised a company during the Mexican war, and was attached to the 21st Indiana regiment, with which he participated in the battle of Buena Vista. After the war, early in 1847, he took part in the whiskey rebellion of Missouri, and was made a captain in the 3d U. S. artillery. In 1847, four days after his return from Mexico, he was elected to the Indiana senate, and served for two terms. He removed to Louisville, Ky., in 1849, and there followed his profession, being very successful in the management of difficult cases, especially in addressing the jury. At the beginning of the civil war he was earnest in his efforts to restrain Kentucky from joining the Confederacy, and, resigning his seat in the state senate, began the organization of troops for the national army, and was appointed colonel of the 3d Kentucky volunteers in September, 1861. On 1 Oct., 1861, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers and attached to Gen. Ben. Carles Buell's army. He took part in the battle of Shiloh, where he led a brigade of Gen. Alexander M. McCook's division, and participated in the battle of Perryville on 8 Oct., 1862, where for his bravery he was promoted major-general of volunteers. Subsequently he succeeded Gen. Thomas M. Mitchell in the command of the 5th division of the Army of the Cumberland, serving with great credit in the battle of Stone River, the Tullahoma campaign, the movement at Chattanooga, and the battle of Chickamauga. From November, 1863, till November, 1865, when he resigned, he had command of the districts of Nashville, Tenn., and middle Tennessee, and during this time made a raid into Alabama, destroying the Montgomery and Atlanta lines of railroay. In 1864 he held the important post of Fort Rosecrans in the defence of Nashville against Gen. John B. Hood. He was elected to congress from Kentucky as a Republican, from 4 Dec., 1864, to 3 July, 1866, when he resigned after being censured by the house for publicly insulting Joseph B. Grinnel, of Iowa, in the capitol; but he was re-elected, serving from 3 Dec., 1866, till 3 March, 1867. He served on the committee on military affairs, and was one of the representatives that were selected to attend the funeral of Gen. Winfield Scott in 1866. President Johnson appointed him brigadier-general in the regular army on 28 March, 1867, and he also served at the same time the brevet of major-general in the U. S. army for services during the civil war. He was then sent officially to receive Alaska from the Russian government and to assume control of the territory. Gen. Rousseau was summoned to Washington to testify in the impeachment of President Johnson, and was subsequently assigned to the command of the Department of the Gulf, with headquarters at New Orleans. He succeeded Gen. Philip H. Sheridan in this command and continued there until his death.

ROUSSEL, Gabriel Edmund (roo-seel), French explorer, b. in Dinan in 1717; d. in Sevau in 1781. He accompanied La Condamine (q. v.) to South America, and afterward was sent to explore Brazil and the La Plata provinces, returning in 1739 with valuable collections, which were deposited in the Museum of natural history. At the instance of the Academy of sciences, Louis XVI. gave $2,000 from his privy purse for the publication of Roussel's works, which include "Voyages d'explorations à travers le Brésil, les Guianes et les contrées arrosées par la rivière de la Plata" (2 vols., Paris, 1781); "Flora Americana, seu genera plantarum quas in Amazonia crescent" (3 vols., 1784); "Récit de l'histoire et de la découverte du Brésil" (1785); and "Description générale de l'Amérique du Sud, sa flore et sa faune, ses produits, son état politique et commercial" (2 vols., 1786). ROUSSELOT DE SURGY, Jacques Phili bert (roos-eh-lo), French author, b. in Dijon, 26 June, 1737; d. in Paris, 11 March, 1791. He held for many years an office in the French treasury department, and afterward royal censor of new publications. His "Mélanges intéressants et curieux" (10 vols., Paris, 1764-5) treat of the natural, civil, and political history of Asia and America; the six last volumes are devoted to the latter country, and contain some interesting information that is scarcely to be found elsewhere, as the author in his official capacity had access to the French archives of state, many of which have been missing since the revolution of 1789. His other works include "Mémoires géographiques, physiques et historiques de l'Amérique du Sud" (4 vols., 1765), and "Histoire naturelle et politique de la Pensylvanie, et de l'établissement des quakers dans cette contrée," in part translated from the German of Kahns and Mitcheberg (3 vols., 1770).

ROUTH, Sir Randolph Isham, Canadian statesman, b. in Poole, England, in 1725; d. in London, 29 Nov., 1828. Sir Richard Routh, was at one time chief justice of Newfoundland. The son was educated at Eton, and served in the British army thirty-seven years. He was present in the peninsula and at Waterloo, and in 1828 was made a commissary-general. Having settled in Canada, he was a member of the executive council and received the honor of knighthood by patent.

ROUX DE ROCHELLE, Jean Baptiste Gaspar (1795-1872), French historian, b. in Lens, France, 1795; d. in Paris, March 15, 1872. He was consul at New York in 1822-4, and minister to the United States from 1839 till 1843. His works include "Les Turjias," a poem (Paris, 1816); "La Byzance," a poem (1822); "Histoire des Etats-Unis" (2 vols., 1835); and "Histoire de l'Empire de la Bolivie," a partial history of the conquest of Mexico.

ROWAN, John, jurist, b. in Pennsylvania in 1773; d. in Louisville, Ky., 13 July, 1855. He moved with his parents to Kentucky in 1783, and was educated in Bardstown. In 1795 he was admitted to the bar, and in 1799 he became a member of the State constitutional convention. He was chosen secretary of state in 1804, and was elected to congress from Kentucky, serving from 9 Jan., 1807, till 3 March, 1809. During 1819-21 he was judge of the court of appeals, and he attained a high reputation as a lawyer in criminal cases. Subsequently he was elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 5 Dec., 1823, till 3 March, 1831, during which time he made able speeches on the amending of the judicial system, and on imprisonment for debt. Later he was appointed commissioner of claims against Mexico under the treaty of 11 April, 1839, and was sent in 1848 as minister to Naples, where he remained until 1850. Judge Rowan was president of the Kentucky historical society in 1848-53, and published in 1850 his speeches in the senate on Henry S. Foote's resolution on the Mexican boundary. He was afterward commander of the U. S. navy, and during the Seminole war cruised in the sloop "Vandalia" on the west coast of Florida, conducting boat expeditions and participating in operations on shore from November, 1832, till October, 1836. He was commissioned as lieutenant, 8 March, 1837, served in the coast survey in 1838-40, was executive officer of the sloop "Cygne" in the Pacific squadron in 1846-8, and during the Mexican war took part in the capture of Monterey and San Diego, where he landed and hoisted the American flag, 29 July, 1846. On blockade duty in the Gulf of California the "Cygne" captured twenty Mexican vessels and caused the destruction of several gun-boats. Lieut. Rowan commanded the naval brigade under Com. Robert F. Stockton at the victories of San Gabriel and La Mesa, 9 and 10 Jan., 1847, was slightly wounded in the shoulder, and highly complimented for his valor by the President. He commanded an expedition ten miles into the interior of Mexico, where he routed a large force of Mexicans, who then ceased to attack the U. S. naval garrison. He was on ordinance duty in 1850-3 and again in 1857-61, commanded the store-ship "Relief" in 1853-5, and was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1855. When the civil war opened he was in charge of the steam sloop "Pawnee," which he brought to Washington from Philadelphia in February, 1861. Rowan was a resident of Norfolk, Va., where he had married, but, notwithstanding this and his affection to the south, he announced his adhesion to the National government, and was continued in the command of the "Pawnee." At the capture of Alexandria he covered the city with his guns. On 25 May, 1861, he took the "Pawnee" to Aquia creek and participated in the first naval engagement of the war by the attack on the Confederate batteries there. He commanded this vessel in the bombardment and capture of the forts at Hatteras, as the first in his squadron under Com. Stringham, and fully shared the honor of this success. Rowan then destroyed Fort Screveno, twenty miles south of Hatteras. In January, 1862, he led the vessels in Goldsborough's expedition to the sounds of North Carolina. The "Delaware" was his division flagship, and, in the attack on Roanoke island, 8 Feb., 1862, he directed the movements of the vessels. After the forts surrendered, the enemy's flotilla was pursued by Rowan with fourteen improvised gun-boats into Pascatoquit river, where he completely destroyed the Confederate vessels and defenses. Several expeditions were conducted by Rowan through the sounds of North Carolina. On 12 March, 1862, he and Com. Burnside cooperated in the expedition to New Bern, N. C., where he compelled the forts to capitulate. He also captured Fort Macon at Beaufort, N. C., 25 April, 1862, and continued to follow up his successes by expeditions until the authority of the government was completely re-established in the waters of North Carolina. Rowan was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862, and for his conspicuous gallantry he was next promoted to commodore on the same day. He next commanded the "New Ironsides" off Charleston, and in many months of constant conflict with the enemy increased his reputation. In the spring of 1864 his services in the "New Ironsides" were no longer required, and Rowan was relieved. He received a vote of thanks from congress, and on 25 July, 1866, was promoted to rear-admiral by selection, in recognition of his eminent services. He commanded the Norfolk navy-yard in 1866-'7, was commander-in-chief of the Asiatic squadron in 1868-'7, and while on this duty was promoted to vice-admiral. He was in command of the naval station at New York in 1872-'3, served as president of the board of examiners in 1876-'9, was governor of the Naval asylum at Philadelphia in 1881, and became superintendent of the Naval observatory in 1882. Admiral Rowan acted as chairman of the light-house board after January, 1883, at Washington, D. C.

ROWAN, Sir William, British general, b. in the Isle of Man, 18 June, 1789; d. in Bath, England, 26 Sept., 1879. He entered the army as an ensign in the 2nd regiment in 1802, and served with it for twenty-five years in the peninsular war, at Waterloo, and in North America. He was civil and military secretary to Lord Seaton, lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, from 1822 till 1829. He was made a major-general, in 1846, and in 1849 was appointed commander of the British forces in Canada, which post he held till 1855. During part of this time he was administrator of the government of Canada, while the Earl of Elgin was absent in England. He was knighted in 1836, and was a field-marshall, and colonel of the 52d foot at the time of his death.

ROWLAND, Henry Augustus, clergyman, b. in Windsor, Conn., 18 Sept., 1804; d. in Boston, 4 Sept., 1859. He was graduated at Yale in 1826, and at Andover theological seminary in 1827. During the three years following he was agent of the American Bible society in New York and Connecticut, and he was ordained in the Presbyterian church on 24 Nov., 1830. He was called to Fitchett, N. C., in 1831, and three years later to the parsonage of the Pearl street church, New York city. In 1843 he accepted charge of the Honesdale, Pa., parish, and from 1855 till his death was pastor of the Park Presbyterian church in Newark, N. J. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Union college in 1853. He published many single sermons, and, besides contributions to the religious press, was the author of "On the Common Maxims of Indulgence" (New York, 1850); "The Path of Life" (1851); "Life in a Dark Alley" (1852); and "The Way of Peace" (1853). See "Sermons of the Late Henry A. Rowland," by R. F. Fearon (New York, 1860). His son, Henry Augustus, physicist, b. in Honesdale, Pa., 27 Nov., 1818, was graduated at Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1830 as a civil engineer, and engaged during 1841 in the surveying of a railroad in western New York. He then taught for a time in Wooster university, but in 1852 returned to his home, and entered the arts and sciences, becoming assistant professor in 1854. Prof. Rowland spent a year abroad studying with Helmoltz in Berlin and in examining physical laboratories in Europe. In 1856 he was invited to accept the chair of physics, with charge of the laboratory, in the newly founded Johns Hopkins university, and he has since held that place. The honorary degree of Ph. D. was conferred upon him by that university in 1880. He was a member of the electrical congress that met in Paris in 1881, and served on the jury of the electrical exhibition there in that year, and for his services was made a chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Prof. Rowland is a permanent member of the International commission for establishing electrical units, is corresponding member of the French electrical institute, a fellow of the royal society, one of the twelve foreign members of the Physical society of London, and is an associate of the American academy of arts and sciences, from which in 1884 he received the Rumford medal for his researches in light and heat, and in 1881 he was elected to the National academy of sciences. In 1853 he presided over the section on physics of the American association for the advancement of science at Minneapolis, and delivered a valuable address entitled "A Plea for Pure Science." His original work has been extensive, and includes numerous researches that have been made under his supervision at the Johns Hopkins. While he was in Berlin he showed experimentally that a moving charge of statical electricity has the same magnetic effect as a current. His researches gained reputation by his large diffraction gratings, which are ruled, by a method of his own, directly on concave mirrors. An image of the spectrum is thus produced without the aid of lenses. The photographs of the solar spectrum that he has succeeded in making with the aid of these gratings, which are a great extension of his earlier work, have been done. They were exhibited at the National academy of sciences in 1883. He has also made an extremely accurate determination of the value of the ohm, the absolute unit of electrical resistance. Among his published works are: "On Magnetic Permanence" (1873); "On the Magnitude andMaximum Magnetization of Nickel and Cobalt" (1874); "Studies on Magnetic Distribution" (1875); "On a Magnetic Effect of Electric Connection" (1876); "Research on the Absolute Unit of Electrical Resistance" (1878); "On the Mechanical Equivalent of Heat" (1884); "On Concave Gratings and Interference" (1886); and "Research on Mixture of Northern and Southern Magnetic Elements," (1886); and the article on "Suns" in the "Encyclopaedia Britannica"; also he has published "The Mechanical Equivalent of Heat" (Baltimore, 1880), and "Photographs of the Normal Solar Spectrum" (seven plates, 1886).

ROWLANDSON, Mary, captive. She was a daughter of John White, and wife of the Rev. Joseph Rowlandson, the first minister of Lancaster, Mass., who died in 1878. On 10 Feb., 1867, during King Philip's war, the Indians surprised and burned Lancaster, and took her captive. For several days she had no food, and after her child was frozen to death and buried in the forest, she was sold by her Narragansett captor to Sagamore Hopkins. She was named One, the name of an uncomfortable mistress, who treated her with insolence. The Indians with whom she lived remained near the site of Petersham, Worcester co., Mass., until they crossed Connecticut river on hearing that they were pursued. Mrs. Rowlandson then met King Philip, who treated her with much civility. Soon the Indians returned to Worcester county. Timothy White, having heard that Mrs. Rowlandson went through almost every suffering but death. She was beaten, kicked, turned out of doors, refused food, insulted in the grossest manner, and at times almost starved. Nothing but experience can enable us to conceive what must be the hunger of a person by whom the discovery of six acorns and two chestnuts was regarded as a rich prize. At times, in order to make her miserable, they announced to her the death of her husband and children. Her captivity lasted nearly three months, and was ended through the agency of a resident of Concord, Mass. She was redeemed for about eighty dollars, which was contributed by several women of Boston. She published her experience in a book entitled the "Memoirs of Mary Rowlandson among the Indians" (Cambridge and London, 1822; 2d ed., Boston, 1720; new ed., 1723). The 5th edition was edited by Joseph Willard (Lancaster, Mass., 1828).

ROWLEY, Thomas Algeo, soldier, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 5 Oct., 1808; d. there, 14 May, 1886. He was educated in private schools, held several public offices in Pittsburg, and entered the U. S. army as 2d lieutenant of Pennsylvania volunteers to serve in the war with Mexico. He was afterward promoted to captain, and served in Maryland and District of Columbia regiments. From 1857 till 1860 he was clerk of the courts of Alleghany county, and at the beginning of the civil war he enlisted as captain in the 15th Pennsylvania volunteers, and served as a volunteer until the close of the war. Afterward he entered the U. S. army, rising as colonel of the 192d Pennsylvania volunteers, he served three years, was made brigadier-general for services at Fredericksburg, Va., on 29 Nov., 1862, and resigned his commission on 29 Dec., 1864. From 1866 till 1870 he was U. S. marshal for the western district of Pennsylvania, and he afterward held the office of mayor of Pittsburgh.

ROWLEY, William Roben, soldier, b. in Gouverneur, St. Lawrence co., N. Y., 8 Feb., 1824; d. in Chicago, Ill., 9 Feb., 1886. After teaching in Brown county, Ohio, he settled in Galena, Ill., where he held various civil offices, and in November, 1861, entered the military service as 1st lieutenant in the 45th Illinois regiment. After the capture of Fort Donelson he was commissioned captain in 1862. He was appointed aide-de-camp on staff of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant. He distinguished himself at Shiloh by riding from the thickest of the fight at the Hornet's Nest toward Crump's Landing with orders to Gen. Lewis Wallace to bring his troops to the field, for which service he was promoted major, 1 Nov., 1862. He served on the staff until the siege of Vicksburg, at which time he was temporarily reliefed from the staff, and acted as provost-marshal-general of the departments of the Tennessee and Cumberland, with headquarters at Columbus, Ky. When Gen. Grant was promoted lieutenant-general, Maj. Rowley was made lieutenant-colonel and military secretary on his staff, which office he held until 30 Aug., 1864, when he resigned, owing to impaired health. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865. He then returned to Galena, Ill., and was elected county judge in 1877, which office he held at his death, and was also engaged in real estate business. Before his death he was the only surviving member of Gen. Grant's military staff when he commanded the Army of the Tennessee, and he died on the day that closed the official term of Gen. Grant.

ROWSE, Samuel Worchester, b. in Bath, Me., 29 Jan., 1822. He has devoted himself to drawing in black and white, and his works in crayon, chiefly portraits and ideal heads of children, are well known to the public. Many of them have been reproduced by photography and other processes. Among his portraits are those of Ralph Waldo Emerson and Nathaniel Hawthorne.

ROWSON, Susanna, author, b. in Portsmouth, England, in 1762; d. in Boston, Mass., 2 March, 1824. She was the only daughter of Lieut. William Haswell, of the British navy, who, being engaged in the revenue service on the American station, settled in Nantasket, Mass. Miss Haswell's talents attracted the attention of James Otis, who was a frequent guest in her father's house, who called her "his little scholar." During the early part of the Revolution, Lieut. Haswell's property was confiscated, and he and his family were removed on parole to Hingham in 1775, and in 1777 to Abington. He subsequently sailed in a cartel with his family to England, and, after serving as governness, Miss Haswell married in 1786 William Rowson, a musician. In that year she published a novel, "Victoria" (London), which was dedicated to the Duchess of Devonshire, who introduced her to the Prince of Wales, from whom she procured a pension for her father. Her husband became bankrupt, and in 1792–5 she appeared on the stage with him in Edinburgh. In 1793 they came to this country, appearing for the first time in Annapolis, Md., and subsequently in Philadelphia and Baltimore. In 1796 she played in Boston at the Federal street theatre, appearing in several of her own plays, and closing with her comedy, "Americans in England," in May, 1797. She then opened a school for girls. She retired in 1822. Mrs. Rowson possessed many accomplishments, was active in charities, and was a successful teacher. She edited the Boston "Weekly Magazine," and contributed to other periodicals. She wrote numerous popular odes and songs. Her plays include "The Volunteers; a Farce," founded on the whiskey insurrection in western Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1793), and "The Slaves in Algiers," her most popular novel was "Charlotte Temple, or a Tale of Truth" (London, 1799). Montevideo, the hero, was in reality the author's kinsman, Col. John Montresor, while serving in the British army. Charlotte Rowson married Stanley, a descendant of the Earl of Derby, to embark with him in 1774 to New York, where he abandoned her. She died in the Old Tree House on Pell and Doyers streets at the age of nineteen years, and was buried in the grave-yard of Trinity church. In addition to the inscription, the slab bore the quarterings of the house of Derby, and in after-years the name of Charlotte Rowson has been carved on that of Derby.

Among Mrs. Rowson's publications are: "The Inquisitor, or Invisible Ramdahl" (3 vols., London, 1788; Philadelphia, 1794); "Trials of the Human Heart" (4 vols., Philadelphia, 1796); "Rowen and Rachel, or Tales of Old Times" (2 vols., 1798); and "Miscellaneous Poems" (Boston, 1801). Her sequel to "Charlotte Temple," entitled "Lucy Temple, or the Three Orphans," was published after her death (Boston, 1829). See a memoir by Elias Nason (Albany, 1870). — Her sister-in-law, Charlotte Rowson, b. near London about 1775; d. in 1855, came to this country in 1793 and appeared on the stage in light characters and sang popular songs with much effect. She married William P. Johnston, of Philadelphia, publisher of the first New York daily paper."She of Canada," by David Clapckmite (p. 2), became an eminent artist.

ROYAL, Joseph, Canadian statesman, b. in Repentigny, Quebec, 7 May, 1837. He was educated at the Jesuit college, Montreal, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada in 1864, and to that of Manitoba in 1871. He served in important cases, retired in 1880, and is now generalissimo of the credit foncier of Montraville, Que. He has written much for the French Canadian periodical press for many years, and edited and established various newspapers. He was elected to the legislative assembly of Manitoba in 1870, and was re-elected in 1875 and 1878. In 1879 he was chosen to the Dominion parliament, and he was re-elected in 1882 and 1887. He was appointed speaker of the legislative council of Manitoba in 1873, which post he held till March, 1872, when he was appointed a member of the executive council and provincial secretary, but resigned in July, 1874. He was minister of public works from 3 Dec., 1874, till he was appointed attorney-general in May, 1876, and held the latter office till the resignation of the government, when he became minister of public works in the new administration. He was appointed a member of the executive council of the Northwest territory in 1873, and was the first superintendent of education for Manitoba. He has been a delegate to Ottawa on the subject of obtaining better terms for Manitoba, and also regarding the enlargement of her boundaries. In October, 1875, he aided in securing a report on the government of Manitoba and the Dominion. Mr. Royal was a commissioner to consolidate the statutes of Manitoba in 1875, and since that year has been 1st vice-chancellor of the University of Manitoba. He received the confederation medal in 1885, and in June, 1888, was appointed lieutenant-governor of the Northwest territory. He is the author of "Le prétendu de charme" (1871); "La politique de Sire Louis II. Lafontaine" (1864); "Considerations sur les nombreux changements constitutionnels de l'Amérique Britannique du Nord, l'annexion" (1866); "Notes par un Néocoléen" (1866); "Le colonisation en 1866" (1867); "Le sacrifice et l'égoïsme" (1867); and "Le goût-théorique" (1867).
ROYALL, Anne, editor, b. in Virginia, 11 June, 1739; d. in Washington, D.C., 1 Oct., 1854. She was stolen by the Indians in early life and remained with them fifteen years. Afterward she married a Capt. Royall and settled in Alabama, where she learned to read and write. Subsequently she removed to Washington, D.C., where she secured an old Ramage printing-press and a font of lettered type, and with the aid of journeymen printers published on Capitol hill a small weekly sheet called the "Washington Paul Pry," and afterward the "Huntress." John Quincy Adams described her as going about "like a virago-servant in enchanted armor, redeeming herself from the cramps of indigence by the notoriety of her eccentricities and the forced currency they gave to her publications." She was a prominent character during the succeeding administrations, and John W. Forney says: "She was the terror of politicians, and especially of congressmen. I can see her now trumpeting through the halls of the old capitol, umbrella in hand, seizing upon every passer-by and offering her book for sale. Any public man who refused to buy was certain of a severe philippic in her newspaper, or a severe personal assault upon a woman of great industry and astonishing memory sufficient to tire of a vacation which grew more and more unprofitable with better times and milder manners." At last she became so unendurable that she was formally indicted by the grand jury as a common scold, and was tried in the circuit court before Judge William Cranch, and sentenced to be ducked, according to the English law in force in the District of Columbia; but this was delayed with a fine. Mrs. Royall was the author of "Sketches of History, Life, and Manners in the United States by a Traveller." (New Haven, 1826); "The Tennessean, a Novel founded on Facts" (1827); "The Black Book, or a Continuation of Travels in the United States" (Washington, 1828); "The Black Book, or Sketches of History, Life, and Manners in the United States" (3 vols., 1829); "A Southern Tour, or a Second Series of the Black Book" (2 vols., 1830-1); and "Letters from Alabama" (1830).

ROYALL, Isaac, b. in Antigua in 1719; d. in England in October, 1781. He was a wealthy resident of Medford, which he represented for many years in the general court. For twenty-two years he belonged to the committee of safety, and the council of war, and participated in the French war, and was appointed brigadier-general in 1761, being the first resident of New England to bear that title. During the Revolution he sympathized with Great Britain, and left this country on 16 April, 1775. He was present at, and his estate was confiscated in 1778, and it is said that "to carry on his farm after his departure was found to be sometimes difficult, for the honest man's scythe refused to cut Tory grass, and his oxen would not plough Tory ground." Among numerous bequests, he left 2,000 acres of land in Worcester county, Mass., for the endowment of a law professorship in Harvard. This was established in 1815, and is known by his name. The town of Royallton, Worcester Co., Mass., was named for him. One of his daughters married the younger Sir William Pepperrell.

ROYALL, William Bedford, soldier, b. in Virginia, 15 April, 1825; d. in Washington, 13 Dec., 1895. He took part in the Mexican war as 1st lieutenant of Missouri mountain volunteers, and did good service at the capture of Buena de Tas and in the capture of Monterey. He returned to civil life in October, 1848. In recognition of his gallantry he received a commission in the regular army, dating from 3 March, 1855, and he participated in an expedition to the headwaters of Conchos river in the following year. In 1857 he won great credit by a brilliant defense of his camp against hostile Comanches. Escaping from Texas in the beginning of the civil war, he was commissioned as captain, 21 March, 1861, and was engaged at Falling Waters, the siege of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Hanover Court-House, where he earned the brevet of major, and Old Church, where he cut through the enemy's entanglements driving sabre wounds which disabled him for several years. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, was made a major on 7 Dec., 1863, and during the remaining period of the war was engaged in recruiting service. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted colonel. In 1868 he took the field against the hostile Indians in Kansas, commanding in a combat at Prairie Dog creek. For a part of the time he was the commander of the Republican river expedition of 1869, and was engaged in several affairs with the hostile Indians. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel on 2 Dec., 1875, and in 1876 took part in the Yellowstone expedition, and was engaged at Rosebud creek and in other actions. He was promoted colonel of cavalry on 1 Nov., 1882, and retired from active service on 31 March, 1887.

ROYCE, Josiah, author, b. in Grass Valley, Nevada Co., Cal., 29 Nov., 1855. He was graduated at the University of California in 1875, studied at Leipsic and Göttingen in 1875-6 and in 1876-7 was a fellow of Johns Hopkins university, where he obtained the degree of Ph. D. in 1878. He was instructor in English literature and logic at the University of California in 1878-80, and from 1880 till 1885 instructor in philosophy at Harvard, and since 1885 he has been assistant professor of philosophy there. He is the author of "A Primer of Logical Analysis, for the Use of Composition Students" (San Francisco, 1881); "The Religious Aspect of Philosophy; a Critique of the Basis of Conduct and Faith" (Boston, 1885); "California from the Conquest in 1846 to the Second Vigilance Committee; a Study of American Character," in the "American Commonwealth" series (1886); "The Foul of Oakfield Creek; a Novel of California Life" (1887); and "The Spirit of Modern Philosophy."

ROYCE, Stephen, governor of Vermont, b. in Tunbridge, Vt., 12 Aug., 1877; d. in East Berkshire, Vt., 13 Nov., 1878. He was brevetted colonel and brigade-general, U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865, for faithful and meritorious services in recruiting the armies of the United States. From 1865 till 1870 he served as professor of military science in the University of Texas.

RUFIN, Armand Gustave (row-fan), French explorer, b. in Landerneau in 1731; d. in New Orleans, La., in 1789. He entered the colonial administration in early life, and held offices in St. Lucia, Martinique, and Santo Domingo. In 1777 he was king's deputy-lieutenant at Cayenne, and in 1783 was in charge of the administration of Dutch Guiana, which had been retaken from the English. After the conclusion of peace he set out on a voyage of exploration through the basins of Amazon and Orinoco rivers, and during a sojourn of thirty-two months made a valuable collection of specimens in natural history. Toward the beginning of 1789 he was sent to explore the upper basin of Mississippi river, but he died in New Orleans of yellow fever a few days after his arrival in that place. His works include "Tableau statistique et économique des Guianes" (Paris, 1783); "Voyage à travers les déserts de l'Amazonie" (1784); "Quinze mois sur les bords de l'Orinoc" (1787); "Choix de plantes et d'insectes peu connus des Guianes et du Brésil" (1789); and "Observations sur les mers françaises" (Paris, 1788).

RUFIN, Edmund (raf-fin), agriculturist, b. in Prince George county, Va., 5 Jan., 1794; d. on his estate of Redmoor, in Amelia county, Va., 15 June, 1845. In 1810–12 he attended William and Mary college. He served in the legislature, was secretary of the state board of agriculture, agricultural surveyor of South Carolina, for many years was president of the Virginia agricultural society, and was the discoverer of the value of marl as a fertilizer of poor soil, by the use of which millions of dollars were added to the value of the real estate of eastern Virginia. He was a state-rights man and a secessionist, and was a member of the Palmetto guard of South Carolina. At the beginning of the civil war he went to South Carolina, and, by order of Gen. Beauregard, his company was ordered to open fire on Fort Sumter, and as the oldest member he was selected by his comrades to fire the first gun, 12 April, 1861. He shot himself because he was unwilling to live under the U. S. government. Among other agricultural papers he edited the "Farmer's Register" from 1835 till 1842, and he also left on chirography the "Essai sur l'agriculture du comté de Richmond, Va." (1831); "Essay on Agricultural Education" (1833); "Anticipations of the Future to serve as Lessons for the Present Time" (1839); and edited "The Westover Manuscripts, containing the History of the Dividing-Line between Virginia and North Carolina; a Journey to the Land of Eden, A. D. 1781; and a Progress to the Mines," by William Byrd, of Westover (Petersburg, 1841; 2d ed., 2 vols., Albany, 1866).

RUFIN, George Lewis, lawyer, b. in Richmond, Va., 16 Dec., 1834; d. in Boston, Mass., 19 Nov., 1886. He was of African descent, but of free parentage and was educated at the public schools in Boston. He became a baccalaureate of Harvard and after graduation at Harvard in 1860 practised with success in Boston, served in the legislature as a Republican, and was appointed by Gov. Benjamin F. Butler judge of the municipal court in the Charlestown district in 1883, being the only colored justice that held office in New England.

RUFIN, Thomas, jurist, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 17 Nov., 1787; d. in Hillsboro, N. C., 15 Jan., 1870. After graduation at Princeton in 1805 he studied law, and removed to Hillsboro', N. C., in 1807. He served in the legislature in 1813–16, becoming speaker in the latter year, was judge of the supreme court in 1816–18, and elected again from 1823, and was chief justice of the state supreme court in 1859 and 1863. He was a delegate to the Peace congress that met in Washington in 1861. The University of North Carolina conferred on him in 1864 an LL. D. degree.

RUFINER, Henry, educator, b. in Page county, Va., 19 Jan., 1789; d. in Malden, Kanawha co., Va., 17 Dec., 1861. His father removed to the valley of the Great Kanawha, where he bought large tracts of land, and was one of the first to manufacture salt there. The son was graduated at Washington college, Va., in 1814, studied theology, was licensed by the presbytery of Lexington in 1819, and held various pasteurates in the vicinity. He was professor at Washington college (now Washington and Lee university) from 1819 till 1837, and its president from 1837 till 1848, when he resigned and retired to his farm. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Princeton in 1838 and that of L. D. by Washington in 1848. He was the author of "On the Disposition of the Horizon of Future Punishment" (Richmond, 1829); "Inaugural Address" (Lexington, 1837); "Judith Bensadili, a Romance" (1840); "The Fathers of the Desert, or an Account of the Origin and Practice of Monks" (2 vols., New York, 1850); and several discourses, among which was an address against slavery, known as "The Early Days of the American Republic" (1847).

RUZ DE LA VISON, Etienne (roo), West Indian physician, b. in St. Pierre, Martinique, 14 Jan., 1806. He studied medicine in Paris, was admitted among the pupils of the Hôtel Dieu hospital, and in 1835 obtained his diploma as doctor. In 1836 he was sent by the government to Marseille to inquire into the means of checking an epidemic of Asiatic cholera. In 1837 he returned to Martinique to practise his profession, and became afterward chief surgeon of the hospital of St. Pierre, and superintendent of the lunatic asylum of the colony. He specially engaged in researches upon the poisons that were used by the negroes and the extinct tribes of Carib Indians, and presented some interesting contributions on this subject to the French academy of medicine, which were printed in the annals of that society. After the revolution of 1848 he was president of the state council of the colony in 1848–52. Returning to Paris in 1856, he was manager of the Zoological garden of accclimatization in 1860—5, was elected delegate of Martinique to the colonial committee in 1856—7, and in 1875 became an associate member of the French academy of medicine. His works include "Études historiques et statistiques sur la population de Saint Pierre de la Martinique" (St. Pierre, 1854); "Mémoire sur la maison des aliénés de Saint Pierre de la Martinique" (Paris, 1858); and "Enquête sur le Bothrops lanceolé, ou vipère fer de lance, le serpent de la Martinique" (1860).

RUGENDAS, Johann Moritz, German artist, b. in Munich, 1802; d. in Weilheim, Württemberg, 29 May, 1858. He devoted himself more particularly to illustrating his pencil the life and scenery of Mexico and South America, where he travelled at various times between 1821 and 1847. The sketches that he made in Brazil were lithographed and published with German text (Paris, 1827—33), and his portfolios of South American sketches and studies were purchased by the government, at Munich. His oil-painting, "Columbus taking Possession of the New World" (1855), is in the New Pinakothek, Munich.

RUGER, Thomas Howard, soldier, b. in Lima, Livingston co., N. Y., 2 April, 1833. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1854, assigned to the engineer corps, and worked on the construction of the explosion tunnels, Lee's Hill, 1 April, 1855, and from 1856 till the civil war practised law in Janesville, Wis. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d Wisconsin regiment, 29 June, 1861, and its colonel on 20 Aug., and commanded it in Maryland and the Shenandoah valley till August, 1862, after which he was in the northern Virginia and Maryland campaigns. He was commissioned brigadier-general on 29 Nov., 1862, led a brigade in the Rappahannock campaigns, and commanded a division at Gettysburg. In the summer of 1863 he was in New York city, where he aided in suppressing the draft riots. He then guarded the Nashville and Chattanooga railroad in Tennessee till April, 1864, led a brigade in Sherman's advance into Georgia in November, 1864, of the 23d army corps that took part in the campaign against Gen. John B. Hood's army in Tennessee, receiving the brevet of major-general of volunteers, 30 Nov., 1864, for services at the battle of Franklin. He then organized a division at Nashville, led it from February to June, 1865, in North Carolina, and then had charge of the department of that state till June, 1866, when he was mustered out. He accepted a colonelcy in the regular army, 28 July, 1866, and on 2 March, 1867, was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for services at Gettysburg. From January till July, 1868, he was provisional governor of Georgia, and from 1871 till 1876 he was superintendent of the U. S. military academy. From the last year till 1878, he was stationed in charge of the Department of the South, and in 1876 he commanded the troops during the trouble in South Carolina incident to the claims of rival state governments. (See Chamberlain, D. H.) He then commanded posts in the south and west, and on 10 March, 1886, was promoted brigadier-general. After temporarily commanding the Department of the Missouri 4 April, and Missouri 28 May, 1888, he was placed in charge of "St. Louis" and Dakota, and later was in command of the Department of the East. He was retired in 1897.

RUGER, William Crawford, jurist, b. in Bridgewater, N. Y., 30 Jan., 1824; d. in Syracuse, 14 Jan., 1892. He was educated at Bridgewater academy, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Bridgewater and Syracuse. He was counsel for the defendants in the "cannon-organ" prosecutions that were instituted by Gov. Samuel J. Tilden. He was a member of the Democratic national convention in 1872, and twice a candidate for congress. In 1876 he was president of the convention in Albany at which the State bar association was formed. In 1882 he was elected chief judge of the New York court of appeals.

RUGGLES, Benjamin,son, b. in Windham county, Conn., in 1784; d. in St. Clairsville, Ohio, 2 Sept., 1857. He obtained a classical education by teaching during the winters, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He removed to Marietta, Ohio, and subsequently to St. Clairsville, and in 1810 became president judge of the court of common pleas for the third circuit. In 1815 he was chosen U. S. senator, and he served until 1833, gaining by his habits of industry the name of the "wheel-horse of the senate." In 1836 he was chosen a presidential elector on the Whig ticket.

RUGGLES, Daniel, soldier, b. in Barre, Mass., 31 Jan., 1810; d. in Fredericksville, 1 June, 1857. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and served on frontier and recruiting duty till the Mexican war, in which, after his promotion as captain, 18 June, 1846, he was called to active duty at the gallantry at Contreras and Churubusco, and that of lieutenant-colonel for Chapultepec. He then served mostly in Texas till his resignation on 7 May, 1861, for two years before which he had been on sick leave of absence. He then joined the Confederate army, was commissioned brigadier-general in the same year, served in New Orleans, and led a division at Shiloh, and in November, 1863, and commanded the Department of the Mississippi. He repelled raids on the northern and southern borders of the state in 1863—4, and in 1865 was commissary-general of prisoners. After the war he took charge of his large estate near Palafax, Tex., and also resided at Fredericksville, Va., where he died.

RUGGLE, John, army officer, b. in Waterborough, Mass., in 1790; d. in Thomaston, Me., 20 June, 1874. He was graduated at Brown in 1813, studied law, and began to practise in Skowhegan, Me., but removed to Thomaston in 1818. He served in the lower house of the legislature in 1823—31, as its speaker in 1825—9 and 1831, and resigned in the last-named year to become judge of the district court of the state, in place of Samuel E. Smith, who had been chosen governor. He was then chosen U. S. senator as a Democrat in place of Peleg Sprague, who had resigned, and served from 6 Feb., 1833, till 3 March, 1841. He afterward returned to the practice of law.

RUGGLES, Samuel Bulkley, lawyer, b. in New Milford, Conn., 11 April, 1806; d. on Fire Island, N. Y., 13 Jan., 1888. In his early age to Poughkeepsie, was graduated at Yale in 1814, studied law in the office of his father, Philo, who was surrogate and district attorney at Poughkeepsie, and was admitted to the bar in 1821. He was elected a member of the assembly of 1828, and, as chairman of the committee on ways and means, presented a "Report upon the Finances of Internal Improvements of the State of New York," which led the state to enter upon a new policy in its commercial development. This report proposed to borrow sums of money sufficient to enlarge the Erie canal within five years, and not, as had been at first decided, to rely upon part of the tolls to pay for the enlargement while waiting twenty years. The enlargement was not made at once, but Mr. Ruggles's views, which were much assailed, were amply vindicated by the event. He was a commissioner to determine the route of the Erie railroad, and a director in 1836-9, a director and promoter of the Bank of commerce in 1839, commissioner of the Croton aqueduct in 1842, delegate from the United States to the International statistical congresses at Berlin in 1853 and the Hague in 1869, U. S. commissioner to the Paris exposition of 1867, and delegate to the International monetary conference that was held there. He laid out Gramercy park, in the city of New York, in 1831, gave it its name, and presented it to the surrounding property-owners. He also had a considerable influence upon shaping Union square, where he resided, and he selected the name of Lexington avenue. He was for a long term of years a trustee of the Astor library, and he held the same office in Columbia college from 1836 till the end of his life. He was also a member of the Chamber of commerce of the state of New York, and of the General convention of the Protestant Episcopal church. Mr. Ruggles's claim to distinction rests chiefly upon his canal policy, and the steadfast attendance that he continued to give to the Erie canal, both as a private citizen during his life and as canal commissioner, in which office he served from 1840 till 1842, and again in the year 1858. Yale gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1859. Among his numerous printed papers are "Report upon Finances and Internal Improvements" (1838); "Vindication of Canal Policy" (1858); "Defence of Improvement of Navigable Waters by the General Government" (1872); "Law of Burial" (1858); "Report on State of Canals in 1858" (1859); reports on the Statistical congress at Berlin (1867), the statistical congress at the Hague (1851); "Report to the Chairman of the Committee on Canals" (1854); and a "Consolidated Table of National Progress in Cheapering Food" (1889).—His cousin, Charles Herman, jurist, b. in Litchfield county, Conn., 10 Feb., 1789; d. in Doughtkeeper, N. Y., 16 June, 1865, received a good education, studied law, and began practice in Kingston, N. Y. He was a member of the New York legislature in 1820, and was elected immediately afterward to congress, serving in 1821-3. He then served as a judge of the Dutchess county circuit court, was again in the legislature, and in 1853 became a judge of the court of appeals of the state of New York, but resigned in 1855.—Charles Herman's nephew, George David, soldier, b. in Newburg, N. Y., 11 Sept., 1833, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1855, and assigned to the mounted rifles. He served on frontier duty, including three Indian expeditions, till the civil war, and in 1858 was acting adjutant-general of the Department of the West, at St. Louis. In July, 1861, he was commissioned colonel of the staff on 28 June, 1862, was chief of staff of the Army of Virginia in Gen. John Pope's campaign, and continued to serve as an additional aide-de-camp throughout the war, sometimes with the Army of the Potomac, of which he was adjutant-general from February till June, 1863, and sometimes in Washington. He took part in the battles of Antietam and South Mountain, and the assault and capture of Petersburg. On 9 April, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, and continued to serve as adjutant-general, which resulted in the fall of Richmond and surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia under Gen. Robert E. Lee, and he was also given brevet commissions in the regular army to date from 13 March, including that of brigadier-general. Since the war he had served as adjutant-general of various departments. In 1893 he became adjutant-general of the army and was retired in 1897.

RUGGLES, Timothy, lawyer, b. in Rochester, Mass., 20 Oct., 1711; d. in Wilmot, Nova Scotia, 4 Aug., 1765. He was a son of Rev. Timothy Ruggles, of Rochester. He was graduated at Harvard in 1732, and began the practice of law in Rochester, but removed to Sandwich about 1737, and thence to Naukeagus, on the New River. He opened a tavern, and personally attended the bar and stable, while continuing to practice his profession. He was one of the best lawyers in the province of Massachusetts, and before his removal to Hardwick the principal antagonist of James Otis, senior, in causes of importance, as at a later period was the chief opponent of James Otis, junior, in contests in the criminal court. In 1755 he was commissioned a judge of the court of common pleas of Worcester county, and on 21 Jan., 1762, he became its chief justice. The latter office he held until the Revolution. He was also appointed, 23 Feb., 1763, a special justice of the superior court of the province. Mr. Ruggles was a representative in the general court from Rochester in 1736, from Sandwich for eight years between 1739 and 1752, and from Hardwick fifteen years between 1754 and 1770. He was speaker of the house in 1762 and 1763. In 1765 he was chosen one of the delegates from Massachusetts to the stamp act congress of that year in New York, and was elected its president, but refused to sign the resolutions of the congress. During the Revolutionary war he went to Great Britain, and was censured for the refusal by the general court of Massachusetts and reprimanded in his place from the speaker's chair. Nine years later he accepted an appointment as mandamis-counselor, and took the oath of office, 16 Aug., 1774. Ruggles rendered service in the French war that began in 1754 and ended in 1763. He had the rank of colonel in the expedition of Sir William Johnson against Crown Point in 1755, and in the battle of Lake George, where the French, under Baron Dieskau, met with a signal defeat, he was next in command to Johnson. In 1758-60 he served as brigadier-general under Lord Amherst, and accompanied that general in his expedition against Canada. In 1769-70, in the campaign that was made by the general court of Massachusetts in January, 1764, of a farm in Princeton. A few years later he was appointed a surveyor-general of the king's forests in the province, and in the northern part of Nova Scotia. Lucius R. Page, who in his "History of Hardwick" (Boston, 1883) has given the best and latest account of Gen. Ruggles, has written that "the whole progress of the citizens of Massachusetts, and indeed of New England, in both military and civil affairs." In the years that immediately preceded the Revolution, tion. Timothy Ruggles had been the leader of the king's party in the general court; and when the British troops left Boston in 1775 he went with them, but there is no evidence, however, that he took an active part in the war against his countrymen. It has been said of him that "he applied the spirit which led to the Revolution, but regarded the violent efforts practised to effect the separation of the provinces from the mother country as impolitic, and left to others the task of restoring his country's property confiscated by the government of Massachusetts, but Great Britain gave him land in Nova Scotia, and after the close of the Revolutionary war he settled there and spent the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits. In his new home, as before in Hardwick, he rendered lasting service to his neighbors by the use of scientific methods in farming and by the introduction of choice breeds of cattle and horses. He was more than six feet in height, careful in his dress, and had an expressive countenance. He was commanding and dignified in appearance and fearless in demeanor. His wit was ready and brilliant, his mind was clear, comprehensive, and penetrating. He was a forceful and convincing public speaker. Though advanced in years, he maintained the same time profuse in hospitality. As a military officer he was noted for cool bravery and excellence of judgment, as well as for knowledge of the art of warfare. "There were few men in the province," wrote Joseph Willard, "more justly distinguished than Ruggles, and few who were more severely dealt with in the bitter controversies preceding the Revolution." "Had he been so fortunate," wrote Christopher C. Baldwin, "as to have embraced the popular sentiments of the time, there is no doubt he would have been ranked among the leading characters of the Revolution." See an article by Christopher C. Baldwin on Timothy Ruggles in the "Worcester Magazine" (1826), and addresses before the Members of the bar of Worcester county, Mass., by Joseph Willard (1829), Emory Washburn (1826), and Dwight Foster (1878); also Emory Washburn's "Sketches of the Judicial History of Massachusetts from 1630 to the Revolution in 1775" (Boston, 1840).

RUGGLES, William, educator, b. in Rochester, Mass., 5 Sept. 1737; d. in Washington, D. C., 19 Sept. 1877. He was graduated at Brown in 1820, and in 1832 became a tutor in Columbian college, D. C., and afterwards to the chair of natural philosophy and natural philosophy. He remained in this office until his death, completing the term of fifty-five years as teacher in one institution. Prof. Ruggles was a generous contributor to charitable objects, especially those of the Baptist denomination. To Karen theological school, in Burham, he gave during his life $15,000, and at his death he left a legacy of $57,000. He was graduated at Brown with the honorary degree of D. D. in 1852.

RULISON, Nelson Somerville, P. E., bishop, b. in Carthage, N. Y., 24 April, 1842; d. in Mannheim, Germany, 1 Sept. 1897. His early education was obtained at the Wesleyan academy, Gouverneur, N. Y. He entered the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, was graduated in 1866, and was elected deacon in Grace church, Utica, N. Y., 27 May, 1866, by Bishop Coxe, and priest, in the Church of the Annunciation, New York city, 30 Nov., 1866, by Bishop Horatio Potter. The first year of his ministry he served as assistant minister in the Church of the Annunciation, New York city. In 1867 he became rector of Zion church, Morris, N. Y., and in 1875 Bishop Rulison appointed him to the see of Mahoning, and Bishop Rulison ordained and consecrated him bishop. He founded and built St. John's free church, and labored there for nearly seven years. He accepted a call to St. Paul's church, Cleveland, Ohio, in 1876, and held that post for eight years. He received the degree of D. D. from Kenyon college, Ohio, in 1879, was clerical deputy from Ohio in the general conventions of 1880 and 1883, and president of the standing committee of the diocese of Ohio for six years. He was elected assistant bishop of central Pennsylvania in the summer of 1884, and was consecrated in Gen. Lee's church, Cleveland, Ohio, 8 Oct., 1884. Bishop Rulison had published several sermons that he had preached on special occasions, and contributed freely to current religious literature in verse as well as prose. He wrote also a "History of St. Paul's Church, Cleveland, Ohio" (Cleveland, 1877). He became bishop in 1885.

RUMFORD, Benjamin Thompson, scientist. b. in Woburn, Mass., 26 March, 1753; d. in Autun, near Paris, France, 21 Aug., 1814. He received a common-school education and excelled in mathematics and mechanics. In 1766 he was apprenticed to John Appleton, a merchant in Salem, and continued his studies by devoting his leisure to the study of algebra, trigonometry, and astronomy, so that at the age of fifteen he was able to calculate an eclipse. Later he began the study of medicine under Dr. John Hay in Woburn, and attended a few lectures at Cambridge, but spent most of his time in manufacturing surgical instruments. Subsequently he returned to Boston, and there engaged as a clerk in the dry-goods business. The depressed condition of affairs soon threw him out of employment, and, with his friend Loammii Baldwin, he attended the lectures in experimental philosophy that were delivered by Prof. John Winthrop at Harvard. The experiments were repeated by the two students with improvised apparatus on their return to the lectures. He also taught for a short time in Bradford, Mass., and later in Rumford (now Concord), N. H. In 1771 he married Sarah Walker Rolfe, a widow of ample means, about thirteen years his senior. Gov. John Wentworth, of New Hampshire, recognizing his ability, gave him a commission of major in one of the New Hampshire regiments; but this act met with opposition from Gen. Gage, who resented the appointment of a younger man over their heads. This feeling of hostility increased as the active measures of the Revolution approached, and knowledge of the intention of tarring and feathering him on account of his supposed Tory inclinations caused his abrupt departure from Concord in November, 1774, leaving his wife and infant daughter. He made his way to Boston, where his military feelings led to his intimate relations with Gen. Thomas Gage. It is said that after the battle of Bunker Hill he was favorably introduced to George Washington, who had just assumed command of the American army, and who would have given him a commission in the artillery but for the opposition of the New Hampshire regiment. In March, 1775, he returned to Woburn, where he was arrested, and, after a public trial, was not fully acquitted, although not condemned. Unwilling to remain in obscurity at home under a cloud of suspicion, he determined to seek a field of activity elsewhere. Turning his property into money as far as possible he left his family in October, 1757, and they did not hear from him again until after the close of the war. It appears that he was received on board of the British frigate "Scarborough" in Newport, and thence taken to Boston, where, on the evacuation of the city, he was given despatches from Gen. William Howe to Lord George Germaine, secretary of state for the colonies. His behavior so impressed the minister that he appointed him as his under-secretary in the colonial office. He directed immediate attention to military affairs, improved the accoutrements of the horse-guards, continued his experiments on gunpowder, and improved the construction of firearms. These services received the approbation of his superiors, and in 1780 he was appointed an under-secretary of state. Meanwhile he investigated various scientific subjects, including the combustion of bodies, a paper on which he submitted to the Royal society, where, in 1779, he was elected a fellow. In 1781, after the retirement of Lord George Germaine, he returned to this country and raised in New York the "King's American dragoons," of which he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel on 24 Feb., 1782, and was stationed chiefly on the borders of New Hampshire and Vermont. Some authorities say that he served in the south, and at one time defeated Gen. Francis Marion's men, destroying their stores. Before the close of the war he returned to England, and on the establishment of peace he obtained leave of absence to visit the continent with the intention of offering his services to the Austrian government. In 1783, after his return to Bavaria, he married the widow of Maximilian Francis, the former of Munich, and changed it into a park, where, after his leaving Bavaria, a monument was erected in his honor. His health failed under the pressure of these undertakings, and he obtained leave of absence in 1785. After visiting Italy he spent some time in England, and while in that country he was engaged by a Bavarian count to conduct some of its charitable institutions with a view of remedying their evils and introducing reforms. The war between France and Austria caused his return to Bavaria, where he maintained its neutrality, although the country was overrun by the soldiers of both nations. His health again failing, he was obliged to leave Munich, and he was sent to England. His health was also impaired by a subject to which we have referred, that he could not be received in that capacity at the English court. But he remained in England as the private agent of Bavaria, and in 1799 was chiefly instrumental in founding the Royal institution, in which he caused Sir Humphry Davy to be called to the chair of chemistry. About this time he was invited to return to the United States, but, although disposed to do so, he finally removed to Paris in 1802, and there married, in 1804, the widow of the great French chemist Lavoisier, his first wife having died on 19 Jan., 1792, after being separated from him sixteen years. The remainder of his life was spent at the villa of his wife's former husband in Avetnil, basly engaged in scientific researches. About seven years before his death he was elected to the Royal society of London to found prizes bearing his name for the most important discoveries in light and heat, and the first award of the latter was made to himself. The greater part of his private collection of philosophical apparatus and specimens, and models of his own invention, were bequeathed to the Royal institution, and he also left

war, and superintendent of the police of the electorate, and he was also for a short time chief of the regency that exercised sovereignty during the absence of the elector. He received decorations from Poland, and was elected a member of the Academies of Munich and Mannheim. In 1786 the elector, becoming vice-general of the empire during the interval between the death of Joseph II. and the coronation of Leopold II., invited himself of the prerogatives of that office to make him a count of the Holy Roman empire, on which occasion he chose as his title the name of Rumford, the town in New Hampshire where he and his wife were born. While engaged with his various reforms in connection with the army he was led to study domestic economy. He investigated the properties and management of heat, and the amount of it that was produced by the combustion of different kinds of fuel, by means of a calorimeter of his own invention. By reconstructing the fire-place he so improved the methods of warming apartments and cooking food that a saving in fuel of about one half was effected. His studies of cookery still rank high. He improved the construction of stoves, cooking-ranges, coal-grates, and chimneys, and showed that the non-conducting power of cloth is due to the air that is included in its fibers. Among the other benefits introduced by him into Bavaria were improved breeds of horses and cattle, and a greater economy in the consumption of stoves. Under-secretary of state as he was, he reigned in the south, and at one time defeated Gen. Francis Marion's men, destroying their stores. Before the close of the war he returned to England, and on the establishment of peace he obtained leave of absence to visit the continent with the intention of offering his services to the Austrian government. The greater part of his private collection of philosophical apparatus and specimens, and models of his own invention, were bequeathed to the Royal institution, and he also left to Harvard the funds with which was founded the Rumford professorship of the physical and mathematical sciences as applied to the useful arts, which was established in October, 1816. He published the results of his investigations in pamphlets, and essays in French, English, or German, many of which were issued as "Essays, Political, Economii ical, and Philosophical" (3 vols., London, 1797;
vol. x., 1802, "Lives of the Nine Great British James Rumford, in Sparks’s "American Biogra-

Works," with "A Memoir of Sir Benjamin Thompsom." by George E. Ellis, published by the American academy of arts and sciences (5 vols., Boston, 1876).—His daughter, Sarah, Countess of Rum-ford, b. in Concord, N. H., 18 Oct., 1774; d. there, 2 Dec., 1852, is said to have been the first American to inherit and bear the title of Countess. She remained in this country after her father went to England, but in January, 1796, she rejoined him in London at his request. In 1797 she was received by the Bavarian elector as countess, and was permitted to receive one half her father's pension, with the privilege of residing wherever she chose. Subsequent to 1814 she divided her time between London and her house in Brompton, making protracted visits to Paris of two and three years' duration, and to her residence in Concord. With her father she estab-lis hed the Rolf and Rumford asylums in Concord, N. H., for the poor and needy, particularly motherless girls. She bequeathed $15,000 to the New Hampshire asylum for the insane, and $2,000 each to the Concord female charitable society, the Boston children's friend society, and the Fatherless and widow's society of Boston.

RUMINAGUI (roo-meen-yah-ghe'), Peruvian soldier, b. in Quito in the latter half of the 16th century; d. in 1534. He was a son of one of the principal generals of a native prince, and entered the military service of the conqueror, Huinna Capac, and of his son, Atahualpa (q. e.). At the time of the invasion of Pizarro in 1532, Ruminagui was marching with 5,000 men to re-enforce the army that was sent against Cuzco, and advised Atahualpa not to receive the Spaniards in Cajamarca, but, seeing that his advice was unheeded, he retired with his army to Quito, thus escaping
the defeat of the Peruvians, which occurred in 1532. Quito was then in a state of confusion;
he was elected a regency, he summoned to the royal palace the children, brothers, and principal officers of the emperor, and had them all murdered during a banquet that was given in their honor. Then, proclaiming himself independent, he began a reign of terror in Quito.
When, in 1533, Sebastian de Benalcazor, at the request of the Cañari Indians, marched against Ruminagui, the latter made a heroic resistance for a long time in the mountain-passes that lead to the capital. In Tiquipas a battle was fought, which resulted in favor of the Indians, but in the night an eruption of the volcano Cotopaxi began, which had been predicted by the priests would be fatal to the empire of Quito, and the Indian army dispersed. Ruminagui endeavored to defend the capital, but was hotly pursued by the Spaniards, and, as the Indians despaired and hated him, they revealed his retreat, and he was killed toward the beginning of 1534.

RUMPLE, Jethro, clergyman, b. in Cabarrus county, N. C., 1817; d. there, 1859. He worked on a farm, and studied at intervals till he was eighteen years old; when he began to prepare for college, teaching to defray his expenses. He was graduated at Davidson college in 1836, studied in the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C., and was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry in 1837.
After holding pastoriates in Mecklenburg coun-y, he was called in 1860 to Salisbury, N. C., where he has since remained. The University of North Carolina gave him the degree of D.D. in 1882.
Dr. Rumpke was elected to the presidency of the school of his church, and published "History of Rowan County, N. C." (Salisbury, N. C., 1884), and "Hisory of the First Fifty Years of Davidson College" (Raleigh, 1888). His "History of Presbyterianism in North Carolina" recently appeared as a serial.

RUMSEY, Benjamin, Continental congressman, b. about 1738. His grandfather, Charles, emigrated from Wales to this country about 1653,
and after living in Charleston, S. C., New York, and Philadelphia, settled in Cecil county, Md. He was the great-grandfather of James Rumsey, noticed below. Benjamin was elected by the Maryland convention, 29 Dec., 1775, one of a committee of five to prepare a draft of instructions for the departures of the province in congress, and to form a similar committee to report resolutions for raising, cloth ing, and victualling the provincial forces. On 25 May he became one of the council of safety, and on 10
Nov. he was chosen by the convention to the Continental congress.

RUMSEY, James, inventor, b. in Bolonia
Manor, Cecil co., Md., about 1748; d. in London, England, 29 Dec., 1812. He was a manufacturer by trade, and early turned his attention to inventing, making various improvements in the mechanism of mills. In 1784 he exhibited to George Washington the model of a boat for steam ing the cur-cent of rivers by the force of the steam acting on settling poles, which he patented in several states;
and he obtained in March, 1785, the exclusive right for ten years "to navigate and build boats calculated to work with greater ease and rapidity against rapid rivers" from the assembly at Philadelphia. Subsequently he succeeded in launching a boat on the Potomac, which he propelled by a steam-engine and machinery of his own construction that secured motion by the force of a stream of water thrown out by a pump at the stern. In December, 1785, the legislature of Maryland was pressed by a large concourse of people, and he was granted the rights of navigating the streams of New York, Maryland, and Virginia. The Rumsey society, of which Benjamin Franklin was a member, was founded in Philadelphia in 1788 for the purpose of furthering his schemes. He then went to England, where a similar society was organized, and he obtained patents for his inventions in Great Britain, France, and Holland. A boat and ma-machinery were built for him, and a successful trip was made on the Thames in December, 1792, but he died while preparing for another experiment.
The legislature of Kentucky presented in 1839 a medal to his son "commemorative of his father's services and high agency in giving to the beneficial the benefits of that improvement." He published a "Short Treatise on the Application of Steam" (Philadelphia, 1788), by which he became involved in a controversy with John Fitch (q. e.).

RUMSEY, Julian Sidney, merchant, b. in Batavia, N. Y., 3 April, 1823; d. in Chicago, Ill., 29 April, 1896. He removed to Chicago in 1857, and engaged the business of a clothing house. His brother subsequently became partners. This firm, then known as Newberry and Dole, sent out in September, 1839, the first shipment of grain from
Mr. Rupp's historical compilations were issued from the press, while other volumes of local history followed in rapid succession. He was an indefatigable worker, an excellent German scholar, with good conversational powers, and in his lifetime collected much historical material. He had the peculiar faculty of obtaining facts and figures about a few words, and was a resolute writer of volumes. His works were repositories of zeal and industry. He was not a polished writer, and lacked method in his historical arrangement. He translated, wrote, compiled, and prepared for the press about thirty volumes, but the great work of his life, "The History of the Germans of Pennsylvania," remains unpublished. Apart from his translations, Mr. Rupp's historical writings included "A History of Berks County, Pennsylvania" (1836); "History of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania" (1844); "History of Religious Denominations of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1844); "History of Berks and Lebanon Counties" (Lancaster, 1844); "History of York County" (1843); "Events in Indian History" (1842); "History of Northampton, Lehigh, Monroe, Carbon, and Schuylkill Counties" (Harrisburg, 1846); "History of Western Pennsylvania" (1846); "History of Dauphin, Cumberland, Franklin, Bedford, Adams, and Perry Counties" (Lancaster, 1848); "History of Somerst, Cambria, and Indiana Counties" (1848); "History of Northumberland, Huntingdon, Mifflin, Centre, Union, Columbia, Juniata, and Indiana Counties" (Lancaster, 1848); "History of Thirty Thousand German and other Immigrants to Pennsylvania from 1727 to 1776" (Harrisburg, 1856); "Genealogy of the Descendants of John Jonas Rupp" (1874).
supplied the service with unmedicated drugs. He was again fleet surgeon of the East India squadron in 1847–50, of the Pacific squadron in 1854–7, and of the Mediterranean squadron from August, 1860, till July, 1861. During the intervals between cruises he was on duty at Philadelphia. During the civil war he was surgeon of the Boston navy-yard. He was on special duty at Philadelphia in 1857–59, was the senior officer of the medical corps in 1866–9, and was retired on 4 Sept., 1899. He was president of the Academy of natural sciences of Philadelphia in 1870–82, and president of the College of physicians of Philadelphia in 1870–83. He was commissioned medical director on the retired list, 3 March, 1871. Dr. Rushenberger had published some of the results of his investigations during hiservices, by which he had acquired a wide reputation. Among his works are "Three Years in the Pacific" (Philadelphia, 1834; 2 vols., London, 1835); "A Voyage around the World, 1855–7" (Philadelphia, 1838; omitting strictures on the British government, 2 vols., London, 1838); "Elements of Natural History" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1850); A Lexicon in Terms used in Natural History" (1850); "A Year, the Origin, Progress, and Present Condition of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia" (1852); and "Notes and Commentaries during Voyages to Brazil and China, 1848" (Richmond, 1854). He had also published numerous articles on naval rank and organization (1843–50), and contributed papers to medical and scientific journals, and he edited the American edition of Miss Somerville's "Physical Geography," with additions and a glossary (1850; new ed., 1856).

RUSH, Benjamin, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Byberry township, Pa., 24 Dec., 1745; d. in Philadelphia, 19 April, 1813. His ancestor, John, who was a captain of horse in Cromwell's army, emigrated to this country in 1683, and left a large number of descendants. Benjamin's father died when the son was six years old. His earliest instruction was under his uncle, Rev. Samuel Finley, subsequently president of Princeton, who prepared him for that college. He was graduated in 1760, and subsequently in the medical department of the University of Edinburgh in 1768, after studying under Dr. John Redman, of Philadelphia. He also attended medical lectures in England and in Paris, where he enjoyed the friendship of Benjamin Franklin, who promoted the means of paying his expenses. In August, 1769, he returned to the United States and settled in Philadelphia, where he was elected professor of chemistry in the City medical college. In 1771 he published essays on slavery, temperance, and health, and in 1774 he delivered the annual oration before the Philosophical society on the "Natural History of Malaria among the People of North America." He early engaged in pre-Revolutionary movements, and wrote constantly for the press on colonial rights. He was a member of the provincial convention of Pennsylvania, and chairman of the committee that reported that it had become expedient for congress to declare independence, and surgeon to the Pennsylvania navy from 17 Sept., 1775, to 1 July, 1776. He was then elected to the latter body, and on 4 July, 1776, signed the declaration. He married Julia, a daughter of Richard Stockton, esq. He was appointed surgeon-general of the middle department in April, 1777, and in July became physician-general. Although in constant attendance on the wounded in the battles of Trenton, Princeton, the Brandywine, Germantown, and in the sickness at Valley Forge, he found time to write four long public letters to the people of Pennsylvania, in which he commented severely on the articles of confederation of 1776, and urged a revision on the ground of the dangers of giving legislative powers to a single house. In February, 1778, he resigned his military office on account of wrongs that had been done to the soldiers in regard to the hospital stores, and a coldness between himself and Gen. Washington, but, though he was without means at that time, he refused all offers of private service in the army. He then returned to Philadelphia, resumed his practice and duties as professor, and for twenty-nine years was surgeon to the Pennsylvania hospital, and port physician to Philadelphia in 1790–3. He was a founder of Dickinson college and the Philadelphia dispensary, and was largely interested in the establishment of public schools, concerning which he published an address, and in the founding of the College of physicians, of which he was one of the first censors. He was a member of the State convention that ratified the constitution of the United States in 1787, and of that for forming a state constitution in the same year, in which he endeavored to procure the incorporation of his views on public schools, and a penal code on which he had previously written essays. After that service he retired from public life. While in occupation of the chair of chemistry in Philadelphia medical college, he was elected to that of the theory and practice of medicine, to which was added the professorship of the institutes and practice of medicine and clinical practice in 1791, and that of the practice of physic in 1797, all of which he held until his death. During the smallpox epidemic in 1793 he rendered good service, visiting from 100 to 120 patients daily, but his bold and original practice made him enemies, and a paper edited by William Cobbett, called "Peter Porcupine's Gazette," was so violent in its attacks upon him that it was prosecuted, and a jury rendered a verdict of $3,900 damages, which Dr. Rush distributed among the poor. This proves that during the epidemic convinced him that yellow fever is not contagious, and he was the first to proclaim that the disease is indigenous. From 1799 till his death he was treasurer of the U. S. mint. "His name," says Dr. Thomas Young, "was familiar to the medical world as the Sydenham of America. His accurate observations and correct discrimination of epidemic diseases entitled him to this distinction, while in the original energy of his reasoning he far exceeded his prototype." He was a member of nearly every medical, literary, and benevolent institution in this country, and of many foreign societies, and for his replies to their queries on the subject of yellow fever received a medal from the king of Prussia in 1850, and a gift of one hundred guineas from the king of Prussia. Benjamin Rush as president of the Pennsylvania society for the abolition of slavery, was president of the Philadelphia medical society, vice-president, and a founder of the Philadelphia Bible society, advocating the use of the Scriptures as a text-book in the public schools, an originator of the American philosophical society, of which he was a vice-president in 1799-1800. He taught, more clearly than any other physician of his day, to distinguish diseases and their effects, gave great impulse to the study of medicine in this country, and made Philadelphia the centre of that science in the United States, more than 2,250 students having attended his lectures during his professorship in the Medical college of Philadelphia. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1812. His publications include "Medical Inquiries and Observations" (5 vols., Philadelphia, 1789-98; 3d ed., 4 vols., 1809); "Essays, Literary, Moral, and Philosophical" (1788; 2d ed., 1806); "Sixteen Introductory Lectures" (1811); and "Diseases of the Mind" (1812; 5th ed., 1835). He also edited several medical works.—His son, Richard, statesman, b. in Philadelphia, 29 Aug. 1789; d. there, 30 July, 1859, was graduated at Princeton in 1807, and admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1809, and early in his career was distinguished for his defence of William Duane, editor of the "Aurora," on a charge of libelling Gov. Thomas McKean. He became solicitor of the guardians of the poor of Philadelphia in 1810, and attorney-general of Pennsylvania in 1811, comptroller of the U.S. treasury in November of the same year, and in 1814-17 was U.S. attorney-general. He became temporary U.S. secretary of state in 1817, and was then appointed minister to England, where he remained till 1827, negotiating several important treaties, especially that of 1818 with Lord Castlereagh respecting the fisheries, the northwest boundary-line, conflicting claims beyond the Rocky mountains, and the slaves of American citizens that were carried off on British ships, contrary to the treaty of Ghent. He was recalled in 1825 to accept the portfolio of the treasury which had been offered him by President Adams, and in 1828 he was a candidate for the vice-presidency on the ticket with Mr. Adams. In 1829 he negotiated in Holland a loan for the corporations of Washington, Georgetown, D. C., and Alexandria, Va. He was a commissioner to adjust a boundary dispute between Ohio and Michigan in 1835, and in 1836 was appointed permanent commissioner to obtain the legacy of James Smithson (q. v.), which he left to found the Smithsonian institution. The case was then pending in the English chancery court, and in August, 1838, Mr. Rush returned with the amount, $308,315.46. He was minister to France in 1847-49, and in 1848 was the first of the ministers at that court to recognize the new republic, acting in advance of instructions from his government. Mr. Rush began his literary career in 1812, when he was a member of the Madison cabinet, by writing vigorous articles in defence of the second war with England. His relations with John Quincy Adams were intimate, and affected his whole career. He became an anti-Mason in 1831, in which he wrote a powerful report against the Bank of the United States, and ever afterward co-operated with the Democratic party. He was a member of the American philosophical society. His publications include "Codification of the Laws of the United States" (5 vols., Philadelphia, 1815); "Narrative of a Residence at the Court of London, from 1817 till 1825" (London, 1833, a separate and abridged work of the same work. "Comprising Incidents, Official and Personal, from 1819 till 1825," (1815; 3d ed., under the title of "The Court of London from 1819 till 1825, with Notes by the Author's Nephew," 1873); "Washington in Domestic Life," which consists of personal letters from Washington to his private secretary, Col. Tobias Lear, and some personal recollections (1857); and a volume of "Occasional Productions, Political, Diplomatic, and Miscellaneous, including a Glance at the Court and Government of Louis Philippe, and the French Revolution of 1848," published by his sons (1860).—Richard's son, Benjamin James, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 29 Jan. 1811, d. in Paris, France, 20 June, 1877, was graduated at Princeton in 1829, studied law, and in 1833 was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia. In 1837 he was appointed secretary of legation at London, where he served for a time as charge d'affaires. He published "An Appeal for the Union" (Philadelphia, 1850) and "Letters on the Rebellion" (1862).—Another son of the first Benjamin James, Phoebe Ann Rush (Phila. Pa., 1 March, 1786; d. there, 26 May, 1857, was graduated at Princeton in 1806, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1809. He subsequently studied in Edinburgh, and, returning to Philadelphia, practised for several years, but afterward relinquished the active duties of his profession to devote himself to scientific and literary pursuits. He left $1,000,000 to the Philadelphia library company for the erection of the Ridgeway branch of the Philadelphia library. His publications include "Philosophy of the Human Voice" (Philadelphia, 1827); "Hamlet, a Dramatic Prelude in Five Acts" (1844); "Analysis of the Human Intelect" (2 vols., 1857); and "Rhymes of Contrast on Wisdom and Folly" (London, 1867).—His wife, Phoebe Ann, b. in Philadelphia, 1797; d. there in 1857, was a daughter of Jacob Ridgeway. She was highly educated in early life, well versed in the languages and literature of modern Europe, and by her social tact and brilliant conversational powers became one of the most noted American women of her time. Her house in Philadelphia was one of the finest in the country, and her entertainments were on the largest and most luxurious scale. —A brother of the first Benjamin James, Jacob, jurist, b. in Byberry township, Pa., in 1746; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Jan., 1820, was graduated at Princeton in 1765, settled in the practice of law in Philadelphia, was a judge of the high court of errors and appeals of Pennsylvania in 1784-1806, president of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia in 1806-20, and at an earlier date was a justice of the supreme court of the state. In the controversy between Joseph Reed and John Dickinson as to the character of Benedict Arnold (q. v.), Judge Rush espoused the latter's cause. Princeton gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1804. His publications include "Resolution in Committee Chambers, 6 Dec. 1774," "Charges on Moral and Religious Subjects" (1806); "Character of Christ" (1806); and "Christian Baptism" (1819).—His daughter, Frances, published "Kelyn," a novel (Philadelphia, 1812).
RUSH, Christopher, A. M. E. Zion bishop, b. in Craven county, N. C., in 1777; d. in New York city, 16 July, 1853. He was a full-blooded African, and born a slave. He went to New York in 1798, and was subsequently freed, and licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church in 1813. He was ordained a superintendent or bishop in 1828. He was largely instrumental in the separation of the colored from the white branch of the Methodist church, and his address before Bishop Enoch George finally carried the measure, and he was thus a founder of what is now the African Methodist Episcopal Zion church. At this time the African Methodists numbered only 100, but Bishop Rush lived to see it a comparatively large and flourishing organization. He published a history of his denomination.

RUSH, William, sculptor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 July, 1756; d. there, 17 Jan., 1836. In his youth he was apprenticed to Edward Cutbush, a carver, and he first became known as a maker of figure-heads for ships. Especially noticeable among his ship-carvings were the figures "Genius of the United States" and "Nature" for the frigates "United States" and "Constellation," and busts and figures of Voltaire, Rousseau, Benjamin Franklin, William Penn, and others, for various vessels. The figure of the "Indian Trader" for the ship "William Penn" excited great admiration in London. The carvers there sketched it and took casts of the head. Another figure, that of a river-god, carved for the ship "Ganges," won the admiration of the Hindoos, who came in numerous boats to reverence this image. But he did not confine himself to figure-heads, although he never worked in marble, but always in wood or clay. In 1812 he exhibited, at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, "Exhortation," "Prais," and cherubim, and busts of Linnaeus, William Bartram, and Rev. Henry M. Muhlenberg. He executed also statues of "Winter," "Agriculture," a figure of Christ on the cross, which last two were destroyed by fire, several portrait-busts, including Gen. Lafayette (1824), and other works. His best-known statue is that of Washington (1834), which was bought for the city of Philadelphia. Mr. Rush served in the Revolutionary army, and was a member of the councils of his native city for more than a quarter of a century.

RUSK, Jeremiah McLain, governor of Wisconsin, b. in Morgan county, Ohio, 17 June, 1809; d. in Viroqua, Wis., 21 Nov., 1893. He divided his time between farming and labor study till he attained his majority, and in 1833 removed to Wisconsin and engaged in agriculture in Vernon county. He enlisted in the National army in 1802, was commissioned major of the 25th Wisconsin regiment, rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and served with Gen. William T. Sherman from the siege of Vicksburg till the close of the war. In 1865 he received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers for meritorious service at the battle of Shiloh. He was elected bank comptroller of Wisconsin in 1866, which post he held till 1870, was chosen to congress as a Republican in the latter year, served three terms, and as chairman of the committee on pensions performed important services in readjusting the pension rates. He declined the appointment of chargé d'affaires in Paraguay and Uruguay, and that of chief of the bureau of engraving and printing, which were offered him by President Garfield. Since 1882 he had been governor of Wisconsin, having been elected for three successive terms. In 1888 Gen. Rusk was an unsuccessful candidate for the Republican nomination and was re-appointed president of the department of agriculture in President Harrison's administration.

RUSK, Thomas Jefferson, senator, b. in Cumberland, S. C., 8 Aug., 1802; d. in Macon, Ga., 29 July, 1856. He received an academic education, practised law with success in Georgia, and in the early part of 1835 removed to Texas. He then identified himself with the history of that republic, was a member of the convention that declared its independence in March, 1836, was its first secretary of war, participated in the battle of San Jacinto, and became commander of the army after Gen. Sam Houston was wounded, continuing to hold that office till the organization of the constitutional government. He again chosen secretary of war, but resigned after a few months' service, subsequently commanded several expeditions against the Indians, and was a member of the legislature. He was a justice of the supreme court in 1838-42, president of the convention that consummated the annexation of Texas to the United States in 1845, and upon its admission to the Union was chosen U. S. senator as a Democrat, serving in 1846-56. He had been re-elected to a third term, but in a fit of insanity, caused by domestic misfortune, he committed suicide. During his senatorial service he was chairman of the committee on the post-office, and was interested to a large extent in the overland mail and the wagon roads of the Pacific.

RUSK, Josiah, R., inventor, b. in 1821; d. in Halifax, N. S., 31 Dec., 1863. He invented the pavement that bears his name. It consists of granite blocks, and was laid in Broadway, New York city, but proved impracticable on account of its being too slippery. Subsequently he turned his attention to metallurgical projects, and for some time prior to his death was engaged in gold-mining in Nova Scotia.

RUSK, John Denison, physician, b. in Chebacco (now Essex), Mass., 1 Sept., 1801; d. in Pompton, N. J., 1 March, 1881. He was graduated at Yale in 1823, and in the medical department in 1825. After spending a year abroad in hospital practice, he settled in New York city, but in June, 1827, he went with a cargo of supplies to aid the Greeks in their struggle for independence. He remained, superintending the development of a hospital service in Greece, for several years, but the failure of his health compelled his return, and he entered again upon practice in New York city. Dr. Rusk became interested at once in the condition of the poor that were suffering from opthalmia in the city hospitals, and at his own cost, in March, 1832, made the first attempt for immediate and complete instruction of the blind. He was appointed superintendent of the newly chartered New York Institution for the blind in the same year, and in this office introduced many methods of teaching, some of which have been permanently useful. He invented the phonetic alphabet, which consists of forty-one characters, sufficiently like the Roman letters to be read easily, to which he added twenty-two prefixes and suffixes. This system of writing never was introduced generally, but he simplified mathematical characters, and his printed maps, from raised designs, in which he used wave-lines for water, are still in use. He went abroad for his health, but on his return he engaged in numerous philanthropic and educational schemes. He was elected the founders of the New York prison association, its corresponding secretary in 1846-54, and subsequently a vice-president, was superintendent of the New York juvenile asylum in 1851-8, and a member of the board of education in 1848-51. He also established in 1850 a house of employment for women, which institution was under the care of his wife and daughter. During his old age he made further improvements in printing for the blind.

RUSSELL, Lord Alexander George, British soldier, b. in England in 1821. He is a son of the sixth Duke of Bedford, entered the army in 1839, and was promoted captain in 1846, major in 1853, lieutenant-colonel in 1856, colonel in 1861, major-general in 1874, and lieutenant-general in 1877. He was selected to the governor-general of Canada in 1847, served in the Cape war in 1842-3 as deputy assistant quartermaster-general to the 1st division, and was present at the battle of Bera, for which he obtained a medal. He took part in the Crimean war, was at the siege of Sebastopol, and for gallant conduct presented with the Crimean medal and clasp, and with Sarumian and Turkish medals and the order of the Medjidie. He commanded at Shorncliffe in 1873-4, and in southeastern England in 1877-8, served in Canada from 1883 till 1888, and at the latter date was succeeded by Gen. Sir John Ross. His headquarters were at Halifax, Nova Scotia.

RUSSELL, Alexander Jamieson, Canadian engineer, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 29 April, 1807. He settled with his parents in 1822 in Megantic county, Can., where his father was crown-lands agent. The son became deputy provincial surveyor in 1829, entered the commissionariat department in 1830, served for two years on the construction of the Rideau canal, and afterward was engaged during eight years in the work of the government at Quebec. He resigned in 1841, and became civil engineer and chief of public works in the three time counties of Lower Canada, for which he projected and constructed roads and bridges. In 1846 he was transferred to the crown timber office at Ottawa to settle differences between lumbermen, and to grant licenses to cut timber on Ottawa river and its tributaries. Afterward the collection of the timber revenues and the inspection of the other crown timber agencies in Lower and Upper Canada were added to his duties. He has published a geographical work (Ottawa, 1850).

RUSSELL, Archibald, philanthropist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1811; d. in New York city, 12 April, 1871. His father, James, was for many years president of the Royal society of Edinburgh. The son graduated at the University of Edinburgh in philosophy, law, and medicine, and subsequently studied at the University of Bonn, Germany. He settled in New York city in 1836, where he devoted his time and fortune to benevolent and educational enterprises, founding the Five Points mission, of which he was president for eighteen years, and aiding in establishing the Half-Ottawa School, of which he was a vice-president. He was an active member of the Christian commission during the civil war, gave largely to its support, and was chairman of the famine relief committee. He made his summer home in Ulster county, opposite Hyde Park, N. Y., from 1844 until his death, and was connected with the most important internal improvement in that region. He established its present system of common schools, founded the Ulster county savings bank, and was its president from its establishment until his death, and built a Presbyterian church at his own cost near his country-seat, Glen-Allwine. Mr. Russell married Helen Rutherford, a daughter of Dr. John Watts. He published the "Principles of Statistical Inquiry" (New York, 1839), and "Account of 11,000 Schools in New York" (1847).

RUSSELL, Benjamin, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 Sept., 1761; d. there, 4 Jan., 1845. He was apprenticed to Isaiah Thomas, at Worcester, Mass., but before completing his term enlisted in the Revolutionary army, and contributed war news to the "Spy." Thomas's paper. He began the publication of the "Columbia Centinel" about 1784, a semi-weekly journal, which had no equal in its control of public sentiment. He was aided by Stephen Higginson, John Lowell, Fisher Ames, Timothy Pickering, and George Cabot. In 1788 Russell attended the Massachusetts convention for independence, was elected a member of the convention of the United States, and made the first attempt at publication of a Boston newspaper. His enterprise was conspicuous in collecting foreign intelligence, and, in order to obtain the latest news, he visited all foreign vessels that came into Boston harbor. The "Centinel" kept regular files of the "Moniteur," which brought Louis Philippe and Talleyrand frequently to its office during the Boston war. An atlas, which was the gift of the former, was of constant service to Russell in preparing his summaries of military news from the continent. When congress was holding its first session, Russell wrote to the department of state, and offered to publish gratuitously all the laws and other official documents—the treasury then being almost bankrupt—which offer was accepted. At the end of several years he was called upon for his bill. It was made out, and received. On being informed of this fact, Gen. Washington said: "This must not be. When Mr. Russell offered to publish the laws without pay, we were poor. It was a generous offer. We are now able to pay our debts. This is a debt of honor, and must be discharged." A few days afterward Mr. Russell deposited the full amount of his bill. In 1799-1800 he published a Federalist paper, called the "Gazette," which was a violent enemy of France, Jefferson, and the Republican newspapers, and held its influence under the same management until 1839. Russell retired from the "Centinel" in 1828. He originated the phrase the "era of good feeling" on the occasion of President Monroe's visit to Boston in 1817, when the chiefs of both parties, the Republicans and Federalists, united in the support of the executive. He represented Boston in the general court for twenty-four years, served several terms in the state senate, and was a member of the executive council and of the Constitutional convention of 1820.

RUSSELL, Henry, roofer, b. in Shoreditch, Kent, 24 Dec., 1813. He was the son of a Hebrew merchant, and in infancy appeared in Christmas pantomimes. Later he studied music, and subsequently taught. He settled in Rochester, N. Y., in 1843, as teacher of the piano-forte, and became widely known as a composer and vocalist. For years he travelled in the country, giving monologues entertainingly to the accompaniment of his own compositions. He also engaged for the concerts of oratorio and philharmonic societies, and received the compliments in "Hamlet," "Richard III," and "Macbeth" to his own music. Russell had a heavy baritone voice of small compass, but in declamatory delivery it was highly impressive. On the singer's return to Europe, he appeared in many cities of Great Britain and Ireland to repeat his American success. Finally he retired from the concert-room, and settled in London as an opulent money-lender and bill-broker. All his songs were sold at large prices, and for years returned him a handsome income. They are composed in a manly vein, entirely free from puerile sentimentality, and many of them bid fair to endure for future generations. They include "The Iky Green," "The Old Arm-Chair," "A Life on the Ocean Wave," "Some Love to Reun," and "Woodman, what that Tree."

RUSSELL, Isaiah Cook, geologist, b. near Garratsville, N. Y., 10 Dec., 1832. He was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1852, after which he spent two years in studying science at the School of Mines of Columbia college. In 1874 he accompanied one of the parties sent out by the U. S. government to observe the transit of Venus, and was stationed at Queenstown, New Zealand. On his return in 1875 he was appointed assistant in geology at the School of Mines, and in 1878 he became assistant geologist on the U. S. geological and geographical survey west of the 100th meridian. In 1890 he was appointed to a similar office on the U. S. geological survey, which he still (1898) holds. Besides large contributions on geological subjects to various scientific periodicals, he has published scientific memoirs, which have been issued by the government in the annual reports of the survey, or as separate monographs. These include "Sketch of the Geological History of Lake Lahontan" (1883); "A Geological Reconnaissance in Southern Oregon" (1884); "Existing Glaciers of the United States" (1885); "Geological History of Lake Lahontan" (1885); "Geological History of Mono Valley," (1888); and "Sub-Aerial Decay of Rocks" (1888).

RUSSELL, John Henry, naval officer, b. in Frederick city, Md., 4 July, 1827; d. in Washington, 1 April, 1897. He entered the navy, was attached to the "St. Mary's" in the Gulf of Mexico, 1844-6, and participated in the first operations of the Mexican War. He was present at Vera Cruz prior to the capture of that city. He became a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847, and was graduated at the naval academy in 1848. He was attached to the North Pacific exploring expedition in 1855-6, and served in the sloop "Vincennes" under an appointment as acting lieutenant, and also as navigator. In this cruise the U. S. envoy to China was indebted to Lieutenant Russell for opening communication with the Chinese, who had refused all intercourse. Russell cleverly pushed his way alone to the senior mandarin, and delivered dispatches by which American and English envoys were admitted to audience. He was commissioned master, 14 Sept., 1855, and lieutenant, 15 Sept., 1855, and in 1860-1, when on ordnance duty at the Washington navy-yard, he was one of two officers there that remained loyal, notwithstanding that his ties and affections were with the south. He went to Norfolk to assist in preventing vessels at the navy-yard from falling into the hands of the secessionists, and had command of the last boat that left the yard, 28 April, 1861. He was next attached to the frigate "Colorado," and on 14 Sept., 1861, he commanded a boat expedition to cut out the privateer "Judas" at Pensacola, under the protection of shore batteries and about 1000 men. Russell boldly approached during the night, and after a severe hand-to-hand conflict, in which 20 of the "Judas" crew were captured and wounded, himself among the latter, he succeeded in destroying the "Judas" and regained the "Colorado." Admiral Porter, in his "Naval History," says that "this was without doubt the most gallant cutting-out affair that occurred during the war." The navy department complimented Russell. The state of Maryland gave him a vote of thanks, and President Lincoln personally expressed his gratitude. Russell was then placed in command of the steamer "Kumbbee" in Farragut's squadron, was present at the surrender of the forts below New Orleans, and received the garrison of Fort Jackson as prisoners on his ship. Farragut thanked him for his service in saving lives of officers and men in the flag-ship's boat during a guerilla attack at Baton Rouge, and Russell was commissioned commodore. He was in command, 16 July, 1862, was on ordnance duty at Washington in 1864, and commanded the sloop "Yancey" of the Pacific squadron, in 1864-5. After being commissioned commodore on 28 Jan., 1867, he took charge of the steamer "Ossipee," of the Pacific squadron, in 1868-71, and during a trip in the Gulf of California rescued the passengers and crew of the Pacific steamer "Contemporary," in September, 1869. He became captain, 12 Feb., 1874, commanded the sloop "Plymouth" in 1875, and by prompt measures saved the vessels of the North Atlantic squadron from an epidemic of yellow fever at Key West. In 1876-7 he commanded the steamer "Fowhatam" on special service. He was made commodore, 30 Oct., 1883, and was placed in command of the U. S. navy-yard at Norfolk, Virginia, in 1887. Subsequently he was rear-admiral, 4 March, 1886, and voluntarily went upon the retired list, 27 Aug., of the same year.

RUSSELL, Jonathan, diplomatist, b. in Providence, R. I., in 1771; d. in Milton, Mass., 19 Feb., 1882. He was graduated at Brown in 1791, and educated for the law, but engaged in business, and subsequently in politics. He was U. S. minister to Norway and Sweden in 1814-18, and one of the five commissioners that negotiated the treaty of Ghent in the former year. He settled in Mendon, Mass., on his return to this country, took an active part in politics, and in 1821-3 was a member of congress, having been elected as a Democrat. He was a versatile and graceful writer, but, with the exception of his diplomatic correspondence while in Paris, London, and Stockholm, and a Fourth of July oration that reached its twentieth edition (Providence, 1890), he published nothing.

RUSSELL, Noahiah, clergyman, b. in Middle- town, Conn., in 1639; d. there, 3 Dec., 1713. He was graduated at Harvard in 1651, taught at Ipswich, and in October, 1688, was ordained minister of the church in Middletown, where he remained until his death. He was one of the twelve founders of Yale, and a trustee of that college. His "Diary" is published in the "New England Historical Register" for January, 1842. His son, William, clergyman, b. in Middletown, Conn., 20
Nov., 1800; d. there, 1 June, 1871, was graduated at Yale in 1799, studied theology under his father, was a tutor in Yale, and from 1783 until his death served as pastor of the church in Middletown. He declined the presidency of Yale college, was one of its trustees, and published a sermon entitled "The Decay of Love to God in Churches" (New London, Conn., 1741).

RUSSELL, David, Canadian administrator, b. in England about 1755; d. there about 1825. In 1793 he accompanied Gen. John G. Simcoe, first lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, to that province as inspector-general, and became a member of its first parliament and of the executive council. After Gen. Simcoe's resignation, in 1796, Gen. Russell administered the government of the province until the arrival of Gen. Hunter in 1799. During Gen. Russell's administration, among other acts passed by the legislature were the act incorporating the legal profession, and that for establishing trade with the United States.

RUSSELL, Richard, colonist, b. in Hertfordshire, England, in 1612; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 11 May, 1674. He came to this country in 1640, was elected a representative to the General Court, served as selectman in 1645-8, 1654, 1634, and 1638, assistant in 1635-67, and treasurer of Massachusetts from 1644 until his death. His son, James, jurist, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 1 Oct., 1649; d. there, 28 April, 1709, was a representative in 1670, an assistant in 1680-6, and one of Gov. Joseph Dudley's council. He was a member of the council of safety in 1688, a leader in the Revolutionary movement of that day, a commissioner under the new charter in 1692, and was a judge and treasurer of Massachusetts in 1689-90. He discharged all his duties with fidelity, was a liberal friend to the poor, and respected the institutions of religion. His grandson, Chambers, jurist, b. in Boston, 4 July, 1713; d. in Guilford, England, 24 Nov., 1756, was graduated at Harvard in 1731, became executive councilor, representative, and subsequently judge of the superior court and of the admiralty. Chambers' descendant, David, congressman, b. in Massachusetts in 1780; d. in Salem, N. Y., 24 Nov., 1861, received a common-school education, removed to Salem, N. Y., was admitted to the bar there, and edited The Virginia Journal of Commerce. He was a member of both the U. S. and New York legislatures in 1831 and in 1839, subsequently U. S. district attorney for northern New York, and in 1835-41 was a member of congress, having been elected as a Whig. He afterward resumed his profession, in which he continued until his death. His son, David Allen, soldier, b. in Salem, N. Y., 10 Dec., 1829; d. near Winchester, Va., 19 Sept., 1864, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, served in the Mexican war, and received the brevet of 1st lieutenant in August, 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct in the several affairs with guerrillas at Paso Ovejas, National Bridge, and Cerro Gordo. He became captain in 1854, was engaged in the defenses of Washington, D. C., from November, 1861, until January, 1862, when he was appointed colonel of the 5th Massachusetts volunteers, served with the Army of the Potomac in the Virginia peninsular campaign, and was engaged at Yorktown, Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, and the seven days' battles around Richmond. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, 1 July, 1862, for these services, became major of the 8th U. S. infantry on 9 April of the same year, and participated in the battles of Crampton's Gap and Antietam. In November, 1862, he became brigadier-general of volunteers. He commanded a brigade of the 6th corps in the Rappahannock campaign, was engaged at Fredericksburg, Salem, and Beverly Ford, and at Gettysburg, for which battle he was brevetted colonel, 1 July, 1863. During the Rapidan campaign he participated in the capture of the Confederate works at Rappahannock station, commanded a division in the 6th corps in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, and North Anna, was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, 6 May, 1864, and was in the actions at Cold Harbor and the siege and battles around Petersburg. He was then engaged in the defence of Washington, D. C., and in August and September, 1864, served in the Shenandoah campaign in command of his former division. He was killed at the head of his column in the battle of Opequon, Va. He was brevetted major-general in the United States army, 19 Sept., 1864.

RUSSELL, William, soldier, b. in Culpeper county, Va., in 1758; d. in Fayette county, Ky., 3 July, 1825. He removed with his father to the Virginia frontier in early boyhood, joined Daniel Boone's Indian expedition when he was fifteen years of age, and was appointed lieutenant in the Revolutionary army the next year, in which capacity he served throughout the war. He returned to Kentucky in 1791, and was the first to reach the summit of the mountain, and to receive a sword from the enemy. He was then promoted captain, served against the Cherokee Indians, and negotiated a treaty of peace with that tribe. He subsequently fought at the battle of Whitesell's Mills and at Guilford Courthouse. He removed to Kentucky at the end of the war, and bore a prominent part in almost every general expedition against the Indians until the settlement of the country, commanding the advance under Gen. John Hardin, Gen. Charles Scott, and Gen. James Wilkinson. In the expedition under Gen. Anthony Wayne he led a regiment of Kentucky volunteers. He was a delegate to the Virginia legislature in 1790 that passed the act that separated Kentucky from that state, and on the organization of the Kentucky government was annually returned to the legislature till 1808. At that date he was appointed by President Madison colonel of the 7th U. S. infantry. He succeeded Gen. William H. Harrison in command of the frontier of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri in 1811, and was named commander-in-chief and engaged against the Pooua Indians in 1812. He served again in the legislature in 1823, and declined a nomination for governor. Russell county, Ky., is named in his honor.

RUSSELL, William, electionist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 28 April, 1798; d. in Lancaster, Mass., 17 May, 1855. He was educated in the Latin school and the university of his native city, and came to this country in 1819, in which year he took charge of Chatham academy, Savannah, Ga. He removed to New Haven a few years later, and taught in the New Township academy and Hopkins grammar-school. He then devoted himself to the instruction of classes in election in An- donover, Harvard, and Boston, edited the "American Journal of Education" in 1836-9, and subsequently taught in a girls' school in Germantown, Pa. He resumed his election classes in Boston and Andover in 1839, and lectured extensively in New England and New York. He established a teachers' institute in New Hampshire in 1849, which he removed to Lancaster, Mass., in 1855. His entire life was devoted to teaching, for the most part before the Massachusetts teachers' institutes, under the care of the state board of education. He published "Grammar of Composition" (New Haven, 1825); "Lessons in Enumeration" (Boston, 1839);
"Rutgers, Henry, patriot, b. in New York city 7 Oct., 1745; d. there, 17 Feb., 1830. He was graduated at Columbia in 1766, served as a captain in the American army at the battle of White Plains, and subsequently was a colonel of New York militia. During the British occupation of New York city, he was arrested as a spy, and imprisoned in prison and hospital. Col. Rutgers was a member of the New York legislature in 1784, and was frequently re-elected. He was the proprietor of land on East river, in the vicinity of Chatham square, and in other parts of the city, and gave sites for streets, schools, churches, and charities. He presided over a meeting that was held on 24 June, 1812, to prepare against an expected attack of the British, and contributed toward defensive works. From 1802 to 1826 he was one of the regents of the State university. He gave $5,000 for the purpose of reviving Queen's college, New Jersey, the name of which was changed to Rutgers college on 5 Dec., 1825. See memoir in "New York Genealogical and Biographical Record," p. 800. April, 1886; and "The Rutgers Family of New York," by Ernest H. Crosby (New York, 1886).

Rutherford, Thomas, merchant, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 7 Jan., 1766; d. in Richmond, Va., 31 Jan., 1852. He was designed by his family for the church, but at the age of fifteen years entered the counting-house of Hawkesley and Rutherford, Richmond, Indicated, at the head of which was his eldest brother, John. In 1784 he was sent to Virginia in charge of two vessels with valuable cargoes, and went to Richmond, where he established a warehouse. In 1788 he returned to Dublin and became a partner in the firm, but he came again to Richmond in 1789, made that city his home, and married there in 1790. Beginning with a capital of $5,000, he accumulated a handsome fortune. He was successful both in the shipping and milling business, was public-spirited, and exercised great liberality. He gave to the city of Richmond the ground on which the penitentiary now stands, and made other gifts of city property to private citizens. When too old to continue in active business, he collected around him his many friends and relatives and was the center of a charming circle, whom he entertained by his bright conversation and witty sayings. He left a manuscript autobiography in his own handwriting, which is preserved by his descendants. During the congressional session of 1820 the question of a protective tariff was raised for the first time. The merchants of Richmond, in September, 1820, adopted a memorial protesting against a course of tariff reform, and Mr. Rutherford was selected to draft it. It was presented in their behalf by John Tyler; and in after-years, when ex-President Tyler was invited to lecture in Richmond, he selected for his subject "Richmond and its Memories"—one of those memories being "Thomas Rutherford, his Anti-Tariff Memorial and other Political Writings."—His eldest son, John, b. in Richmond, Va., 6 Dec., 1792; d. at Richmond, Va., in July, 1866, received his education at Princeton, and studied law, but practised his profession only a short time. He was for many years president of the Virginia mutual assurance society, the first institution of this kind in the state, and held this post until his death. He was the first captain of the Richmond artillery and became colonel of the regiment, and was known thenceforth as "Colonel John." Col. Rutherford became lieutenant-governor of Virginia in 1840, and, upon the death of Gov. Thomas Gilmer in 1841, succeeded him as civil command and intimate governor as United States, Country." This expression of opinion had great influence in public opinion in Virginia in the command of the state forces at the opening of the civil war. — John's only son, John Coles, b. in Richmond, Va., 29 Nov., 1825; d. at Rocky Castle, Greenbriar, Va., in August, 1866, received a good education, studied one year at Washington college, Va., and was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1842. Subsequently he studied law, and practiced with success in his county and adjoining counties. At the age of twenty-seven he elected to the house of delegates, and he represented his county for twenty consecutive years. He was at different times chairman of the most important committees of the house, and was favorably known as a debater and writer. He contributed under the signature of "Sidney," some able articles to the press; one, "A Banking," published in pamphlet-form, especially gained him literary reputation. He possessed great popularity both as a public man and as a private citizen. He died within the week after his father's death.

RUTHERFORD, Friend Smith, soldier, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 25 Sept., 1819; d. in Alton, Ill., 28 Jan., 1865. Daniel Rutherford, of the University of Edinburgh, who is regarded as the discoverer of nitrogen. He studied law in Troy, N. Y., removed to the west, and settled in practice at Alton, Ill. On 30 June, 1862, he was commissioned as captain and commissary of subsistence, but he resigned on 2 Sept., in order to assume the command of the 57th Illinois regiment. He participated in the attack on the Confederate works at Chickasaw Bayou, near Vicksburg, led the assault on Arkansas Post, and served with credit at the capture of Port Gibson and in the final operations against Vicksburg. He subsequently served in Louisiana, and died from exposure and fatigue a week before his commission was issued appointing him brigadier-general of volunteers. His brothers, Robert Rutherford and George Valentine, served also in the volunteer army during the civil war, and were both made brigadier-general by brevet on 13 March, 1863.

RUTHERFORD, Griffith, soldier, b. in Ireland about 1531; d. in Tennessee about 1800. He settled in North Carolina, west of Salisbury, and sat in the Provincial congress that met in 1774. He was a member of the council of safety, and was appointed a brigadier-general by the Provincial congress at Halifax on 22 June, 1776. In September 1776, he marched at the head of 2,400 men into the country of the Cherokee, who with the topics had been ravaging the frontier settlements, and, in cooperation with a force that had been raised in South Carolina by Col. Andrew Williamson, killed a great number of the Indians, destroyed their crops and habitations, and compelled them to make peace and surrender a part of their lands. He commanded a brigade at the battle of Sanders Creek, near Camden, 16 Aug., 1780, where he was taken prisoner. He was confined at Charleston and afterward at St. Augustine until he was exchanged on 22 June, 1781, when he took the field again, and was in command at Wilmington when the town was evacuated by the British at the close of the war. He served in the North Carolina senate, with intermissions, till 1786. Subsequently he removed to Tennessee, and in September, 1794, on the creation of the separate territory of Tennessee, was appointed president of the legislative council.

RUTHERFORD, John, senator, b. in New York city in September, 1769; d. in Rutherford, N. J., 23 Feb., 1840. His father, Walter, a son of Sir John, of Edgerton, Scotland, served in the British army from the age of seventeen, and, after the concluding peace of the Canadian campaign of Sir Jeffrey Amherst, resigned his commission, married a daughter of James Alexander, and became a citizen of New York. The son was graduated at Princeton in 1776, studied law, was admitted to the bar, married a daughter of Lewis Morris, was elected clerk of the vestry of Trinity church, and had charge of much of the property of that corporation. In 1787, he removed to Tranquility, Sussex co., N. J. He was a member of the legislature of New Jersey, and a presidential elector in 1788, and was twice elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 21 Oct., 1791, till February, 1808, when he resigned to devote his attention to the management of his estate in New Jersey, engaged extensively in agriculture, and was a promoter of public improvements. He was president of the board of proprietors of eastern New Jersey. In 1826 he served on a commission to adjust the boundary between New York and New Jersey, and in 1829 and 1835 was one of a joint commission to settle boundary questions between those states and Pennsylvania.

—His grandson, Lewis Morris, physicist, b. in Morrisania, N. Y., 25 Nov., 1816; d. in Tranquility, N. J., 30 May, 1865. He graduated at Williams in 1834, and studied law. He was admitted to the bar in 1837, and practised as the associate of Peter A. Jay, and, after his death, of Hamilton Fish, in New York city. In 1849 he abandoned the practice of law and thereafter devoted his leisure to science, principally in the direction of astronomical photography and special analysis. In January, 1865, he published in the "American Journal of Science" a paper on the spectra of stars, the moon, and planets, with diagrams of their lines and a description of the instruments that he used, which was the first published work on star-spectra after the great revelations of Bunsen and Kirchhoff, and the first attempt to classify the stars according to their spectra. While engaged in making his observations upon star-spectra Mr. Rutherford discovered the use of the star-spectroscopes to show the exact state of achromatic correction in an object-glass, particularly for the rays that are used in photography. In 1864, after many experiments in other directions but for the same end, he ascertained, by devising and constructing an objective of 114 inches aperture and about 15 feet focal length, corrected for photography alone. This objective was a great success, and was in constant use in making negatives of the sun, moon, and star-groups, until it was replaced in 1898 by another, which had about the same focal length but was 13 inches in aperture. This glass was an ordinary achromat, such as is used for vision, and was converted into a photographic objective by the addition of a third lens of flint glass, which made the proper correction and could be affixed in a few minutes. Mr. Rutherford constructed a micrometer for the measurement of astronomical photographs, for use upon pictures of solar eclipses or transits and upon groups of stars, of which he had measured several hundred. He claims, that the photographic method is at least equal in accuracy to that of the heliometer or ffril-micrometer, and far more convenient. The photographs of the moon made by Mr. Rutherford are of remarkable beauty and have not yet been surpassed. A German writer having suggested that the colloid film was not reliable, Mr. Rutherford published in 1872 a series of measurements that conclusively demonstrated its fixity under normal conditions. In 1864 he presented to the National academy of sciences a photograph of the solar spectrum that he had obtained by means of bisulphide of carbon prisms. It contained more than three times the number of lines that had been laid down within similar limits on the chart by Bunsen and Kirchhoff. He constructed a ruling-engine in 1870 which produced interference-gratings on glass and spectrum metal that were superior to all others until the recent productions of Prof. Henry A. Rowland. With one of these gratings, containing about 17,000 lines to the inch, he produced a photograph of the solar spectrum which was for a long time unequalled. In 1876 he published a paper describing an instrument which he called a heliometric circle and showed by readings that it gave a far greater accuracy than could be obtained from divisions on metallic circles of the same dimensions. Mr. Rutherford was named by the president of the United States one of the American delegates to the International meridian conference that met in Washington, and in the latter he was chosen to take an active part in the work and framed and presented the resolution that finally expressed the conclusions of the conference. He was invited by the French academy of sciences to become a member of the International conference on astronomical photography in Paris in 1887, and was appointed by the president of the National academy of sciences as its representative, but was obliged to decline an active part in the work on account of failing health. In 1898 he became a trustee of Columbia, but he resigned in 1894, after giving his astronomical instruments to that institution, in whose observatory they are now mounted. Mr. Rutherford was one of the original members named in the act of congress in 1898 creating the National academy of science, and was one of the Royal astronomical society, and his work had been recognized by the gift of many diplomas, memberships, orders, and medals, both domestic and foreign.

RUTLEDGE, John, statesman, b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1739; d. there, 23 July, 1800. He was the eldest son of Dr. John Rutledge, who came to South Carolina from the north of Ireland about 1755, practised medicine in Charleston, and married a lady of fortune, leaving her a widow with seven children at the age of twenty-seven. The son, who was sent to England to study law at the Temple, returned to Charleston in 1761, and acquired a high reputation as an advocate. He was an earnest opponent of the stamp-act when it was discussed in the provincial assembly. He was sent to the congress at New York in October, 1765, and with his colleague, Christopher Gadsden, boldly advocated colonial union and resistance to oppression. He was a member of the South Carolina convention of 1774, in which he argued in favor of making common cause with Massachusetts, and carried a resolution that South Carolina should take part in the proposed congress, and that her delegates should go unhampered by instructions. He was one of those that were chosen by the planters to represent them in the first Continental congress at Philadelphia. Patrick Henry pronounced him "by far the greatest orator" in that assembly. In 1775 he was again chosen a delegate to congress. He was chairman of the committee that framed a constitution for South Carolina in 1776, and on 27 March was elected president of the new government, and commander-in-chief of the military forces. When the British fleet arrived in Cape Fear river he fortified Charleston, and insisted on retaining the post on Sullivan's island when Gen. Charles Lee proposed its evacuation. During the battle he saved two hundred and fifty pounds of powder, and directed Col. William Montrie not to retreat without an order from him, adding that he would "sooner cut off his right hand than write one." He was dissatisfied with changes in the constitution, and in March, 1778, resigned his office, but in the following year he was chosen governor again by an almost unanimous vote of the legislature, superseding Rawlins Lowndes. He was clothed with dictatorial powers, and prepared to repel the British invasion. When Gen. Augustine Prevost advanced upon Charleston in May, 1779, the city was defenceless, Gen. Benjamin Lincoln with the Continental troops being 150 miles away. The latter hastened to the succor of Charleston by forced marches, and state troops were gathered for the ensuing battle. It was proposed by the governor's council that the British should retire, on condition that South Carolina should remain neutral during the rest of the war, and that her fate should be determined by the issue of the conflict. This measure, which the historian Ramsay thinks was a wise, devised for the purpose of gaining time, was favored by Rutledge. Supported by Gadsden, the younger Gen. Moultrie, on Lincoln's approach, the enemy retreated, and Rutledge, at the head of the militia, took the field against the invaders.
When Charleston was captured by Sir Henry Clinton in 1780, Gov. Rutledge retired into North Carolina, and until the close of hostilities that terminated the army of Gen. Nathaniel Greene, and participated in its operations. When South Carolina was partly redeemed from the conquerors, he resumed the duties of governor, summoning the assembly at Jacksonboro in January, 1782. He retired from the governorship in that year, and was elected to the Continental Congress. In that body he opposed a general impost, except for the purpose of paying the army. He was returned to Congress in 1783, and in March, 1784, after declining the mission to the Hague, he was appointed chancellor of South Carolina. He was a member of the convention that framed the Federal constitution, in which he was one of a committee of five that reported a ratio of representation more favorable to the south than that which was finally adopted, and was chairman of the committee of detail. He advocated the assumption of all the state debts by the Federal government, threatened a secession of the south if the slave-trade were prohibited, proposed that Congress should elect the president, and in the discussion of the powers and constitution of the judiciary exercised an influence. Of the whole the constitution went into operation he was nominated a justice of the U.S. supreme court, but declined in order to accept the chief justiceship of his native state. On 1 July, 1795, he was appointed chief justice of the U.S. supreme court. He presided at the August term, but when the Senate met in December his mind had become diseased, and the nomination was rejected. Hugh, jurist, b. in Charleston, S.C., about 1741; d. there, in January, 1811, acquired his legal education in London, returned after completing his term at the Temple, and took high rank at the bar of South Carolina. He was appointed judge of admiralty at Charleston in 1776, and was speaker of the legislative council in 1777–8. After Charleston surrendered, he was sent with his brother Edward and other patriots to St. Augustine. In 1782–5 he was speaker of the state house of representatives. In 1794 he was chosen by the legislature one of the three judges of the court of equity as constituted by a lately enacted law, which office he filled till his death. Another brother, Edward, statesman, b. in Charleston, S.C., 23 Nov., 1719; d. there, 29 Jan., 1811, was one of the best of the family. After acquiring a classical education and reading law with his brother, he was entered as a student at the Temple, London, in 1739. He attended the courts of law and the houses of parliament for four years, and, on being called to the bar, returned to Charleston and entered into practice. He married Harriet, a daughter of Henry Middleton, soon after his arrival. In 1774 he was sent to the Continental Congress. He took an active part in the discussions and debates concerning the Declaration of Independence, of which he was one of the signers, and remained a member of Congress till 1777. On 12 June, 1776, he was appointed on the first board of war. He was delegated, with John Adams of the Virginian Franklin, to confer with Lord Howe with reference to Howe’s proposals for a reconciliation. The representatives of Congress met the British admiral on Staten island 11 Sept., 1776, but refused to treat with him except on the basis of a recognition of American independence. In 1779 he was again elected to Congress, but he was unable to attend on account of sickness. After the evacuation of Charleston he returned to his home, engaged in professional practice, which he continued with success for seventeen years. During that time he was an active member of the legislature. He effectually resisted the efforts that were made to revive the slave-trade as long as he had a voice in the public business of the state. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1798, and the author of the law abolishing the rights of entail that was enacted in 1791. He declined the office of associate justice of the U.S. supreme court in 1794, and was elected governor of South Carolina in 1796, but did not live to complete his term. John’s son, John, member of Congress, b. in Charleston, S.C., 1796; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 Sept., 1819, studied law with his father. He was elected to Congress as a Federalist, and twice re-elected, serving from 15 May, 1797, till 3 March, 1803. The first John’s grandson, Edward, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S.C., in 1797; d. in Savannah, Ga., 13 March, 1832, was graduated at Yale in 1817, and was admitted to orders in Christ church, Middletown, Conn., 17 Apr., 1819. In 1825 he became rector of St. Augustine’s, after which he became professor of moral philosophy in the University of Pennsylvania, and he was president-elect of Transylvania university at the time of his death. Mr. Rutledge published “The Family Altar” (New Haven, 1828), and a “History of the Church of England” (Middletown, Conn., 1825). Hugh’s son, Francis Huger, P. E. Bishop, b. in Charleston, S.C., 11 Apr., 1799; d. in Tallahassee, Fla., 6 Nov., 1866, was graduated at Yale in 1821, studied at the General theological seminary, New York city, and was ordained deacon in 1838 and priest on 20 Nov., 1839. He had charge of a church on Sullivan’s island in 1827–29, was rector of Trinity church, St. Augustine, Fla., in 1829–45, then became rector of St. Augustine’s church, Tallahassee, and was consecrated bishop of Florida on 15 Oct., 1851. The degree of D.D. was conferred on him by Hobeit in 1844. He published occasional sermons. RutTENBER, Edward Manning, antiquary, b. in Bennington, Vt., 17 July, 1824. He learned the printer’s trade in New York, N.Y., and was a public officer in the state of New York for two years, from 1850 till 1852. He has published a “History of New York” (New York, 1859); “Ob-
RYAN, George Frederick Augustus, English traveller, b. in Kent, England, in 1820; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 29 Sept., 1848. He was educated at Sandhurst military college, which he left at the age of seventeen, and volunteered in the Spanish service during the Carlist war of 1833-35. He was commissioned as a lieutenant in the British army after returning home, went with his regiment to Canada, resigned soon afterward, and spent several years among the Indians and traders of the west. He subsequently travelled in Africa, and just before the Mexican war made a tour through all the provinces of Mexico, and spent the following winter in the region of the Rocky mountains, returning to England in August, 1847. He set out on a second trip to the far west, but died on the way. He was the author of "Adventures in Mexico and the Rocky Mountains" (London, 1847), "Life in the Far West" (1849); a pamphlet on the Oregon question, and papers in the "Transactions" of the British ethnological society.

RUA, Joaquin (mooth, Mexican linguist, b. in Merida in 1772; d. there, 15 Sept., 1850. He entered the order of St. Francis in his native city in 1789, and was ordained priest the same year. Fifty years after his ordination in 1809, was graduated there, and in 1810 became a priest. He was immediately assigned to the missions of the Maya Indians, of whose language he possessed a thorough knowledge. Besides numerous religious works, he wrote in the Maya language: "Catecismo historico y Doctrina Cristiana" (Merida, 1822), "Gramatica Maya" (Caracas, 1822), "Codex old Maya, para la enseñanza de los niños indigenas" (1845), "Analis del idioma Yucateco" (1851), and "Leti u cihil Evangelio Jesucristo habla San Lucas," edited by W. M. Watts (London, 1865).

RYAN, Abram Joseph, poet, b. in Norwich, Vt., 15 Aug., 1839; d. in Louisville, Ky., 22 April, 1866. At an early age his Pascal-Catholic family, and after the usual classical and theological studies, he was ordained, and shortly afterward became a chaplain in the Confederate army, serving until the close of the war. He wrote "The Conquered Banner" soon after Lee's surrender. In 1865 he removed to New Orleans, where, in addition to his clerical duties, he edited the "Star," a weekly Roman Catholic paper. From New Orleans he went to Knoxville, Tenn., after a few months to Augusta, Ga., and founded the "Banner of the South," a religious and political weekly. This he soon relinquished, and for several years was pastor of St. Mary's church, Mobile, Ala.; but in 1880 his old restlessness returned, and he went to the north for the twofold object of publishing his poems and lecturing. He spent the month of December in Baltimore, where his "Poems, Patriotic, Religious, and Miscellaneous," were published. There also, about the same time, he delivered his first lecture, the subject being "Some Aspects of Modern Civilization." During this visit he made his home at Lovelock college, and in return for the hospitality of the Jesuit fathers he gave a public recital from his poems, and devoted the proceeds, $300, to found a medal for poetry at the college. His lecturing tour was not successful, and in a few months he returned to the south, where he continued to lead the same restless mode of life. Father Ryan was engaged on a "Life of Christ" at the time of his death. His most popular poems, besides that mentioned above, are "The Lost Cause," "The Sword of Luke," "The Flag of Erin," and the epic "Their Story runneth Thus."...
RYAN, William Redmond, author, b. in England.

RYAN, William Thomas, Canadian author, b. in Toronto, 3 Feb., 1839. He was educated at St. Michael's college, Toronto, and, entering the army, served during the Crimean war, and subsequently in the 100th royal Canadian regiment. On leaving the army he devoted himself to journalism and literature. He edited "The Volunteer Review," published at Ottawa, "The Evening Mail," of which he was proprietor, the "Daily Free Press" at Ottawa, and the "Daily Sun," and is now (1896) editor of the Montreal "Daily Post" and the "True Witness." He has contributed poems and articles to various newspapers in Canada and the United States, and he is known as an author under the name of Carroll Ryan, which he took in 1855. He has published "Oscar, and other Poems" (Hamilton, 1857); "Songs of a Wanderer" (Ottawa, 1865); "The Canadian Northwest and the Canadian Pacific Railway" (Montreal, 1871); "Poems," and "The Life and Works of his wife, Mary Ann MacNer, whom he married in 1870, has published "Poems" (Ottawa, 1879).

RYDER, Albert Pinkham, artist, b. in New Bedford, Mass., 13 March, 1847. He studied art under William E. Marshall and at the Academy of design, where he began to exhibit in 1873. In 1877, 1882, and 1887 he went abroad, visiting London and Paris and spending a year in France, Spain, and Germany. His paintings are notable rather for color and effect than for form, and he might be classed as a representative of the impressionist school in this country. Among his works are "Wandering Cow," "Curlew Hour," "Pegasus," "Farm-Yard," "The Waste of Waters is their Field" (1884), "Little Maid of Arcady" (1886), "Tempie of the Mind," and "Phantom Ship.

RYDER, James, educator, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 8 Oct., 1800; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 Jan., 1869. He was brought to the United States when a child, entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus at the age of thirteen, studied for five years at Georgetown college, and afterward completed his theological studies in his native land. He was ordained a priest in 1823, and, after teaching theology and the sacred scriptures for three years at the College of Spoleto, he returned to the United States, and was for several years professor of theology and philosophy and vice-president of Georgetown college. In 1858 he became pastor of St. Mary's church, Philadelphia, and in the following year he took charge of a church in Frederick, Md., which he soon left to assume the presidency of Georgetown college. From 1843 till 1845 he was superior of the Jesuit order in the United States. In 1846 he became president of the College of the Holy Cross, which had been established three years before at Worcester, Mass., but in 1848 he returned to his former RYDER, Platt Powell, artist, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 11 June, 1821; d. 16 July, 1896. He studied under Leon Bonnat in Paris in 1860-70. Among his genre paintings are "Life’s Evening," "Spinning," and "An Interior" (1870); a "Forest" (1873); "Reading the Cup" (1882); "Welcome Step" (1883); "Clean Shave," "Washing-Day," and "Bill of Fare" (1884); "Fireside" (1885); and "Watching and Waiting" (1886). He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1869, and was also a founder of the Brooklyn academy of design.

RYDER, John, Canadian clergyman, b. in Norfolk, Ont., 12 June, 1800; d. in Simcoe, Ont., 5 Oct., 1878. He received a fair education, became a Wesleyan preacher at the age of eighteen, and aided in founding many institutions of the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1854 the Canadian government expressly directed and maintained the missions of the London Wesleyan committee in the Northwest territory, sent Mr. Ryder to explore the field. He travelled nearly 3,000 miles in the yacht of the Hudson bay company and in bark canoes, and, before returning, went to England and arranged for the transfer of the missions. His journey is described in "Hudson’s Bay, or a Missionary Tour in the Territory of the Hon. Hudson’s Bay Company" (Toronto, 1855).

RYERSON, Martin, benefactor, b. in Paterson, N. J., 6 Oct., 1798; d. 17 Feb., 1882. His early educational advantages were limited. At sixteen years of age he left home alone, and in Detroit found employment with a fur-dealer. In 1836 he went to Muskegan, Mich., and, while trading with the Indians, learned to speak the Ottawa and Chippewa languages. In 1841 he embarked in the lumber business on a limited scale, and in 1851 he established a yard at Chicago, by which his business was greatly increased, and he became wealthy. Mr. Ryerson gave freely to charitable institutions and public enterprises, and, as a token of his friendship and appreciation of Indian character, he erected in Lincoln park, Chicago, a bronze group in memory of the Ottawa nation, of which tribe his wife was a member. He expressed a wish to have a "National Park" in the United States, near a block, valued at $225,000, should be forever set apart and distributed equally among eight charitable institutions of Chicago. The family have placed the property in trust for this purpose.

RYLANE, Joseph Hinze, clergyman, b. near Manchester, England, 16 June, 1826. He was graduated at King’s college, London, in 1841, and, after officiating as a curate in London for two years, came to the United States in 1863, and became rector of St. Paul’s church, Cleveland, Ohio. In 1867-71 he was rector of St. James’s church, Chicago, Ill., and since 1871 he has been rector of St. Mark’s church, New York city. He received the degree of D. D. from Western Reserve college in 1867. Dr. Ryland belongs to the school of Christian rationalists. He is the author of "Preachers and Preaching" (London, 1862); Essays on Miracles (New York, 1874); Social Questions: Lectures on Competition, Communism, Co-operation, and Christianity and Socialism (New York, 1880); and Pulpit Talks on Topics of the Time (1881).

RYLAND, Robert, clergyman, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 14 March, 1865. He was graduated at Amherst college in 1884, and at Western reserve college in 1886. In 1892 he ordained to the Christian ministry in 1827, and in 1827–32 was pastor of the Baptist church in Lynchburg, Va. In 1892 he took charge of the Manual-labor school in Richmond, and when that school was chartered in 1844 as Richmond college he was made its president, serving until 1866. For twenty-five years he acted as pastor of the 1st African Baptist church of Richmond, during which time he baptized into its fellowship nearly 4,000 persons. In 1888 he removed to Kentucky, where he has been engaged in the work of teaching and preaching. Dr. Ryland has been a friend of the colored people, and a promoter of higher education.

RYLE, John, manufacturer, b. in Bollington, near Macclesfield, England, 22 Oct., 1817; d. in Macclesfield, England, 6 Nov., 1887. He died in the silk-mills of Macclesfield when but five years of age; and, having become an expert weaver and thrower, emigrated to the United States in 1839, and was engaged to establish a silk-factory at Paterson, N. J., of which he became owner in 1846. He was the first to carry on this business with success in the United States. At first the production was limited to twist and process silks. He tried weaving in 1846, and again in 1850–50, but was not able to make the manufacture of broad silks remunerative until after the civil war.
SA. Estacio de (sah), Portuguese soldier, b. in Alentejo about 1530; d. in Rio Janeiro, 20 Feb., 1567. He was a nephew of Men de Sao (p. 0). During the struggle between the French and Portuguese in Brazil the Portuguese government sent Estacio de Sa, with two galleons but few soldiers, to expel the invaders. He arrived at Bahia in 1564, and, after waiting several months to organize a sufficient force, left in 1565 for Rio Janeiro, but, on examining the fortifications, became convinced of his inferiority. He then sailed for Sáo Paulo, where he remained one year organizing militia and awaiting re-enforcements, and in January, 1566, sailed again for the Bay of Rio Janeiro. On 1 March he came to anchor at the bar and landed his force, fortifying himself between the Pão d'Assucar and the Morro São João, where he held the foundations of the future city of Rio Janeiro. The French general, hearing of Jesuits of the critical condition of his nephew, sent an expedition to his aid. Estacio de Sa began operations immediately by attacking the fortifications, which were taken after an obstinate battle, in which Sa was wounded. The French were completely routed and obliged to retire in their ships to Europe, but Sa died a few days after enlisting his forces, and was buried in the church of São Sebastião, on the hill afterward called Morro de Castello.

SA. Salvador Correa de, Brazilian governor, b. in Rio Janeiro in 1594; d. in Lisbon, 1 Jan., 1688. He was a grandson of the first governor of Rio Janeiro after its separation from Bahia in 1553, and his father, Martin de Sa, also held that office after it was declared a separate government of Bahia till 1598. Young Salvador entered the public service in 1612, protecting a convoy of thirty vessels from Paramaribo to Europe against Dutch privateers. He was afterward sent to Brazil to prepare an auxiliary force of 500 men and three armed ships to assist the fleet that had been sent under Padre de Toledo against the Dutch invaders, and, after saving the province of Espírito Santo from an attack by Dutch corsairs, he aided in the recapture of Bahia in 1625. He returned in 1632 to Lisbon, but was sent in 1634 as admiral of the south to suppress a rebellion of the Cachoes Indians in Paraguay, whom he defeated in 1635. He was appointed captain-general of Rio Janeiro in 1637, and as such recognized in 1640 the Prince of Braganza as King John IV, and, when the Jesuits of the south refused to acknowledge the new sovereign, Sa left his uncle, Duarte Correa, in charge of the government, and sailed on 29 March for São Paulo, where he soon restored order. In March, 1644, he was appointed general of the fleet, to protect the Brazilian coast against the Dutch, and co-operated with João Fernandes Vieira in the attack on Recife. He was appointed in 1645 to establish a government in Angola, and sailed on 12 May for Africa, finishing the conquest of the Congo kingdom by the capitulation of Fort São Miguel, 15 Aug., 1648. In 1658 he was again appointed governor of southern Brazil, and took charge in September, 1659, but, after quelling an insurrection in Niem, in October, 1660, he handed the government over to his successor in June of that year, and sailed for Lisbon. When Alphonso VI. was deposed, 23 Sept., 1667, Sa, whose son had been the favorite of that monarch, was banished to Africa for ten years; but, resolving to finish his days in a Jesuit convent, he obtained, by the influence of the general of the order, permission to live in retirement in his palace of Lisbon, where he died nearly a centenarian.

SA. Simão Pereira de, Brazilian author, b. in Rio Janeiro in 1701; d. there about 1760. He studied in the Jesuit college, and was afterward admitted into the order. He was graduated in theology and canonical law at Coimbra university, and by his learning became one of the most celebrated members of his order. He wrote much, and among the few of his productions that have been preserved are "Ensaios topographicos e militar sobre a Colonia do Sacramento" (Rio Janeiro, 1760), and "Descripção cronologica da diocese de Río de Janeiro" (1765).

SAAVEDRA, Cornelio (sah-yay-dr6), Argentine soldier, b. in Potosí, Bolivia, in 1730; d. in Buenos Ayres in 1829. In 1757 his family removed to Buenos Ayres, where he obtained his education. He filled different posts under the Spanish government, and on 6 Sept., 1806, was appointed chief of a battalion. When Montevideo was taken by the English troops, 2 Feb., 1807, Liniers marched with a division of 2,500 volunteers to protect the city, and Saavedra took part in the expedition at the head of a body of troops, consisting of all the arms and ammunition of Colonia, and marched them to Buenos Ayres. On 5 July, 1807, he took an active part in the reconquest of the latter city, at the head of his battalion. On 25 May, 1810, after the revolution, of which he was one of the chiefs, he was appointed president of the governing junta. Against the advice of Mariano Moreno (p. 563) he consented to take Liniers into the junta in December, 1810, and by this and other measures caused discontent, and when the patriotic army under Belgrano was defeated, 20 June, 1811, at Huaqui, Saavedra left for upper Peru to take command of the army. On 23 Sept. the revolution that overthrew the junta took place, and Saavedra was ordered to deliver the forces under his command to Gen. Pueyrredon. In 1814 he was accused of being the leader of the mutiny of 5 April, 1811, took refuge in Chili, and was excluded from the amnesty that was granted afterward. When, in 1816, the congress of Tucuman was established, he presented himself for trial, and was acquitted and occupied his former place. When Balcarce passed to the army of San Martin in 1817, Saavedra was appointed his successor as chief of staff, which place he occupied till 1818. He served in the Argentine army till 1821, when he retired with his family to a country-seat.

SAAVEDRA, Hernando Arias de, Spanish soldier, b. in Asuncion, Paraguay, in 1566; d. there about 1625. He was a son of one of the officers that accompanied Cabeza de Vaca, and at an early age entered a military career, taking part in many engagements against the Indians. For his services he was made governor of Asuncion, which post he held three different times, being the first native to obtain such an office. In one of his expeditions he advanced 200 leagues to the south of Buenos Ayres, and was taken prisoner by the Indians, but escaped and returned to Asuncion. Afterward he invaded the Chaco, and explored the borders of Parana and Uruguay rivers. He gained most renown by the two reforms that he promoted, of which the first was the suppression of the encomiendas or system of personal slavery, which would have resulted in the destruction of the native race.
SABIN, Elijah Robinson, clergyman, b. in Tolland, Conn., 10 Sept., 1756; d. in Augusta, Ga., 3 May, 1854. Born in a country which is now part of Pennsylvania, Sabin, Salmon, and Salem, came to this country in 1645, and held local offices in Relobost, Mass., and his father, Nehemiah, served in the Revolutionary war, and was fatally wounded at Trenton. In 1781 his family removed to Vermont, and the son was employed in clearing land, educating himself in leisure hours. In 1798 he began to preach, and in 1799 he entered the ministry. He was appointed presiding elder of the Vermont district in 1805, and subsequently of the New London district, embracing Rhode Island, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and a part of New Hampshire. He was appointed chaplain of the Massachusetts house of representatives, being the first of his denomination to hold this office, and afterward became pastor of a Methodist church in Hampden. He assisted in the military hospital there, and, after the enemy took possession of the town, was taken prisoner and confined in a transport. His wife mounted a horse, rode nine miles to the British commander, and obtained his release on the plea that he was a non-combatant. In 1815 he resumed his charge in Hampden. He died while travelling in the interior, near the boundary of New Hampshire and Vermont.

SAVEDRA, Juan de, Spanish soldier, b. in Seville, Spain, about the end of the 15th century; d. in Chuquina, Peru, 21 May, 1534. He went to Peru in 1534 as chief judge of the expedition of Pedro de Alvarado, but after his arrival entered the service of Diego de Almagro, whom he accompanied in the discovery and conquest of Chili in 1535–6. In the latter year he founded the city of Valparaiso, and, on his return to Peru, he took part in the battle of Alcanay, 12 July, 1537. He acted on behalf of Almagro as commissioner in the negotiations of Main about the boundaries of New Toledo, but was not present at the battle of Salinas, 6 April, 1538, on account of illness. Although he always refused the offers of the brothers Pizarro during Almagro's absence, Juan de Saavedra, a courtier in Lima, joined the rivalry with Juan de Rada (q. e.), retired to Lima, and took no part in the battle of Chupas. In 1544, when Gonzalo Pizarro rose in rebellion, he appointed Saavedra his substitute at Huanuco. President Gasca in 1547 induced Saavedra to re-enter the Localist party, appointing him captain of cavalry, which corps he commanded in the battle of Xaquixaguana. In 1548 he was appointed governor of Cuzco, but in 1551 he was superseded by the audiencia of Lima. In 1554 the city of Cuzco sent him with the rank of captain to join the army of Alonso de Alvarado, operating against the rebellions Francisco Giron (q. c.), and he met his death at the battle of Chuquina.

SAVEDRA GUZMAN, Antonio, Mexican poet, b. in Mexico about 1550; d. in Spain about 1598, entered the Spanish orders, Vicente Espinel and Lope de Vega, praise Saavedra's work highly, and William H. Prescott calls him the poet-chronicler.

SABIN, Dwight May, senator, b. in Marseilles, La Salle co., III., 25 April, 1844. His early years were spent on a farm, and in 1857 the family removed to Connecticuth. He was educated at Philis Andover academy, which he left in 1863 to enter the National Union; but he resigned after three months, owing to impaired health, and procured a clerkship in Washington, D. C. In 1864 he entered on farming and the lumber business in Connecticut, and in 1868 he removed to Stillwater, Minn., where he engaged in lumbering and manufacturing. Mr. Sabin now (1898) owns a large number of forest lands, is a leading stockholder in the Northwestern car company, having acquired a fortune. He served in the state senate in 1870–1, was a member of the National Republican conventions of 1872, 1876, 1880, and 1884, serving as chairman of the last, and was elected to the U. S. senate as a Republican, to succeed William Windom, for the period that terminated on 4 March, 1889.
SABINE, Sir Edward, British soldier, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 14 Oct., 1788; d. in Richmond, England, 26 June, 1863. After receiving a military education in England, he joined the royal artillery as 2d lieutenant in 1803, became captain in 1820, and served in the war with the United States, commanding the batteries in the siege of Fort Erie in 1814. He was appointed adjutant in the first arctic expedition under Sir John Ross in 1818, and accompanied Sir William Edward Parry's expedition of 1819-20 in the same capacity, making important researches in terrestrial magnetism. In 1821-23 he made a series of voyages ranging from the equator to the Arctic circle in quest of data concerning the variations of the magnetic needle, and conducted pendulum experiments, thus laying the basis for an accurate determination of the figure of the earth. His discoveries led to the establishment of magnetic observatories in Great Britain and the United States. His last military appointment was president, and from 1840 till 1860 he published reports of observations at the Cape of Good Hope, Hobart Town, St. Helena, and Toronto. In 1818 he became a fellow of the Royal society, of which he was vice-president from 1850 to 1860, and president from 1861 to 1871. He was made a knight of the Bath in 1829 and a general in 1870. During one voyage he edited the "North Georgia Gazette and Winter Chronicle," a periodical written by the officers on the "Hecla" in 1819-20, which was reprinted (London, 1822). He also aided in the preparation of a "Natural History" (1824), which was appended to Parry's "First Arctic Voyage" (1821), and was the author of an "Account of Experiments to determine the Phase of the Earth" (1825); "The Variability of the Intensity of Magnetism upon Many Parts of the Globe" (1828); and numerous memoirs and scientific papers. He was engaged in scientific work until his death, and, with his wife as assistant, prepared reduction tables and charts of all the observations of terrestrial magnetism. He was also engaged in topographical surveys in the United States, in the British Possessions, and in other parts of the world. His works are "A Catalogue of the Royal Geographical Society," etc.

SACKETT, William Augustus, congressman, b. in Aurelius, Cayuga county, N. Y., 18 Nov., 1812; d. 6 Sept., 1895. His ancestors came from England in 1633, settled in Massachusetts, and continued to live in New England until 1801, when his father moved to Cayuga county, N. Y. He received an academic education, studied law in Seneca Falls and Skaneateles, was admitted to the bar in 1834, and soon secured a lucrative practice. Elected to congress as a Whig, he served from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1853. He took part in the controversy in relation to the admission of California as a free state, and both spoke and voted for admission. He earnestly opposed the fugitive slave law, and was uncompromisingly in opposition to slavery and the admission of any more slave states. From the committee on claims he made a report on the power of consuls, which had an influence in the final modification of those powers. He removed to Saratoga Springs in 1857, making his home there ever since. He traveled extensively in Europe, Egypt, and the Holy Land, and wrote letters describing his journeys that were published. He had been a Republican since the organization of the party, and had been active as a public speaker.

—His son, William, was colonel of the 9th New York cavalry, and was fatally wounded while leading a charge under Sheridan at Trevilian Station.

SACO, José Antonio (sah'-ko), Cuban publicist,
b. in Havana, Cuba, Jan. 19, 1827; d. Madrid, Spain, in 1879. He finished his education in Havana, where, in 1851, he obtained the professorship of philosophy in the Seminary of San Carlos. From 1824 till 1826 he travelled in the United States, and in 1828 he returned to New York, where he devoted himself to literary labors. He translated into Spanish, from the Latin, the celebrated work of Hegemons on roman law, a work which was translated through ten editions in Spain. In 1832 he went to Havana, and held the editorship of the "Revi-sta Bimestre Cubana" until 1834, when he was banished from the island on account of his liberal ideas and anti-slavery principles. In 1836 he was elected to represent the eastern part of Cuba in the Spanish cortes, but he did not take his seat, as the Madrid government deprived him of his seat.
He published in Madrid "Paralelo entre Cuba y algunas colonias inglesas" (1838). He made afterward an extensive tour in the European continent, and in 1840 fixed his residence in Paris, where he published "Supresion del tráfico de esclavos en Cuba" (1845), which brought upon him the wrath of the slave-holders, and diminished his chances of being eligible to return to the legislature. In 1846 he published in Paris his "Ideas sobre la incorporacion de Cuba a los E. U." favoring the annexation of Cuba to the United States, which was immediately translated into English and French, and assailed by the American press.

"La situacion politica de Cuba y su remedio" was published in 1851, and "La cuestion Cubana" in 1853. He was elected by the Cuban Congress in 1853 as one of the delegates sent to Madrid to advocate political reforms for the island, and in 1878 was again elected by the same city to the Spanish cortes.
Saco was a voluminous writer. During the last years of his life he began the publication of his great work "Historia de la esclavitud desde los tiempos mas remotos" (Paris, 1856 et seq.), one of the most exhaustive works of its kind. Several volumes were published before his death. It has been translated into various European languages. Other works of Saco are "Historia de la esclavitud entre los Indios," and numerous articles and essays on a diversity of subjects, which have been collected under the title of "Coleccion de papeles varios" (Havana, 1882).

SADLER, Mary Anne (Madden), author, b. in Coot Hill, County Cavan, Ireland, 31 Dec., 1820.
After receiving a private school education she contributed to London magazines, and in 1844 emigated to Montreal, Canada, where she published by subscription "Tales of the Olden Time." In 1846 she married James Sadler, then of the publishing firm of D. and J. Sadler and Co., of New York and Montreal, and became connected editorially with the Roman Catholic press. She has translated several religious works, tales, and dramas from the French, and is the author of stories for Roman Catholic Sunday-schools, and several novels.
Her works include "Alice Riolan, or the Blind Man's Daughter" (Boston, 1851); "New Lights, or Life in Galway" (New York, 1854); "The Blakes and their Relations" (1859); "The Confederate Chie-tains, a Tale of the Irish Rebellion of 1641" (1859);
"Bessy Conway, or the Irish Girl in America" (1862);
"The Daughter of Tyconnell" (1863); "Maureen Dhu, the Admiral's Daughter" (1870); and "Purgatory, Dogmatic, Historical, and Political" (1886).—Her daughter, Anna Theresa, author, b. in Montreal, Canada, 19 Jan., 1854, was educated partially in New York city, and gradu-atd at the convent of Villa Maria, near Montreal, in 1871. She has contributed largely to Catholic periodicals, has published an numerous tales and poems from the French and Italian, and is the author of "Seven Years and More" (New York, 1872);
"Ethel Hamilton, and other Tales" (1871); "The King's Page" (1877); "Women of Catholicity" (1885); and "The Silent Woman of Ahood" (1887).
She has also published a compilation entitled "Irish Tales of the Mountains."—"SADLER, Benjamin, deacon, b. in Baltimore, Md., 25 Dec., 1823. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1842, and at the theological seminary there in 1844, and was successively pastor of Lutheran churches at Pine Grove, Pa., in 1845—9; Shippensburg, Pa., in 1849—53; Middletown, Pa., in 1853—6; and Easton, Pa., in 1856—62. In the last year he became principal of the Ladies' seminary at Lutherville, Md., and in 1875 he accepted the presidency of Muhlenberg college, Allentown, Pa. He occupied this post until 1886, when, disabled for life by a fall on the ice, he was compelled to abandon the work. In 1867 he received the degree of D. D. from Pennsylvania college. He was a trustee of that institution in 1862—72, and has held several offices of trust and honor and confidence. He is a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his denomination, and has published numerous baccalaureate discourses and addresses, including "A Rebellions Nation Reproved" (Easton, Pa., 1861), and "The Causes and Remedies of the losses of her Popula-ation by the Lutheran Church in America" (Philadelphia, 1858).—His eldest son, Samuel Philip, chemist, b. in Prine Grove, Pa., 18 July, 1858, was graduated at Pennsylvania college in 1876, studied at Lehigh university in 1867—8, and was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1870 with the degree of S. B. He then studied chemistry at the University of Göttingen, where in 1871 he received the degree of Ph. D., for original researches on iodium salts. On his return he held the professorship of chemistry at Pennsylvania college until 1874, when he accepted the chair of general and organic chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, which he resigned in 1891. He was also professor of chemistry in the Philadelphia college of pharmacy, to which he was appointed in 1879. Prof. Sadler again visited Europe in 1885 for the purpose of inspecting laboratories of applied chemistry in England and on the continent, and on his return made a report of his observations to the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania for their guidance in organizing a laboratory of industrial chemistry. He is a fellow of the Chemical societies of London and Berlin, of the American association for the advanc-ment of science, and of other societies in the United States. Since 1879 he has furnished each month notes on chemistry to the "American Journal of Pharmacy." Dr. Sadler was chemical editor of the American reprint of the ninth edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica" (Philadelphia, 1880—3), and,
with Joseph P. Remington and Horatio C. Wood, edited the fifteenth and sixteenth editions of the "United States Dispensatory" (1846—8), having become in charge of the chemical part of that work.
Besides numerous addresses and lectures, he has published "Handbook of Chemical Experimentalations for Lecturers." (Louisville, 1877), and edited the eighth edition of Attfield's "Medical and Pharmaceutical Chemistry" (Philadelphia, 1879).
SAFFOLD, Reuben, jurist, b. in Wilkes county, Ga., 4 Sept., 1788; d. in Dallas county, Ala., 15 Feb., 1847. After practising law in Georgia he removed to Jackson, Ala., in 1813. During the Indian troubles he commanded a volunteer company, and he subsequently served several terms in the legislature of Mississippi territory. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1819, was made a circuit judge, and was one of the three judges that were appointed to the supreme bench in 1846. He was a judge of the superior court of Tennessee, 1835-40, and during this period of service he calculated the orbit of the planet Saturn, and discovered many new ones. From 1869 till 1871 he was engaged upon the great catalogue of stars that is in course of preparation by the cooperation of European and American astronomers. His work was interrupted by the Chicago fire of 1871, and after that year he was much employed in latitude and longitude work in the territories by the U. S. corps of engineers, for whom he also prepared a star catalogue, which was published by the war department. He published a second in 1879. Since 1876 he has been professor of astronomy at Williams college, which gave him the degree of Ph. D. in 1878. He is a member of various astronomical societies, and has edited volumes iv, v, and x, of the "Annals of Harvard College Observatory," the latter volume containing a paper on P. Bond's discoveries in the constellation of Orion, which Prof. Safford completed after Prof. Bond's death. His other contributions have appeared in the "Proceedings of the American Academy," the monthly notices of the Royal astronomical society, and other astronomical journals. He prepared a catalogue of polar stars as a memorial of the late 50th anniversary of his graduation at Williams college, which was published in 1888.

SAFFORD, William Harrison, lawyer, b. in Parkersburg, Va., 19 Feb., 1821. He was educated at Asbury academy, Parkersburg, Va., studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1842, and in 1848 removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, where he has since practiced his profession. From 1858 till 1860 he served in the state senate, and from 1868 till 1874 he was judge of the 2d subdivision of the 5th judicial circuit of Ohio. He is the author of "Life of Blennerhassett" (Chillicothe, 1859), and "The Blennerhassett Papers" (Cincinnati, 1861).

SAGARD-THEODAT, Gabriel, French missionary, lived in the 17th century. He was a convert of the Jesuits in Paris in 1613 when, as Brown, the secretary of Louis XIII., asked the superior of that order to send missionaries to Canada. Sagard entrusted to be sent on the mission, but he was not allowed to leave France until eight years afterward. Shortly after his arrival in Quebec he set out for the Huron country with Father Viet. He remained there over two years, when his companion was named in Rivière des Prairies (hence called Saut du Récollet), and Sagard returned to France. His writings include "Grand voyage du pays des Hurons, situé en l'Amérique, vers la mer d'ence, et derniers confins de la Nouvelle-France, dite Canada, où il est traîné de tout ce qui est du pays, des mangeurs et naturel des sauvages, de leur gouvernement et façons de faire, tant dans leur pays qu'allant en voyage, de leur foi et croissance, avec un dictionnaire de la langue huronne" (Paris, 1632), and "Histoire du Canada et voyage que les frères mineurs recollets y ont fait pour la conversion des infidèles" (1636). The works of Sagard were very little known until recently. They were republished and edited by Henry E. Chevalier (Paris, 1866).

SAGE, Gardner Avery, donor, b. in New York city, 3 May, 1853; d. in White Sulphur Springs, Va., 22 Aug., 1882. He studied surveying, practised his profession in New York city, and acquired a fortune. He was an active member of the Reformed Dutch church, in which he held many offices of trust, and built and endowed the library of the theological seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., which bears his name, and which he was long a director. This was dedicated on 4 June, 1873, and now (1889) contains 70,000 volumes. He also founded a chair of Old Testament exegesis in the seminary, gave a residence for one of the professors, also large sums for the maintenance of Hartzog Hall, and made other bequests to aid the institutions of the Reformed church in New Brunswick. His gifts amounted to nearly $50,000.

SAGE, Henry Williams, philanthropist, b. in Middletown, Conn., 31 Jan., 1814; d. in Ithaca, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1897. He was a descendant of David Sage, who settled in Middletown in 1652. His father, Charles, was shipwrecked on the coast of Florida in 1838, and murdered by Indians. The boy's preparation for Yale at Bristol, Conn., was interrupted by the death of his father, 1841. He entered mercantile life. In 1854 he established a lumber-manufactory on Lake Simcoe, Canada, and later, with John McGraw, another at Wcoma (now West Bay City), Mich., which at that time was one of the largest in the world. Mr. Sage was one of the most extensive landholders of Michigan. From 1857 till 1889 he resided in Brooklyn, and was an active member of the Plymouth church. He took much interest in founding Cornell University, and in 1873 erected there a college hall for women, which is known as Sage college. After the death of Ezra Cornell he was made president of the board of trustees of Cornell university. He endowed the Lyman Beecher lectureship on preaching at Yale, and built and presented to West Bay City, Mich., a public library at a cost of $30,000. Mr. Sage also endowed and built several churches and schools. His gifts to Cornell amounted to more than a million dollars.

SAGE, Russell, financier, b. in Oneida county, N. Y., 4 Aug., 1816. He received a public-school education, and then engaged in mercantile pursuits in Troy. In 1841 he was elected alderman, and he was re-elected at this office until 1867, serving for seven years as chairman of Rensselaer county. He was then elected to Congress as a Whig, and served, with re-election, from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1857. Mr. Sage was the first person to advocate, on the floor of congress, the purchase of Mount Vernon by the government. Subsequently he settled in New York city and engaged in the business of selling "privileges" in Wall street. At the same time he became interested in railroads, and secured stocks in western roads, notably the Milwaukee and St. Paul, of which he was president and vice-president for twelve years. By disposing of these investments, as the smaller roads were absorbed by trunks-lines, he became wealthy. In later years he has been closely associated with the Goulds in the management of the Western, St. Louis, and Pacific, the Missouri Pacific, the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western and the St. Louis and San Francisco railroads, the American cable company, the Western Union telegraph company and the Manhattan consolidated system of elevated railroads in New York city, in all of which corporations he has been a director. Mr. Sage was for many years closely connected with the affairs of the Union Pacific road, of which he was a director. He has been a director and vice-president in the Importers and traders' national bank for the past twenty years, also a director in the Merchants' trust company and in the Fifth avenue bank of New York city.

SAGEAN, Mathieu (sah-zhay-ong), Canadinn explorer; b. near La Chine about 1865; d. in Bilo, La., about 1790. He early entered the service of Robert Cavelier, the La Salle (q. v.), assisted in the building of Fort Saint Louis of the Illinois, and was left there under Henry Tonty (q. v.) in 1681. Being desirous to make new discoveries, he obtained leave shortly afterward from Tonty and set out at the head of eleven Canadians and two Mohigan Indians. They ascended the Mississippi about 500 miles, and then, their provisions being exhausted, stopped a month to hunt. While thus engaged, they found another river flowing south southeast, carried their canoes to it, sailed about 430 miles, and found themselves in the midst of an Indian tribe dwelling in well-built villages and governed by a chief who claimed descent from Montezuma. On his return to Canada, Sagen was captured by English pirates upon the shores of the South Atlantic, and was translated into captivity among them. He followed a life of adventure for about twenty years in the East and West Indies, but toward 1720 he found his way to France and enlisted in a company of marines at Brest. There he revealed the secret of his discoveries in America. His story was written down from his dictation and sent to the secretary of the navy, Comte de Pontchartrain (q. v.), who translated it into Latin. As a result, Sagen was sent to Biloai, near the mouth of the Mississippi, with orders that he should be supplied with the means of conducting a party to the country he had discovered, and which he represented as being rich in gold. But the officers in command neglected their instructions, and suffered the order to remain unexecuted. Sagen's discovery has been contested much more than he described the country as a kind of El Dorado, but other authors contend that, aside from these exaggerations, Sagen's discovery was real, and that he saw the remains of an ancient Mexican tribe that had emigrated northward after the Spanish conquest. Sagen's story, written from his dictation, is preserved among the manuscripts in the National library at Paris, and it was translated into English and published by John Gilmary Shea in his History of memoirs and narratives concerning the French colonies in America (1862).

SAGER, Abram, physician, b. in Bethlehem, N. Y., 22 Dec., 1810; d. in Ann Arbor, Mich., 6 Aug., 1877. He was graduated at the Troy polytechnic school in 1831, studied medicine in Albany and at Yale, and was graduated at the medical school of Castleton, Vt., in 1835. He settled in Detroit and afterward in Jackson, Mich. From 1837 till 1840 he assisted in the geological survey of Michigan, having charge of the departments of botany and zoology, of which branches he was professor in the state university from 1842 till 1855. In 1859 he was made professor of obstetrics, and in 1854-69 he had the chair of diseases of women and children, but he resigned in 1875, when the board of regents introduced homeopathy. He was a member of various medical and scientific societies, and was president of the Michigan medical society in 1856-7. Dr. Sager contributed papers to medical journals, and published reports on botany and zoology in 1893. His collection laid the foundation of the Zoology museum at the university, to which he also presented the "Sager Herbarium" of 1,200 species and 12,000 specimens.

SAGRA, Ramon de la (sah-gra), Spanish economist, b. in Coruna in 1798; d. in Cartagena, Switzerland, 25 May, 1831. After finishing his work in Madrid, he was appointed in 1822 director of the botanical garden of Havana, which post
he retained for twelve years, forming several valuable collections. He also opened a class in agricultural botany and founded a model farm, which was of much benefit to the country. In 1834 he travelled through the United States. After a sojourn of several years in Paris he returned to Madrid, where he founded a magazine, and devoted himself exclusively to the study of political economy till 1848, when he went to Paris and took part in the 1848 revolution. From 1844 till 1856 he was a deputy to the Cortes. His works include "Historia economica, politica, y estadistica de la isla de Cuba" (Havana, 1831); "Principios de Botanica Agricola" (1855); "Breve idea de la administracion, del comercio y de las rentas, y gastos de Cuba durante los años 1826 a 1836" (Paris, 1836); "Historia fisica, politica y natural de la isla de Cuba" (2 vols, 1837-42; French translation, 1844); "Cinco meses en los Estados Unidos" (1836; French translation, 1837); "Apuntes desintitudos a ilustrar la division del articulo adicional al proyecto de constitucion" (Madrid, 1835); "Historia fisica, economica, politica, intelectual y moral de la isla de Cuba" (Paris, 1861); "Cuba en 1860" (Madrid, 1861); "Tratado de plantarum in flora Cubana-descriptorum" (1863); and "Los camarotes microscopicos de Cuba" (1866).

SAHAGUN, Bernardino de (sah ah gwan), Spanish missionary, b. in Sahagun, Leon, late in the 15th century; d. in Mexico, 23 Oct., 1590. He studied in Salamanca, entered the Franciscan order about 1520, came to Mexico in 1529, where he was a professor in the Institute and College of the San Francisco de Tlaltelolco, and, after thoroughly learning the Aztec language, was for more than fifty years a missionary to the natives. His leisure hours were occupied in composing a civil, religious, and natural history of Mexico in twelve volumes, which were illustrated with drawings by the author and copies of the hieroglyphic writings of the Aztecs; but these drawings were considered by the Franciscans of the order contrary to religion, as perpetuating the idolatry of the natives, and his work was not allowed to be published, but it was sent by the viceroy to the chronicler Herrera, who used some of the material in his "Décadas." The work was afterward printed under the title of "Diccionario historico universal de Nueva Espana" (Mexico, 1829). He also wrote in the Aztec language:
"Arte de la Lengua Mexicana" (Mexico, 1576); "Diccionario de la lengua mexicana" (1578);
"Salmochia cristiana en lengua Mexicana, para que canten los indios en las iglesias" (1583); "Catecismo de la Dissertation Cristiana en lengua Mexicana" (1583); and, according to Bonifacio, a "ὑγιεινα: Αναληφανταιηκου Αγιουρηκα ηα los primeros Religiosos Franciscanos," a Spanish manuscript in two volumes, containing the con-fertences of the missionaries with the native priests in Aztec language.

SAINT CASTIN, Jean Vincent de l'Aabadie (sahn kahz-teen), Baron de, French colonist, b. in Lesur, Bearon, in 1650; d. in Acadia in 1725. He came to Canada in 1670 as an ensign in the exdition of the Expedition of Concolles, and, when his regiment was disbanded in 1668, was among the few officers that chose to remain in the colony, and was sent to Acadia to command for the king under command. In 1675 Duttenheim from Saint Do-minig made the latter prisoner, but Saint Castin escaped and afterwards joined the woods with the Indians, and gained much influence over them.

He also made a fortune of about 400,000 pounds by dealing in beaverskins with his neighbors of New England. His trading house was at Pentaguet, now Castine, in the old fort, which he occupied or abandoned by turns, according to the needs of the time. But his trade involved him in difficulties with the royal governors, and in 1688 the king required him to establish a permanent settlement and cease all trade with the English. About this time Saint Castin married the daughter of Ma-dockambou, chief of the Penobscots, and in the same year war was renewed, mainly through Saint Castin's efforts. He attacked the English posts at Port Royal, at the head of 250 Indians, and continued for years to plunder the English settlements.

The authorities of Boston set a price upon his head,
as they regarded him as their most insidious enemy, and employed deserters to kidnap him; but the plot was discovered, and the deserters were shot at Mount Desert. With his Indians, Saint Castin landed in 1690 at New Harbor, near Port Penguin, and, cooperating with the troops of Ber-ville, obliged the governor to surrender, and destroyed the fortress. The French dominions were thus extended over a large part of Maine. The remainder of his history is intimately connected with the struggles for the possession of Acadia. He defended Port Royal in 1706, and again in 1717, when he was wounded, he saved the fort. He is said to have gone to France in 1709, but he was in Acadia again soon afterward, where he fought for the last for the French cause, and was killed in an engagement in 1712. His son, Josueta, a half-breed, was a leader of the eastern Indians in their later difficulties with the English. In December, 1721, he was surprised at Port Royal and carried a prisoner to Boston. After five months he was released on account of the hostile feelings that his detention provoked among the Abenakis.

ST. CLAIR, Arthur, soldier, b. in Thirsk, Caithness, Scotland, in 1734; d. in Greensburg, Pa., 31 Aug., 1818. He was the grandson of the Earl of Roslyn, was educated at the University of Edinburgh and fitted for medicine under Dr. John Hunter. Inheritance a fortune from his mother, he purchased a commission as ensign in the 69th foot on 13 May, 1757, and came to this country with Admiral Edward Boscawen's fleet.

He served under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst at the capture of Louisburg, Nova Scotia, in 1758, and under Gen. James Wolfe at Quebec, 30 Sept., 1759. On 16 April, 1762, he resigned the com-mision of lieutenant-colonel, which he had received on 17 April, 1759, and in 1764 he settled in Ligonier valley, Pa., where he purchased land, and erected mills and a residence. In 1770 he was made surveyor of the district of Cumberland, and he subsequently became a justice of the court of quarter sessions and a member of the county proprietors of Bedford and Westmoreland counties.

ST. CLAIR, Matthew, soldier, b. in St. Clair,
New York, 1727; d. there, 1810. He served in the Revolutionary War, and was appointed surveyor of the county in 1791, which office he held until his death.
In July, 1775, he was made colonel of militia, and in the autumn he was commissioned secretary to the commanders-in-chief, appointed to treat with the western tribes at Fort Pitt. On 3 Jan., 1776, he became colonel of the 21st Pennsylvania regiment, and, being ordered to Canada, he joined Gen. John Sullivan after the disastrous affair at Three Rivers, and aided that officer by his counsel, saving the army from capture. He was appointed brigadier-general on 9 Aug., and resigned his commission in the following January. Joining Gen. Washington in November, 1776, he was appointed to organize the New Jersey militia, and participated in the battles of Trenton and Princeton. On the latter occasion he rendered valuable service by protecting the fords of the Assunpink. He was appointed major-general on 20 Feb., 1777, and, after serving as adjutant-general of the army, succeeded Gen. Horatio Gates in command at Ticonderoga. The works there and at Mount Independence on the opposite shore of Lake Champlain werearrisoned by less than 2400 men, poorly armed, and nearly destitute of stores. The approach of a force of more than 7000 men under Gen. John Burgoyne warned Gen. St. Clair to prepare for an attack. His force was too small to resist all attacks, and, as he had not discovered Burgoyne's designs, he neglected to fortify Sugar Loaf mountain over which the British approached. St. Clair and his officers held a council of war, and decided to evacuate the fort. The blaze of a house that had been set on fire contrary to orders discovered their movements, and immediately the British started in pursuit. St. Clair fled through the woods, leaving a part of his force at Hublarston, which was attacked and defeated by Gen. Fraser on 7 July, 1777, after a well-contested battle. On 12 July, St. Clair reached Fort Edward with the remnant of his men. "The evacuation," wrote Washington, when the news reached him, "is an event of chagrin and surprise not apprehended, nor within the compass of my reasoning. This stroke is severe indeed, and has distressed us much." Gen. St. Clair remained with his army, and was with Washington at Brandywine, 11 Sept., 1777, acting as voluntary aide. A court-martial was held in 1778, and he was acquitted, "with the highest honor, of the charges against him," which verdict was approved by congress. He had joined John Sullivan in his expedition against the Six Nations, was a commissioner to arrange a cartel with the British at Amboy, 9 March, 1780, and was appointed to command the corps of light infantry in the absence of Lafayette, but did not serve, owing to the return of Gen. George Clinton. He was a member of the court-martial that condemned Maj. Andre, commander of the U.S. post at West Point. In October, 1783, he aided in suppressing the mutiny in the Pennsylvania line in January, 1781. He was active in raising troops and forwarding them to the south, and in October joined Washington at Yorktown a few days before the surrender of Lord Cornwallis. In November he was placed in command of a body of troops to join Gen. Nathanael Greene, and remained in command of the S. Pennsylvania line, a member of the Pennsylvania council of censors in 1783, a delegate to the Continental congress from 2 Nov., 1785, till 28 Nov., 1787, and its president in 1787, and a member of the American philosophical society. On the formation of the Northwestern territory in 1789 Gen. St. Clair was appointed its governor, holding this office until 1812. The last words of Washington on his departure were: "Be wary of a surprise." He made a treaty with the Indians at Fort Harmar in 1789, and in 1790 he fixed the seat of justice of the territory of Cincinnati, Ohio, which he named in honor of the Society of the Cincinnati, of which he was president for Pennsylvania in 1783-9. He was appointed commander-in-chief of the army that was operating against the Indians on 4 March, 1790, and moved toward the savages on Miami and Wabash rivers, suffering so severely from gout that he was carried litter to the banks of the Miami. Viliages on 4 Nov., and his force was defeated by a horde of Indians led by Blue Jacket, Little Turtle, and Simon Girty, the renegade. Washington refused a court of inquiry, and St. Clair resigned his general's commission on 5 March, 1792, but congress appointed a committee of investigation, which exonerated him. On 22 Nov., 1802, he was removed from his governorship by Thomas Jefferson. retiring to a small log-house on the summit of Chestnut ridge, he spent the rest of his life in poverty, vainly endeavoring to effect a settlement of his claims against the government. The legislature of Pennsylvania granted him an annuity of $400 in 1813, and shortly before his death he received from congress $2,000 in discharge of his claims. In his Reminiscences, St. Clair gives a Narrative of the Manner in which the Campaign against the Indians in the Year 1791 was conducted under the Command of Maj.-Gen. St. Clair, with his Observations on the Statements of the Secretary of War" (Philadelphia, 1819). See "The Life and Public Services of Arthur St. Clair," with his correspondence and other papers, arranged by William H. Smith (Cincinnati, 1882).
Guadeloupe occupied more than a year, and he was engaged in it when the island was visited by the terrible earthquake of 1834. On his return to France he published his work on the Antilles, and on its appearance set out to explore southern Italy. For several years he acted as assistant to Élie de Beaumont, occupant of the chair of the history of inorganic bodies in the Collège de France, and finally became his successor. Prof. Deville was also deeply interested in meteorology, and established a network of meteorological stations over France. In 1861 he was elected to the Senate of the Paris Academy of sciences in 1857 in the place of Dufranôx, and promoted officer of the Legion of honor, 13 Aug., 1862. He published, among other works, "Voyage géologique aux Antilles et aux îles Tercrefie et de Pого" (7 vols., Paris, 1856-64) and "Recherches sur les principaux phénomènes de météorologie, etc., aux Antilles" (1861).—His brother, Henri Etienne, West Indian chemist, b. in St. Thomas, 11 March, 1819; d. in Paris, 9 July, 1856, studied in Paris, early acquired reputation for his chemical researches, and in 1851 was appointed professor of chemistry in the Normal school of Paris, which post he held till 1859, when he was made professor in the University of Paris. He discovered the anhydrous nitric acid in 1849, a new metallic alloy in 1852, and made other valuable researches. From 1853 to 1865 devoted his labors principally to researches upon the new metal aluminium. He was the first to make artificial diamonds, which he discovered at an enormous cost, and he discovered new properties of several metals. His works include "Mémoire sur les carbonates métalliques et leurs combinaisons" (Paris, 1852); "Mémoire sur les trois éléments minéraux du silicium" (1855); "Mémoire sur la production des températures élevées" (1856); "Métallurgie du platine et des métaux qui l'accompagnent" (1857); and "De l'aluminium, ses propriétés, sa fabrication" (1859).

SAINTE-CROIX, Gaëtan Xavier Gulpheim de Pascalis (surnamed Chevalier de, French soldier, b. in Normandy, 13 Dec., 1798; d. in Cape Francois, St. Domingo, 18 Aug., 1822. He entered the French army as a lieutenant in 1821, and served for fifteen years in Saint Domingo, Martinique, and Louisiana. He gained credit by his defence of the fortress of Belle Isle in June, 1851, was promoted major-general, 29 July, and became commander of the French forces in the Leeward and Windward Islands. In 1852 he was engaged in an attack upon Martinique, which the English had just captured, but was defeated. After organizing the defence in Saint Domingo, he exerted himself to send re-enforcements and supplies to Havana, and prepared an expedition against Jamaica, when he died of yellow fever.

SAINTE-CROIX, Louis Marie Philibert Emmanuel de, French botanist, b. at sea. 22 May, 1809. He studied at the military school of Saint Cyr, and became a lieutenant of the general staff, but resigned in 1838 and returned to his home in Martinique, where he engaged in agricultural experiments upon his large estate. He introduced new methods for the culture of the sugar-cane, and was also the first to experiment on the culture of the cotton-plant in the French West Indies. For his services he was made a knight of the Legion of honor, and in 1840 he became treasurer-general of the department of Mayenne. His works include "Manière d'estimer le rendement de la canne à sucre" (Paris, 1841); "La question du sucre" (1842); "De la fabrication du sucre aux colonies" (1843); "Principes fondamentaux d'agriculture coloniale" (1845); and "Le sucre aux colonies" (1847).

SAINT GAUDENS, Augustus, sculptor, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 1 March, 1834. When six months of age he was brought to New York, and in that city he subsequently followed the profession of a cameo-cutter. He began to draw at Cooper institute in 1861, and in 1865—6 was a student at the National academy, modelling also in his leisure hours. In 1867 he went to Paris, where he studied under François Jouffroy at the École des beaux arts. He was elected in 1872, and the following year he produced, in 1871, his first figure, "Hiawatha." In the next year he returned to New York, where he has since resided. Mr. Saint-Gaudens has been president of the Society of American artists. His more important works are the bas-relief "Adoration of the Cross by Angels," in St. Thomas's church, New York; statues of Admiral David G. Farragut (1880), in New York, of Robert R. Randall (1884), at Sailor's Snug Harbor, Staten island, N. Y., and of Abraham Lincoln (1887), in Chicago; a fountain (1886-7), in Chicago; "The Puritan," a statue of Samuel Chapin (1887), in Springfield, Mass.; portrait busts of William M. Evarts (1872-3), Theodore D. Woolsey (1875), at Yale, and Gen. William T. Sherman (1888); and medallions of Gen. Lafayette (1877) and Pres. Benjamin Harrison (1887). Mr. Saint-Gaudens assisted John La Farge in the decoration of Trinity church, Boston, and the monument to Le Roy King, at Newport, R. I., is also the joint work of those two artists.—His brother, Louis, sculptor, b. in New York, 8 Jan., 1854, studied in the École des beaux arts, Paris, in 1879-80. He has modeled a "Faune," "St. John," for the Church of the Incarnation, New York, and other statues, and has assisted his brother in most of his works.

ST. GEORGE, Sir Thomas Bligh, British soldier, b. in England about 1763; d. in London, 6 Nov., 1857. He entered the army as an ensign in the 57th foot, became a lieutenant in 1799, captain in 1804, major in 1804, and in 1805 lieutenant-colonel in the 63rd foot. During the period of these promotions he served in France, Portugal, Corsica, and the Mediterranean, and took part in many battles. In March, 1809, he went to Upper Canada, having been appointed inspecting field-officer of militia there. He commanded at Amherstburg when it was attacked by Gen. William Hull, led the Canadian troops in a sortie from Detroit in August, 1812, and at the river Raisin, in Michigan, 23 Jan., 1813, when Gen. Winchester was defeated. At this battle Gen. St. George received severe wounds. He became colonel in 1813, major-general in 1819, was nominated a companion of the Bath in 1819, and was knighted in 1835.

SAINT-HILAIRE, Augustin François César Pronvost, French botanist, b. in Orleans, France, 4 Oct., 1799; d. there, 30 Sept., 1853. He was sent when a young man to Holland to superintend a sugar-refinery that belonged to the family, and he thus passed several years in an unremunerative employment. On his return to France he devoted himself enthusiastically to the study of natural history, and was elected several times auditor of the council of state, he embarked for Rio Janeiro on 1 April, 1816. For six years he explored the Brazilian empire, journeying about 5,400 miles from 13° south latitude to the Rio de la Plata. He returned to France in 1822 with 24,000 specimens of plants, embracing about 6,000 species, almost all of them new, and nearly all analyzed on the spot, grains, 2,000 birds, 16,000 insects, and 135 quadrupeds, besides reptiles.
fishes, and a few minerals. On reaching home he devoted himself at once to preparation for publication of his elaborate work on the flora of Brazil: but his health, seriously impaired by the fatigues and trials he had undergone, gave way, and it was only after a long period of rest that he was enabled to complete it. He was appointed correspondent of the institute in 1818 while absent in Brazil, and became an active and influential member of it. He died 8th Feb., 1830. He was also a chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and of the Portuguese Order of Christ. Among his works are "Aperçu d'un voyage dans l'intérieur du Brésil, la province Cisplatine et les missions du Paraguay" (Paris, 1823); "Flora Brasiliensis meridionales, ou histoire et description de toutes les plantes qui croissent dans les différentes provinces du Brésil" (2 vols., 1825); "Mémoire sur l'application d'un systéme d'agriculture adopté par les Brésiliens et les résultats qu'il a eus dans la province de Minas-Geraís" (1827); "Voyage dans la province de Rio de Janeiro et Minas-Geralis" (2 vols., 1830); "Voyage dans le district des diamants et sur le littoral du Brésil" (2 vols., 1833); and "Voyage aux sources du San Francisco et du Jucar" (Paris, 1837-38).

SAINTIN, Jules Émile, French artist, b. in Lomé, Aisne, 14 Aug., 1829. He studied in Paris under Michel Martin Drolling, François Édouard Picot, and Leboucher. For several years about 1852-'63 he practised his profession in New York. During his stay there he exhibited frequently at the Academy of design, and was elected an associate in 1861. He has received several medals in Europe, and became chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1857. Among the portraits that he painted while he was in this country are those of Paul Morphy (1860); Stephen A. Douglas (1860), in the Corcoran gallery, Washington; and John F. Kensett (1863).

ST. JOHN, Isaac Monroe, engineer, b. in Augusta, Ga., 19 Nov., 1827, col. in Greenbrier White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., 7 April, 1880. After graduation at Yale in 1845, he studied law in New York city, and removed to Baltimore in 1847, where he became assistant editor of the "Patriot," but chose civil engineering for a profession, and was engaged on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. In 1855 he removed to Georgia, and was employed on the Central of Georgia railroad during the civil war, when he entered the engineer corps of the Confederate army at Richmond, Va., and was assigned to duty under Gen. John B. Magruder. He rendered valuable service in constructing fortifications during Gen. George B. McClellan's first campaign. In May, 1862, he was made major and chief of the mining and nitre bureau, which was the sole reliance of the Confederacy on gunpowder material. He was promoted through the various grades to the rank of brigadier-general, and in 1865 was made commissary-general, and established a system by which supplies for the army were collected directly from the people and placed in depots for immediate transportation. After the war he resumed his profession in Kentucky, became chief engineer of the Cincinnati and N. Kentucky railroad, and built the short-line to Cincinnati, which was considered a great feat in civil engineering. He was city engineer of Louisville in 1870-'1, made the first topographical map of that city, and established its system of sewerage. From 1871 until his death he was consulting engineer of the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad, and chief engineer of the Missouri & Arkansas railroad.

ST. JOHN, John Pierce, governor of Kansas, b. in Franklin county, Ind., 25 Feb., 1833. In early years he was employed on his father's farm, and was clerk in a grocer's store. In 1853 he went to California, worked in various capacities, and made voyages to South America, Mexico, Central America, and the Sandwich islands, and served in wars with the Indians in California and Oregon. In 1860 he removed to Charleston, Ill., to continue the study of law, which he had begun in his miner's cabin. In 1861 he was elected captain of the 68th Illinois volunteers, in which he became a captain. At Alexandria, Va., he was detached from his command, and assigned as acting assistant adjutant-general under Gen. John P. Slough, in 1864 he was placed in command of the troops at Camp Macon, Ill., and on the organization of the 143d regiment he was elected its lieutenant-commanding. Shortly after the close of the war he resumed practice in Charleston, but removed afterward to Independence, Mo., where he practised law four years with success, and won a reputation as a political orator. He removed to Olath, Kan., in 1869, served in the state senate in 1873-'4, and was elected governor of Kansas, as a Republican, in 1878, serving until his death, when he was succeeded by his brother, James P. Slough (1879-'83). He was the candidate of the Prohibition party for president of the United States in 1884, and received a vote of 151,869. During the canvass he delivered addresses in various parts of the United States.

ST. JUST, Luc Letelliere de, Canadian statesman, b. in Rivière Onelie, province of Quebec, 12 May, 1829; d. there, 1 Feb., 1881. He studied law, and after practising for a time was elected to the old parliament in 1850. He was defeated at the general election of 1852, and again in 1857, but in 1860 he was elected for Granville division to the legislative council, where he sat until the union in 1867. In 1863 he became minister of agriculture in the Sandfield Macdonald administration, retaining the office until 1864. In 1867 he was called to the senate, and in 1873, when the Liberal administration came into power, he became minister of agriculture. Toward the close of 1874 he resigned his portfolio, and was appointed lieutenant-governor of Quebec. He soon found himself at variance with different members of the local government, especially with the premier, M. de Boucherville. The difference between them gradually became wider, and finally he became one of the most ardent and effective denouncers of the new system to the dispute. On 24 March, 1878, the lieutenant-governor brought matters to a crisis by dismissing his cabinet, a proceeding that produced the most violent excitement throughout the country. The matter was at last considered in parliament, but, as the Liberals were in power, and had only dismissed their political opponents, he escaped even censure. In 1879 the Conservatives came into power; the dismissal case was reconsidered, and the ministry advised the dismissal of the lieutenant-governor. The governor-general, Lord Lorne, hesitated, and referred the case to the secretary for the colonies at London, who requested him to take the advice of his ministers. Consequently, M. de St. Just was dismissed from office.

ST. LEGER, Barry, British soldier, b. in 1739; d. in 1789. He was a nephew of the fourth Viscount Doneraile and fellow of St. Peter's college, Cambridge, and was of Huguenot descent. He entered the army, 37 April, 1758, as ensign of the 29th regiment of foot, and, coming to this country in the following year, served in the French war, learning the duties of his calling by gaining much experience in border warfare. He served under Gen. Abercrombie in 1757, and participated in the siege of Louisburg in 1758. Accompanying Wolfe to Quebec in 1759, he was in the battle on the Plains of Abraham, where he checked the flight of the French. In July, 1760, he was appointed brigade-major, preparatory to marching to Montréal, and he became major of the 93rd foot, 16 Aug., 1762. Maj. St. Leger was chosen by George III., at Gen. Burgoyne's recommendation, to be the leader of the expedition against Fort Stanwix, and justified their confidence in him, in his advance from Ostego, by his prudence against surprise and by his stratagem at Oriskany, and the art of that place, to the panic that was produced by the rumor of the approach of Arnold, which forced him to raise it. After the failure of this expedition he was promoted, in 1760, to colonel in the army, the highest rank he ever attained, and, becoming a leader of rangers under the immediate command of Gen. Haldimand, he carried on a guerrilla warfare, with headquarters at Montreal. In the summer of 1781 he proposed a plan for the capture of Gen. Philip Schuyler, which, however, failed in its object. In the autumn of the same year, in obedience to the orders of Haldimand, who was anxious to persuade Vermont to return to her allegiance, he ascended Lake Champlain with a strong force to Ticonderoga, in the expectation of meeting the Vermont commissioners; Gen. Burgoyne, hearing a rumor of the surrender of Cornwallis, he retreated to St. John, without accomplishing his mission. He was commandant of the royal forces in Canada in the autumn of 1784, and his name appears in the army lists for the last time in 1785. St. Leger possessed some literary talent, as is shown both by his letters to Burgoyne and the British ministry, and by his name entitled "St. Leger's Journal of Occurrences in America" (London, 1780).

ST. LUC. LA CORNE de, French soldier, b. in 1712; d. in Montreal, Canada, 10 Oct., 1784. He belonged to a family that was noted in Canadian annals for the number of its military members. His father was Jean-Louis de la Corne, who held the office of town mayor of Three Rivers, and in 1719 was major-general of troops at Quebec, and his brother was the Chevalier Pierre de la Corne (q. v.), but he signed his name La Corne St. Luc. During French supremacy in Canada he was an active partisan leader against the English. He was engaged in 1746 in scouting in the vicinity of Lake St. Sacrement and Fort St. Frederick in June, 1746, nearly capturing it. He fought again at Lakes Huron and Superior in the name of the king of France. The costly presents to the Indians and other expenses of the expedition were more than repaid by the gifts of furs that he received in return.

ST. LUC, Charles Balthazar Julien Fevre de, artist, b. in Dijon, France, 23 March, 1786; d. there, 15 June, 1852. He was entered at a cadet in the military school in Paris, 1 April, 1784, and appointed ensign, 27 April, 1788. At the opening of the French revolution he was loyal to the crown, and joined the army of the princes, serving until it was disbanded, when he retired to Switzerland, and came thence to this country. He landed in Canada in 1793, but soon afterward reached New York. While with the French army he learned the attention to drawing and painting, and in Switzerland he had learned to carve and gild wood. A compatriot named Christian had invented a machine in 1769 which he called a Pantograph, by means of which the human profile could be copied with mathematical accuracy. It had great success in France, and Saint Ménin determined to introduce it into this country. He constructed such a machine with his own hands, according to his understanding of it, and also made a pantograph, by which he reduced a portrait to a miniature, and by means of engraving on plates with crayon, finished in black crayon, were reduced by the pantograph to a size small enough to be engraved within a perfect circle two inches in diameter. The machine, of course, only gave the outline, the finishing being done in one case with crayon, and in the other with the graver and roulette, by which means he took in this country more than 800 portraits. The drawing and engraved plate, with a dozen proofs, became the ST. LUC, Seth, was a man of education, talent, and courage. His modes of warfare were brutal and sanguinary, and his unmercifully slaughtering the colonists manifests the most bitter vindictiveness.

ST. LUBIN, Simon Francois Dumont, Sieur de, French officer, lived in the 17th century. He was the deputy of the intendant of the French government in Canada, Jean Talon, who on 3 Sept., 1670, commissioned him to search for copper-mines and confer with the tribes about Lake Superior. Nicolas Perrot, who had visited the lake country a few months before, accompanied him as interpreter. On 5 May, 1673, St. Lubin concluded a treaty, with imposing ceremonies, in the presence of the Jesuit missionaries then in Upper Canada, at Sault Ste. Marie, with the principal chiefs of the Saults, Menomonees, Potawattamies, Winnebagos, and other tribes, seventeen in all, and formally took possession of the surrounding Lakes Huron and Superior in the name of the king of France. The costly presents to the Indians and other expenses of the expedition were more than repaid by the gifts of furs that he received in return.

ST. LUCIN, Charles Balthazar Julien Fevre de, artist, b. in Dijon, France, 23 March, 1786; d. there, 15 June, 1852. He was entered at a cadet in the military school in Paris, 1 April, 1784, and appointed ensign, 27 April, 1788. At the opening of the French revolution he was loyal to the crown, and joined the army of the princes, serving until it was disbanded, when he retired to Switzerland, and came thence to this country. He landed in Canada in 1793, but soon afterward reached New York. While with the French army he learned the attention to drawing and painting, and in Switzerland he had learned to carve and gild wood. A compatriot named Christian had invented a machine in 1769 which he called a Pantograph, by means of which the human profile could be copied with mathematical accuracy. It had great success in France, and Saint Ménin determined to introduce it into this country. He constructed such a machine with his own hands, according to his understanding of it, and also made a pantograph, by which he reduced a portrait to a miniature, and by means of engraving on plates with crayon, finished in black crayon, were reduced by the pantograph to a size small enough to be engraved within a perfect circle two inches in diameter. The machine, of course, only gave the outline, the finishing being done in one case with crayon, and in the other with the graver and roulette, by which means he took in this country more than 800 portraits. The drawing and engraved plate, with a dozen proofs, became the property of the sitter for the price of $25, the artist reserving only a few proofs of each portrait. With these proofs he formed two sets, and wrote upon each impression the name of the subject. These two complete collections were brought to this country in 1830, and one of them is now in the Corcoran gallery, Washington, D.C. While in this country Sainte-Ménin resided principally in Philadelphia and New York, but made visits to other cities, taking portraits. While he was in Philadelphia in 1798 he secured a profile portrait of Washington, which is especially interesting as being the last portrait of him that was taken from life. In 1810 Sainte-Ménin returned to France, where remaining a few years, he returned again in this country, when he abandoned engraving and followed portrait- and landscape-painting. In October, 1814, he finally quitte the United States for France, and in 1817 he was appointed director of the museum at Dijon, which post he occupied at the time of his death. Mathematics and mechanics were the pursuits he loved next to follow, the arts being merely a minor making-adjunct; but we owe to the physiognotrace and graver of Sainte-Ménin the preservation of the likenesses of many distinguished citizens.

ST. OURS, Jean Baptiste de, Sieur d'Eschaillons, French-Canadian soldier, b. in Canada in 1685; d. in Montreal in 1744. His father, Pierre de St. Our, was the first of the family to come to the French, became governor of the colony, and obtained extensive grants of land. The son entered the army as soon as he was fit to bear arms, was made lieutenant in 1702, and a little afterward became garde-marine. In 1708 he was one of the three commanders of the expedition against Fort Orange (now Albany). The Christian Indians having abandoned the expedition the French were about to retreat, but St. Our appealed to the Indians that remained with him not to return without doing something. About 200 swore that they would follow him, and at their head he captured the village and fort of Haverhill, with its garrison, afterward leading his men back to Canada, having admirably extracted them from an ambush. He commanded a company of frontier Rangers, sent to the English in 1710. In 1731 he was intrusted with a special mission to various Indian tribes by the governor, De Vaudreuil. He went by way of Detroit, visited Lachine, and endeavored to put a stop to the liquor traffic with the Miami. St. Our's also tried to bring about peace between the Sioux and their enemies, took steps to form the Creeks into a single village, and succeeded to attract to that of Gamanistsiony the savages that were scattered along Lake Superior. On his return he was made major of Montreal, and he subsequently became king's lieutenant.—His grandson, Charles Louis Roch, b. in Canada in 1753; d. there in 1834, on his entrance into public life decided to support the English government in Canada, and was appointed a member of the legislative council. In this post he endeavored successfully to give expression to the views of his countrymen. He opposed an attempt to have the English language adopted, and also combated a plan for confiscating the property of the Jesuits. In 1774 he was appointed major of militia, and soon afterward he became colonel. The services of the Canadian volunteers gained him the friendship of Gen. Carleton, who made St. Our's aide-de-camp. He travelled through Europe in 1785, and was received with honor not only at the English court, but by Fred-Franciscan Fathers at Oldenburg and at Indianaples, the Fathers of St. C. at Terre Huite, and the Brothers of the Sacred Heart. The following five orders also owe their advent in the diocese to his administration: the Sisters of St. Francis, the Nuns of the Order of St. Benedict, the Daughters of Charity, the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Ursuline Sisters, and the Sisters of St. Joseph.

SAINT PIERRE. Legardeur-Jacques de (sain-pe-air), French soldier, b. in Normandy in 1698; d. near Lake George, Canada, in 1765. He went in early youth to Canada, as ensigne in a regiment of marines, served against the Iroquois, and took a commendable part in the war of 1740 against the English. In 1752 he was sent on a journey of discovery toward the Rocky mountains, which he was among the first to explore, and, on his return in October, was ordered by Gov. Duquesne to Ohio, where the French had just built Fort de Beauport on French Creek, which commanded the route to Alleghany river. On 11 Dec. he received there George Washington, then adjutant-general of Virginia, who brought a letter from the President, inviting them to withdraw from English territory. According to the journal of Washington, printed at Williamsburg just after his return, he was extremely well received by Saint Pierre, whom he describes as an able and courteous commander. In the spring of 1753 Saint Pierre was succeeded by Contrecœur and appointed commander of the Indian auxiliaries, in that capacity he remained till 1757, when he served in Baron Dieskau’s expedition. He was subsequently killed in the action where Whiting’s regiment was routed. Saint Pierre’s account of his journey to the Rocky mountains is preserved in the National Library of Paris, and has been published in the collection of John Gilmary Shen (New York, 1862). It is entitled “Mémoire sur le voyage du comte de Jacques Legardeur de Saint Pierre.”

ST. REAL. Joseph Remi Vallières de, Canadian jurist, b. in Markham, Upper Canada (or, according to some accounts, in Quebec), 1 Oct., 1787; d. in Montreal, 17 Feb., 1845. He went to reside with an uncle in Quebec, where his aptitude for learning attracted the attention of Bishop Picot, who, with the blessing of Bishop Seiller, personally superintended his education. He afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1812, and began practice in Quebec. In 1813 he was elected to the assembly for the county of Champlain, and at once allied himself with the Canadian party in the house, then engaged in a struggle for what they regarded as constitutional liberty. During the absence of M. Papineau on a mission in England, he was chosen speaker of the assembly, and during the administration of Sir James Kenilworth in 1828, was appointed judge of the district of Three Rivers, where he remained for several years. Sir Charles Bagot appointed him chief justice of Montreal in 1842. From that time until his death he was indefatigable. In 1829 the governor of Canada, Sir John Colborne, had requested Judge De St. Real to grant a writ of habeas corpus in the case of Judges Parrot and Bedard, suspended by Sir John some time before. Judge De St. Real refused, and was in consequence suspended from office, and suffered much loss.

SAINT SIMON. Claude Henri, Comte de, b. in Paris, 17 Oct., 1769; d. there, 19 May, 1825. His education, that of the nobility of his time, was in the direction of philosophy. He entered the army in 1776, and was sent to this country as the commander of a company under the Marquis de Bouillé in 1779. He remained with the French forces, acquitting himself with gallantry until the surrender at Yorktown. Like many of his brother French officers, he was made a life-member of the Society of the Cincinnati. On the voyage home the French squadron, under the Comte de Grasse, was defeated by Admiral Rodney on 12 April, 1782, and the vessel on which Saint Simon had embarked surrendered and he himself was made a prisoner and taken to Jamaica, where he remained until the declaration of peace in 1783. Before returning to France he visited Mexico, and proposed to the viceroy of that country to unite the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by means of a canal; but no notice was ever taken of his scheme. In France he was made chamber of St. Louis and colonel of the Aquataine regiment. During the Reign of Terror he was arrested for being a member of the aristocracy. After an imprisonment of eleven months he was liberated and succeeded in recovering 150,000 francs as his share of the profits of his previous financial operations. He now began to study the sciences and philosophy, and devoted himself to the construction of society. He obtained a small clericalhip, and lived in obscurity until his friend, Diard, gave him the means to issue his “Introduction aux travaux scientifiques du dix-huitième siècle” (2 vols, Paris, 1808). In 1810 Diard died and Saint Simon suffered from actual want. Nevertheless, he continued to pursue his studies, and was able to live at ease and in comfort, with the advice of friends, and the lack of powerful protectors, he issued his “Réorganisation de la société Européenne” (Paris, 1814) and “L’Industrie, ou discussions politiques, morales et philosophiques” (4 vols, 1817-18). In 1820 he published a pamphlet entitled “Parabole,” in which he advanced the most revolutionary ideas, and for which he was tried and acquitted. In 1829 he attempted suicide, but only succeeded in depriving himself of an eye, and lived long enough to complete his two greatest works, “Catechisme industriel” (1824) and “Le nouveau Christianisme” (1825). See “Saint Simon, sa vie et ses travaux,” by Nicholas G. Hubbard (Paris, 1857); “Œuvres, choisis de Saint-Simon” (3 vols, Brussels, Paris, and London, 1837); and “Saint Simon and his editor, Enfantin” (20 vols, 1859-1909).

ST. VALIER. Jean Baptist De Lacroix Chevrieres de, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Grenoble, Dauphiné, France, 14 Nov., 1653; d. in Quebec, 26 Dec., 1727. He was chaplain to Louis XIV., and in 1684, when Lavall, bishop of Quebec, went to France to engage a successor, his recommendation by the royal chaplain secured his appointment to that office. He arrived in Canada in July, 1685, in his capacity of vicar-general to Bishop Lavall, and remained until November, 1687, when he returned to France. He was consecrated bishop of Quebec, at St. Sulpice de Paris, by Nicholas Colbert, archbishop of Carcassonne, in January, 1703, and returned in 1706 to Canada in August of the same year. He founded the general hospital of Quebec in 1768, and the Ursulines of Three Rivers in 1666. While he was bishop, Louis XIV, confirmed by letters-patent, in October, 1697, the erection of the bishopric of Quebec, and the union of the rectory to the seminary, as well as of the revenue of the monastery de la Flèche.

SAINT VICTOR. Jacques Benjamin Maximi- milien, Comte de, West Indian author, b. in Fort Dauphin, Santo Domingo, 14 Jan., 1770; d. in Paris, 8 Aug., 1858. He studied in the College of La Flèche and became a journalist. Under Napoleon he was on the staff of the "Journal des SAJOUS, Charles Enchariste, physician, b. in Paris, France, 13 Dec. 1832. He came to this country at the age of nine years, was educated by private tutors, and, after attending lectures in the medical department of the University of California and at Jefferson college, Philadelphia, received his diploma in 1878. Remaining in Philadelphia, he soon obtained a lucrative practice among the French residents of that city. He was made professor of anatomy and physiology in the Wagner free institute of science, and lecturer on diseases of the nose and throat in the Philadelphia school of anatomy. Having made this class of diseases his specialty, Dr. Sajous became clinical chief in the throat department of Jefferson college hospital, and finally lecturer in the college proper, which post he now (1898) occupies. He became widely known early in his career through his inventive genius. He devised numerous instruments that are extensively used in his specialty. Dr. Sajous is an honorary and corresponding member of a large number of American and foreign medical societies, and has received several decorations from foreign governments. His contributions to professional literature include numerous articles in medical journals, and two works, "Diseases of Hay Fever" (Philadelphia, 1885) and "Diseases of the Nose and Throat" (1886). In 1888 he edited and brought to a successful issue one of the largest medical works of the time, the "Annual of the Universal Medical Sciences," having for its object to collate the progressive features of the medical literature of the world, and collect information relating to medicine in uncivilized countries. In this he was assisted by sixty-six associate editors.

SAJOUS, George Augustus Henry, English journalist, b. in London, 24 Nov., 1828; d. in Brighton, 8 Dec., 1895. His father was an Italian and his mother a native of the West Indies. The son was educated for an artist, but embraced the literary profession, becoming a contributor to magazines. In 1863-4 he was the American correspondent of the London 'Telegraph.' He published many books, including "America in the Midst of War" (London, 1865) and "America Revisited" (1882).

SALABERRY, Charles Michel d'Irumberry de, Seigneur de Chambly and de Beauch, Canadian soldier, b. at the manor-house of Beaport, Lower Canada, 1786; d. at Chambly, 4 Feb., 1829. His father, descended from a noble family, was a legislative councillor in Canada, and placed his four sons in the army. Charles being the only one that attained distinction. He entered the British service when young, and served for eleven years under Gen. Prescott in the West Indies, was present at the capture of Martinique in 1786, and engaged in the chain-b boat at Cap Haitien. In 1795 his expedition as aide-de-camp. When recalled to Canada, he commanded the Voltigeurs, and became also one of the chiefs of staff of the militia. Late in 1812 he and his Voltigeurs, together with M. de Schembault's advance-guard, were attacked at Lachine by 1,400 men of Gen. Dearborn's army, who were forced to retreat. Subsequently de Salaberry's corps participated in the battle of Chryler's Farm, which also was disastrous to the Americans. He afterward attacked Gen. Wade Hampton's forces at Four Corners, on the Oldtown route, when Hampton decided to join Dearborn by taking the route leading to Chateaugay. De Salaberry, anticipating such a movement, ascended the left bank of the river and took up advantageous positions and established lines of defense. On 23 Oct., Gen. Hampton, with 5,500 men, advanced against the British defenses, and with 5,200 men attempted to turn the position, leaving in reserve the remainder of his troops. De Salaberry, warned of this movement, placed himself in the centre of the first line of defense, leaving the second in charge of Lieut.-Col. MacDonell. The Americans were foiled in all their efforts, and De Salaberry's men poured in a deadly fire upon the Americans, when Gen. Hampton ordered a retreat. This action was regarded as so important in Great Britain that a gold medal was struck commemorating it, and De Salaberry received the order of the Bath. He subsequently entered political life, and became a legislative councillor in 1818.

SAJABERRY, Mariano (sah-jah-bay-ri), Mexican soldier, b. in the city of Mexico in 1787; d. in Gualatpe, 24 Dec. 1857. He entered the army in 1813 as aide of the militia regiment, serving under the Spaniards till 14 May, 1821, when he pronounced for the plan de Ignatu, and was promoted captain by Mr. Boron. Afterward he fought under Santa Anna against the Spanish invasion of Barralas in 1829, in the campaign of Texas in 1836, being promoted colonel, and in 1839 brigadier for his services against the Federal chief Mejia.

In 1844 he was appointed commander of the district of Mexico, and remained faithful to Santa Anna in the revolution of 6 Dec., 1844, losing his place in consequence. After the fall of Herrera in January, 1846, Salas was reappointed commander and deputy to the congress, but on 4 Aug. he headed a revolt in favor of Santa Anna, and took charge of the executive as provisional president. When Monterey capitulated to Gen. Zebbarc Taylor, 24 Sept., 1847, Salas was active in preparing troops and supplies for the army that was to march to the north under Santa Anna, and, when the latter was elected president, Salas delivered the executive on 24 Dec. to the vice-president, Gomez Farias. In May, 1847, he was appointed second in command of the Army of the North in San Luis. With it he participated under Valencia in the actions of Contreras and Churubusco, where he was taken prisoner, and, refusing to be paroled, he was released only after the peace of Guadalupe-Hidalgo. He was appointed commander of Queretaro and president of the supreme military court, and in 1853 was one of the principal supporters of the dictatorship of Santa Anna, who made him commander-in-chief of the SALAZAR, Maximilian. 1806: in Lima in 1806; d. in Paris, France, in February, 1828. He was graduated as LL. D. in the College of San Bartolome, soon afterward composed two theatrical pieces, which were performed at the theatre of Bogota, and also published several articles in the Semario. When the revolution of 1810 began he occupied the place of vice-president of the College of Monserrat, which he abandoned and entered public life. The civil war that followed the revolution obliged him to move to Caracas, where he was well received by Gen. Miranda, who appointed him minister to the government of Cartagena. In that city he conducted the paper general "El Mensajero," and on the arrival of Morillo he emigrated, where he found himself a lawyer. In 1829 he was appointed minister of the supreme tribunal of Venezuela, and in 1827 he was sent as minister plenipotentiary to the United States. During his stay in New York he published a political pamphlet in English and Spanish about the reforms that ought to be introduced in the constitution of Colombia. He also wrote a poem, "El Soberano de Cuba," which was printed in Caracas by his widow. On account of the civil disturbances of his country, he went to Paris to educate his children, but after his death his family returned to Caracas. He wrote "El Solitario de Eneas" and "El Sacrificio de Idomeneo," two dramas (Bogota, 1802); "Placer póstumo," published in 1837; Salazaar, with the biografía de Gunamar de Urdaneta (Trinidad, 1817); and "La campaña de Bogotá," a heroic poem (1818).

SALAZAR DE ESPINOZA, Juan de, Spanish soldier, b. in Villa Pomar about the end of the 15th century; d. in Asuncion about 1590. He sailed with the expedition of Pedro de Mendoza (q. v.), and assisted in the foundation of Buenos Ayres. In 1537 Salazar, with the acting governor, Galán, and the garrison, removed to Asuncion, and in 1538 was elected the first mayor of that city. In March, 1542, Salazar fought against the Guaycurus and Agues Indians, commanding the infantry, and in 1545 he was appointed acting governor at Asuncion. On 25 April, 1544, when Cabeza de Vaca was taken prisoner by the Incas, the former proclaimed Salazar governor and charged him with the command on the voyage, and landed him at San Vicente, in Brazil, where he stayed almost two years, but in October, 1555, he arrived at Asuncion and took possession of his office as treasurer. Salazar was a candidate for governor in 1558, but was defeated.

SALCEDO, Francisco (sah-thay-do), Mexican monk, b. in Chippa about 1550. By the Franciscan order, taught theology in the city of Mexico, and on account of his profound knowledge of the aboriginal languages, including Aztec, Quiché, Cakchiquel, and Tzutuhil, was called by Bishop Gomez Fernandez de Cordova to the University of Guatemala, where he taught these tongues for many years to the clergy and missionaries. He wrote "Arte y Diccionario de la Lengua Mexicana," "Sermones Trilingues en Quiché, Cakchiquel y Tzutuhil" (2 vols.), and "Documentos Cristianos en tres Lenguas," which are still preserved in manuscript, unpublished, in the Franciscan convent of Guatemala.
SALDANHA, João Carlos Oliveira, Duke de, Portuguese statesman, b. in Lisbon, 17 Nov., 1784; d. in London, England, 21 Nov., 1856. He was a grandson of the famous Marquis de Pombal, and received his education at the College of the Nobility of Lisbon and to the University of Coimbra. When the royal family fled to Brazil, he remained to serve under the French, but was made a prisoner by Wellington's forces and transported to England. In 1814 he was permitted to go to Brazil, where he was appointed commander of the Portuguese forces. He rendered great service in forwarding troops for the war that resulted in the possession of Uruguay. From 1818 till 1822 he was a member of the province of Rio Grande do Sul, and, joining the liberal movement, promulgated the new constitution in 1821, but in 1822 he returned to Europe, as he was unwilling to serve under the regency of Dom Pedro. Upon his arrival in the capital he was appointed captain-general of Brazil and commander-in-chief of all the forces in the country, but, having learned of the election of Dom Pedro to the empire, he refused to return to Brazil to foster a civil war, and was imprisoned for about a year. In February, 1825, King João VI, appointed him secretary of foreign relations, and after the death of the king he became, during the regency of the Infanta Isabel Maria, governor of Oporto, where he suppressed the first movements of the partisans of Miguel. In 1829, he was called to the Portuguese army in the capacity of war, but, on account of disagreements with the regent, he resigned and went to London in 1827. After several unsuccessful attempts against the reactionary party, he took an active part in the struggle between Dom Pedro and Dom Miguel, on the side of the former, and was rewarded with the rank of field-marshall and commander-in-chief, and henceforth his career was a short series of political intrigues and revolutions, sometimes at the head of the government, and then again exiled, or ambassador in France and England. The last revolution in which he took part was in 1870, when he presided for a short time over the cabinet, and in February, 1871, he was sent as ambassador to London, where he died. The left memoirs in manuscript.

SALES, Jean-Claude, was born at Roussillon, France, in 1771; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 16 Feb., 1854. He emigrated to the United States during one of the political convulsions of France, and was instructor at Harvard in French and Spanish from 1816 till 1830 and afterward in Spanish alone till the year of his death. He edited and enlarged Augustin E. Josset's "Grammar of the Spanish Language" (Boston, 1822), and published critical and annotated editions of the Spanish dramatists, "Don Quixote" (1836), and other Spanish classics, the "Fables" of Fontaine, with notes, and treatises on the French and Spanish languages.

SALES, PATRICK. Peter de, b. in Canada in 1789; d. there, 15 Dec., 1854. He studied medicine in London under Sir Astley Cooper, and on his return to Quebec soon became distinguished as a surgeon. He took part in the war of 1812 as surgeon-in-chief of the Canadian voluneteers. In 1814 he visited France and England, where he married the daughter of Sir Fenwick Balmer, in the following year returned to Canada, and resided in Quebec up to 1823. Here he took a prominent part in the Canadian Literary Institute, took to the public journals, and denouncing the oligarchical regime that then prevailed. In 1823 he went to England, where he published "A Political and Historical Account of Lower Canada, with Remarks on the Present Situation of the People" (London, 1830), which created a sensation in Canada, and delayed the union of the provinces. — His brother, Mark Paseal, b. in Barre-de-Févère in 1792; d. in Quebec, 30 March, 1872, studied medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, where he was a pupil of Dr. Rush, and obtained his degree in 1812, and established himself in Quebec. During the war of 1812 he served as surgeon-general of the militia of Lower Canada, and in 1814 retired from his profession and took up his residence in his own country. He was elected a member of the provincial legislature in 1824, and continued to take a leading part in Canadian politics. The immense and difficult highway through the prairies, which has brought that coast into communication with Quebec, is due to his enterprise.

SALINAS Y CORDOBA, Buenaventura de (sah-leen-ah), Peruvian clergyman, b. in Lima in the latter part of the 16th century; d. in Cuenca, Mexico, 15 Nov., 1653. He belonged to the Franciscan order, was sent as a commissioner to Spain and Rome in 1651, and returned in 1654 as vicar-general. His works, which are mainly devoted to the assertion of the equality of Americans of Spanish race with native-born Spaniards, are "Memorial de las Historias del Nuevo Mundo del Pirí, y memorias y excelencias de la ciudad de Lima" (1650; Madrid, 1659), and "Memorial al Rey Nuestro Señor" (Madrid, 1651). The latter is an appeal to the king against himself and those born of Spanish race in the Indies, but also a strong plea for the liberty of the Indians.

SALISBURY, Edward Elbridge, philologist, b. in Boston, Mass., 6 April, 1814. He was graduated at Yale in 1832, studied theology there for three years, and in 1836-9 prosecuted the study of oriental languages under Silvestre de Sacy, a part of whose library he brought back to the Yale Library, the States, and also with Garcin de Tassy in Paris and Franz Bopp in Berlin. A professorship of Arabic and Sanskrit was created for him at Yale in 1841, and, after spending another year in the study of Sanskrit at Bonn, he entered on the duties of his professorship with the delivery of an "Inaugural Discourse on Arabic and Sanskrit Literature," as a printed paper. 1843. He became the chair of Sanskrit to William D. Whitney, providing the endowment and subsequently giving to the university his oriental library. He acted as professor of Arabic for two years longer, and then spent another year in Europe. He had meanwhile been elected corresponding secretary of the American oriental society, and for several years he conducted the "Journal" and labored for the prosperity of the society, of which he became president in 1863. Prof. Salisbury was elected a member of the Asiatic society of Paris in 1838, and a corresponding member of the Imperial academy of sciences and belles-lettres at Constantinople in 1855, and of the German oriental society in 1859, besides being a member of other learned societies, and was given the degree of LL.D. by Yale in 1869 and by Harvard in 1886. Besides oriental papers in the "Journal of the American Oriental Society," he has published articles in the "New Englander," and has printed privately an account of the Biodati family (New Haven, 1855); a lecture on the Principles of Domestic Taste, delivered before the Yale Literary Society (1874); and a large volume of "Genealogical and Biographical Monographs" (1885). Three additional volumes have since been issued.—His wife, Evelyn, b. in Lyne, Conn., 3 Nov., 1823, a daughter of Charles J. McCurdy, began and has aided him in the completion of the latter, which treat of her lines of descent, as the former work did of the lines of his descent, and that of the Phillips family, to which his first wife belonged.

SALISBURY, James Henry, physician, b. in Scott, Cortland co., N. Y., 13 Oct., 1823. He was educated at Homer academy, and in 1846-8 was assistant, and in 1849-52 principal, chemist of the New York state geological survey. He received the degree of M. D. from Union medical college, New York, in 1850. In 1851-2 he lectured on elementary and applied chemistry in the New York state normal school at Albany. He conducted experiments and microscopic examinations, the results of which were published in the "Transactions" of the American association for the advancement of science, and devoted himself later to the study of the causes and treatment of chronic diseases, publishing his therapeutical discoveries in the New York "Journal of Medicine." In 1864 he settled in Cleveland, Ohio, where he assisted in establishing the Charity hospital medical college, before which he lectured till 1866 on physiology and histology. He has been president of the Institute of microscopy since 1878. Among his published works are "A Syllabus and History of Plants" (Albany, 1848); one on the "Chemical and Physiological Examinations of the Maize Plant during the Various Stages of its Growth," which was published in the New York agricultural report for 1849, and reprinted in the Ohio state reports; and "Microscopic Examinations of Blood and Vegetables found in Variola, Vaccina, and Typhus Fever" (1853).

SALISBURY, Sylvester, British soldier, b. in England; d. in Albany, N. Y., about 1890. He was a captain in the force that captured New Amsterdam in 1664, and was placed in command of Fort Orange, the name of which he changed to Fort Albany. He married a Dutch lady named Marins, and held the offices of high sheriff and justice of the peace at Albany. When New Amsterdam was retaken by the Dutch in 1673, he was carried as a prisoner of war to Spain, then an ally of the Netherlands in the war against France and England. On his release, he was restored to his post at Albany. Sir Edmund Andros sent him to England in 1675 with a petition to King James for a community of the English and Dutch settled in that province. He then joined the Austrian army, but was compelled to resign, extraneous habits having brought him into pecuniary difficulties. In 1681 he came to the United States and offered his services to the national government. He was given a colonel's commission and attached to the staff of Gen. Louis Bleeker. In November, 1682, he took command of the 8th New York regiment, which was mustered out in the following spring. He was appointed colonel of the 68th New York volunteers on 8 June, 1684, serving under Gen. James B. Steedman in Tennessee and Georgia, and toward the end of the war was assigned to the command of the post at Atlanta, receiving the brevet of brigadier-general on 15 April, 1685. He next offered his services to the M. D. from Altyland, who had been chartered for Mexico in February, 1686, and on 1 July was appointed colonel of the general staff. He became the emperor's aide-de-camp and chief of his household, and was captured at Queretaro. Soon after Maximilian's execution he returned to Europe, re-entered the Prussian army as major in the grenadier guards, and was killed at the battle of Gravelotte.

SALISBURY, D. in Baltimore, Md., in 1842; d. in San Francisco, Cal., on 31 May, 1879. He was a son of Dr. John D. Salisbury, who was long known as a leader in the medical profession, and had been adopted when a child in Europe by the wife of a member of the cabinet at Washington, but, after receiving a good education in Philadelphia, to have left her home and become a circus-rider and then a rope-dancer. Afterward he acquired a reputation as an actress under the name of Agnes Leclercq, and lived several years in Havana, Cuba. She returned to the United States in 1862, and married Prince Salm Salm on 30 Aug., 1862. She accompanied her husband throughout his military campaigns in the south, performing useful service in connection with the field-hospitals, and was with him also in Mexico. After the fall of Queretaro she rode to San Luis Potosi and inspired President Juarez to procure the release of Maximilian, with whom she entered into an agreement with him. She also sought the intervention of Porfirio Diaz and of Mariano Escobedo, and arranged a conference between the latter general and the archduke. After the death of her husband she raised a hospital brigade, which accomplished much good during the Franco-Prussian war. Subsequently she married Charles Heneage, an attaché of the British embassy at Paris, but soon separated from him. She published "Ten Years of My Life" (New York, 1875).

SALM SALT, Prince Felix, soldier, b. in Anhalt, Prussia, 25 Dec., 1828; d. near Metz, Alsace, 18 Aug., 1870. He was a younger son of the reigning Prince zu Salm Salm, was educated at the cadet-school in Berlin, became an officer in the Prussian cavalry, and saw service in the Schleswig-Holstein war, receiving a decoration for bravery at Aarhus. He then joined the Austrian army, but was compelled to resign, extraneous habits having brought him into pecuniary difficulties. In 1861 he came to the United States and offered his services to the national government. He was given a colonel's commission and attached to the staff of Gen. Louis Bleeker. In November, 1862, he took command of the 8th New York regiment, which was mustered out in the following spring. He was appointed colonel of the 68th New York volunteers on 8 June, 1864, serving under Gen. James B. Steedman in Tennessee and Georgia, and toward the end of the war was assigned to the command of the post at Atlanta, receiving the brevet of brigadier-general on 15 April, 1865. He next offered his services to the M. D. from Altyland, who had been chartered for Mexico in February, 1866, and on 1 July was appointed colonel of the general staff. He became the emperor's aide-de-camp and chief of his household, and was captured at Queretaro. Soon after who had assumed command at Port au Prince. On his arrival in the capital, Salme was tried and sentenced to death by a court-martial on charges of bloodshed and treason, and was immediately executed on the steps of the ruined palace.

SALMON, Frederick, soldier, b. near Halberstadt, Prussia, 7 April, 1826. After passing through the gymnasium, he became a government surveyor, later a lieutenant of artillery, and in 1848 a pupil in the Berlin school of architecture. Emigrating soon afterward to the United States, he settled in Manitowoc, Wis., as a surveyor. He was for four years county register of deeds, and in 1857-9 chief engineer on the Manitowoc and Wisconsin railroad. He entered the volunteer service in the spring of 1861 as a captain in the 5th Missouri volunteers, and served under Gen. Franz Sigel, being present at Wilson's Creek. After the three-months' term of service had expired he was appointed colonel of the 9th Wisconsin infantry, which he commanded in the southwest until he was made a brigadier-general, 16 June, 1863, and assigned to the command of a brigade in Kansas. On frontier service and in command of the capture Newtonia, Mo. He served through the war, receiving the brevet of major-general in March, 1865, and was mustered out on 25 Aug., 1865. Gen. Salmon was subsequently for several years surveyor-general of Utah territory, where he now (1888) resides.—His brother, Edward, b. near Halberstadt, Prussia, in 1828, came with him to this country, became a lawyer, was governor of Wisconsin in 1862-'3, and now practices in New York city. He has gained a high reputation as a political speaker, especially in the German language.

SALMON, Haym, financier, b. in Lissa, Prussian Poland, about 1740; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1785. He settled in Philadelphia some years before the Revolution as a merchant and banker, and succeeded in amassing a large fortune, which he subsequently devoted to the use of the American government during the war for independence. He negotiated all the war subsidies obtained during that struggle from France and Holland, which he indorsed and sold in bills to American merchants at a credit of two and three months on his personal security, receiving for his commission one per cent. He was paymaster-general of the French forces in the United States, and for some time lent money to the agents or ministers of several foreign states when their own sources of supply were cut off. It is asserted that over $100,000 thus advanced have never been repaid. To the U. S. government Mr. Salmon lent about $900,000 in specie, and at his death $400,000 of this amount had not been returned. This was irrespective of what he had lent to statesmen and others while in the discharge of public trusts. His descendants have frequently petitioned for remuneration, and their claims have several times been favorably reported upon by committees of congress.

SALPONTI, Jean Baptist, R. C. archbishop, b. in Marseilles, France, 21 Feb., 1823; d. in Tuscun, 16 July, 1898. He received his education in a school in Ajain, and subsequently studied the classics in the College of Clermont and philosophy and theology in the Seminary of Clermont Ferrand. He was raised to the priesthood on 29 Dec., 1851, and, after spending about eight years in the Carmelite college of one per cent. He also acted as a preparatory seminary of Clermont, he came to the United States in 1850, and was parish priest of Mora, N. M., until he was appointed vicar-general of Arizona in 1866. He was nominated vicar apostolic of Arizona three years afterward, and consecrated by the title of bishop of Doryla in partibus on 20 June, 1869. His vicariate included Arizona, with part of Texas and New Mexico. He immediately set about building churches, organizing new congregations, and founding schools and hospitals. The number of persons attached to the churches when Dr. Salpointe was transferred to Santa Fe as coadjutor to Archbishop Lamuy, and the churches had increased from about half a dozen to twenty-three, besides fifteen chapels. He succeeded Archbishop Lamuy as archbishop of Santa Fe in 1885.

SALTER, Richard, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1723; d. in Mansfield, Conn., 14 April, 1791. He was graduated at Harvard University in 1745, and then studied medicine, and after that theology, supplied a pulpit in Boston for some time, and on 27 June, 1744, was ordained pastor of the Congregational church at Mansfield, where he remained till his death. He gave to Yale college in 1781 a farm, which was sold for $2,000, for the purpose of promoting the study of Hebrew and other oriental languages. He was proficient in Greek, Hebrew, and other branches of philosophy, and was a member of the American Philosophical Society. He compiled a dictionary of the Greek language. The Academy of D. D. was conferred on him by Yale in 1782. He published an "Election Sermon" (1768), and began a "Commentary on the New Testament," but abandoned his design, when the work was in great part written.

SALTER, William D., naval officer, b. in New York city in 1794; d. in Elizabeth, N. J., 5 Jan., 1869. He entered the navy in 1813, and in March, 1809, was attached to the frigate "Constitution" under Capt. Isaac Hull during the action with the British frigate "Guerriere," on 19 Aug., 1812, and was the last survivor of those who participated in that action. He became lieutenant on 9 Dec., 1814, was made master-commandant on 3 March, 1831, captain on 3 March, 1839, and commodore on the retired list on 16 July, 1852. He was in command of the Brooklyn navy-yard in 1856-'9, and in 1863 was on a commission to examine vessels, from which duty he was relieved in 1866.

SALTONSTALL, Sir Richard, colonist, b. in Halifax, England, in 1586; d. in England about 1658. He was a nephew of Sir Richard, who was lord mayor of London in 1597. The nephew was justice of the peace for the first Riding on the manor of Ledsam, near Leeds. He was one of the grantees of the Massachusetts company under the charter that was obtained from Charles I. On 26 Aug., 1629, Saltonstall, Thomas Dudley, Isaac Johnson, John Winthrop, and eight other gentlemen signed an agreement to pass the seas and to inhabit and continue in New England, provided that the patent and whole government of the plantation should be transferred to them and to other actual colonists. The proposition was accepted by the general court of the company, which elected Sir Richard the first-named assistant of the new governor. He arrived with Gov. Winthrop in the "Arbella" on 22 June, 1630, and began, with George Phillips, the settlement of Watertown, but, owing to the ill health of his two young daughters, who, with his five sons, had accompanied him, he returned with them and two of the sons to England in 1631, where he continued to display in all ways the greatest interest in the colony, and to exert himself for its advancement. He was one of the patentees of Connecticut, and sent out a shipload to take possession of the territory. The vessel, on the return voyage, was wrecked on Sable Island in 1635. In 1644 he was sent as ambassador to Holland. A portrait that was painted by Rembrandt while he was there is reproduced in the illustration. He was one of the judges of the high court that sentenced the Duke of Hamilton, Lord Capel, whose estates to death for treason in 1649. In 1651 he wrote to John Cotton and John Wilson a letter of remonstrance in regard to their prosecution of the Quakers.—His son, Richard, b. in Woodness, Yorkshire, England, in 1610; d. in Hulme, Lancashire, 29 April, 1694, was matriculated at Emmanuel college, Cambridge, in 1637, and emigrated to Massachus- etts with his father in 1639. He was among the first settlers of Ipswich, and was chosen one of the government's assistants in 1637. In 1642 he published a polemic against the council appointed for life. In July, 1643, he signed a letter urging the colonial authorities to take warlike measures against the French in Acadia. He befriended the regicides that escaped to New England in 1660, and protected them against the importation of negro slaves. In 1662 he returned to England.—The second Richard's son, Nathaniel, councillor, b. in Ipswich, Mass., in 1639; d. in Haverhill, Mass., 21 May, 1707, was graduated at Harvard in 1659. He was an assistant from 1679 till 1686, and was offered a seat in the council by Sir Edmund Andros, but declined. After the deposition of that governor, he was chosen one of the council under the charter of William and Mary. In 1692 he was appointed one of the judges in a special commission of revenue and terminer to try the persons accused of practising witchcraft in Salem. Repudiating the spirit of persecution that prevailed, and foreseeing the outcome of the trials, he refused to accept the commission.—Nathaniel's son, Gordon, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 27 March, 1699; d. in New London, Conn., 29 Sept., 1734, was graduated at Harvard in 1714, studied theology, and was ordained minister of New London, Conn., on 19 Nov., 1714. He was distinguished not only for learning and eloquence, but for knowledge of affairs and elegance of manners. He was one of a committee appointed by the Connecticut assembly to wait upon the Earl of Bellmont when he arrived in New York in 1689, and was frequently called on to assist in public business. While Gov. Fitz John Winthrop was ill, Saltonstall, who was his chief adviser and representative, and on the death of the governor was chosen by the assembly to be his successor, entering on his functions on 1 Jan., 1708. In the following May he was confirmed in the office at the regular election. His first official act was to propose a symposium for the adoption of an ecclesiastical system. The Saybrook platform, which was the outcome of his suggestion, was by his influence made to conform in some essentials to the Presbyterian polity. Gov. Saltonstall was appointed agent of the colony in 1709 for the purpose of conveying an address to Queen Anne, accept- ing the conquest of Canada, and raised a large con- tinent in Connecticut for the disastrous expedition of Sir Hovenden Walker. He set up in his house the first printing-press in the colony in 1709, and was active in the arrangements for establishing Yale college, influencing the decision to build at New Haven instead of at Hartford, making the plans and estimates, and during the early years of the college taking the chief part in the direction of its affairs. He was continued in the office of gov- ernor by annual election till his death.—Gordon's nephew, Richard, jurist, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 24 June, 1763; d. 30 Oct., 1796, was graduated at Harvard in 1728. He was chosen one of the commission to present Haverhill in the general court. Subsequently he was a member of the council. From 1736 till he resigned a few months before his death he was a judge of the superior court. He was chairman of a commission that was appointed in 1766 to trace the boundary-line between Massachusetts and New Hampshire.—Gordon's son, Gabriel, b. in New London, Conn., 22 Dec., 1708; d. in North- wich, Conn., 19 Sept., 1785, was graduated at Yale in 1725. He was appointed colonel of militia in 1739, served at the siege of Louisburg in 1745, and was one of the commissioners for fitting out expeditions against Canada. He was a member of the general assembly in 1744–8, then of the house of representatives, and was appointed a councilman in 1748. He served in the assembly again at intervals till 1757. From 1751 till his death he was judge of probate at New London. In September, 1776, he was appointed brigadier-general of militia, and reported to Gen. Washington at Westchester with nine regiments.—The second Gordon's nephew, Dudley, naval officer, b. in New London, Conn., 8 Sept., 1728; d. in the West Indies in 1768, was offered in 1746 to be a member of Essek Hopkins's squadron in February, 1776, and on 10 Oct., 1776, was appointed fourth in the list of captains of the Continental navy. He was com- modore of the fleet that left Boston in July, 1779, to reduce a British post on Penobscot river. Salton- stall was desirous of attacking as soon as they arrived, but Gen. Solomon Lovell, the commander of militia, was unwilling. When Sir George Col- lier appeared off the coast with a formidable naval force, the Americans re-embarked. Saltonstall drew up his vessels in order of battle at the mouth of the river, but was greatly overmatched, and his men were demoralized. As soon as the enemy came near, his ship, the Warren, was run aground and completely captured by a vessel in the same manner, while the rest were captured by the enemy. The crews and the land-forces fled to the woods, and made their way by land to Boston. A court of inquiry, wishing to shield the state militia, and, perhaps, establish a claim on the Continental government for a part of the expenses by inculpating a Continental officer, blamed Salton- stall for the disastrous termination of the expedi- tion, which had involved Massachusetts in a debt of 87,000,000, and on 7 Oct., 1779, he was dismissed the service. He afterward commanded the priva- teer "Minerva," and among the prizes taken by him was the "Hannah," a merchant ship bound for New York with a valuable cargo.—The third Richard's son, Richard, soldier, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 5 April, 1734. He was a lieutenant colonel, 1753; his eldest son, Edmund, was graduated at Harvard in 1751. He com- manded a regiment in the French war, and soon after the peace of 1763 was appointed sheriff of Essex county. In the beginning of 1776 he emi- grated to England. While sympathizing with the Tories, he refused to take a command in the royal army and retired to his countrymen.—Another son, Nathaniel, physician, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 10 Feb., 1746; d. there, 15 May, 1815, was graduated at Harvard in 1766. He was a skilful physician, possessed high scientific attainments.
and during the Revolution was a firm Whig. — Another son, Leverett, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 35 Dec., 1754; d. in New York city, 20 Dec., 1782, accompanied the British army from Boston to Halifax, was given a commission, and served as a captain under Lord Cornwallis. — The second Nathaniel's son, Leverett, lawyer, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 13 June, 1783; d. in Salem, Mass., 8 May, 1835, was graduated at Harvard in 1803, and became aide-de-camp at Salem in 1835. He was speaker of the state house of representatives, president of the state senate, the first mayor of Salem in 1836-8, a presidential elector on the Webster ticket in 1852, and was elected to congress to fill a vacancy, serving from 5 Dec., 1858, till 3 March, 1855. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1858. He was an active member of the Massachusetts historical society, the American academy of arts and sciences, and other learned bodies. When he died, he left a large part of his library to Phillips Exeter academy, where he had received his early education, and a bequest of money to purchase books for the library at Harvard. He was the author of an "Historical Sketch of Haverhill," printed in the collection of the Massachusetts historical society. A descendant of Gordon, William Wanton, b. in New London, Conn., 19 Jan., 1733; d. in Chicago, Ill., 18 March, 1882, was on his mother's side a great-grandson of Joseph Wanton. He was an early settler in Chicago, and during the last twenty years of his life held the post of assignee in bankruptcy.— The second Leverett's grandson, Leverett, lawyer, b. in Salem, Mass., 10 March, 1830; d. 27 April, 1885, was graduated at Harvard and at the law-school, and practised in Boston till 1864. In December, 1885, he was appointed collector of customs for the port of Boston and Charlestown. He was an active member of the Massachusetts historical society and of other learned bodies, and was compiling a genealogical history of his family.

SALTUS, Edgar, author, b. in New York city, 8 June, 1858. He was educated at St. Paul's school, Concord, N. H., studied later at the Sorbonne, Paris, and in Heidelberg and Munich, Germany, and after his return to Columbia college law-school, where he graduated in 1880. His earliest literary efforts were in poetry. His first book was "Bilzim," a biography (Boston, 1884). He next devoted himself to writing essays, essays on mysticism, philosophy, a history of which he published under the title of "The Philosophy of Disenchantment" (1885), which was followed by an analytical exposition entitled "The Anatomy of Negation" (London, 1886; New York, 1887). He is the author also of "Mr. Incoll's Misadventure" (1887); "The Tarasconians," "L'Empire" (1889); "Mary Magdalene" (New York, 1891); "Imperial Purple" (Chicago, 1898); and "When Dreams Come True" (New York, 1895).

SALVAIERTA, Juan Maria de (sal-vah-teer-tah), Italian missionary, b. in Milan, 15 Nov., 1648; d. in Guadalajara, Mexico, 18 July, 1777. He studied in the Jesuit college of Parma, entered that order in Genoa, went to Mexico; ever he studied theology, and was for several years professor of rhetoric in the College of Puebla. Later he obtained permission to convert the Tarahumaras Indians of the northwest, among whom he lived for ten years, founding several missions. He was subsequently appointed visitor of the missions in Sinaloa and Sonora, and there formed a project for the spiritual conquest of California, and to carry out this project expeditions to that country had been without result. After obtaining permission from his superiors, he sailed on 10 Oct., 1697, for Lower California, where, on 19 Oct., he laid the foundation of the mission of Loreto. He soon learned the language of the natives, whom he propitiated by his kindness, and in seven years established six other missions along the coast. In 1704 he was appointed provincial of his order, and resided in Mexico, but when his term was concluded in 1707 he returned to his native province, and was for a time called to the capital by the viceroy, the Marquis de Valero, to give material for the "History of California," which King Philip V. had ordered to be written. Although suffering from illness, Salvatierra obeyed, and, crossing the Gulf of California, continued his voyage along the coast, carried on the shoulders of the Indians, till he died in Guadalajara. He wrote "Cartas sobre la Compania espiritual de Californias" (Mexico, 1698), and "Nuevas cartas sobre Californias" (1699), which have been used by Father Miguel Venable in his "Historia de Californias." Salvatierra is still known as the apostle of California.

SALVERT, Perier du, colonial governor, b. in France about 1690. He was an officer in the French navy from the age of 18. He entered into the service of the king of France on the recall of the Sieur de Bienville in 1724, he was sent out as governor of Louisiana. His administration was lax and inefficient, and the Natchez Indians, exasperated by the deeds of evil-disposed persons, rose against the French, and on 29 Nov., 1729, slaughtered all the male inhabitants of the post in their country. Their example was followed by the Yazedos, Perier formed an alliance with the Choctaws, and, after the latter had met the enemy in the field several times, marched into the Natchez country, and laid siege to the fortified village of the Indians until they withdrew across the Mississippi. In order to restore the prestige of France arms, the governor sent an expedition of 1,000 men against the Natchez in the following winter, which succeeded in capturing their fort and taking several hundred prisoners, who were sent to Santo Domingo and sold as slaves. In 1733 Bienville was reinstated, and Perier returned to France, where he was made lieutenant-general. In 1755 he was sent in command of a fleet for the protection of Santo Domingo, and during the war of 1756-63 he commanded a squadron.

SALVIINI, Tommaso, Italian actor, b. in Milan, Italy, 14 Oct., 1848; he and his mother were actors of ability. He performed children's parts at the age of thirteen, later joined the troupe of Adelaide Ristori, and shared her triumphs. After fighting in the Italian war for independence in 1849, he returned to the stage, and, by his impersonation of the title-roles of Giuseppe Micaldi's "Othello" and Vittorio Alfieri's "Macbeth" achieved an European reputation. He was in the "Orosonine in Voltaires' "Zaire," first essayed Othello in 1857, created the part of Conrad in "La morte civile," and added to his repertoire Romeo, Hamlet, ingomar, Paedo in Silvio Pellico's "Francesca di Rimini," which he played at the Dante celebration in 1865, and the Gladiator in Alexandre Dumas' tragedy of that name, Sullivan in "David Garrick," Terziolo Tasso, Samson, Esau in "Elizabeth," Maxime Odlet in the "Romance of a Poor Young Man," and other characters. In 1871 he visited South America, and in 1875-4 he made a tour in the United States, giving 128 performances, besides 28 in Havana. In New York city Edwin Booth played the ghost to his Hamlet. In 1881 he again visited America.

SALZMANN, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Munich, Austria, 17 Aug., 1819; d. in Milwaukee,
W.حساس, 17 Jan., 1874. He studied at the University of Vienna, where he won his doctor's degree, and was ordained a priest in 1842. He came to the United States in 1847, and was appointed pastor of St. Mary's church, Milwaukee. He succeeded Archbishop Henmi as president of the Theological seminary of St. Francis, the success of which is in a great measure due to his efforts. He was one of the founders of the Sons of Settlers, "a German patriotic society" published at Milwaukee, to which he was a frequent contributor.

SAMOSET, Indian chief, b. in New England about 1590. He was a chief of the Penobscott on the Maine coast, and learned English from the colonists of Menunvian, island, sent out by Sir Ferdinando Gorges. Three months after the landing of the Pilgrims, Samoset entered their settlement at Plymouth with the salutation "Welcome, Englishmen." He informed them that Patuxet, where they had planted their village, was ownerless land, because its former inhabitants had been carried off by pestilence. A week later he brought Squanto, who had been taken to England, to act as their interpreter, and showed their friendly interest in endeavoring to make a treaty with Massasoit, the chief sachem of the Wampanoags.

SAMPLE, Robert Fleming, clergyman, b. in Cornings, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1809. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1849, and at Western theological seminary, Allegheny City, in 1853. He was pastor of a Presbyterian church at Merion, Pa., in 1833-36, and then at Bedford, Pa., till 1866, when he removed to Minneapolis, Minn., and after supplying a pulpit for two years was called to the pastorate of another, in which he continued until, in 1887, he exchanged it for a charge in New York city. He is a member of various church boards, and a director of the McCormick theological seminary, Chicago, Ill. He received the degree of D. D. from Wooster university, Ohio, in 1876. In 1884 he was sent as a delegate to the Presbyterian alliance at Belfast, Ireland. He has been a frequent contributor to the religious press. Besides numerous pamphlets and sermons, he has published several books for the young on Christian experience, and also a "Memoir of Rev. John C. Thom" (1880).

SAMPSON, or SAMSON, Deborah, heroine, b. in Plympton, Mass., 17 Dec., 1709; d. in Sharon, Mass., 20 April, 1827. She was large of frame, and accustomed to severe toil, and yet not yet eighteen years of age, moved by a patriotic impulse, determined to disguise her sex and enlist in the Continental army. By teaching for two terms, she earned enough to buy cloth from which she fashioned a suit of male clothing. She was accepted as a private in the 4th Massachusetts regiment, under the name of Robert Shurtleff, and served in the ranks three years, volunteering in several hazardous enterprises, and showing unusual coolness in action. In a skirmish near Tarrytown she received a sabre cut on the temple, and four months later she was shot through the shoulder. During the Yorktown campaign she was seized with brain fever, and sent to the hospital in Philadelphia. The surgeon discovered her sex, took her to his home, and on her recovery disclosed the facts to the commander of her company, who sent her with a letter to Gen. Washington. The commander-in-chief gave her a discharge, with a note of good marks for her conduct and service. After the war she married Benjamin Gunnell, a farmer of Sharon. During Washington's administration she was invited to the capital, and congress, which was then in session, voted her a pension and a grant of lands. She published a narrative of her life in the army, under the title of "The Female Review" (Philadelphia, 1796), of which a new edition was issued by the Rev. John A. Vinton, with an introduction and notes (Boston, 1850).

SAMPSON, Ezra, clergyman, b. in Middleborough, Mass., 12 Feb., 1749; d. in New York city, 12 Dec., 1829. He was graduated at Yale in 1753, and entered the ministry in the same year; was ordained in Plymouth, Mass., on 15 Feb., 1753. In that year he officiated as chaplain in the camp at Roxbury, and by his vigorous discourses encouraged the patriotic determination of the militia. He retained his charge until, at the end of twenty years, his voice failed, when he resigned, returned to Hudson, N. Y., soon afterward, and in company with Henry Craison, founded the publication in 1801 of the "Boswell's Review," from which he withdrew in 1803. He was editor of the "Connecticut Courant" at Hartford in 1804, and continued to write for the paper till 1817. In 1814 he was appointed a judge of Columbia county, N. Y., but he soon resigned. He published a "Sermon before Col. Cotton's Regiment" (1753); "The Thanks- Offering of a Record Reader of the Bible" (1802); "The Sham Patriot Unmasked" (1803); "Historical Dictionary" (1804); and "The Brief Remarks on the Ways of Man," a collection of moral essays originally published in the "Courant" (1817; new ed., 1853).

SAMPSON, Francis Smith,braider, b. in Goochland county, Va., 2 Nov., 1844; d. at Hampden Sidney college, Va., 1887. He entered the University of Virginia in 1861, was graduated M. A. in 1863, and after studying two years at Union theological seminary in Virginia, was appointed teacher of Hebrew there. He was ordained as an evangelist in 1841. He performed all the duties of professor of oriental languages and literature, but was not given the title of professor till 1840, when he returned from a year's study at Halle and Berlin. Hampden Sidney college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1849. He prepared a "Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (New York, 1856).

SAMPSON, John Patterson, author, b. in Wilmington, N. C., 18 Aug., 1857. He is of mixed Scottish and African descent, was graduated at his college's graduation inspection, at one time a teacher in New York city, and during the civil war conducted a journal in Cincinnati, Ohio, called the "Colored Citizen," in which he advocated the enlistment of negroes in the National army. In 1865 he was appointed assessor at Wilmington, N. C., and was superintendent of the Freedmen's school in 1866. In 1868-9 he attended the Western theological seminary at Allegheny, Pa. He took an active part in reconstruction, was a member of the North Carolina constitutional convention, was nominated by the Republicans for both the legislature and congress, and for fifteen years held various posts under the state and U. S. governments. After completing his studies at the National law university, Washington, D. C., he was admitted to the bar of the U. S. supreme court in 1875. In 1882 he relinquished the practice of law, and entered the ministry of the African Methodist Episcopal church. He was appointed to a church near Trenton, N. J., was chosen chaplain of the state senate, and afterward took charge of a congregation at Trenton. He received the degree of D. D. from Wilberforce university, Ohio, in 1888. He was a delegate to the general conference in 1888, is known as a lecturer on social and scientific subjects, and has published in book form "Common-sense Physiology" (Hamp- ton, Va., 1890); "The Disappointed Bride" (1883);
"Temperament and Phrenology of Mixed Races" (Trenton, 1834); "Jolly People" (Hampton, 1836); and "Illustrations in Theology" (1838).

SAMUELS, William, author, b. in London, Ireland, 17 Jan., 1764; d. in New York city, 27 Dec., 1836. He was the son of a Presbyterian minister, and held a commission in the Irish volunteers, but afterward entered the University, and became a Presbyterian. He acted frequently as counsel for members of the Society of United Irishmen, thereby exciting the suspicions of the government, and after the failure of the rebellion of 1798 he was brought back as a prisoner to Dublin. He was released on condition that he should go to Portugal. While there he was again imprisoned at the instance of the English government, which was anxious to obtain papers that had been in his possession. He was finally set free, and came to this country. He established himself as a lawyer in New York city, obtained a large practice, and through his writings, which contain severe invectives against the common law, was influential in bringing about amendments and consolidations of the laws of the state. He published: "Samson against the Law" (Philadelphia, 1835); "Memoirs of William Sampson" (New York, 1837); "Catholic Question in America" (1833); "Discourse before the New York Historical Society on the Common Law" (1824); "Discourse and Correspondence with Learned Jurists upon the History of the Law" (Washington, 1836); and the "History of Ireland," in a part a reprint of Dr. W. Cooke Taylor's "Civis Wars of Ireland" (New York, 1833); also reports of various trials.

SAMUELS, William Thomas, naval officer, b. in Palmyra, N.Y., 9 Feb., 1840. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1861, and attached to the frigate "Potomack" with the rank of midshipman. In July, 1862, he was commissioned as lieutenant, and in 1862-3 he served in the practice-ship "John Adams." During 1864 he was stationed at the naval academy, and he then served in the "Patapsco" with the South Atlantic blockading squadron in 1864-5, and was in that vessel when she was destroyed in Charleston harbor in January, 1865. He served in the flag-ship "Colorado," of the European squadron in 1866-7, and was in the "Emperor" in 1867-71. Meanwhile he had been commissioned lieutenant-commander on 25 July, 1866. His next service was in the "Congress" on special duty in 1872, and on the European station in 1873, after which, in 1875, he had the "Alert," and was commissioned commander on 9 Aug., 1874. During 1876-9 he was at the naval academy, and in 1880 was given command of the "Swatara," of the Asiatic squadron. He was assistant superintendent of the U. S. naval observatory in Washington in 1882-3, and in September, 1886, was appointed superintendent of the U. S. naval academy. He was promoted captain in March, 1889, made chief of the bureau of ordnance in January, 1893, and assigned to command of the "Iowa" in June, 1897. In May, 1898, he was appointed acting rear-admiral, and in July he destroyed Cerervia's squadron off Santiago.

SAMSON, George Whitefield, clergyman, b. in Harvard, Mass., 29 Sept., 1819. He was graduated at Brown in 1839 and at Newton theological seminary in 1843. In the same year he was called to the charge of a Baptist church, Wester H. D. C., of which, with the exception of two years in Jamaica Plains, Mass., and some time in foreign travel, he remained pastor until 1858. In that year he was called to the presidency of Columbia College, which office he held until 1871. Soon afterward he was elected president of Rutgers female college, New York city, and continued in this relation until 1873. While president of the female college Dr. Samson was also, for part of the time, pastor of the 1st Baptist church in Harrisburg, Pa., and also engaged in conducting a training-school designed to prepare young men for evangelistic work. Besides numerous articles in periodicals, he is the author of "To Dammon, or the Spiritual Medium" (Boston, 1852; 24 ed., entitled "Spiritualism Tested," 1860); a "Memoir of Mary J. Graham," the principal of her "Institute," "Outlines of the History of Ethics" (1860); "Elements of Art Criticism" (Philadelphia, 1867); abridged ed., 1866); "Physical Media in Spiritual Manifestations" (1869); "The Atonement" (1878); "Divine Law as to Wines" (New York, 1880); "English Revisers' Greek Text shown to be Unauthorized" (1882); "Guide to Self-Education" (1886); "Guide to Bible Interpretation" (1887); and "Idols of our职业."

SAMUELS, Edward Augustus, naturalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 4 July, 1836. He received a common-school education, began early to write for the press, and from 1860 till 1880 was assistant to the secretary of the Massachusetts state board of agriculture. For several years he has been president of the Massachusetts fish and game protection association, besides following the business of a publisher of musical works. He has given attention to invention, and is the originator of a process for engraving by photography directly from nature or from a photographic print. Mr. Samuels has contributed long essays to the U. S. and the Massachusetts agricultural reports, and has published, among other works, "Ornithology and Oology of New England" (Boston, 1867); "Among the Birds" (1867); "Mammalogy of New England" (1868); and, with Augustus C. L. Arnold, "The Living World" (2 vols., 1848-54). His latest illustrated work is entitled "With Fly-rod and Camera" (New York, 1890).

—His wife, Susan Blazee Caldwell, author, b. in Delfham, Mass., 21 Oct., 1848, is a daughter of Com. Charles H. Caldwell, of Boston, Mass., and in 1882 was mamed to Samuel A. Samuels, of Boston. She is the author of several books of travel and nature, besides following the business of a publisher of musical works. Her publications in book-form include "Adrift in the World" (Boston, 1875); "Little Cricket" (1873); "Daisy Travels, or the Girls of the Hive Hall" (1876); and other stories for youth.

SAMUELS, Samuel, seaman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 March, 1825. He shipped as cabin-boy on a coasting-vessel at the age of eleven, studied navigation on shipboard, and after many voyages became at twenty-one captain of a merchantman. He commanded for several years the "Dreadnought," the fastest of the sailing-packet-boats. In 1863-4 he was captain of the U. S. steamer "Columbia" at the taking of Port...
SANBORN, Edwin David, educator, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., Jan. 14, 1848; d. in Hanover, N. H., Dec. 29, 1883. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1869, taught for a year at Gilmanton, studied law, and afterward divinity at Andover seminary, and became a member of the Latin at Dartmouth in 1883. In 1859 he became president of Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., but in 1863 he returned to Dartmouth as professor of oratory and belles-lettres. In 1880 he assumed the new chair of Anglo-Saxon and the English language and literature. He received the degree of L. D. from the University of Vermont in 1859. He married, on Nov. 13, 1837, Mary Ann, a niece of Daniel Webster. He was a leader in public affairs in his town and state, and was several times elected to the legislature. Besides contributions to newspapers and magazines, he published lectures on education, a "Log on Daniel Webster" (Hanover, 1863), and a "History of New Hampshire" (Manchester, 1875).—His daughter, Katharine Abbott, author, b. in Hanover, N. H., Jan. 13, 1853, taught English literature in various seminaries, and held that chair in Smith college for several years, resigning in 1886, in order to follow literary pursuits in New York city. She has lectured in public on literary history and allied subjects, and written on education, and for several years was a newspaper correspondent in New York city. She has also edited calendars and holiday books. Under the name of Kate Sanborn she has published "Home Pictures of English Poets" (New York, 1890); the "Round Table Series of Literature Lessons" (1894); "The Vanity and Insanity of Genius" (1895); "The Wit of Women" (1895); and "A Year of Sunshine" (1887).

SANBORN, John Benjamin, soldier, b. in Exeter, N. H., Dec. 28, 1826. He was educated at Dartmouth, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in July, 1854. In December of that year he removed to St. Paul, Minn., where he has since resided, engaged in the practice of the law, and upon leaving the bar entered upon public life. As adjutant - general and quartermaster-general of Minnesota he organized and sent to the field five regiments of infantry, a battalion of cavalry, and two batteries of artillery in 1861, and in the spring of 1862 left the state as colonel of the 4th Minnesota volunteers, remaining in active service in the field to the close of the war. At Buka, his first battle, he commanded the leading brigade and was commended in the official report. About 600 of his men, out of 2,200, were killed and wounded in little more than an hour. For this he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, but the demands of which he was the member, from 1855 till 1883, comprise about forty volumes. He has edited William E. Channing's "Wanderer" (Boston, 1831) and A. Bronson Alt-fined by the senate. He participated in the battle of Corinth, Port Gibson, Raymond, Jackson, and Champion Hills, and in the assault and siege of Vicksburg. He was designated to lead the advance into the town after the surrender, and superintended the paroling of the prisoners of war and passing them beyond the lines. This honor was conferred on account of his gallant conduct and that of his command, especially at the battle of Jackson. He was a member of the district of southwest Missouri and a brigade and division of cavalry in the field in October and November, 1864, and fought the actions of Jefferson City, Booneville, Independence, Big Blue, Little Blue, Osage, Marias des-Cyngues, and Newtonia. He was never defeated by the enemy, and never failed of complete success except in the assault of 22 May at Vicksburg. He conducted a campaign against the Indians of the southwest in the summer and autumn of 1865, opened all the lines of communication to the territories of Colorado and New Mexico, and terminated all hostilities with the Comanche, Kiowa, Cheyenne, Arapahoe, and Apache of the upper Arkansas, by the treaties that he concluded at the mouth of the Little Arkansas, at Fort Belknap, in 1865-6, under the direction of President Johnson. He adjusted amicably the difficulties growing out of the war between the Cherokees, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles and their slaves, and declared the slaves of those tribes free. In 1867 Gen. Sanborn was designated by congress as one of an Indian peace commission, and with the other commissioners negotiated several treaties which have remained in force and, in connection with the report of that commission, have had a great influence in the amelioration of the condition of the Indians. He has been a member of the house and senate of Minnesota on various occasions.

SANBORN, John Sewell, Canadian judge, b. in Glinton, N. H., 1 Jan., 1819; d. in Sherbrooke, Ontario, 18 July, 1877. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1842, removed to Canada, and in 1847 was admitted to the bar in Montreal. He was elected to parliament for Sherbrooke county in 1850, re-elected in 1852 and 1854, and was subsequently elected for Compton county, remaining a member till 1857. In 1853 he was elected for Wellington county to the legislative council, and he served in that capacity till 1861, when he became a member of the Dominion senate. He resigned this place in 1873, when he was appointed judge of the superior court at Sherbrooke by Sir John A. Macdonald, to whom he was politically opposed. In 1874 he became a judge of the court of queen's bench.

SAN CARLOS, José Miguel, Duke of Spanish-American statesman, b. in Lima, Peru, in 1771; d. in Paris, France, 17 July, 1828. He was descended from the ancient family of Carvajal, which since the time of Charles V. had possessed the hereditary title of chief courier for the Indies. After completing his studies at the College of Lima, he went to Spain at the age of sixteen, and entered on a military career. He commanded the right of the allied armies that attacked Toulon in 1793, was tutor of the king’s children in 1797-1801, was appointed major-domo of Charles IV. in 1805, and in 1807 became viceroy of Navarre. When Ferdinand VII. ascended the throne, he made the Duke of San Carlos director of his household, and followed the advice of his old tutor, and of Escoquiz, in submitting to Napoleon. During the king’s captivity the duke labored incessantly for his restoration, and when he had accomplished this object, in December, 1813, he exercised the functions of prime minister until in the following November the influence of his enemies compelled his retirement. He was afterward ambassador at different courts, and died while representing his government at Paris.

SANCHEZ, Affonso (sanchez), Portuguese pilot, b. in Cascaes, Estremadura, about 1490; d. about 1486. According to Francisco Gonara in his "Historia de las Indias," Abra e Lima in his "Synopsis e deducio chronologica," Ayres de Cazal in his "Conuographia Brunici," Lisboa in his "Annaes do Rio de Janeiro," and other historians, Sanchez commanded a caravel, and was trading on the coast of Africa, and to whom he left his papers and the secret of his great discovery, which afterward enabled the Genoese navigator to find America. Although no direct proofs exist as to the truth of these facts, nothing has yet been discovered to contradict them, and thus Sanches stands among the many claimants of the discovery of America.

SANCHEZ, Labrador José (sanchez), Spanish missionary, b. in Guadix, Spain, 19 Sept., 1717; d. in Ravenna, Italy, in 1799. He entered the Jesuit order in 1731, went some time afterward to Paraguay, and was professor of philosophy and theology in the academy of New Cordova. He abandoned his professorship to preach to the Indians, among whom he lived for the rest of his life, and to whom he left his papers and the secret of his great discovery, which afterward enabled the Genoese navigator to find America. Although no direct proofs exist as to the truth of these facts, nothing has yet been discovered to contradict them, and thus Sanches stands among the many claimants of the discovery of America.

SANCHEZ DE AGUILAR, Pedro (sanchez), Mexican bishop, b. in Valladolid, Yucatan, 10 April, 1557; d. in Valladolid, Yucatan, 27 Oct., 1639, was a descendant of the first conquerors of Yucatan. Sanchez was sent by his father to Mexico, where he studied in the College of San Ildefonso, was ordained and graduated as doctor in theology, and was rector of several parishes in Yucatan. He became vicar-general of the bishop of Yucatan, and in 1617 was sent to Madrid and Rome as commissioner of the commission of ecclesiastics of the province. He appointed himself to a canonry in the cathedral of La Plata in the province of Charcas, whither he sailed after his return to Mexico, and after he was appointed judge of the Inquisition in Lima, and finally bishop of Santa Cruz. He wrote "Informe contra Ilustrad. Cuitres del Obispado de Yucatan," "Memoria de su Vida y Obras," "Cartilla de Doctrina Cristiana en idioma Yucateco," and "Memoria de los primeros Conquis-SANDEMAN, Robert, founder of a sect, b. in Perth, Scotland, in 1718; d. in Danbury, Conn., 2 April, 1771. He studied in the University of Edinburgh, engaged in the linen trade, and, on marrying the daughter of the Rev. John Glass, became an elder in his church, and reduced Glass's opinions to a system. Under Sandeman's influence churches were gathered in the principal cities of Scotland, and Newcastle, London, and other English towns. His views excited much controversy. They were similar to those of Calvin with the distinguishing tenet that faith was the intellectual basis of the new and bare belief of the bare truth. He rejected all mystical and double sense from the Scripture, prohibited games of chance, "things strangled," according to the Jewish precept, and college training, and required weekly love feasts, and a plurality of elders. The sect was divided into two parts, the Baptist Sandemanians, who practised the sacrament of baptism, and the Osborneites, who rejected it. Sandeman came to this country in 1764, and organized societies in Boston, Mass., and Danbury, Conn. During the Revolution the Sandemanians were generally loyalists, and gave the Wrens much trouble. The sect now numbers about 1,500 persons (1898). Sandeman published a series of 'Letters addressed to the Reverend Mr. Paim and Aspasio' (Edinburgh, 1757; last ed., 1836).

SANDEMAN, Daniel Clarke, editor, b. in Starbridge, Mass., 3 May, 1798; d. in Medfield, Mass., 18 Oct., 1850. He was graduated at Harvard in 1798, was a teacher in the Cambridge grammar-school while studying divinity, and was licensed to preach in 1820. He was pastor of the Congregational society in 1820, and was ordained in the Massachusetts constitutional convention in 1829. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1839. Dr. Sanders was an earnest worker in the cause of education. While president of the University of Vermont he performed his duties for three years without an assistant, the class of 1854 received all its instruction from him, and he regularly taught from six to ten hours a day. He published about thirty discourses, and a "History of the Indian Wars with the First Settlers of the United States" (Montpelier, Vt., 1812).

SANDEAN, Elizabeth Elkins, author, b. in Salem, Mass., in 1762; d. there, 10 Aug., 1851. She was educated in her native town, married Thomas Sanders in 1780, and was greatly engaged in extensive benevolence. She corresponded with many eminent persons, and published "Conversations, principally on the Aborigines of North America" (Salem, Mass., 1828); "First Settlers of New England" (Boston, 1829); and "Reviews of a Part of Prescott's 'History of Ferdinand and Isabella,' and of Campbell's 'Lectures on Poetry' (1841). She also contributed to the press on moral and religious subjects.

SANDEAN, John, engineer, b. in Lexington, Ky., in 1810; d. in Fort Delaware, Del., 29 July, 1858. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1854, became captain in the engineer corps in 1838, and for many years was engaged in improving the Ohio river, and in the construction and repair of the interior defences of New York harbor. During the Mexican war he participated in the battles of Monterey and Vera Cruz, and received the brevet of major for gallantry in the first-named action. He subsequently was employed in the improvements on Delaware bay and river, and in constructing Fort Delaware. He published "Memoirs on the Resources of the Valley of the Ohio" (New York, 1844), and a translation of Francois F. Poncet's "Memoir of the Stability of Revolutions and their Foundation" (1859).

SANDEAN, William Price, soldier, b. in Lexington, Ky., 12 Aug., 1839; d. in Knoxville, Tenn., 18 Nov., 1864. He was graduated in the U. S. military academy in 1856, became 1st lieutenant, 10 May, 1861, and on the 14th of that month captain of the 3d U. S. cavalry. He engaged in the battles of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Mechanicsville, and Hanover Court-House during the Virginia peninsula campaign, became colonel of the 5th Kentucky cavalry in March, 1863, was in pursuit of Morgan's raiders in July and August, was chief of cavalry in the Department of the Ohio in October and November, and participated in the actions at Blue Lick Springs, Lenorii, and Campbell's Station, where he was mortally wounded. He became brigadier-general of volunteers, 18 Oct., 1863.

SANDEANSON, John, author, b. near Carlisle, Pa., in 1813; d. in New York, 10 Oct., 1880. He was educated by a private tutor, and began the study of law in Philadelphia in 1836, but became a teacher, and was subsequently associate principal of Clermont seminary. He went abroad in 1855, and, on his return the next year, became professor of Latin and Greek in the Philadelphia high-school, which post he held until his death. Rufus G. Griswold said of him: "In his work of teaching, and his conversation, as well as in his writings, he never submitted a shadow to any face, nor permitted a weight to lie on any heart." With his brother, Joseph M. Sanderson, he published the first two volumes of the "Biography of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence" (Philadelphia, 1829; completed in 5 volumes, 1831, by Rufus W. Walt, Jr., and others, and republished by William H. Boul- head, 1865). He was also author of a pamphlet in which he successfully opposed the plan to exclude the classical languages from Girard college (1826); "Sketches of Paris" (1838; republished in London, under the title of "The American in Paris," 1838; 3d ed., 2 vols., 1848); and portions of a work entitled "The American in London," which appeared in the "Knickerbocker Magazine.

SANDEANSON, John Philip, soldier, b. in Lebanon county, Pa., 13 Feb., 1818; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 14 Oct., 1864. He was admitted to the bar in 1839, and served in the legislature in 1843, and in the state senate in 1847. He edited the Philadelphia "Daily News" in 1848-56, and became chief clerk of the U. S. adjutant-general's department in 1859, but was designed to become lieutenant-colonel of the 15th U. S. infantry. He was appointed its colonel in July, 1863, and in February, 1864, became provost-marshal-general of the Department of the Missouri. His most important public service was the full exposition that he made during the civil war of the secret political organization in the northern and western states, known as the "Knights of the golden circle" or the "Order of American knights." He published "Views and Opinions of American Statesmen on Foreign Immigration" (Philadelphia, 1843), and "Republican Landmarks" (1856).

SANDEANSON, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Ballybay, County Monaghan, Ireland, 23 May, 1823. He was graduated at the Royal college, Belfast, in 1845, came to this country the next year, and was classical teacher in Washington institute, New York city, in 1847-9. He then studied theology, was licensed to preach in 1849, and became pastor of the Associate Presbyterian church in Providence, R. I. In 1852, founded the parish of the Presbyterian church in New York city. He was acting pastor of the Congregational church at Saugatuck, Conn., in 1872-8, assistant editor of the “Horticultural Monthly” in 1881-3, and has edited the “Pulpit Treasury” since 1885. He has published “Jesus on the Holy Mount” (New York, 1869), and “Memorial Tribute” (1883).

SANDFORD Lewis Ralser, jurist, b. in Ovid, N. Y., Jan. 15, 1872; d. in Toledo, Ohio, 27 July, 1852. He studied law at Syracuse, N. Y., was admitted to the bar in 1828, removed to New York city in 1833, and in 1843 was chosen assistant vice-chancellor of the first circuit. He became vice-chancellor in 1846, and from 1847 till his death was associate justice of the superior court of New York. He published “Catalogue of the New York Law Trustees” (New York, 1843); “New York Chancery Reports” (4 vols., 1846-59); and “New York Superior Court Reports” (1849-52).—His brother, Edward, lawyer, b. in Ovid, N. Y., 22 Sept., 1809; d. at sea, 27 Sept., 1854, received an academic education, and at fifteen years of age settled in Albany, where he engaged in teaching and lecturing. He subsequently studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1838, began practice in New York city, and in 1842 was appointed judge of the criminal court of that city. He subsequently returned to the bar, and took the highest rank in his profession. Mr. Sandford was a member of the New York senate in 1843. He was lost in the steamship “Aretes.”

SANDERO Ralph, author, b. in Liverpool, Eng., about 1693; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., May, 1738. He was the son of John Sandford, of Liverpool, and in early life was a sailor. He emigrated to Pennsylvania, where he settled on a farm and became a Quaker preacher. Sandford was one of the earliest public advocates of the emancipation of negro slaves, and in support of his views published “A Brief Examination of the Practice of the Negroes in the West Indies in the Respect of Trade, &c., &c.” (Philadelphia, 1729); 24 ed., enlarged, 1730. These were printed by Franklin and Meredith. Franklin says, in a letter dated 4 Nov., 1789: “I printed a book for Ralph Sandford against keeping negroes in slavery, two editions of which he distributed gratis.” Sandford’s doctrines met with little favor, except among the poor, who were engaged in competition with slave labor. The chief magistrate of the province threatened Sandford with punishment if he permitted his writings to be circulated, but, notwithstanding, he distributed the work wherever he thought it would be read. Sandford was buried in a field, on his own farm, near the house where he died. The executors of his will had the grave enclosed with a balustrade, and caused a stone to be placed at the head of it, inscribed: “In Memory of Ralph Sandford, Son of John Sandford, of Liverpool. He Bore a Testimony against the Negro Trade and Dyed ye 28th of ye 3rd Month, 1739. Aged 40 Years.” See “Memoir of Benjamin Lay and Ralph Sandford,” by Robert Vaux (Philadelphia, 1853).—SANDOVAL, Alfonso de, Peruvian philanthropist, b. in Seville, Spain; d. in Cartagena, Spanish America, 25 Dec., 1862. He went to South America when a boy, was educated by the Jesuits of Lima, joined their order, and devoted himself to the care of the slaves, among whom he spent the rest of his life. The object of most of his writings was to advance the temporal and spiritual welfare of the negroes. His principal works are “Naturalezza sagrada y profana, costumbres, ritos, tabibias, y catastrofes, en el Perú (Edos los Eshpes)” (Seville, 1837); “Vida de S. Francisco Xavier y lo que obraron los PP. de la companía de Jesus en la India” (1619); and “De Instaurandia Archipontifect Salute” (Madrid, 1640).

SANDOVAL, Gonzalo de, Spanish soldier, b. in Medellin, Spain, about 1486; d. in Moguer, Spain, near the close of 1528. He was the youngest of the lieutenants of Hernando Cortes, who, after the subjugation of Mexico, was made governor of the province of Yucatan and commander at Villa Rica de Vera Cruz. He seized the messengers of Narvaez, who demanded the surrender of the town, and sent them as prisoners to Cortez, to whom he rendered effective aid in overcoming his rival. He conducted operations against the Aztecs from a post called Segura, near Tepacca, until the vessels were built for the attack by force on the capital, when he went to Tlascala to direct their transportation. In the investment he occupied the eastern approach, and in the first assault he supported Alvarado in an attempt to gain the market-place. He met Cristoval de Tajin, who was sent to relieve Cortes, in December, 1521, and in a council of officers obtained a delay. He was the ablest and most conspicuous officer of Cortez in his southward progress, and arrived in 1524 on his return to Spain to confront his enemies, but died immediately after landing.

SANDOVAL SILVA Y MENDOZA, Gaspar de (sand-va-val), Count de Galve, viceroy of Mexico, b. in Saragossa about 1640; d. in Spain early in the 18th century. He was appointed to relieve Melchor de Porto-Carrero, who had been promoted viceroy of Peru, and arrived in Mexico, 17 Sept., 1688. Shortly afterward, hearing that the French had founded an establishment in the Bay of San Bernardo, he ordered the governor of Coahuila, Alonso de Leon (q. v.), to expel them with an expedition, which led Moncada in 1689. He sent in 1690 an expedition of seven ships and 2,000 men to Santo Domingo to assist the governor of that island. He wrote to the Spanish ships of the Spanish West India Company to send two frigates to the French from the western part, and on 21 Jan., 1691, the latter were wrecked near Guainco (now Cape Hattien), the French governor was killed, and the city was sacked and burned. In 1691 he established several military posts in Texas, and in the same year a presidio was founded in the Bay of Pensacola. He was the first to establish schools for the Indians, taught them Spanish, and organized minor employments to those that were foremost in learning. In 1692 the crop of corn failed, and the consequent famine caused a mutiny in the capital, in which the viceroyal palace and several public buildings were partially burnt. A second expedition, in cooperation with the English fleet, was sent in 1693 against the French establishments on the northwest coast of Lower California, and their forts were destroyed. His health was declining, and, after he had repeatedly petitioned the court to relieve him, he obtained in 1695 permission to deliver the executive to Bishop Juan de Ortega Montafia, who took charge on 27 Feb., 1696. Sandoval then returned to Spain.

SANDS, Alexander Hamilton, lawyer, b. in Williamsburg, Va., 2 May, 1828; d. in Richmond, Va., 22 Dec., 1887. He studied at William and Mary in 1838-42, but was not graduated, read law, and in 1843 became deputy clerk of the state superior court. In 1845-50 he held the office in the U. S. circuit court. He was a judge-advocate in the Confederate army during the civil war, and a short time before his death entered the Baptist ministry, serving congregations in Ashland and Glen Allen, Va. Besides contributions to periodicals, he published "History of a Suit in Equity" (Richmond, 1854); a new edition of Alexander Tate's "American Form-Book" (1857); "Recreations of a Southern Barrister" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Practical Law Forms" (1872); and "Sermons by a Village Pastor," (He edited the "Bible's Legal Directory of Virginia Laws," and was the editor of the "Quarterly Law Review" and the "Evening Bulletin" (1859), both in Richmond.

SANDS, Benjamin Franklin, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 11 Feb., 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 June, 1888. He entered the navy as midshipman, 1 April, 1828, and was commissioned lieutenant, 16 March, 1840. During the latter part of the Mexican war he was in the Gulf squadron, and took part in the expedition up the Tabasco river and at Tustin. He cruised in the coast-survey under S. P. Drake, of the "Fear," in command of the brig "Porpoise" off the coast of Africa, for the suppression of the slave-trade, in 1845-51. He was attached to the coast-survey service in 1854-19, during which period he was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1855. He was next attached to the bureau of construction in the navy department until the civil war. He was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862, commanded the steamer "Dacotah" on the blockade, participating in the engagement with Fort Caswell at the mouth of Cape Fear river. He was senior officer in command of the division on the blockade off Wilmington, N. C., in 1862-5, and also took part in both attacks on Fort Fisher in command of the steamer "Federal." He had charge of the division on the blockade off the coast of Texas from February to June, 1865, and on 2 June, 1865, he hoisted the U. S. flag at Galveston, the last place that was surrendered by the Confederates. He was commissioned commodore, 25 July, 1866, and appointed superintendent of the naval observatory at Washington in 1867, where he remained in command of the last part of 1872. He was commissioned rear-admiral, 27 April, 1871, placed on the retired list, 11 Feb., 1874, and was then a resident of Washington until his death.

SANDS, David, Quaker preacher, b. on Long Island, N. Y., 4 Oct., 1745; d. in Cornwall, N. Y., in June, 1818. He became a merchant, but entered the Society of Friends, married a member of that denomination, and began to labor in this country and Canada till 1794, and then in Europe till he was sixty years of age. See "David Sands, Journal of his Life and Gospel Labors" (New York, 1848).

SANDS, Henry Berton, surgeon, b. in New York city, 27 Sept., 1830; d. there, 18 Nov., 1888. After studying at a high-school in New York city, he graduated at the College of physicians and surgeons in that city in 1854. Since that time he had practiced in New York, giving special attention to surgery. From 1860 till 1870 he was in partnership with Dr. William Parker. Dr. Sands was demonstrator of anatomy in the College of physicians and surgeons in 1856-'66, professor of that branch in 1869-'79, and since the last-named year had held the chair of the practice of surgery. He had been connected with various hospitals as consulting or attending surgeon, was a member of many medical societies, and was president of the New York county pathological society in 1866-'7, of the County medical society in 1874-'7, and of the New York surgical society in 1873. In the latter year he became a corresponding member of the Society of surgery of Paris. Dr. Sands had a high reputation as a successful operating surgeon. Among the descriptions of his operations that he contributed to surgical literature are "Case of Cancer of the Larvax, successfully removed by Laparotomy" (1865); "Anemia of the Sub-Clavian, treated by Galvano-Puncture" (1869); "Case of Traumatic Brachial Neuralgia, treated by Excision of the Cords which go to form the Brachial Plexus" (1873); "Case of Bone Anchylosis of the Hip-Joint, successfully treated by Subcutaneous Division of the Neck of the Femur" (1875); "Esmarch's Blood-Less Methods" (1877); "The Employment of Abdominal Section" (1877); "The Question of Trephining in Injuries of the Head" (1883); and "Rupture of the Ligamentum Patellae, and its Treatment by Operation" (1885).

SANDS, Joshua Ratoon, naval officer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 15 May, 1795; d. in Baltimore, Md., 2 Oct., 1888. His father, Joshua Sands, was a partner in New York, and a representative in congress in 1803-'5 and 1823-'7. The son entered the navy as a midshipman, 18 June, 1812, and immediately entered upon his duties in Com. Chauncey's squadron on Lake Ontario. He participated in the action with the "Royal George," 3 Nov., 1812. The next season he was attached to the "Madison," and in the action that resulted in the capture of Toronto he carried the orders of the commodore by pulling in a small boat to the different vessels until the enemy surrendered. In May, 1813, he served in the "Pike," and fought several engagements with the British squadron under Sir James Yeo. In 1814 he was with a battery on shore and in the frigate "Superior" until peace was signed. He was commissioned lieutenant, 1 April, 1818, and commander, 23 Feb., 1841. During the Mexican war he had charge of the steamer "Vixen," in which he assisted at the capture of Alvarado, Tabasco, and Laguna. He was governor of the last-named place until the investment of Vera Cruz, where he rendered service by taking the "Vixen" close under the batteries and to the castle of San Juan de Ubla. He co-operated in the capture of Tampico, and in 1847 brought home the flags, trophies, and brass cannon, with a complimentary letter to the navy department for his creditable services. In 1851 he commanded the frigate "St. Lawrence," with the government exhibits for the World's fair at London, and prior to his departure he was given a large sum of money, which he expended on behalf of Brooklyn with a sword and epauletts, which he gave to the Historical society of Brooklyn, together with a gold snuff-box inlaid with diamonds that had been presented to him by Queen Victoria. He assisted in laying the submarine cable in 1857, took part in the expedition to Central America against the filibusters, and was made a captain in 1861, and was flag-officer in command of the Brazil station in 1859-'61. He was retired on 21 Dec., 1861.
as he was more than sixty-two years of age, but was commissioned commodore, 16 July, 1862, and served as light-house inspector on the lakes until 1866. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 25 July, 1866, and was post-admiral at Norfolk from 1866 till 1872. After that he resided at Baltimore until his death, at which time he was the senior officer of the navy on the retired list.

SANDS, Robert Charles, author, b. in Flatbush, Long Island, N. Y., 11 May, 1759; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 17 Dec., 1832. He was a member of the Sands family (1748-1834), a New York merchant, an active Revolutionary patriot, a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1777, and for many years a member of the legislature. The son was graduated at Columbia in 1813. While in college, he and James Wallis Eastburn had planned two periodicals, "The Moralist," of which a single number appeared, and "Academic Recreations," which lasted a year. To both of these Sands contributed prose and verse. On his graduation he began to study law with David B. Ogden, but at the same time wrote on a great variety of subjects. He was one of the authors of a series of essays in the "Daily Advertiser," entitled "The Neologist" (1817), and another entitled "The Amphitrope" (1819), which were marked by purity of taste. He also began to translate the Psalms of David with his friend Eastburn, and wrote with him "Yamovden," a poem founded on the history of the Indian, King Philip, which was published, with additions by Sands, after Eastburn's death (New York, 1820). He was admitted to the bar in 1820, declining the chair of belles-lettres in Dickinson college, but continued to devote himself to literature, and in 1823-4 issued, with others, the "St. Tammany Magazine," of which seven numbers appeared. In 1824 he began the "Atlantic Magazine," and when it became the "New York Review" he conducted it with William Cullen Bryant in 1825-7. From the latter year till his death he was an editor of the "Commercial Advertiser." During the latter part of his life he lived in Hoboken, N. J., then a rural village, the beauties of whose environs he celebrated in some of his writings. Besides the works that have been mentioned above, he wrote "The Talisman," an annual, jointly with William Cullen Bryant and Guilian C. Verplanck (3 vols., 1828-30; republished as "Miscellanies"). In this appeared "The Dream of the Princess Pampantzin," one of his longest poems and he contributed to "Tales of Glauber Spa," for which he wrote the humorous introduction (2 vols., 1829), and was also the author of "Life and Correspondence of Paul Jones" (1831). His works were edited, with a memoir, by Guilian C. Verplanck (2 vols., New York, 1834).

SANDS, Sir Edwin, English statesman, b. in Worcester in 1561; d. in Northborne, Kent, in 1629. His father, of the same name, was bishop of Worcester, and afterward archbishop of York. The son was educated at Oxford, supported the claims of James I. to the English throne, and was knighted in 1603. He became an active member of the first London company for Virginia, led in reformatory measures, and introduced the vote by ballot. He was elected treasurer (the chief officer of the company) in 1619, and established representative government in the colony, whose security and prosperity he did much to promote. Through Spanish influence, King James, in violation of the charter, forbade his re-election in 1629, but his successor, the Earl ofVerplanck, continued his policy. He published "Europa Speculum, or a Survey of the State of Religion in the Western Part of the World" (best ed., 1657).—His brother, George, poet, b. in Bishopsthorne in 1577; d. in Boxley abbey, Kent, in March, 1644, was educated at Oxford, and in 1621 became colonial treasurer of Virginia, where he built the first water-mill, promoted the establishment of iron-works, and in 1632 introduced ship-building. His translation of the last ten books of Ovid's "Metamorphoses," which he accomplished during his stay (London, 1626), is the first English literary production of any value that was written in this country. In his dedication to Charles I. he says it was "limned by that imperfect light which was snatched from the hours of night and repose." He returned to England in 1624. Sandys is well known as a traveller from his "Relation of a Journey" in the countries on the Mediterranean sea and the Holy Land (London, 1615), and he also published metrical versions of the Psalms (1636), the Song of Solomon (1639), and other parts of the Scriptures. A collected edition of his works has been published (2 vols., London, 1872). See his life by Henry J. Todd, prefixed to selections from his metrical works (1869).

SANFORD, Charles W., lawyer, b. in Newark, N. J., 5 May, 1796; d. in Avon Springs, Livingston co., N. Y., 35 July, 1878. He studied law in the office of Ogden Hoffman in New York city, and was admitted to the bar there, where he remained in continuous practice throughout his life. He was counsel for the Harlem railroad for more than twenty years, a name well known from his connection with several important suits. He was vice-president of the Bar association and a member of the Law institute. He enlisted as a private in the 3d New York militia regiment, and was promoted until he was placed in command of the 1st division. In 1867 he was retired by Gov. Reuben E. Fenton, after being at the head of the military organization in New York city for more than thirty years. On him devolved the responsibility of directing the troops that were called out to suppress the Astor place, Flour, Street-preachers', and Draft riots. At the beginning of the civil war he responded to the first call for three-months volunteers, and was placed at the head of a division under Gen. Robert Patterson. He was in command at Harper's Ferry during the battle of Bull Run.

Various official reports of his have been published by congress, including one on "Penal Codes in Europe" (Washington, 1854), and the "Averillood Correspondence," also published by congress, which treated very fully of several important questions of international law.

SANFORD, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Vermont, June 6, 1795; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 Dec., 1831. He was graduated at Union in 1820, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1823, ordained as pastor of a Presbyterian church in Brooklyn, N. Y., in October of that year, and from 1829 till his death was pastor of a church in Philadelphia. He was distinguished for his power to move the sympathies and emotions of his audiences. See his "Memoirs," by Robert Baird (Philadelphia, 1836).

SANFORD, Nathan, senator, b. in Bridge- hampton, Suffolk Co., N. Y., 5 Nov., 1777; d. in Flushing, N. Y., 17 Oct., 1838. He was educated at Yale college, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1799, and began practice in New York city. He was appointed to several local offices, and on the accession of President Jefferson was made U. S. commissioner in bankruptcy. From 1803 till 1816 he was U. S. district attorney for New York county. This was a period of the commercial difficulties with France, of the embargo, and of the war of 1812, involving great embarrassment to American commerce. To the discussion of the difficult legal questions arising out of the occurrences of this time, Mr. Sanford brought unusual ability, extensive learning, and a liberal spirit. While holding this office, he was twice elected to the New York assembly, of which he was chosen speaker in 1811. From 1812 till 1815 he was a member of the state senate, which, then, in addition to its legislative functions, sat as a court for the correction of errors. He was elected U. S. senator from New York as a Democrat, and served from 4 Dec., 1815, till 3 March, 1821, when he was sent as a delegate to the State constitutional convention. There he proposed amendments, which were adopted, declaring the property qualification for the elective franchise. On the adoption of the new constitution he was appointed to the office of chan-SANGSTER, Edward, poet, b. in Albany, N.Y., 8 July, 1806; d. in Gowanda, Cattaraugus co., N.Y., 28 Aug., 1876, was graduated at Union college in 1824, and studied law, but never practised, preferring journalism, politics, and literature. His first engagement was upon the editorial staff of a Brooklyn newspaper. He was subsequently editor of the New York Evening Post and the New York Mirror, and in 1836 he became associate editor of the Washington "Globe," the organ of the Van Buren administration. Returning to New York city in 1838, he was made assistant naval officer at that post, and also held the office of secretary to the commission to restore the duties on goods that had been destroyed by the great fire of 1835. In 1847 he was elected to the state senate. He was a frequent contributor of both prose and verse to the "New York Mirror" the "Spirit of the Times," and the "Knickerbocker" magazine. Among his best-known compositions, only a few of which appeared over his own name, are a poetical address to "Black Hawk" and "The Loves of the Shell-Fishers." Other specimens of his graceful and humorous verse are published in various publications.

SANGSTER, John Herbert, author, b. in London, Ont., 26 March, 1834. He was graduated at Victoria college in arts in 1851 and in medicine in 1854, has been principal of the Toronto normal school, professor of chemistry and botany in the University of Victoria college, and is now (1898) engaged in active practice as a physician. He has published: "Natural Philosophy" (Montreal, 1861); "Elementary Arithmetic" (1862); "Students' Note-Book on Inorganic Chemistry" (1862); "National Arithmetic Revised" (1864); and "Elements of Algebra" (1864).
book-form include "Manual of Missions of the Reformed Church in America" (New York, 1878); "Poems of the Household" (Boston, 1888); "Home Fairies and Heart Flowers" (New York, 1887); and several Sunday-school books. Her most successful poems are "Our Own," "The Sin of Omission," and "Are the Children at Home?"

SANKEY, Ira David, evangelist, b. in Edinburgh, Lawrence co., Pa., 28 Aug., 1840. His father, David, was for many years a state senator, president of a bank, and an editor. As a boy Ira displayed a great liking for music. The family removed to New Castle, Pa., where, at the age of fifteen, he was united with the Methodists, church of which his parents were members. He became leader of the choir, superintendent of the Sunday-school, and president of the Young men's Christian Association in the town. In 1870 he was delegated to the Indianapolis international convention of the last-named body, where he first met Dwight L. Moody. Since that time he has been associated with him in his evangelistic work as a singer, and has attained a wide reputation. His melodies, whether composed by Mr. Sankey or selected, are simple, pleasing, and effective, readily caught, and easily remembered. On 23 April, 1886, he presented to the town of New Castle, Pa., as a free gift, a Young men's Christian association building, equipped with organ, reading-rooms, halls, school-rooms, and an art gallery, and since then he has also given a valuable building-site to the church with which he was first connected. Mr. Sankey, however, does not confine himself exclusively to singing: he has always taken an active part in the inquiry-room, and of late has addressed meetings very acceptably. He has a fine baritone voice, and a company of harmonium, singing solos, and also leading the audiences. Mr. Sankey's compilation of "Sacred Songs and Solos" has been translated into many languages, and has had a larger circulation than any other book of hymns.

SAN MARTIN, José de, Argentine soldier, b. in Yapeyu, 29 Feb., 1778; d. in Buenos Ayres, 25 Mar., 1850. In the age of eight years he was sent to Spain, where he was educated in the College of the nobility, and, entering the army in 1791, served with credit during the French invasion. Being promoted lieutenant-colonel, he left the army to offer his services in the cause of South American independence, and arrived in Perú, 1812, in the regiment of Grenadiers. The government commissioned him, with the rank of colonel, to organize a regiment of mounted grenadiers, with which he took part in the campaigns against the viceroy Vigodet, whom he defeated, 13 Jan., 1813, at San Lorenzo. On 18 Jan., 1814, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army in upper Perú, to replace Belgrano; but, seeing that the Spanish occupation of Calamuchita was a threat to Perú, he was about to leave the garrison of the country. He reached the east coast and, having arrangements with the coast, he embarked from the coast and entered the capital triumphantly on the 15th. He was elected supreme chief of the republic, but declined and proposed O'Higgins, only reserving the command of the auxiliary Argentine army. The sum of $10,000 was offered, but the municipality carried resolutions declaring the man an impostor, and finally the government of Perú, through the mediation of the republic, offered $10,000. After the surprise of the united army by the Spaniards at San Martín, 19 March, 1818, he reorganized his forces and totally defeated the Spaniards at Maipú on 5 April of that year, liberating Chili from the Spanish yoke. After a visit to Buenos Ayres, he returned in October to Chili, and soon began to organize with O'Higgins a fleet and army for the invasion of Peru. In May, 1820, he was called with his troops to Buenos Ayres, but disobeying, as established government existed in the Argentine, he was proclaimed by his army an independent ruler, and on 20 Aug. sailed with an army of 4,500 men on Admiral Cochrane's fleet from Valparaíso, landing on 7 Sept. at Pisco. After a brilliant campaign he entered Lima, which had been abandoned by the Spaniards on 12 July, 1821, and on 27 July proclaimed the independence of Peru, being elected viceroy of Lima, 18 Aug., by the municipality chief of the government, under the title of protector. During his short administration he abolished slavery and the tribute that had been levied on the Indians, and introduced many other reforms, especially in the system of education. He sent the famous regiment of mounted grenadiers to assist Bolivar in his struggle for independence in Ecuador, and, seeing the importance of united action, he met him in Guayaquil on 23 July, 1822. What passed at this interview is unknown, but on his return to Lima, San Martin resigned on 22 Aug., and, leaving part of his army to assist Gen. Sucre, he went to Europe, where he established himself in Brussels. In 1828 he returned to Buenos Ayres shortly after the battle of Ituzaingo, and, finding his country plunged in intestine troubles, returned to Brussels, as he had made a vow never to unsheathe his sword in civil war, and in 1830 settled in Paris. Chili, Buenos Ayres, and Peru have erected statues in his honor. The one in Buenos Ayres is shown in the engraving.

SAN MARTIN, Tomás de, Spanish-American bishop, b. in Cordova, Spain, in 1482; d. in Lima, Peru, in 1534. He entered the Dominican order, and was appointed regent of studies in the College of St. Thomas, Seville. While here he asked to be sent to Santo Domingo as missionary to the Indians. He arrived in that island in 1525, and at once sided with Las Casas in defending the rights of the natives. He was put in charge of the royal audiencia of Santo Domingo till 1529, when he went to Spain in the interests of the colony. Learning that a body of Dominicans were about to follow Pizarro to Peru, he resigned his title of president, and went with them. He remained in San Miguel de Pilla when Pizarro marched to meet Atahualpa at Cajamarca, but entered Cuzco after its capture, and then went to the province of Chacas, of which he was the first apostle. In 1540 he was made vicar provincial of the Dominicans of Peru, and began the construction of the convent of San Rosario in Lima, and was afterward appointed provincial for eight years. In 1541, after the assassination of Pizarro and the proclamation of the son of Almagro as captain-general of Peru, Viera de Castro, governor of Peru, who was then at Panama, made San Martin his representative. He assembled the leading inhabitants of Lima, and proposed the election of a lieutenant-general to rule the country until the governor should arrive. His advice was followed, and the choice fell on Francisco de Barrientos. In the battle of Chupas in 1542, between the partisans of Almagro and the viceroy, he was present at the solicitation of the latter, but attended impartially to the wounded on both sides. In 1543 he received a letter from Charles V, charging him to see to the execution of the ordinances promulgated at the instance of Las Casas for the protection of the natives. In the civil war that resulted from the effort to give effect to these ordinances, he made attempts to bring about a reconciliation between the viceroy, Nuñez Vela, and Gonzalo Pizarro, and on the triumph of the latter he was sent by him, in conjunction with the archbishop of Lima, to Spain, to solicit an amnesty. He set out in 1546, but, meeting Pedro de la Gasca at Panama, who had arrived from Spain with full power to restore order in Peru, he returned to that city, where he was appointed by the city of Lima to treat with the court of Spain concerning the administration of the country. The emperor not only granted him all the favors he asked for the city, the principal of which was the establishment of a university, but gave him the title of first bishop of La Plata and the regency of the royal audience in that city. On his arrival in Lima he was attacked by the people of which he died.

SAN ROMAN, Miguel de, Peruvian soldier. b. in Puno in 1802; d. in Chorrillos, 3 April, 1863. He was the son of an Indian chief, and accompanied his father in the revolt of Pumacahua (q. v.), and, when the latter was captured and shot, the boy swore vengeance against the Spaniards. In 1821 he entered the army and took part in the conflict in Chorrillos. During the second siege, the battle of Callao in 1826, by order of Bolivar he protected Bellavista. In the campaign of the restoration he served in the constitutional army, and was present in the battle of Yungay, 30 Jan., 1839. In 1841, during the war against Bolivia, he commanded one of the divisions of the Peruvian army, and after the battle of Ingavi on 18 Nov., which was fatal to his reputation, he crossed the Desaguadero river, occupied the department of Puno, and there he employed himself in the reorganization of the army. In 1845 he was elected senator of the republic, and he afterward became president of the council of state, and in consequence vice-president of the republic. In 1851, as a deputy, he occupied his place in the legislative body. He was appointed minister of war in 1855, and in 1856 was a member of the constituent congress, and an author of the constitution that was promulgated that year. In 1858, during several months, he occupied the executive as president of the council of ministers. In 1852 he was elected president of the republic; but his administration was of short duration, as he died of yellow fever, while on a visit to Callao.

SANTA-ANNA, Antonio Lopez de, president of Mexico. b. in Jalapa, 21 Feb., 1795; d. in the city of Mexico, 20 June, 1856. He entered the Spanish army as a cadet on 6 July, 1810, and served against the patriots, rising gradually till in April, 1821, he pronounced for the Plan de Iguala and joined the army of Iturbide, by whom he was promoted brigadier and governor of Vera Cruz. After Iturbide was proclaimed emperor, Santa-Anna began to conspire against him, and, when he was relieved of his command and ordered to Mexico, he proclaimed the republic in Vera Cruz 2 Dec., 1822. In 1823 he pronounced in San Luis Potosí for federation, and when that principle was victorious he was appointed governor of Yucatán, and afterward of Vera Cruz. On 12 Sept., 1828, he headed a revolt against the election of Gomez Pedraza, declaring in favor of Gen. Vicente Guerrero, and after the triumph of the latter he was appointed governor and commander of Vera Cruz. There he began to assemble forces against a threatened Spanish invasion, although his enemies insinuated revolutionary motives, and when, on 29 July, 1829, Gen. Barradas, with an army of 3,000 men, landed near Tampico, Santa-Anna, without awaiting orders from Mexico, marched against the enemy, whom he defeated on 29 Aug., and 10 Sept., and after the third engagement on the next day. He was promoted major-general, but retired to his estate, where he began to intrigue against the new president, Bustamante. On 2 Jan., 1832, he pronounced in open revolt at Vera Cruz, and after finally defeating Bustamante on 12 Nov., 1832, at Casas Blancas, he was elected president, but withdrew to his country place, leaving the vice-president, Valentin Gomez Farias, in charge. He defeated several insurrections against the government, until in 1834 he headed a revolution to overthrow Gomez Farias, who was deposed by congress. 5 Jan., 1835. Gen. Barragan was appointed provisional president, as Santa-Anna persisted in his policy of leaving the responsibility of the government entirely to another, whom he could control. He now allied himself entirely with the reactionary party; the Federal system was abolished, and the governors of the former states, now provinces, were made dependent on the central government. This gave a pretext for the separation of Texas, and that province declared its independence. Immediately Santa-Anna abandoned his estate to take the field in person, and in February, 1836, passed the Rio Grande with 6,000 men. On 6 April he stormed the Alamo fort at San Antonio, killed its defenders, afterward massacred the garrison of Goliad, and for several weeks was victorious. But on 21 April he was surprised at San Jacinto, and totally routed by the Texan army under Gen. Samuel Houston. He fled, but was captured three days afterward, and was fortunate in escaping retaliation for his cruel execution of Texan troopers. He gave a written order to his second in command to pursue across the Rio Grande, and on 14 May signed a treaty with the provisional president of Texas, David G. Burnet, recognizing the independence of that state. He was a prisoner for eight months, but was finally sent by Gen. Houston to the United States, and released in February, 1837. On his return to Mexico he was coldly received and retired to his estate. When Vera Cruz was attacked by the French fleet on 27 Nov., 1838, Santa-Ana offered his services to the government, was appointed commander-in-chief, and prepared the city for resistance. Before daybreak of 5 Dec., a landing force of the French surprised his headquarters and captured his second in command, Gen. Arista, but he had time to escape, and, gathering his troops, he forced the French to reembark. Near the port he was wounded by a cannon-ball, and it was found necessary to amputate his left leg. By his valiant defence he regained his popularity, and when President Bustamante suppressed the revolution of Tamalipas, congress appointed Santa-Ana his substitute. Notwithstanding that his wound had not yet healed, he was transported to the capital, and took charge of the executive from 17 Feb., 1839, till 11 July, when he retired to his estate. He was afterward made general commander of the coast department, but conspired against Bustamante till the latter's government was overthrown, and Santa-Ana was appointed by the consulting junta provisional president, 10 Oct., 1841. From that date till 6 Dec., 1844, either as provisional or constitutional president, sometimes personally, sometimes through his substitutes, he exercised virtually a military dictatorship. In February, 1845, when by his death capital, the provisional president, Gen. Catalino, was arrested, Santa-Ana was impeached, his statue was demolished, and his portrait was burned by the mob. His troops abandoned him, and on his flight toward the coast he was arrested, 15 Jan., 1845, near Joco, and imprisoned in the fortress of Perote till the amnesty of May, when he retired to his old residence in the United States began, and after the unfortunate battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, a mutiny under Gen. Mariano Salas deposed President Paredes and recalled Santa-Ana, who returned on 16 Aug., 1846, was appointed commander-in-chief, and became president in December; but leaving the vice-president, Gomez Farias, in charge, he went north, organized a new army, and met the invader. After a march, full of hardships, through the desert of Potosi, he attacked the American army under Gen. Zachary Taylor near the ranch of Buena Vista on 22 Feb., 1847. The battle continued the next day, but, as his cavalry could not operate in the narrow passes, and the American artillery occupied strong positions, he retired on the evening of the 23d with great losses. Hearing of the overthrow of Gomez Farias, he hastened to the capital, and occupied the executive on 21 March; but when Vera Cruz was taken by Gen. Winfield Scott, he left Gen. Anaya in charge, and took command of the forces in the state of Vera Cruz. He established his head-quarters in Sisal, which he rejoiced to see occupied by American troops on 17 April, and totally defeated on the 18th. With the fragments of his army he retreated to Mexico, where he adopted stringent measures against his opponents, established a severe censorship of the press, and organized an army to defend the capital against the advancing American forces. He collected 20,000 men, for the greater part militia, and after the vanguard under Gen. Valdavia had been routed at Contrales on 18 Aug., and Gen. Rincon at Charumbos on 20 Aug., an armistice was signed on the 24th. Hostilities began again on 7 Sept., Molino del Rey was stormed on the 8th and Chapultepec on the 13th, and on the 14th Mexico was occupied by the American army; Santa-Ana resigned the presidency and retired toward Puebla.

He tried to retrieve his reputation by besieging that city, but was defeated, and retired to Tehuacan, soliciting from Juarez, then governor of Oaxaca, permission to reside in that city, which was refused. When Tehuacan was captured by Gen. Lane, Santa-Ana barely escaped to the mountains, and from his estate obtained permission from the Mexican government and Gen. Scott to leave the country, sailing on 5 April, 1849, for Jamaica. In 1850 he established himself in Turabo, near Cartagena. In consequence of the revolution of 7 Feb., 1853, he was recalled, arrived in Vera Cruz on 1 April, and on the 20th took possession of the executive, and, by his appointment as president for life, with the title of Most Serene Highness, and the power of nominating his successor. His rule soon became so despoti as that revolutions began everywhere, the principal one being that of Ayutla, directed by Gen. Juan Alvarez. After a severe struggle and many defeats, he abandoned the capital on 9 Aug., 1855, and on the 16th sailed for Havana, and thence to Cartagena. He lived afterward for some time in Venezuela, and finally in St. Thomas, whence he appeared, after the French intervention, in February, 1864, in Vera Cruz to offer his services to the regency. He was permitted to land only after signing a pledge not to interfere in politics; but from Havana, where he was seized by the law, he published a manifesto, exciting disturbances in his favor, and Gen. Bazaine ordered him to leave the country, sending him in the frigate "Colbert" to St. Thomas. Maximilian afterward made him grand marshal of the empire, but he rewarded the emperor by a conspiracy against him, and fled to St. Thomas again in 1865. In the following year he went to St. Peter's Island, and after the departure of Seward to raise an army to overthrow the empire, and even offered his services to Juarez; but no response was made. In June, 1867, he chartered the steamer "Virginiss," and appeared before Vera Cruz, which was still occupied by the imperialists, to raise the banner of revolution; but he was detained by the U. S. squadron of observation, and on the surrender of Vera Cruz on 4 April, 1867, was permitted to sail for New York. He tried to effect a landing at Sisal, was captured by the blocking squadron, imprisoned at San Juan de Ulua, and sentenced by a court-martial to death, but was saved by his counsel, Alcalde, who represented his attempt as the ridiculous enterprise of a decrepit old man. He was detained under conditions of leaving the republic forever, and came to the United States, whence he fostered a revolutionary movement in Jalapa in 1870, headed by his son, Angel. After Juarez's death he took advantage of the amnesty that was given by Lerrdo de Tejada, returning to Mexico, and after his request for reinstatement on the army list and back-pay had been refused, he retired from the service, his services being obscured and almost forgotten by the misfortunes that his subsequent conduct had brought upon his country.

SANTACILLA, Pedro, Cuban author, b. in Santiago, Cuba, in 1829. At the age of seven years his parents took him to Spain, where he was educated. In 1847 he returned to his native land, and began his literary career on the staff of a newspaper. He was banished in 1851 on account of his liberal ideas, and in 1853 he came to New York. He went to Mexico in 1861, where he joined the Republicans in their struggle against the Conservatives and Imperialists. In 1863 he married one of the daughters of President Juarez, and filled several official posts in the republic. He has published "Instrucción sobre el cultivo del Tabaco" (1847); "Ensayos Literarios" (1848); "El Papa en el Siglo XIX" (New York, 1854); "El Arpa del Prospector" (1856); "El Llamado del Desierto" (1858); "Lecciones sobre la Historia de Cuba" (1859); a volume of "Fábulas y Alegorías" (Mexico, 1872); another volume of "Poemas," and other literary productions. Some of his works have been translated into English and French.

Sanchez was an Argentine soldier in the Paraguayan War of 1864-65, and in 1872, in the town of Salta, he wrote an account of his experiences.

After the defeat of the Paraguayan forces in 1870, he went to Europe to study law, and in 1872, he returned to Argentina, where he practiced law and served as a member of the National Congress. He was also a member of the Academy of Sciences and Literature of Buenos Aires.

Sanchez died in Buenos Aires on December 15, 1903, at the age of 81.

Sanchez's works contributed to the development of Argentine literature and were widely read during his lifetime.

SANTANA, Miguel, president of Chili, b. at Aguirro, in the department of Lima, Peru, in 1827.

He was educated at the University of Lima, and in 1848, he became a member of the Constituent Assembly of Peru. In 1850, he was elected to the National Congress, and in 1852, he was appointed minister of foreign relations.

Sanchez was known for his support of the liberal reforms and his opposition to the conservative forces in the country. He was also a supporter of the abolition of slavery and the promotion of education.

Sanchez died in Lima, Peru, on November 2, 1887, at the age of 59.

Sanchez's works contributed to the development of Peruvian literature and were widely read during his lifetime.

SANTANA, Pedro (san-tah-nah), president of Santo Domingo, b. in Hincina, 29 June, 1801; d. in the city of Santo Domingo, 14 June, 1864. He studied law, but was living quietly on his farm when, in 1843, he was elected to the National Congress.

He espoused the cause of the independent nations, and was appointed brigadier by the provisional government junta, and at the head of 2,400 men defeated the southern army of 15,000 men under Riviere Herrard, 19 March, 1844. On 12 July, 1844, he was proclaimed supreme chief, after vanquishing his rival, Juan Duarte (q. v.). In the following November Santana was elected constitutional president, receiving also the title of liberator of the country. During the four years of his administration he promoted agriculture and commerce, and sought to create financial resources. In 1848 the clerical party induced Soulouque (q. v.) to invade Dominican territory; but Santana was called to command the troops, defeated Soulouque, and, deposing President Jimenes, ruled as dictator till the election of Buenaventura Baz in October, 1852, as president. Three years later he was elected to the United States, which Baz defeated. Santana was re-elected president in 1853, and again defeated Soulouque's invasions in 1855 and 1856; but the credit of the government declined, and he resigned early in 1857. Baz was now recalled, but was driven from the island by a revolt in November, 1858, and Santana again assumed the executive. The internal struggles continued, and, despairing of his ability to preserve peace, Santana opened negotiations with Spain, and, on 18 March, 1861, the incorporation of Santo Domingo with the Spanish monarchy was proclaimed. Santana was commissioned lieutenant-general in the Spanish army, and received patents of nobility and vast sums of money, which he devoted to the building of a new capital and to the acquisition of territory to be made against him. He retired to his farm, and when the rebellion against the Spanish rule began he offered his services to the governor and marched to Azua, promptly quelling the insurrection; but, when the opposition became general, he retired again, and died of remorse shortly before the end of the Spanish rule. He was twice ennobled by the Spanish crown, and received many other decorations, many of which they call his treason, yet the majority recognize his unsullied motives and his thorough honesty while at the head of the government, and his undoubted bravery is acknowledged by all.

SANTANER, Francisco de Paula (san-tan-der), president of Colombia, b. in Rosario de Cuenca in 1792; d. in Bogota, 5 May, 1840. He started his public career as a lawyer, and was about to be graduated in law, when the news arrived of the declaration of independence in Caracas in 1810, followed by the revolution in Cartagena. Santana immediately took part in the patriotic movement, and was appointed secretary of the military commander of Maracaibo. In 1811 he joined the Federal forces under Baraya, in the campaign against the Unitarian forces under Narino, and he was taken prisoner, 9 Jan., 1813. In February, 1813, he joined the forces under Bolivar, and during that year and 1814 kept up a guerilla warfare against the Spanish troops in the district of Cuenca. When New Granada was invaded by Morillo, he retired in 1816 with the remainder of his forces; then joined the rest of the dispersed patriot army under several chiefs. A meeting of all the independent leaders was held in Aracataca on 16 July, and Santana was elected commander-in-chief; but he was soon replaced by Gen. Paez (q. v.). Santana left the army of Apure in February, 1817, joined Bolivar's staff in April, and accompanied him in the campaign against Baraya and the unfortunate operations against Morillo in 1818. In August of that year he was promoted brigadier and commissioned by Bolivar to prepare a force for the campaign of 1819. He joined Bolivar in Guainalito in June of that year, and his vote principally decided the invasion of New Granada, in which he participated, being promoted general of division on the battle-field of Boyaca on 7 Aug. When Bolivar returned to Venezuela, 20 Sept., he appointed Santana vice-president of the state of Cundinamarca, and as such he sent troops to the south against the Spanish president of Quito. The congress of Quito elected Santana on 30 Aug., 1821, vice-president of the newly constituted republic of Colombia, and from December, 1821, until September, 1826, during Bolivar's absence in Quito and Peru, he was at the head of the executive, acting with prudence and ability, and exerting himself to forward re-encroishments to Bolivar. He was re-elected in the same year; but Bolivar's return he deposed through systematic opposition to the latter, showing himself in the convention of Ocaña, to which he was elected by the province of Bogota, to be a personal enemy of the liberator, under the pretext that the latter had tried to subvert the constitution for personal ambition. Santana was even charged with complicity in the attempt to murder Bolivar on 25 Sept., 1828, and he was condemned to death on 7 Nov., but his sentence was commuted to banishment. He travelled through England, France, and Germany, and while absent was elected president of the new republic of New Granada for the term of 1832–7. His administration was just and progressive, especially in fostering primary education. He introduced free public schools, founding colleges in the provinces, and dividing the republic into three university districts. He was elected to congress in 1835, re-elected in 1839, and died during the session of that body. He wrote a justification of his conduct under the title “Apuntamientos para los Memorias de Colombia y Nueva Granada” (Bogota, 1837).

SARAVIA, Francisco (sa-rah-ve-ah), Spanish missionary, b. in Rio Janeiro at the end of the 17th century; d. there in 1761. He was graduated in medicine at the University of Coimbra, made a fellow of the Royal academy of London, and on his return to Brazil practised in Rio Janeiro, where he became famous for his charity. He wrote “Portuguesa e America illustrada” (1756). A very strange story of Saravia is told by Sir Lowry, to show that the apostle St. Thomas visited Brazil, and began to decipher sundry inscriptions and symbolic characters that he had met in the mountains of Iquaquara in Minas Geraes (Rio Janeiro, 1758): “Polyantno Philotheosicon on Moral, Politico, Instruccion y Historica, a work on the education of youth (1758); and “Politico e Historico, Brazilien medicin historiae, on endemic and epidemic diseases and their treatment (1757).
SARGENT, James, inventor, b. in Chester, Vt., 1 Dec., 1824. He was educated in district schools and worked on a farm until he was eighteen years old. During the ensuing four years he was engaged in a woollen-factory, where he had special charge of the machinery. In 1848, having acquired proficiency in the art of making daguerreotypes, he travelled through the country engaged in that pursuit, but in 1852 he returned to New England and devoted himself to the manufacture and sale of an automatic apple-parer. The financial difficulties of 1857 compelled him to give up that business, and he became a partner in the Yale and Greenleaf lock company. Having a natural fondness for mechanics, he devoted himself at first to the study of the mechanism of locks, and acquired expertise as a lock-picker. Further investigation of the subject led him to invent a lock that was proof against professional skill, for which, in 1865, he received a patent. He then established himself in Rocheston, N. Y., where he continues to manufacture locks. One of the features of this lock was the introduction of a powerful magnet that held the parts sufficiently under control to prevent the use of a micrometer to measure motion or determine the relative positions of the unlocking devices. Subsequently he improved this lock by the introduction of an automatic mechanical device in lieu of the magnet. In 1873 he invented the two locks that bear his name, which were the first ever successfully used in this country, and are now largely used in banking establishments. Mr. Sargent has devised various styles of his locks for special uses, and from time to time has added improvements to the original patterns.

SARGENT, Nathan, b. in Putney, Vt., 5 May, 1791; d. in New York, 30 Oct., 1852. He was educated in his native town, admitted to the bar, and settled in Cathawa, Ala., in 1816, where he became county and probate judge. He removed to Buffalo, N. Y., in 1826, and to Philadelphia in 1830, where he established a Whig newspaper. He afterward became Washington correspondent of the "United States Gazette," and was widely known under his pen-name of "Oliver Oldschool." He was sergeant-at-arms of the U. S. house of representatives in 1849-51, register of the U. S. treasury in 1851-3, and commissioner of customs in 1861-7. For several subsequent years he was president of the Washington re-form-school. He published "Life of Henry Clay" (New York, 1844), and "Public Men and Events" (2 vols., 1857).

SARGENT, Paul Dudley, soldier, b. in Salem, Mass., in 1745; d. in Sullivan, Me., 28 Sept., 1828. His ancestor, William, came to this country from Gloucester, England, before 1678, and his father, Epes, was a colonel of militia before the Revolution, and a justice of the general session court for more than thirty years. He died in Gloucester, Mass., in 1762. Paul commanded a regiment at the siege of Boston, was wounded at Bunker Hill, commanded a brigade of militia at Harlem, White Plains, Trenton, and Princeton. After the war he was chief justice of the court of common pleas of Hancock county, Me., for many years, judge of probate, justice of the same, first representative to the general court, postmaster, and an overseer of Bowdoin.—His nephew, Winthrop, soldier, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 1 May, 1759; d. in New Orleans, 3 June, 1829, was graduated at Harvard, and in 1771 became captain of a ship belonging to his father, who was a merchant. In 1775 he entered the Revolutionary army, and was naval agent at Gloucester, 1 Jan., 1776, and captain of Gen. Henry Knox's regiment of artillery, 16 March, 1776, serving throughout the war, and taking part in the siege of Boston, the battles of Long Island, White Plains, Trenton, the Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth, attaining the rank of major. He became connected with the Ohio company in 1786, under Gen. Rufus Putnam, and was appointed surveyor of the Northwestern territory by congress. He was its secretary in 1787, and was its governor in 1788-1801. During the War of 1812 he was major-general, and was wounded in the expedition under Gen. Arthur St. Clair. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, and of the philosophical society, an original member of the Society of the Cincinnati as a delegate from Massachusetts, and published, with Benjamin R. Smith, "Papers Relative to Certain American Antiquities" (Philadelphia, 1796), and "Boston," a poem (Boston, 1803).—Winthrop's great-nephew, Fitzwilliam, physician, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 17 May, 1820, was graduated at Jefferson college in 1839, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1843. He became surgeon to the White hospital, Philadelphia, in 1844-51. At the latter date he removed to Switzerland, where he has since resided. He has published "Bandaging and other Operations of Minor Surgery" (Philadelphia, 1848; with additions on military surgery, 1852), and edited Robert Druitt's "Principles and Practice of Minor Surgery" (Philadelphia, 1858); and James Miller's "Principles of Surgery" (1856).—His son, John Sinzger, artist, b. in Florence, Italy, in 1856, studied under Carolus Duran, and his professional life has been principally spent in Europe. In 1879 he received honorable mention at the salon, and in 1881 a medal of the 2nd class. He has exhibited in London, Paris, and New York portraits and genre paintings. Among his figures are "Fishing for Oysters" (1876); "Duchess of Devonshire Bathing" (1879); and "El Juleso" (1882). He is especially noted for his excellent portrait, among which are those of Carolus Duran and "Docteur Pezzu," "Portrait of a Young Lady," exhibited at the salon of 1881; a group of four young girls, "Hall of the Four Children" (1882); "Madame C.," at the salon of 1884; and "Mrs. Marquand" and "Mrs. Boit" at the Royal academy exhibition, 1888. See sketch of Sargent by Henry James, in "Harper's Magazine," 1887.

Sargent, Henry, artist, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 25 Nov., 1770; d. in Boston, Mass., 21 Feb., 1845, was the son of Daniel, a successful merchant of Boston. Henry early developed artistic tastes, and, after spending several years at Drummer academy, he was sent abroad, and studied under Benjamin West in London. He devoted himself to his profession on his return to Boston, and was successful and popular. He became adjutant-general of Massachusetts in 1814, and was subsequently aide to Gov. John Brooks and then to Gov. Bennington for an elevated railway. His best-known pictures are the "Dinner Party," "Christ's Entrance into Jerusalem," and the "Landing of the Pilgrims," which he presented to the Plymouth association.

His son, Henry Winthrop, horticulturist, b. in Boston, Mass., 26 Nov., 1810; d. in Fishkill-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., 10 Nov., 1882, was graduated at Harvard in 1830, studied law in Boston, and moved to New York city, but resigned his profession to become a partner in the banking-firm of Gracie and Sargent. He retired from business in 1839, purchased a tract on Hudson river in the midst of a native forest, and devoted himself to landscape-gardening. His home, Woodwicthe, became one of the most beautiful and instructive gardens in the United States. During a quarter of a century was among the most widely known and famous of American horticulturists. Mr. Sargent's publications include many articles to horticultural magazines; "Sketch Tours through England, Ireland, and Scotland" (New York, 1846); "Treatise on Landscape Gardening" (1855); and he added a full supplement to the 6th edition of Andrew J. Downing's "Landscape Gardening" (1859).

—Henry's brother, Lucius Manlius, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 June, 1816; d. in West Roxbury, Mass., 2 June, 1857, studied two years at Harvard, and studied law, but did not practise, devoting himself to literary pursuits, to philanthropic work, and to the temperance cause, for which he wrote and lectured for more than thirty years. His earliest publication was "Translations from the Minor Latin Poets" (Boston, 1847), which was followed by the original poems "Hubert and Helen, and other Verses" (1812); an "Ode" (1813); "Three Temperance Tales," that passed through 130 editions, and were translated into several languages (1818); "Deatings with the Devil" (1856); "Reminiscences of the Peace," and "Reprehensible Conduct" (1861). He contributed to the "Boston Transcript" for many years under the signature of "Sigma," and his writings were characterized by honesty of opinion and vigor of style. His papers on the coolie trade were subsequently collected and republished in England by the Reform association. His numerous poems were never printed in book-form. He married a sister of Horace Binney. See "Reminiscences of Lucius M. Sargent," by John H. Sheppard (Boston, 1869).

—Lucius Manlius's son, Horace Binney, soldier, b. in Quincy, Mass., 30 June, 1821, was graduated at Harvard in 1843, and at the law department there in 1845. At the opening of the civil war he was senior aide on the staff of Gen. John A. Andrew, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 1st regiment, Massachusetts cavalry, in 1861, became colonel of the same regiment in October, 1862, was on duty with the forces in South Carolina, in the Army of the Potomac and the Department of the Gulf, participating in the engagements of Secessionville, Culp's and Rapidan Station, and in the battles of Antietam, South Mountain, Chancellorsville, and in the Red River campaign under Gen. Banks, where he was wounded in action, 21 March, 1864, was brevetted brigadier-general for "gallantry and good conduct," and 29
Sept., 1864, was mustered out on account of wounds received in action. He has been a frequent contributor to periodical literature and the press, and has delivered numerous addresses. — Another son of Lucius Manlius, Lucius Manlius, soldier, b. in Boston, 15 Sept., 1826; d. near Bellefonte, Va., 9 Dec., 1864, was graduated at Harvard in 1848, and at the medical department there in 1857, becoming house surgeon and dispensary physician at the Massachusetts general hospital. He was commissioned surgeon in the 24th Massachusetts volunteer regiments in May, 1861, and became captain in October of that year, and became captain in the 1st Massachusetts cavalry, was ordered to the Army of the Potomac, and participated in the battles of Kelly's Ford, Antietam, South Mountain, Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville. He became major in his former regiment, 2 Jan., 1864, lieutenant-colonel, 30 Sept., and was mortally wounded in an engagement on Meherrin river.— John Osborne, lawyer, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 20 Sept., 1811, is the grandson of the first Lucius Manlius's first cousin. He was graduated at Harvard in 1839, where he founded the "Collegian," in which he was editor by his brother Epes, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and other students. He then studied law in Boston, was admitted to the bar in 1833, and in 1834-7 contributed the political articles to the "Pomona and the New York Atlas," in 1838 to 1848 became associate editor of the "Courier and Enquirer," and resigned after the election of President Harrison, resumed his profession of the law, taking charge, in 1848, as a volunteer for the Whig congressional committee, of the "Battery," a campaign paper published in Washington, to advocate Gen. Zachary Taylor's election. He subsequently founded the "Republic" with Alexander C. Bul- litt, in which he supported the compromise measures, conducting the paper on the principle of opposition to both the Abolition and Secession parties. He discontinued its publication at the close of President Fillmore's administration, and subsequently practised law in Washington and New York city. He resided abroad 1861-73, and some years latter date has lived in New York city. He declined the mission to China, which was offered him by President Fillmore. Mr. Sargent has done varied literary work, and his publications include a "Lecture on the Late Improvements in Steam Navigation and the Arts of Naval Warfare," with a biographical sketch of John Ericsson (New York, 1844), a version of Anastasius Grim's "Last Knight," founded on incidents in the life of the Emperor Maximilian (New York, 1872), three legal pamphlets reviewing "The Rule in Minor's Case" (New York, 1871), and four numbers of "Chapters for the Times, by a Berkshire Farmer," political (Lee, Mass., 1884).— John Osborne's brother, Epes, editor, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 37 Sept., 1814, in 1842 accompanied his father to Russia when a lad, and, after studying at the Boston Latin-school and at Harvard, attended a collegiate course, devoting himself to literature. His earliest productions appeared in the "Collegian," and he subsequently connected himself with the "Boston Daily Advertiser" and the "Atlas," and in 1847 was contributor of the "Mirror." He returned to Boston about 1846, and edited the "Evening Transcript" for several years, retiring from that charge to devote himself to editing a series of educational works. During his editorial career Mr. Sargent held pleasant relations with Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, William C. Preston, and Henry Clay, and Mr. Clay said that Mr. Sargent's "Memoir" of him was the best and most authentic in existence. While president of New York he was a member of the Union club, and a founder of the New York club. He was a laborious student and worker, and engaged with success in almost every branch of literature. He began to write for the stage in 1847, and produced the "Bride of Genoa," a poetical drama in five acts, which was played with success at the Tremont theatre, Boston, in February, 1857, and subsequently in New Orleans and New York. He produced "Valereau" the following November at the Tremont theatre, Ellen Tree taking the part of Isabelle. His plays, "Change Makes Change," a comedy, and the "Priestess," a tragedy, were successfully received in this country and abroad. His novels and tales for the young include "Wealth and Worth" (New York, 1843); "What's to Be Done, or the Will and the Way" (1841); "Fleetwood, or the Stain of a Birth" (1843); and "Peculiar, a Tale of the Great Transition," which pictures the social changes in the south during the early years of the civil war (1861). His poems include "Songs of the Sea" (Boston, 1847); a second volume of "Poems" (1858); "The Woman who Dared" (1863); and numerous fugitive poems, of which the most popular are "Life on the Ocean Wave," the lyric on the death of Warren, and the lines beginning "Oh, ye keen breezes from the salt Atlantic." His miscellaneous works are "The Life and Services of Henry Clay" (Auburn, 1843); with additions by Horace Greeley, 1852; "American Adventure by Land and Sea" (2 vols., Boston, 1847); "The Critic Criticised" (1856); "Arctic Adventures by Sea and Land" (1857; with additions, 1860); "Original Dialogues" (1861). He edited the lives of Campbell, Collins, Goldsmith, Gray, Hood, and Rogers, with the "American Poets" (Boston, 1859, 1865); "Selected Works of Benjamin Franklin," with his autobiography and a memoir (Philadelphia, 1853); the "Works of Horace and James Smith" (New York, 1857); and the "Modern Drama" (15 vols., 1846-58). Shortly before his death he completed a "Cyclopedia of English and American Poetry" (New York, 1863).— Lucius Manlius's great-nephew, Charles Sprague, a grammarian, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 April, 1841, was graduated at Harvard in 1862, became lieutenant and aide-de-camp of U. S. volunteers in November of that year, aide-de-camp in 1863, and was brevetted major of volunteers in 1865. He was chosen director of the botanic garden and Arnold arboriculture of Harvard in 1875, and professor of botanic in 1879. Prof. Sargent planned the largeキャンペーン of North American weeds in the American museum of natural history, New York city, in 1880. He was chairman of a commission to examine the Adirondack forests and devise measures for their preservation in 1885, and in 1888 became editor and general manager of "Garden and Forest," a weekly journal of horticulture and forestry. His publications include a "Catalogue of the Forest Trees of North America."
1500. He was the commander of the naval station in the Pacific in 1578, when Sir Francis Drake committed depredations on the coast of Peru and Mexico, and, in the belief that Drake would return by the Strait of Magellan, Sarmiento was ordered by the viceroy to take possession of that passage and intercept him. He left Callao with eleven vessels in 1579, and after vainly waiting for Drake, who had been sighted by the Cape of Good Hope, he explored the coast, and, after some encounters with the natives, returned to Spain in 1580. On his reporting the results of his expedition to Philip II, the latter resolved to fortify the strait, and sent, toward the end of 1581, an expedition of twenty-four vessels with 2,500 men from Cadiz, under command of the young and brave Diego de Valdez. The expedition was unfortunate, as eight vessels were lost in a storm, and Flores, on account of rivalry with Sarmiento, abandoned him with twelve vessels in the entry of the strait and returned to Spain. With only four vessels Sarmiento continued the voyage, arriving in January, 1583, at a favorable point, where he founded a fort and colony, which he called San Juan de la Frontera, and named it in honor of his friend and fellow voyager Francisco Pizarro. He left a garrison of 300 men, and sailed in 1584 for Europe, but was captured by an English fleet, carried to England, and kept a prisoner till 1588. Meanwhile his colony had dissolved and gradually perished of starvation, one of the survivors being rescued by Cavendish's fleet in 1587, and another by Mériché in 1589. After his liberation Sarmiento made a representation of his experience, and a complaint against Flores, to King Philip II, which was first printed in Madrid in 1598, and again in vol. xii. of the collection of American documents that has been in course of publication by the Spanish government since 1864. It seems that Sarmiento's complaint was neglected, for she died soon afterward in poverty and disgrace.

SARMIENTO DE SOTOY AYAR. García, Count de Salvatierra, viceroy of Mexico and Peru, b. in Spain about 1500; d. in Cartagena, Colombia, in 1655. He was sent to replace the Marquis de Villena, who had been deposed by royal order, on suspicion of favoring the independence of Portugal, and arrived in Mexico in 1642, receiving the viceroyalty after being elected by the Cortes. In 1644 he sent an unsuccessful expedition under Juan González Barriga to explore and colonize California. In the next year the city suffered by an inundation of the lagoons, and the viceroy ordered the cut of Nohchistango, which had been begun by Enrique Martínez, to be repaired. The city of Salvatierra (now in the state of Guanajuato) was founded in 1617, and in the same year the viceroy was obliged to interfere between Bishop Pañós and the Jesuits. In 1648 he was promoted viceroy of Peru, and, sailing from Acapulco, he entered Lima on 20 Sept. His government in Peru did not present any noteworthy features, and he delivered the executive to his successor, Count de Alva de Albe, on 24 Feb., 1655, dying, on his return voyage, in the same year.

SARMIENTO VALLADARES, José, Count de Montezuma, viceroy of Mexico, b. in Spain about 1650; d. there in 1717. Through his wife, a descendant of the Emperor Montezuma II, he inherited the title of Count de Montezuma and Tula, and in 1696 was appointed viceroy of Mexico, receiving the executive on 18 Dec., from the provisional viceroy, Juan de Ortega Montañés. During his administration the Jesuit Salvatierra set out on the first successful expedition to Lower California in 1697, and during the same year he quelled a riot that was caused by scarcity of corn.
In 1837 he also sent an unsuccessful expedition to expel the Danish from St. Thomas. When King Charles II. died in 1700, appointing the grandson of Louis XIV, his heir, the Count of Montecuma, who did not favor the house of Bourbon, solicited
his recall, and, as the new king, Philip V., feared Sarriento's partiality for the Austrian succession, the latter was ordered to deliver the executive again to Bishop Ortega, which he did on 4 Nov., 1701. On 23 Nov., 1704, Sarrasín was created Duke of Atlitxo and grandee of Spain.

SARRASIN, Michel, Canadian author, b. in France in 1639; d. 9 Sept., 1734. He resided at Quebec when Canada was a French dependency, and was a member of the superior council of the colony. He became physician to the king, keeper of the king's seal in 1733, and a member of the Academy of sciences of Paris. On his arrival the historian Charlevoix expressed surprise at finding so learned a man in the colony. Sarrasín contributed many articles to the publications of various learned societies, among others a "Description of the Castor," in the memoirs of the Academy of sciences (1704); "A Letter on the Mineral Waters of Cap de la Magellenine," in the memoirs of the society of the colony; in the Paris "Documents"; and a description of a plant which he had discovered and named "Sarracenia purpurea." The whole genre of which this is a species was named "Sarracena"
by Tournefort, in honor of Dr. Sarrasín.

SARTAIN, John, artist, b. in London, 24 learned to engrave in the line manner, in which style he produced several of the plates in Othway's
"Early Florentine School." In 1825 he began to practice mezzotints, and when he came to the United States in 1830 was one of the first to introduce that branch of engraving here. Subsequently he usually mingled both styles, with the addition of stippling. He has published that he had studied painting under John Varley and Henry Richter, and in Philadelphia he became the pupil of Joshua Shaw and Manuel J. de France. For about ten years after his arrival in this country he was also engaged in painting portraits in oil and miniatures on ivory. During the same time he found employment in making designs for bank-note vignettes, and also in drawing on wood for book-illustration. In 1843 he became proprietor and editor of "Campbell's Foreign Semi-Monthly Magaazine," and thereafter devoted himself entirely to engraving and to literary work. He had an interest at the same time in the "Eclectic Museum," for which, later, when John H. Agnew was alone in charge, he simply engraved the plates. In 1848 he purchased a one-half interest in the "Union Magaazine," a New York periodical, which was later transferred to Philadelphia. The name was changed to "Sartain's Union Magazine," and during the four years of its existence the journal became widely known.

During this period, besides his editorial work and the engravings that had to be made regularly for the periodicals with which he was connected, Sartain produced an enormous quantity of plates for book-illustration. The framing prints from his studio include "The County Election in Missouri," after Bingham (about 1854); Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gilmor, of Baltimore, two plates after Sir Thomas
Lawrence, and two after Paul Brown, after "Christ Rejected," after Benjamin West (1862);
Men of Progress, American Inventors" (1862); Zeisburger preaching to the Indians at Gose-shanik" (about 1862), and "The Iron-Worker and King Solomon" (1856), the last three after Christian Schussele; "John Knox and Mary, Queen of Scots," after Emmanuel Leutze; "Homestead of Henry Clay," after Hamilton; "Evangelists" and

"The Battle of Gettysburg" (1876-7), after Peter F. Rothermel. Since he came to Philad-epia, Mr. Sartain had taken an active interest in art matters there. He had held various offices in the Artists' fund society, the School of design for women, and the Pennsylvania academy, and had been actively connected with other educational institutions. He had visited Europe several times, and on the occasion of his second visit in 1862 he was elected a member of the society
"Art et Amicitie" in Amsterdam. In 1856 he had charge of the art department at the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia. In recognition of his services there, the king of Italy conferred on him
the title of cavaliere, and he had received also other decorations and medals. His architectural knowledge had been frequently called into requisition, and he had designed several monuments, notably that to Washington and Lafayette in Monument cemetery, Philadelphia, for which he also modelled the two medallion heads. His son, Samuel, engraver, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Oct., 1839, at the age of sixteen began to engrave under his father, and since his twenty-first year has been in business for himself. His prints include "Clear the Track," after
C. Schussele (1854); "Christ blessing Little Children," after Sir Charles Lockcke Eastlake (1861); "One of the Chosen," after Guy; "Christ stting the Tempest," after Hamilton; "The Song of the Angels," after Thomas Moran; "Evangelists," and various portraits after Thomas Sully. He is now, however, principally devoted himself to engraving portraits and other plates for books.
He holds offices in the Artists' fund society, the Franklin institute, and other art and scientific societies of Philadelphia. Another son, William,
b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 Nov., 1843, practised engraving under his father until about his twenty-fourth year, producing some very good plates, notably "Young America crushing Rebellion and Sedition" (1864) and "Little Samuel," after James Sant (1866). During 1867-'8 he studied under Christian Schussele and at the Pennsylvania academy. He then went to Europe, where he studied with Leon Bonnat and at the Ecole des beaux arts, in Paris. After an absence of eight years he returned to the United States in 1877, settling in New York, where he was elected an associate of the National academy in 1889. He was one of the original members of the Society of American artists, and is a member also of other art associations.
He received a silver medal in Boston in 1881, and honorable mention in Philadelphia in 1887. Mr.
Sartain paints both landscape and figure subjects.
Many of his pictures represent street scenes in Italy and Algiers. Among his works are "Tombs of the Saints, at Bouzareah" (1874); "Italian Boy's Head" and "Italian Girl's Head" (1876): "Narcissus"
SARTORI. Lewis Constant, naval officer, b. in Bloomsbury, N. J., 3 June, 1812; d. in Philadelphia, 11 Jan., 1890. He entered the navy, 2 Feb., 1829, was promoted to lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, and during the Mexican war was attached to the bombing squadron in 1846-7, and 1847-8. He was promoted to command, 7 April, 1861, and assigned to the steamer "Flag" on the South Atlantic blockade. He commanded the screw-of-war "Portsmouth" in the Western Gulf blockading squadron in 1863-5, and the steamer "Agawam," of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1865-6. He was promoted to captain and assigned to the North Pacific squadron in 1868-70, was brevet commodore, 12 Dec., 1873, and retired, 3 June, 1874.

SARTEWELL, Henry Parker, scientist, b. in Pittsfield, Mass., 18 April, 1782; d. in Penn Yan, N. Y., 15 Nov., 1867. After receiving a classical education, he began to practice medicine at nineteen years of age. He was a surgeon in the U.S. army during the second war with Great Britain, and subsequently settled in Bethel, Ontario co., N. Y., where he devoted himself to the study of botany. He removed to Penn Yan, N. Y., in 1839, where he continued to reside. His botanical labors extended over a period of forty-six years, and his collections of American plants are found in many herbariums in Europe and America. About 1846, he gave his entire attention to the study of the genus Carex, one of the most extensive and difficult of the vegetable kingdom. He then conceived the idea of gathering and grouping all the indigenous species of Carex in North America, which resulted in his publication of his work entitled "Flora Americana Septentrionalis Exsiccata," 4 vols., New York, 1856. The third part of this work, intended to include fifty new species, was begun, and more than forty species had already been collected for it, when he died. His herbarium, the labor of forty years, containing about 8,000 species, is now in Hamilton college, N. Y. Dr. Sartwell kept daily records of the weather for forty years previous to his death, which were published in Penn Yan, and sent to the Smithsonian institution. Hamilton college recognized his work by conferring upon him the degree of Ph. D., in 1864.

SASNETT, William Jacob, clergyman, b. in Hancock county, Ga., 29 April, 1829; d. in Montgomery, Ala., 5 Nov., 1865. He was graduated at Olelothos se university in 1859, and studied law, but abandoned it for the ministry, and rose to eminence. He was professor of English in Emory college, Ga., in 1849-57, president of Lagrange female college in 1858, and the next year became principal of East Alabama college in Auburn. He wrote and spoke constantly in favor of the higher education of women. He received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Alabama, and his publications include many magazine articles and "Discussions in Literature and Religion." (Nashville, Tenn., 1850), and "Progress" (1855).

SASOONAN, or ALLUMMAPEE ("one who is well wrapped up"), Indian chief, d. in the autumn of 1741. He was king of the Delawares as early as 1718, and in that year headed the delegation of Indian chiefs at Philadelphia and signed an absolute release to the proprietaries for lands "situate between Delaware and Susquehanna from Duck creek to the mountains on this side Lechaw," which lands had been granted by their ancestors to William Penn. In 1728 he removed to the Susquehanna. He was friendly to the whites, and an honest, well-meaning Indian of good natural sense.

SASSACUS, Pequot chief, b. near Groton, Conn., about 1590; d. in the Mohawk settlement in June, 1637. He was chief of the Pequot Indians, a brave warrior, and thought by the other tribes to be endowed with supernatural powers. He was, in consequence, the terror of the New England coast, and a dreaded foe to the settlers. His domain comprised the present towns of Wethersfield, Stonington, North Stonington, and Groton, and his tribe numbered 700 warriors, besides women and children. In 1637 they attacked a small English fort at Saybrook, murdered several women at Wethersfield, and carried two girls into captivity. The colonists then mustered all their able men, and, under command of John Mason (q. v.), attacked the Pequot fort on the Mystic river, 5 June, 1637. The colonists were advised by several Indian tribes, including the Narragansetts, who were so alarmed by the fact that Sassacus was in command of the Pequots that, when the hour of the attack came, they fell back in terror, exclaiming: "Sassacus in the fort! Sassacus in the fort! Sassacus all one god! Nobody can kill him! The whites were finally victorious, but the chief escaped to the Mohawks, by whom he was soon murdered.

SATTERLEE, Henry Yates, clergyman, b. in New York city, 11 Jan., 1843. He was graduated at Columbia in 1863, and at the General theological seminary, New York city, in 1866, was ordained deacon the same year in the Protestant Episcopal church, and priest in 1867. He was associate rector of the church at Albany's Falls, Dutchess co., N. Y., in 1867-83, became its rector at the latter date, and since 1882 has had charge of Calvary church, New York city. Union college gave him the degree of D. D., in 1882. In 1888 he declined the assistant bishopric of Ohio. Dr. Satterlee has been actively interested in the Episcopal church as the private and public missions and temperance movements, and in the home and foreign missionary work of the Protestant Episcopal church. He has published serial articles in the magazines, and several sermons, and manuals of religious instruction. —His cousin, Walter, artist, atonement. "Autumn," "Town Cranes," and "Fortune by Tea-Leaves" (1886); and the water-colors "Solitary" and "Old Bullards" (1878); and "Two Sides of a Convent-Wall" (1884); and "The Fortune-Teller," "The Net-Mender," and "The Lightened Load" (1887). His pencil has been frequently employed in book-illustration, and he is well known as a teacher.

SAUNDERS, Alvin, senior, b. in Fleming county, Ky., 12 July, 1817; d. in Omaha, Neb., 1 Nov., 1899. His family were Virginians. He went with his father to Illinois in 1829, and attended school in the intervals of farm-work. He removed in 1836 to Mount Pleasant, in that part of Wisconsin territory that is now Iowa, and was postmaster there for seven years. At the same time he studied law; but, instead of practising, he engaged in business as a merchant and banker. Mr. Saunders was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of Iowa in 1846, and a state senator for eight years. He sat in the first Republican convention in the state, and in the National conventions of 1860 and 1868, was a commissioner to organize the territory of Montana and served as governor of Nebraska territory from 1861 till its admission into the Union in 1867. During his term of office the population of the iberian of the Astor library, of which, since 1876, he has been librarian. Madison university gave him the degree of M.A. in 1853. He has been a frequent contributor to magazines and reviews, and has published "Memoirs of the Great Metropolis, or London from the Tower to the Crystal Palace" (New York, 1857); "New York in a Nutshell" (1858); "Salut for the Solitary, by an Epicure" (1853), and "Salut for the Social" (1856), of which many editions appeared in New York and London, and which were reissued in one volume, illustrated (New York, 1872: new ed., 1883); "Pearls of Thought, Religious and Philosophical; Gathered from Old Authors" (1848); "Modern College" (1860); "Art, Women, Love, and Marriage" (1868); "Evenings with the Sacred Poets" (1869): revised and enlarged, 1885); "Pastime Papers" (1885); and "Story of Some Famous Books" (London, 1887), in "The Book-Lover's Library." Most of his books were published both in New York and in London, and ran through numerous editions. He has also edited "Our National Centennial Jubilee" (1876), and, with Henry T. Tuckerman, "Homes of American Authors" (1853).

SAUNDERS, John, jurist, b. in Virginia in 1754: d. in Fredericksburg, New Brunswick, in 1834. His grandfather emigrated to Virginia from England, and acquired large landed estates. John received a liberal education, and in the latter half of 1775 raised a troop of horse at his own expense, and joined the royal forces. His was subsequently captain of cavalry in the Queen's rangers, was often in engagements, and was twice wounded. At the peace he went to England, became a member of the Middle Temple, and practised law. In 1790 he became a judge of the supreme court of New Brunswick, and was appointed a member of the council of that colony. In 1822 he became chief justice. Judge Saunders possessed two estates in Virginia, both of which were confiscated.

—His only son, John Simcoe, held the offices of advocate-general, justice of the court of judicature, and member of the council, and at his death was secretary of the province.

SAUNDERS, Prince, attorney-general of Hayti, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1753: d. in Hayti, 12 Feb., 1840. He was of African descent, and, after receiving an excellent education and teaching in free colored schools in Colchester, Conn., and Boston, Mass., emigrated to Hayti in 1807. Here he was employed at once by Henry Christophe to improve the state of education in the island, and sent to England to procure teachers, books, and apparatus. In that country his first name was mistaken for a title, and as he took no pains to correct this misapprehension he received much attention, and was a guest at many great houses. At that of Sir Joseph Banks, president of the Royal society, "everybody," says Charles R. Leslie in his "Recollections" (London, 1843), "was pleased to bow down to Highness. I got near to hear what passed in his circle, and a gentleman, with a star and ribbon, said to him: 'What surprises me is that you speak English so well.' Saunders, who had never spoken any other language in his life, bowed and smiled, acceptance of the compliment. The result of this mission was not satisfactory to Christophe, and immediately after its close Saunders returned from Hayti to the United States, where he studied divinity, and preached for some time in Philadelphia. A few years later he went again to Hayti, where he was made attorney-general, which office he held at his death. He was the author of the Haytian criminal code, and published "Documents Relative to the Kingdom of Hayti, with a Preface" (London, 1816); "Memoir on Slavery" (Philadelphia, 1818); "Address on Education" (1819); and "Haytian Papers" (Boston, 1818).

SAUNDERS, Romuald Mitchell, statesman, b. in Caswell county, N.C., 5 March, 1791; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 21 April, 1867. His uncle, James Saunders, represented Orange county in the Provincial congress of North Carolina which met at Hallifax, 4 April, 1776, and also in the congress held at the same place, 12 Nov., 1776, and was appointed colonel of the northern regiment of his county. James's younger brother, William, the father of Romuald, was an officer in the North Carolina line. The son was educated at the University of North Carolina, studied law in Tennesse, and was admitted to practice in that state in 1812, having been adopted by his uncle James on the death of his father. He returned to North Carolina and was elected to the house of commons from Caswell county from 1815 till 1829, serving as speaker of the house in 1819 and 1820. In 1821 he was elected as a Democrat to congress, where he served five terms in 1829 he was chosen attorney-general of the state. In 1833 he was appointed by President Jackson one of the board of commissioners to decide and allot the amounts that were due citizens of the United States for injuries by France, as settled by the treaty of 4 July, 1831. In 1837 he was elected by the legislature judge of the superior courts, which post he resigned in 1840 to become the candidate of the Democratic party for governor, but he was defeated by John Moorehead. In 1844 he was again elected to congress, and in the Democratic national convention of that year he introduced the celebrated two-third rule, by which the votes of two thirds of all the members of the convention were made necessary for a nomination. The adoption of this rule resulted in the defeat of Martin Van Buren for the nomination and the selection of James K. Polk. He continued in congress until 1845, when he was appointed minister to Spain. He was specially directed by President Polk to negotiate for the purchase of Cuba, and was authorized to offer $100,000,000 for that island. He returned home in October, 1849, and was elected to the house of commons from Wake county in 1850, where he was earnest in securing the construction of the North Carolina railroad, in the reconstruction of the Raleigh and Gaston railroad, and in the development of internal improvements by the state. He was elected judge of the superior courts in 1851, and one of the commissioners to revise and codify the laws of the state. He served as judge until 1863, when he was deposed by Gov. William W. Holden.

SAUVIER, Bandin (so-vyer), Flemish naturalist, b. in Ypres in 1779; d. in Brussels in 1832. He enlisted early in the French army, served in the West Indies, and afterward went to New Orleans, where he became a wealthy merchant and devoted his leisure to the study of natural history and geology. Declining health and heavy losses in business decided him to return to Europe, and he fixed his residence in a suburb of Brussels. His works include "Carte geologique du delta du Mississipi" (Brussels, 1827); "Voyages scientifiques dans les bassins du Mississipi et de l'Arkansas" (1828); and "Etudes critiques sur les formations geologiques dans la vallee du Mississipi" (1829).

SAVAGE, Edward, Jr., painter, was born in Orange, Mass., 26 Nov., 1761; d. there, 6 July, 1817. He was originally a goldsmith, but later turned his attention to portrait-painting. Washington sat to him several times, and in 1789-90 Savage painted his portrait for Harvard. He produced also the well-known "Family Group at Mount Vernon." This was for a long time exhibited in the museum that Savage established in New York, and is now owned by William P. Hazeneyer. His portraits of Washington and Henry Knox were frequently engrailed by the artist himself and by others.

SAVAGE, Edward Hartwell, physician, b. in Alstead, N. H., 18 May, 1812. He received a public-school education, and since 1834 has served as a member of the police force in Boston, Mass., being chief of police in 1840-8. Since 1861 he has been justice of the peace for Suffolk county, Mass. He has published "Boston Police Recollections, or Boston by Daylight and Gaslight" (Boston, 1860), and "Five Thousand Boston Events from 1630 to 1860" (1884).

SAVAGE, James, antiquary, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 July, 1784; d. there, 8 March, 1873. He was descended from Maj. Thomas Savage, who came to Massachusetts from England in 1635. After graduating at Harvard in 1803 he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1817, and served in both houses of the legislature. He was also a member of the executive council, and a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1820, filled several municipal offices, and was a member of the school committee. He was the founder of Provident institution for savings, the first savings bank in Boston, and the second in the United States, of which he was also secretary, treasurer, vice-president, and president, and for nineteen years he was treasurer of the Massachusetts Historical Society, of which he was also president, and edited several of its collections. Thackray was much impressed by his sturdy individuality, and remarked to a friend: "I want to see that quaint, charming old Mr. Savage again." Edw. P. Whipple calls him "the soul of integrity," and says: "It is curious that James Savage, the most eloquent of men when his soul was stirred to its depths, should now be particularly honored merely as an acute antiquarian..." His hatred of iniquity sometimes blazed out in a fury of wrathful eloquence which amazed those who specially esteemed him as a prodigy of genealogical knowledge, and even disturbed the equilibrium of those who chiefly knew him as the most valued and trusted of friends." Harvard gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1841. For five years Mr. Savage was an associate editor of the "Monthly Anthology," which was founded in Boston in 1803 and continued until 1811, preparing the way for the "North American Review." The discovery of the missing manuscript of John Winthrop's journal in the tower of the Old South church, Boston, in 1836, led Mr. Savage to transcribe and annotate the original manuscripts, which he published under the title of "John Winthrop's History of New England from 1630 to 1646, with Notes to illustrate the Civil and Ecclesiastical Concerns, the Geography, Settlement, and Institutions of the Country, and the Lives and Manners of the Ancient Planters" (2 vols., Boston, 1825–76; 2d ed., with corrections, 1855). The first volume of Winthrop's "Journal" had been published from the family manuscripts (Hartford, 1799). In addition to numerous genealogical, historical, political, and controversial pamphlets, he edited William Paley's works (5 vols., Cambridge, 1828; new ed., 1839), and prepared a "Genealogical Dictionary of the First Settlers of New England, showing Three Generations of Those who came before May, 1620" (4 vols., Boston, 1860–4). This work, which occupied him several years, and which displays extraordinary industry and research, has been called "the most stupendous work on genealogy ever completed." He delivered the Fourth-of-July oration in Boston in 1811, and an address on the constitution of Massachusetts on 29 Jan., 1832, both of which were published.

SAVAGE, John, jurist, b. in New York in 1779; d. in Utica, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1863. After graduation at Union in 1799 he studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised his profession. In 1814 he was a member of the state assembly, and he was then elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Dec., 1815, till 3 March, 1819, after which he became U. S. district attorney. He was state comptroller from 12 Feb., 1821, till 13 Feb., 1823, and served as representative in congress from 1823 till 1827, and U. S. assistant treasurer in New York. He was a presidential elector on the Polk and Dallas ticket in 1845. Union gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1829.

SAVAGE, John, journalist, b. in Dublin, 13 Dec., 1828; d. in Spragueville, Pa., 9 Oct., 1888. He was editor and publisher; he was a student in the art-school of the Royal Dublin society. He was also active in revolutionary clubs, established two journals that were suppressed by the British government, and afterward organized and led armed peasants in the south of Ireland. When the cause was lost, he escaped to New York in 1849, and became a proof-reader for the New York Tribune. Afterward he was literary editor of "The Citizen," wrote for the "Democratic Review," and for the "Savannah Daily Times." In 1857 he removed to Washington, where he was chief writer for "The States," the organ of Stephen A. Douglas, of which paper he became the proprietor. He was active in organizing the Irish brigade and the Irish legion for the National army during the civil war, and served in the 9th New York regiment. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by St. John's college, Fordham, N. Y., in 1875.

Mr. Savage wrote several popular war-songs, including "The Starry Flag" and "The Muster of the North." He is the author of "Lays of the Fatherland" (New York, 1850) ; 28 and 48: the Modern Revolutionary History and Literature of Ireland" (1857); "Our Living Representative Men" (Philadelphia, 1868); "Savannah" (New York, 1863); "Campaign Life of Andrew Johnson" (1864); "Life and Public Services of Andrew Johnson" (1866); "Fenian Heroes and Martyrs" (Boston, 1868); "Poems: Lyric, Dramatic, and Romantic" (1870); "Pictureque Ireland" (1878–9); and several plays, including "The Puritan," which was produced in 1858 (1845); "Waiting for a Wife," a comedy (1859); and "Eva, a Goblin Romance" (1865).

SAVAGE, John Houston, lawyer, b. in McMinnville, Warren co., Tenn., 9 Oct., 1815. He received a public-school education, and before he was of age served as a private under Gen. Edmund P. Gaines on the Texas frontier, and also for six months against the Seminoles in Florida. Afterward he studied law, and began to practise in Smithville, Tenn. He was made colonel of Tennessee militia, and in 1841–7 was attorney-general of the 4th district of his state. In 1844 he was an elector on the Polk ticket. In 1847 he was appointed major of the 14th infantry, U. S. army, and served in the Mexican war, being wounded at Chapultepec, was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 11th infantry, and, after the death of Col. William M. Graham, commanded this regiment until the close of the war. On returning to Tennessee he resumed the practice of law, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1853, again from 3 Dec., 1853, to 3 March, 1859, being a member of the committee on military affairs. During the civil war he was colonel of the 16th Tennessee Confederate infantry, and was wounded at Perryville and at Murfreesboro'. He served in the legislature of Tennessee in 1857, 1859, and 1859, and now (1898) practices law in McMinnville.

SAVAGE, Minot Judson, clergyman, b. in Norridgewock, Me., 10 June, 1841. He was educated at Bowdoin, graduated at Bangor theological seminary in 1864, and became a Congregational missionary in California. He was pastor of churches in Framingham, Mass., in 1867, and Hannibal, Mo., in 1869. In 1873 he had charge of a Unitarian church in New York, and from 1874 he has been pastor of the "Church of the Unity" in Boston. Among his publications are "Christianity, the Science of Manhood" (Boston, 1873); "The Religion of Evolution" (1876); "Blinfton, a Story of To-day" (1878); "Life Questions" (1879); "The Morals of Evolution" (1880); "Belief in God" (1881); "Beliefs about Man" (1882); "Poems" (1882); "Religions and Labor" (1883); "The Sphinx" (1883); "The Religious Life" (1886); "Social Problems" (1886); and "My Creed" (1887).

SAWTELLE, Charles Greene, soldier, b. in Norridgewock, Me., 10 May, 1834. His father, Cullen Sawtelle, was a member of congress in 1845–7 and 1849–51. After graduation at the U. S. military academy in 1854, he served in several Kansas border disturbances, in the Utah expedition in 1858, and on garrison duty in California in 1859–60. On 17 May, 1861, he became captain of the staff and assistant quartermaster. He superintended the forwarding of troops and supplies for the Army of the Potomac until 17 Aug., 1862, and the embarkation during the Maryland campaign. He was chief quartermaster of the 2d corps in the Rappahannock campaign, and engaged on Gen. Stoneman's raid toward Richmond in May, 1863. From 21 June till 6 Aug., 1863, he was assistant chief quartermaster of the Army of the Potomac, and forwarded supplies from Washington and Alexandria, Va., for the Pennsylvania campaign. He was chief quartermaster of the cavalry corps of the army of the Potomac from 15 Dec. till 15 Feb., 1864, and then was transferred to Brownsville, Tex., and was in charge of the transports and supplies for Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks' army on its return from Red river, which he met at Atachafala. He constructed a bridge of 900 feet across the river, using 21 steamers as pontoons. From 19 May till 6 June, 1864, he was in charge of steam transportation in the Department of the Gulf, and was chief quartermaster in the military division of west Mississippi, from 6 June, 1864, till 2 July, 1865. He received the brevets of major, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general, U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865. In 1881 he attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and served in the quartermaster's departments of the Columbia and of the South, and of the military divisions of the Atlantic and of the East. In 1894 he became colonel, in 1896 quartermaster-general, and was retired in 1898.

SAWTELLE, Henry Allen, clergyman, b. in Sidney, Me., 11 Dec., 1832; d. in Waterville, Me., 22 Nov., 1885. His early years were spent on a farm. He was graduated at Colby university in 1854, and at Newton theological institution in 1858, after which he was ordained minister of the church at Limerick, Me., but in 1859 he went as a missionary to China, remaining there until 1861, when he resigned, owing to impaired health. From 1862 till 1874 he was pastor of Baptist churches in San Francisco, editing there the "Evangel" and the "Spare Hour." Subsequently he had charges in Chelsea, Mass., and Kalamazoo, Mich. Hilliside college, Mehling, gave him the degree of D. D. in 1874. Dr. Sawtelle contributed to the "Bibliotheca Sacra" and the "Baptist Quarterly," and was the author of "Things to Think of" (San Francisco, 1873).

SAWYER, Frederick Adolphus, senator, b. in Boston, Mass., 12 Dec., 1822; d. in Sewance, Tenn., 31 July, 1894. After teaching for several winters he was graduated at Harvard in 1844, and continued to read law in Vermont, Maine, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire till 1850, when he took charge of the normal school in Charleston, S. C. He passed through the lines to the National forces in 1864, and, going to New England, made many speeches in advocacy of the re-election of President Lincoln. In February, 1865, he went to Charleston again and took an active part in the reconstruction of South Carolina. He was appointed, on 30 May, collector of internal revenue for the 2d district of South Carolina—the first civil appointment in the state after the war—was elected to the State constitutional convention, but was unable to take his seat, and afterward chosen to the U. S. senate for the term that ended in 1873. In that body he served on the committees on private land claims, education in the District of Columbia, pensions, and appropriations. Mr. Sawyer was one of the leaders in opposition to the re-election of Gov. Franklin J. Moses. On 10 March, 1873, he became assistant secretary of the treasury, which office he held till June, 1874. From that time till 1880 he was engaged in private business, being also connected with the law. In 1880 he was appointed private secretary to President Grant; he was a special agent of the war department till 1887, and since that time he had conducted a preparatory school in Ithaca, N. Y.

SAWYER, Frederick William, author, b. in Saaco, Me., 22 April, 1810; d. in Boston, Mass., 6 Sept., 1873. He removed to Boston in June, 1838, where he began to practise law in 1840, and established the Sawyer's bank. He has published "Merchant's and Shipmaster's Guide" (1840); "Plea for Amusements" (1847); and "Hits at American Whims," which had previously appeared in the Boston "Transcript," under the signatures of "Carl" and "Cantu Carl." (1860).

SAWYER, Horace Bucklin, naval officer, b. in Burlington, Vt., 22 Feb., 1797; d. in Washington, D. C., 9 Jan., 1852. He was educated at Flatbush academy, Long Island, N. Y., studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but, instead of practising, devoted himself to politics. He served in the legislature in 1800–1, having been chosen as a Democrat, was a presidential elector in 1804, and served in congress in 1807–13, 1817–23, and 1825–9. He was eccentric in his conduct, of dissipated habits, and negligent of hisgregated labors, yet he was elected repeatedly, often over powerful opponents. His prodigality and good-fellowship, though they made him many friends, brought him near to poverty in the closing years of his life. In 1850 he removed to Washington, where he was a clerk in one of the departments till his death. He published a "Life of John Randolph" (New York, 1844), and an "Autobiography" (1844), and was also the author of several plays.

SAWYER, Philetus, senator, b. in Whiting, Vt., 22 Sept., 1810. When he was a year old his father, who was a farmer and blacksmith, removed to Essex county, N. Y., where the son's youth was spent in manual labor and in attending the common schools at intervals. At seventeen years of age, by an arrangement with his father, he became the master of his own time, and in 1847, when he had saved about $2,000, he removed to Wisconsin. After two years of farming he went to Algoma (now part of Oshkosh) and engaged in the lumber business, in which he was very successful and won a reputation for integrity. He was chosen to the legislature in 1857 and 1861, served as mayor of Oshkosh in 1863-'4, and was a delegate to the Lawndale's convention of 1866. He was chosen to congress as a Republican in 1864, and served by successive terms from 1865 till 1868, during a renomination. In 1881 he was elected U. S. senator, and he was re-elected in 1887. He has been a delegate to the National Republican conventions of 1864, 1876, and 1880. In the lower house of congress Mr. Sawyer served for some time as chairman of the committee on the Pacific railroad, and as a member of the committees on commerce and navigation he has been influential there and in the senate he has been known as a valuable working member, but he seldom takes the floor. He has given $12,000 toward a building for the Young men's Christian association in Oshkosh, and contributed liberally to other religious, benevolent, and educational enterprises.

SAYWERS, Sylvanus, inventor, b. in Templeton, Mass., 25 Oct., 1805. His father was a mill-owner and lumberman, and from childhood the son showed great mechanical ingenuity. While he was a lad he invented a reed-organ that embodied many of the features of those that are now in use. From about his twelfth till his twenty-first year he led a busy farm life and copied himself largely with carpenter's and smith's tools. In 1829 he went to Augusta, Me., with a view of working with his brother-in-law, a gunsmith, and, though his health soon forced him to return, he gained knowledge that enabled him to repair fire-arms and do much similar work, in which he engaged till his majority. During this time he also made several inventions, including the daylight clock, the portable camera to be operated by foot-power. He went to Boston about 1843, and, while working in a machine-shop there, invented a machine for preparing chair-cane from rattan. Thousands of dollars had been spent in vain attempts to construct such a machine, but Mr. Sawyer's was successful, and after it was patented, in Jan., 1851, he and his brother Joseph established a shop at East Templeton, where they manufactured chair-cane by its means. In the following December the American rattan company was formed to use their machine, and erected a large shop in Fitchburg, Mass. Mr. Sawyer devised several auxiliary machines, and, besides serving as director, was manager of the company's shops. His inventions have greatly revolutionized the chair-cane business, transferring it from southern India, China, and Holland to this country. In the summer of 1853 he invented improvements in rifled cannon projectiles, which were patented in 1855. These embrace the placing of a coating of lead or other soft metal on the rear and sides of the shell, which is expanded laterally by the discharge and prevents the "wounding" or passage of gas by the projectile, also filling the grooves of the rifling and obviating the use of helical projections; and the arrangement of a percussion-cap so as to insure the explosion of the shell on impact. In 1857-'8, with his brother Addison, Mr. Sawyer conducted experiments on his invention, at his own expense, for the benefit of the U. S. ordnance bureau, and after thorough tests it was approved, and the secretary of war announced that the practicability of rifled cannon and projectiles had at last been demonstrated. It was recommended that four field-guns be issued for practice, but before the order was carried into effect the civil war had begun. The 43-pounders (rifles) of Oshkosh batteries were mounted at Newport News and upon the Rip Raps (Fort Woods), the latter being the only guns there that could reach Sewell's Point battery, a distance of three and one-half miles, which they did with great accuracy, and made fearful havoc with the railroad-iron-clad batteries. An 18-pounder Sawyer rifle also did great execution on board the steamer "Fancy." Mr. Sawyer claims that he was treated unjustly by the ordinance officers during the civil war. Notwithstanding the report in his favor, his guns were not extensively adopted, but his improvements were incorporated in others that, he said, were infringements on his patents. He was advised by government officials to wait till the civil war had ended, and then to call attention of ordnance of the army and navy; but they both died shortly after its close, and nothing had been done in the matter. But he received several orders for guns directly from department commanders, to whom he furnished the first batteries of cast-steel rifled guns made in this country. He made other improvements in projectiles in 1861-'2, and in 1864-'5 built a shop for the manufacture of ordnance; but the close of the wars in this country and South America caused it to be turned to other uses. He took out patents on dividers and calipers in 1867, a steam-generator in 1868, a sole sewing-machine in 1876, and a centring watchmaker's lathe in 1882. He subsequently engaged in the manufacture of watchmaker's tools, but soon retired from business, and took much interest in agriculture. He had served as an alderman in Fitchburg.

SAYWERS, Thomas Jefferson, clergyman, b. in Reading, Va., 9 Jan., 1804; d. in Medford, Mass., 24 July, 1899. He was graduated at Middlebury, was pastor of a Universalist church in New York city, where he also edited the Christian Messenger. In the year 1872 he became a fellow of the liberal institute, Oneida county, where he also taught theology. In 1892 he returned to his charge in New York, but in 1891 he retired to a farm at Clinton, where he lived in retirement, declining the presidencies of St. Lawrence university, Canton, N. Y., Lombard university, Ill., and Tufts college, Mass., which he had been instrumental in founding in 1852. He was also active in establishing the theological school of St. Lawrence university in 1856. In 1862-'5 he edited the "Christian Ambassador," and then resided on a farm in New Jersey till 1899, when he became professor of theology in Tufts. Prof. Sawyer had defended the doctrines of Universalism in the press, and in public discussions. In his writings he denounced denominational literature, he has published in book-form "Letters to Rev. Stephen Remington in Review" of his "Lectures on Universalism" (New York, 1849); "Rev. Stephen E. F. Hall's Universalism as it Is" (1843); "Endless Punishment," and other discourses (1845); "Memoirs of Rev. Stephen R. Smith" (Boston, 1852); discussions with Rev. Isaac Westcott on "The Doctrine of Endless Misery" (New York, 1853) and "The Doctrine of Universal Salvation" (1854); "Who is Our God, the SAXE-WEILMAR-EISENACK, Carl Bernhard, Duke of, b. in Weimar in 1792; d. in Holland, 31 July, 1862. He entered the service of the king of the Netherlands, took part in the principal campaigns of 1806–15 against the French, and became lieutenant-general in 1831. In 1825 he obtained leave of absence, and sailed for this country in the royal sloop-of-war "Pallas." He visited all the principal cities of the United States and Canada, and on his return, published "North America, 1823–26" (Philadelphia, 1828).

In this work he shows himself to be an excellent and intelligent observer.

SAXTON, Joseph, mechanic, b. in Huntington, Pa., 22 March, 1799; d. in Washington, D. C., 26 Oct., 1873. He received a limited education, and was apprenticed to a watchmaker, after which he constructed a printing-press, and published a small newspaper at irregular intervals. In 1817 he went to Philadelphia, where he worked at his trade, and invented a machine for cutting the teeth of wheels, the outlines of which were true epicycloidal curves. Meanwhile he learned to draw with facility, and devoted some time to the study of engraving. He then became associated with Isaiah Lalkens, a celebrated printer of Philadelphia, and constructed an astronomical clock with compensating pendulum and an escapement on a new plan devised by himself. The town clock in the belfry of Independence Hall was also made by him about this time. In his ambition to obtain knowledge he became a member of the Franklin institute, and acquired reputation among its members for his ingenuity. In 1828 he visited England, and, being attracted to the Adelaide gallery of practical science in London, he constructed many ingenious mechanical toys for that institution. He also made numerous original investigations, met many celebrated engineers and mechanics, and was introduced by Michael Faraday to the meetings of the Royal institution. In 1833 he exhibited before the British association for the advancement of science a magnetoelectric machine, with which he showed a brilliant electric spark, decomposed water, exhibited the electric light between charcoal points, and gave a rapid series of intense shocks. During his residence in England he also invented the locomotive differential pulley, an apparatus for measuring the velocity of vessels, and a fountain-pen, supplied with a perfect metallic ruling-machine, an apparatus for tracing lines on metal by an exactly uniform minute distance from each other that shall represent by an engraving the design on the face of the medal. He was tendered the office of director of the printing machinery of the Bank of England, but declined this place in order to accept, in 1837, that of constructor and curator of the standard weighing and measuring apparatus of the U. S. meter in Philadelphia. During his connection with the mint he constructed the large standard balances that are used in the annual inspection of the assays and the verification of standard weights. In 1843 he was given charge of the construction of the standard balances, weights, and measures to be presented to each of the states for insuring uniformity of measurements and weights, and as director of the U. S. coast survey. He invented an automatic instrument for recording the height of the tides, and applied the reflecting pyrometer that had been previously invented to the construction of measuring rods that would retain their length while subjected to different temperatures. A deep-sea thermometer and an immersed hydrometer were among his later inventions. Mr. Saxton received from the Franklin institute in 1834 a medal for his

SAXTON, William, geographer, b. in Burlington, Vt., 2 June, 1816; d. in Albany, N. Y., 31 March, 1887. He entered Wesleyan university in 1835, but left in his freshman year, and was graduated at Middlebury in 1839. During the four years following he studied law in Bristol, Vt., and in St. Albans, Vt., where, in 1843, he was admitted to the bar. He practised with success in Franklin county for several years, becoming in 1850–51 state's attorney for Chittenango county, and in 1847–48 he was superintendent of common schools. His fondness for literature gradually led him into journalism, and in 1850 he purchased the "Burlington Sentinel," which he edited until 1856. Mr. Sax's served as attorney-general of Vermont in 1856, and for a time was deputy collector of customs. In 1859, and again in 1859, he was the unsuccessful Democratic nominee for governor. Settling in New York, he devoted himself to literature and lectured until 1872, when he moved to Albany, and became an editor of the "Evening Journal." In 1866 Middlebury gave him the degree of LL. D. Mr. Sax's achieved his greatest reputation by his poetry. As a young lawyer he sent his earliest verses to the "Kueckerboer," and in after years he contributed to "Harper's Magazine" and the "Atlantic Monthly." The "Rail," "The Briefless Barrister," "The Proud Miss McBride," and similar humorous poems, as well as his more serious "Jerry, the Miller," "I'm Growing Old," "The Old Church-Bell," and "Treasures in Heaven," were very popular. His published works include "Progress: a Satirical Poem" (New York, 1846); "Humorous and Satirical Poems" (Boston, 1850); "The Money King in All His Work-a-day Grace" (1859); "The Flying Dutchman, or the Wrath of Herr Von Stoppenhose" (New York, 1852); "Clever Stories of Many Nations rendered in Rhyme" (Boston, 1863); "The Times, the Telegraph, and other Poems" (London, 1865); "The Masquerade, and other Poems" (Boston, 1866); "Fables and Legends of Make-believe" (1872); and "Leisure-Day Rhymes" (1875). There have also been numerous collections of his poems.
reflecting pyrometer, and in 1851 was awarded a gold medal at the World’s fair in London for a large balance of extreme precision. In 1857 he was elected a member of the American philosophical society, and in 1863 became a charter member of the National academy of sciences. A sketch of his life was contributed by Joseph Henry to the first volume of the “Biographical Memoirs” of the latter body (Washington, 1877).

SAXTON, Luther Calvin, impostor, b. in Massachusetts in 1806; d. after 1866. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1825. In 1850 he published the “Fall of Troy and Corinth” (New York). He went to Rochester, N.Y., about 1800, and there interested Aristarchus Champian, an aged, wealthy, and somewhat eccentric man, in three schemes—the Union book company, with a capital of $5,000,000; an International bank, with a capital of many millions; and a vast manufacturing corporation. Only the book company was put into operation. Half the stock was to be in books, manuscripts, and copyrights, and of these Saxton professed to have a great supply. Champian furnished capital in the form of notes and mortgages to the amount of $81,475. Saxton established a magazine and visited Europe as the general agent of the company; but after a time Champian grew suspicious, and had him arrested for fraudulent practices, which were brought to trial, 8 Dec., 1863; convicted, sentenced to Auburn prison, 31 Dec., for three years, and served out his full term.

SAXTON, Rufus, soldier, b. in Greenfield, Mass., 19 Oct., 1824. He attended Deerfield academy, worked on a farm until his twelfth year, and afterward entering the U.S. military academy was graduated in 1848. He served the artillery as 1st lieutenant in 1853, and in 1853-4 led a surveying party across the Rocky mountains. In 1855-9 he was employed in the coast survey, and made improvements in the instruments for deep-sea sounding, one of which, a self-registering thermometet, bears his name. In 1859 he became an instructor at the U.S. military academy, was present at the opening of the civil war, was in 1861-2 a colonel of volunteers. For a short time after the retreat of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks from the Shenandoah, Gen. Saxton commanded at Harper’s Ferry, and successfully resisted an attack on his position by Confederate troops under Gen. Ewell. He was military governor of the Department of the South in 1862-5, and was appointed quartermaster with the rank of major in July, 1866. He was brevetted brigadier-general U.S. Army, 13 March, 1865, for faithful and meritorious services during the war, and promoted lieutenant-colonel and deputy quartermaster-general, 6 June, 1872, and colonel and assistant quartermaster-general, 10 March, 1882. From 1883 till 1888 he was in charge of the Jeffersonville depot at Louisville, Ky.

SAY, Thomas, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 Dec. 1799; d. there in 1876. His father, William Say, was an early Quaker colonist. The son was educated in the Friends’ school, and learned the saddler’s trade, but afterward became an apothecary. When a young man he supposed that he visited heaven in a trance. William Muntz published “The Visions of a Certain Thomas Say, of the City of Philadelphia, which he saw in a Trance” (Philadelphia, 1774), on the appearance of which Say printed in the “Pennsylvania Journal” of 2 March, 1774, the following notice: “Whereas a certain William Muntz has printed for sale, without my knowledge or consent, ‘The Vision of Thomas Say,’ which is but an incorrect and imperfect sketch of what I propose to make public. And as I never intended what I had wrote on that head to be published during my life, all persons are desired not to encourage the said Muntz in such wrong proceeding.” After his death his son, Dr. Benjamin Say, published an account of the vision in a “Short Account of the Extraordinary Life, Schemes, and Writings of Thomas Say, copied from his Manuscripts” (Philadelphia, 1796). He was a man of noted benevolence, a zealous promoter of education, and for many years was the treasurer of the Society for the instruction of blacks. He helped to found the Pennsylvania hospital, and was one of the founders of the House of employment.—His son, Benjamin, physician, b. in Philadelphia in 1796; d. there, 23 April, 1818, was educated in Quaker schools, and in 1789 received the degree of M.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He sympathized with the colonies during the Revolution, and in 1781 he was among those known as the “fighting Quakers,” who initiated the formation of the American anti-slavery society, which was brought to trial, March, 1783, convicted, sentenced to Auburn prison, 31 Dec., for three years, and served out his full term.

SAY, Thomas, naturalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 July, 1787; d. in New Harmony, Ind., 10 Oct. 1834, abandoned his pursuits and devoted himself to the study of natural history. In 1812 he was a founder of the Academy of natural sciences at Philadelphia, and in 1818 was a chief contributor to its journal. In 1818 Mr. Say took part in a scientific exploration of the islands and coasts of Georgia, visiting eastern Texas for the same purpose, but progress of the party to the interior was stopped by hostile Indians. In 1819-20 he accompanied the expedition under Maj. Stephen H. Long to the Rocky mountains as chief geologist, and in 1829 took part in that to the sources of St. Peter’s river. He removed to the New Harmony settlement with Robert Owen in 1825, and after their separation remained there as agent of the property. His principal work is “American Entomology” (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1834-38). His “American Conchology,” seven numbers of which were published at New Harmony, was incomplete at the time of his death. His discoveries of new species of insects were supposed to have been greater than had ever been made by a single individual before. He was a frequent contributor to the "Transactions" of the American philosophical society, the New York lycceum, "American Journal of Science," and many other publications. His complete writings on the entomology of the United States were edited by W.M. Thompson. Some of his various writings on entomology by Dr. John L. Le Conte, with a memoir by George Ord (New York, 1850).

SAYLER, Milton, congressman, b. in Lewisburg, Ohio, 4 Nov., 1831; d. 18 Nov., 1892. He was graduated at Miami university in 1852, and afterwards at Cincinnati law-school, and practised law at Cincinnati. He was a member of the legislature of Ohio in 1852-3, was elected to congress, and served by successive elections from 1 Dec., 1873, till 1880. He was chosen speaker of the house of representatives pro tempore, 24 June, 1876.

SAYLER, John, author, b. in Vernon, N. Y., 9 March, 1825; d. 22 May, 1897. His ancestor came to this country in the ship with Roger Williams, whose daughter he married. John was educated in his own town. He was admitted to the bar in Texas in 1844 and removed to Georgia. He taught there and in Texas, and, having studied law in the mean time, was admitted to the bar of Texas in 1846. He practised successfully at Brenham, and was a member of the legislature in 1853-5. When the civil war began he was made brigadier-general of the Texas militia, and he was subsequently on the staff of Gen. John Pope, Magruder. He was appointed special judge of the supreme court of Texas in 1851, and in 1850 became one of the law faculty of Baylor university. He published "A Treatise on the Practice in the District and Supreme Courts of Texas" (1858); "Treatise on the Civil Jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace in the State of Texas" (1857); "Treatise on the Principles of Pleading in Civil Actions in the Courts of Texas" (1872); "The Probate Laws of Texas" (1872); "Laws of Business and Form-Book" (1872); "Constitution of Texas, with Notes" (1872); "Notes on Texan Reports" (1874); "The Masonic Jurisprudence of Texas, with Forms for the Use of Lodges and the Grand Lodge" (1879); and "Revised Civil Statutes and Laws passed by the Legislature of Texas, with Notes and References" (1879). He died in 1897.

SAYRE, David Austen, philanthropist, b. in Bottle Hill, N. J., 12 March, 1793; d. in Lexington, Ky., 11 Sept., 1850. He removed in early life to Lexington, where he became a successful merchant and banker. Though repeatedly meeting with heavy losses, he gave about $500,000 to benevolent objects during his life-time, including $100,000 to found the Sayre institute,—a nephew of Lewis Albert, surgeon, b. in Bottle Hill (now Madison), N. J., 29 Feb., 1820, was graduated at Transylvania university Ky., in 1843, and at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1842. The office of prosector to Dr. Willard Parker, professor of surgery in that institution, was at once given to him, and he held it until 1832. He was appointed in 1853 surgeon to Bellevue hospital, and in 1859 surgeon to the Charity hospital on Blackwell's island, both of which posts he continued to hold until 1873, when he became consulting surgeon. Dr. Sayre advocated clinical practice in medical colleges, and was in 1861 among the first to suggest the establishment of Bellevue hospital medical college. On the formation of that college, he became professor of orthopedic surgery, and fractures and luxations, and later of clinical surgery, which chair he still (1888) holds. In 1844 he was appointed hospital surgeon of the 1st division of the New York state militia, but he resigned in 1846. Since 1850 he has been consulting surgeon to the Home for incurables in Westchester county, N. Y. From 1860 till 1866 he was resident physician of the city of New York, during which time he presented many papers to the board of health. Among these was one showing that cholera is a portable disease, if not a contagious one, and he advocated the rigid enforcement of quarantine regulations. In 1867 he was appointed by the American medical association a delegate to the International medical congress that convened in Philadelphia, and in 1877 he was sent by the same body as a delegate to the British medical association. On this occasion he was invited to give demonstrations of his mode of treatment of hip-joint and spinal diseases in the University college hospital, Guy's, St. Bartholomew's, St. Thomas's, and the Royal orthopedic hospital in London, also in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Cork. In 1879 he went as a delegate to the 6th International medical congress in Amsterdam, and before that body gave demonstrations of his plan of treatment for Pott's disease and lateral curvature of the spine. He attended several international medical congresses in London in 1881, Copenhagen in 1884, and in Washington in 1887, at each of which he read papers descriptive of his recent improvements in the treatment of the diseases of which he makes a specialty. Dr. Sayre's inventions include many surgical appliances, among which are a vulnutome, splints for extension of the hip, knee, and ankle joints in chronic dislocation, a flexible probe, improved tracheotomy-tube, bistre prong for removing foreign bodies from the esophagus, serral clump, club-foot shoe, new method for treating fractured clavicle, and the use of plaster of Paris in the treatment of spinal diseases and curvature. In 1872 he was made a knight of the order of Wasa by Charles XIV., king of Sweden and Norway, for his services to medical science. He is a member of numerous medical societies at home and abroad, and was one of the original members of the American medical association, of which he was vice-president in 1866, and president in 1886. His biography is exceedingly large, consisting chiefly of contributions to professional journals, and includes the books "Practical Manual of Orthopedic Surgery" (New York, 1869); "Lectures on Orthopedic Surgery and Diseases of the Joints" (1876), of which several editions have been issued and which have been re-published in Germany and France; and "Spinal Curvature and Its Treatment" (London, 1875).
neutrality. After leaving Berlin, Mr. Sayre went to Copenhagen, Stockholm, and St. Petersburg, and in each of those cities received ample supplies to support the cause of the independence of the United States. In 1793 he was an active opponent of Washington's administration.

SAYRES, Edward Smith, consul, b. in Marcus Hook, Pa., 6 Oct., 1769; d. in Philadelphia, 29 March, 1847. His father, Capt. John Smith, was a distinguished physician, who is mentioned by Dr. Benjamin Rush as being particularly skilful in the treatment of yellow fever during the epidemic of 1798. The son was educated at the University of Pennsylvania. He was appointed vice-consul of Brazil in 1814, of Portugal in 1830 of Sweden, and Norway in 1831; and in 1820 he was appointed a special consul for Brazil and, in 1872, honorary consul of Brazil for long and faithful services to the empire. He was at the time of his death dean of the consular corps at Philadelphia, and probably the oldest foreign consul in point of service in the United States.

SCADING, Henry, Canadian author, b. in Dunkeswell, Devonshire, England, 29 July, 1813. He was for ten years apothecary and his business was carried on by his son, who lived near York (now Toronto). He was educated at Upper Canada college, Toronto, and at St. John's college, Cambridge, England, where he graduated in 1871. In 1838 he was appointed to a classical tutelage in Upper Canada college, and in the same year he was ordained a priest of the Church of England in Canada. In 1847 he became rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity in Toronto, which post he resigned in 1857. He was also a canon of St. James's cathedral, Toronto. He has been president of the Canadian Institute, Toronto, and was awarded the confederation medal in 1855, in appreciation of his useful public labors as a man of letters, was president of the Pioneer association of Toronto, and received the degree of D.D. from Cambridge university in 1852. He edited the "Canadian Journal of Science, Literature, and History" in 1856-78, and published "Memorial of the Rev. William Honywood Ripley" (Toronto, 1849); "Shakespeare the Sear—the Interpreter" (1864); "Truth's Resurrection" (1865); "Christian Pantheism" (1865); "Toronto of Old" (1873); "The Far North" (1874); "A History of the Old French Fort at Toronto" (1887); brief memoirs of John Strachan, first bishop of Toronto (1868), and Henry Dundas and Sir George Yonge (1878); and numerous pamphlets and articles on the archaeology and history of Upper Canada, and other subjects. In his writings Dr. Scadding has principally aspired to the reputation of a local historian and canalist, and as such has done much valuable work.

SCALES, Alfred Moore, statesman, b. in Reeds- ville, N. C., 28 Nov., 1827; d. in Greenboro, N. C., 9 Nov., 1892. He was educated at the University of North Carolina, but was not graduated. He afterward taught for a time, then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1851, and in 1850 became solicitor of Rockingham county. He was a member of the lower house of the legislature in 1852, 1853, and 1856, and was then elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 7 Dec., 1857, till 3 March, 1859. He became clerk and master of the court of equity of Rockingham county in 1859, which office he held till the civil war. In 1860 he was a presidential elector on the Buchanan ticket, and at the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate army as a private. He was elected captain, subsequently promoted colonel, and then made brigadier-general. He took part in the battle of Williamsburg and in the engagements near Rich- mond, and, after Gen. Pender was wounded at the battle of Fredericksburg, took command of his brigade. He was severely wounded at Chancellorville and Gettysburg, and was present at most of the other battles till the close of the war. He resumed the practice of his profession after the war, was elected to the legislature of North Carolina in 1869-71, and served in congress by successive elections from 1874 till 1885. On 4 Nov., 1884, he was elected governor of North Carolina, and re-elected for the period that terminated in January, 1889.

SCALLAN, Thomas, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Wexford, Ireland, about 1770; d. in St. John, Newfoundland, 29 May, 1838. He studied theology in the Convent of St. Isidore, Rome, where he was ordained the 29th of May, 1799. After his ordination he was appointed professor of philosophy, in the Franciscan college. He returned to Ireland in 1794, and after teaching in the seminary of his order at Waterford went to Newfoundland in 1812, and, after serving in the diocese for a few years, returned again to his native country. In January, 1816, he was nominated coadjutor of Dr. Lambert, who died the following year, and shortly afterwards was appointed bishop of Drago, in parish, in Wexford, on 1 May. In 1817 he succeeded Dr. Lambert as vicar apostolic. During his administration the Roman Catholics of Newfoundland increased in numbers, wealth, and social standing. The island of Anticosti and that part of Labrador that is bounded by the northern part of St. John river were added to his vicariate in 1820. He was of a mild and tolerant disposition and an especial favorite with the Protestants of the island. He was accused of allowing his liberality to carry him too far in his desire to conciliate all religious denominations, and a formal censure was sent from Rome; but, as he was on his death-bed, it was not read to him.

SCAMMELL, Alexander, soldier, b. in Mendon (now Milford, Mass), probably in 1748; d. in Williams- burg, Va., 6 Oct., 1781. He was graduated at Harvard in 1769, and taught in Kingston and Plymouth, Mass. In 1771 he went to Portsmouth, N. H., and in the following year he was employed by the government in exploring and surveying land and timber for the royal navy, and in assisting to make surveys for the United States. He served on board a sloop-of-war to transmit despatches, plans, and reports to the plantation office in Great Britain. Later he studied law with John Sullivan in Durham, N. H., until 1775. On 14 Dec., 1774, he was of the force under John Sullivan, John Langdon, and others that captured William and Mary fort, Newcastle, and secured its arms and 96 barrels of powder; it was the first overt acts of the Revolution, which was declared treason by the royal governor. While Sullivan was a member of the Continental congress Scammell had charge of his legal affairs, which detained him from joining the army at Cambridge. When his preceptor was appointed major-general in the Revolutionary army, Scammell was made a brigade-major. On 10 Dec., 1776, he was given command of the 35 New Hampshire regiment, and he was transferred later to the 1st regiment. In 1777 his regiment was ordered to the northern army under Gen. Horatio Gates, in that campaign he was notably active, and was wounded at Saratoga, 5 Jan., 1778. He was appointed adjutant-general of the American army, and consequently became a member of Gen. Washington's military family. Preferring active command and the post of danger, in March, 1781, he was given command of a chosen regiment of light infantry, and on 30 Sept., at the siege of Yorktown, as officer of the day, while reconnoitring the enemy's position, he was captured by Russian dragoons, and wounded after his surrender. On request of Gen. Washington, Cornwallis permitted him to be taken to Williamsburg, where he died.

Mr. Scammon, born in Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 31, 1840, was the youngest son of the late Thomas Scammon, of Chicago, Ill., March 15, 1863.

He was educated at the high schools of his native city, and took the degree of B. A. at the Union College, New London, Conn., in 1861, and the degree of M. D. at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, in 1865.

He was an assistant surgeon in the United States volunteer army in the War of the Rebellion, and served in the Eighteenth Corps, Army of the Potomac, from 1861 to 1865.

He was appointed a lieutenant of topographical engineers, and was assistant professor of mathematics at West Point from 1857 till 1888, and of ethics from 1841 till 1846. He was aide-de-camp to Gen. Winfield Scott in Mexico in 1846-7, engaged on the survey of the northern lakes in 1847-54, and in 1853 became captain. In 1856 he was dismissed the army for "disobedience of orders.

He was then professor in Mount St. Mary's college, Iselin, N. J., and in 1866 in the polytechnic college in that city from 1859-61. He became colonel of the 23d Ohio regiment in June, 1861, served in western Virginia and Maryland, and was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers, Oct. 15, 1862, for gallant conduct at the battle of South Mountain, Md. He commanded the district of Kanawha from November, 1862, to March 1864, was a prisoner of war from the latter date till Aug. 3, and then led a separate brigade at Morristown, S. C. From November, 1864, to April, 1865, he was in charge of the district of Florida. He was U.S. consul in Prince Edward Island from 1866 till 1870, and afterward professor of mathematics and history in Seton Hall college, Orange, N. J. Another brother, Charles Mellor, was a captain in the Civil War; and another, Mr. W. C. Meigs, became a ship-captain and sailed to California in 1859. He engaged in the whale-fisheery and discovered the habitat of the gray whale in a bay on the coast of California, which was named Scammon Lagoon. At the beginning of the civil war in 1861 he became commander of a U.S. revenue cutter in San Francisco, and he was subsequently appointed lieutenant in that branch of the service, in which he still remains. He is the author of a work on "The Marine Mammals of the Northwestern Coast of America and the American Whale Fishery." (San Francisco, 1874).

Dr. Scannell, Richard, R. C., b. in County Cork, Ireland, Dec. 12, 1845. After completing a course of mathematics and classics in a college at Middleton, Cork, he entered the Foreign missionary college of All Hallows, Dublin, where he studied theology, and affiliated himself to the diocese of Nashville. He was ordained a priest early in 1851, and embarked immediately afterward for the United States. He was appointed assistant at the cathedral of Nashville after his arrival, then pastor of St. Columba’s church, East Nashville, and after a few years rector of the cathedral. He governed the diocese as administrator, during a vacancy in the see, from November, 1850, till June, 1851. In 1855 he organized the congregation of St. Joseph’s, in West Nashville, and on the creation of the diocese of Nashville, after the death of Mr. Clark, in 1857, was elected bishop. He was transferred in 1891 to Omaha.

SCARBOROUGH, John, P. E., bishop, b. in Castleton, in the north of Ireland, 25 April, 1831. On his father’s death in 1840 he came to the United States, and obtained his early education and training in Lancaster, N. Y. He was graduated at Trinity in 1854, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary in 1857, and was ordained deacon in Trinity church, New York, 28 June, 1857, by Bishop Horatio Potter, and priest in St. Paul’s church, Troy, N. Y., 14 Aug., 1858, by the same bishop. His first post was as assistant in St. Paul’s church, Troy, 1857–60. He was rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1860–70, and then became rector of St. Paul’s church, Bellingham, Pa., where he held post he held until 1873. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Trinity in 1872, and served as deputy to the general convention in 1871 and 1874. Having been elected bishop of New Jersey, he was consecrated in St. Mary’s church, Burlington, N. J., 2 Feb., 1873. Bishop Scarborough has published a few occasional sermons, and several addresses and addresses to the people of the several dioceses.

SCARBOROUGH, William Saunders, educator, b. in Macon, Ga., 16 Feb., 1852. He is of African descent. He was graduated at Oberlin in 1875, and taught in the Lewis high-school at Macon, but in 1876 returned to Oberlin and entered the theological department for the purpose of studying Hebrew and Hellenistic Greek. He declined an offer from the Overseas Missionary Society, to go to Africa, and in 1877 was called to fill the chair of ancient languages in Willerforce university, near Xenia, Ohio. He is a member of the American philological society, the Modern language association, and other similar societies. Liberia college, Africa, gave him the degree of L. L. D., in 1882. His publications include “First Lessons in Greek” (New York, 1881), and “Theory and Functions of the Thematic Vowel in the Greek Verbs.”

SCARTH, William Bain, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, 10 Nov., 1837. He was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and came to Canada in 1853. He settled in Toronto, was instrumental in forming the North British Canadian investment company and the Scottish Ontario Manitoba land company, and was manager of both for several years. On the formation of the Canadian northwest land company he became its managing director. Mr. Scarth then removed to Winnipeg, was chosen president of the Liberal-Conservative association, and in 1857 was elected member of the central parliament.

SCATES, Walter Bennett, b. in South Boston, Va., 18 Jan., 1809; d. in Chicago, Ill., 26 Oct., 1887. His parents removed to Kentucky, where he remained till 1831, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He settled at Frankfort, Ill., was appointed attorney-general, and then resided at the capital, Vandalia. In 1836 he was made judge of the 31 judicial district, and in 1841 he was called to the supreme bench of the state. In 1847 he resigned his post and resumed his law practice at Mt. Vernon, Ill. In 1853 he was again elected to the supreme court bench, and again resigned, to return to his law practice in Chicago. In 1862 Judge Scates was commissioned major on the staff of Gen. Mcclernand, and before the close of the civil war was assistant adjutant-general. When he was mustered out of service in 1866 he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. On his return to Chicago he completed his revision of the statutes of Illinois and published law till his death.

SCATTERGOOD, Thomas, Quaker preacher, b. in Burlington, N. J., 23 Jan., 1814; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 April, 1814. His great-grandfather, of the same name, was of the company of Quakers that went to Burlington in 1676. His father, Joseph, at first a mariner, became a lawyer, and died when Thomas was six years old, leaving him to the care of his mother, who, after giving him a good English education, apprenticed him to a trade. He became a turner, in which business he continued throughout his life. He was an active member in the Society of Friends, was for many years a noted elder of the sect, and in the work of the ministry travelled extensively in this country and in Great Britain. His “Memoirs” were printed in the “Friends Library,” vol. viii. (Philadelphia, 1816) and reprinted and published in a separate volume (London, 1845).

SCHAFF, Frederick David, clergyman, b. in Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany, 15 Nov., 1800; d. in Frederick, Md., 27 Jan., 1876. In 1858 he was sent to the gymnasium in Hanau, where he remained until the death of his father in 1774. In 1756 he emigrated with his mother to America, and after her arrival the uncle died, and he was left destitute. After teaching in York county, Pa., he studied theology, was licensed to preach in 1786, and ordained in 1788. He became pastor of Lutheran congregations at Carlisle and other places, and in 1812–34 was the colleague of Rev. Dr. Holmes in Philadelphia. In 1834, in consequence of the infirmities of his age, he relinquished the ministry, and removed to Frederick, Md. He received the degree of D. D. in 1834 from the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Schaffer was a close student, a fine classical scholar, and a good Hebraist. He published “Antwort auf eine Vertheidigung der Methodisten” (Germantown, Pa., 1806) and “Eine kritische Anmerkung” (1808). His eldest son, David Frederick, clergyman, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 22 July, 1787; d. in Frederick, Md., 5 May, 1837, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1807, studied theology, and was ordained by the ministerium of Pennsylvania in 1812. In 1808 he became pastor of the Lutheran congregation at Frederick, Md., which post he held until the end of his life. He was a valuable preacher under his direction, and was connected with all the important enterprises of his own church and with many outside of it. From 1826 till 1831 he was the editor of the first English periodical that was established in the Lutheran church in this country, the “Lutheran Intelligencer.” He took an active part in the establishment of the Lutheran seminary, which in 1826, was one of the founders of the general synod of the Lutheran church (1828), secretary in 1821–2, and its president in 1831–3. In 1836 he received the degree of D. D. from St. John’s college, Annapolis, Md. Besides a large number of doctrinal and other articles in the “Lutheran Intelligencer,” he published various addresses and sermons. —Another son, Frederick Christian, clergyman, b. in Germantown, Pa., 12 Nov., 1792; d. in New York city, 26 March, 1832, studied the classics partly in the academy of his native place and partly under his father, with whom he also read theology, and in 1812 was licensed to preach. In the same year he became pastor of the Lutheran congregation at Harrisburg, Pa., where he remained three years. In 1815 he accepted a call to Christ church, New York city, where he preached in German and English until 1823, when he organized St. Matthew's English Lutheran congregation. Soon afterward difficulties about the church property arose between the German and English congregations, and he organized St. James's English Lutheran congregation, which he served until his death. He received the degree of D. D. in 1830 from Columbia, and in the same year he was elected professor of the German language and literature there. He was deeply interested in the study of natural science, and received from the king of Prussia a gold medal for his valuable services in the interest of this study. He published "The Blessed Reformation and Parables and Parabolic Sayings" (New York, 1813), and several sermons.—Another son, Charles Frederick, clergyman, b. in Germantown, Pa., 3 Sept., 1807; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Nov., 1879, was educated in the University of Pennsylvania, and studied theology partly under the direction of his father. He was ordained in 1829, and became pastor at Carlisle, Pa., where he remained until 1834. In the latter year he removed to Hagerstown, Md., where he had charge of several Lutheran congregations until 1839. He was professor of theology in Capitol University, Columbus, Ohio, in 1840-3, and pastor at Lancaster, Ohio, in 1843-5, at Red Hook, N. Y., in 1845-51, and at Easton, Pa., in 1851-5. From the last year till 1864 he was professor of the German language and literature in Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, and then till his death he was professor of systematic theology of the newly established theological seminary at Philadelphia, and its president. He was a representative of the strictly conservative and confessional party in the Lutheran church, defending his position with great force in many publications, and was a leader in the organization of the general council in 1857. He published a large number of historical, homiletical, and doctrinal articles, and left several manuscript volumes, including a complete "System of Lutheran Theology." Among his works are "Manual of Sacred History," translated from the German (Philadelphia, 1856); "Luther's Small Catechism," a revised translation (1859); "Inaugural Address at Gettysburg" (New York, 1859); and "Arndt's True Christianity," translated from the German (Pennsylvania congregation, Frederick David's grandson, Charles William, theological b. in Hagerstown, Md., 5 Mar., 1813; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 March, 1896. general conference of the alliance, which, after two postponements on account of the Franco-German war, was held in New York in October, 1875. Dr. Schaff was also, in 1871, one of the alliance delegates to the emperor of Russia to plead for the religious liberty of his subjects in the Baltic provinces.

He was president of the American Bible revision committee, which was organized in 1871 at the request of the English committee. Joined in 1873, he was sent to England to negotiate and arrange terms with the British revisers and the university presses with regard to cooperation and publication of the Anglo-American revision. That same year, in August, he attended a conference of the Old Catholics, Greeks, and Protestants at Bonn, with a view to promote Christian union among churches there represented. Dr. Schaff was first president of the newly (1888) organized American society of church history, with its officers representing all the leading branches of the Protestant church; and, in addition to the cultivation of that particular branch of literature to which it is specially devoted, the society aims at unifying Christian thought and sentiment through the written word.

Dr. Schaff's works are mostly historical and exegetical; some of them are written in German, and others in English, but the German ones have been translated. Among the most important are his "History of the Apostolical Church" (New York, 1835); "Sketch of the Political, Social, and Religious Character of the United States" (1853); "Germany, Aits Universities and Religion," (1857); "History of the Christian Church," 6 vols., 1858-88; "German Hymn-Book, with Introduction and Notes" (1859); ed. with music, 1874: "The Christ of the Gospels" (1864); "The Person of Christ, with Replies to Strauss and Reim" (1865); "Lectures on the Civil War and the Outbreak of Slavery in America," 1866; "Christ in Song," 1868; "Revision of the English Version of the New Testament," 1874; "The Vatican Council," 1875; "History and Collection of the Creeds of Christendom," 3 vols., 1876; "Harmony of the Reformed Confessions," 1877; "Through Bible Lands," 1878; "Dictionary of the Bible," 1880; "Library of Religious Poetry," edited in collaboration with Arthur Gilmore. He prepared "the Greek Testament and the English Version," 3d revised ed., 1888; "Historical Account of the Work of the American Committee of Revision of the English Version," 1883; "Christ and Christianity" (1885); and "Church and State in the United States, or the American Idea of Religious Liberty and its Practical Effects, with Official Documents," New York, 1888.

He edited the Anglo-American adaptation of Lange's "Critical, Theological, and Homiletical Commentary on the Bible" (begun in 1864, 24 vols., New York and Edinburgh), and the "International Revision Commentary on the New Testament" (begun in 1884). Dr. Schaff founded and edited the "Kirchenfreund," the first German monthly in this country, and, with Prof. Henry B. Smith, edited the "Philosophical and Theological Library," a series of volumes begun in 1873 (New York and London). He contributed articles to American and foreign reviews, and to Herzog's Smith's, and other encyclopedic works. See Life by his son (1897).

SCHANK, John Stillwell, educator, b. near Freehold, N. J., 24 Feb., 1817; d. in Princeton, 16 Dec., 1898. He was graduated at Princeton, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1843, settled in Princeton, and followed the practice of his profession there until 1865. In 1847 he was called to the curatorship of the college museum and to the presidency of the department of anatomy, physiology, and zoology. In 1855-6 he instructed the senior class in chemistry, and in 1857 he was elected to succeed John Torrey in the professorship. Under his direction the course was enlarged and extended, and he lectured on anatomy, physiology, chemistry, and hygiene. He was a member of various scientific societies, and received the degree of LL. D. from Lafayette.

SCHANK, John, British naval officer, b. in Fifeshire, Scotland, in 1740; d. in Dawlish, England, 6 March, 1823. He entered the royal navy when young, was a lieutenant in 1776, and was employed on the lakes during the Revolutionary war, constructing in less than six weeks the "Inflexible," which he commanded successfully on Lake Champlain, and displaying ability as a seaman. His talents as an engineer were applied in Gen. John Burgoyne's expedition to the building of floating bridges, and on his return to England he was made a post-captain for his services. He attained the rank of admiral of the blue in 1822. He devised a method of navigating vessels in shallow water, and combined all the ingenious inventions, and was the author of several works on naval architecture.

SCHAF, John Thomas, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 1 May, 1843; d. 28 Feb., 1898. He entered the counting-house of his father in Baltimore, when sixteen years of age. In the beginning of the civil war he joined a Confederate battery, was engaged on the battles around Richmond in 1862, was wounded at Cedar Mountain, at the second battle of Bull Run, and again at Chancellorsville, and on 20 June, 1863, was appointed a midshipman in the Confederate navy. In January, 1864, he took part in the capture of the steamer "Underwriter," near New Bern, N.C. He rejoined the army after all the ports were blockaded and was captured in Maryland while on his way to Canada with dispatches. After the war he engaged in mercantile business, then in journalism, and in 1874 was admitted to the bar. In 1878 he was a member of the legislature. Since 1884 he has been a commissioner of the land office of Maryland. Georgetown college gave him the degree of LL. D. He has been editor of the Baltimore "Telegram" and "Morning Herald." Besides many historical addresses and magazine articles, he has published "Chronicles of Baltimore" (Baltimore, 1874); "History of Maryland" (3 vols., 1879); "History of Baltimore City and County" (Philadelphia, 1881); "History of Western Maryland" (2 vols., 1883); "History of Pennsylvania" (3 vols., 1884); "History of Westchester County, N. Y." (2 vols., 1886); "History of the Confederate States Navy from the Laying of the First Keel to the Sinking of the Last Vessel" (1887; 2d ed., Albany, 1894); "History of the State of Delaware" (1888); and "Natural and Industrial Resources and Advantages of Maryland" (Annapolis, 1892).
SCHAUFLER, William Gottlieb, missionary, b. in Stuttgart, Germany, 22 Aug., 1788; d. in New York city, 27 Jan., 1863. He emigrated to Odessa, Russia, with his parents and about 100 others, in 1804, and adopted his father's trade, that of a tailor. In 1820 the preaching of Ignatius Lindl, a Roman Catholic priest of evangelistic views, turned his thoughts toward religion, and he resolved to devote his life to mission work. After serving as an independent missionary in Turkey in 1826 he made his way to the United States, with no property but his clothes, his flute, and one dollar in money, and entered Andover theological seminary, where he supported himself for a time by turning wooden bed-posts. He was graduated in 1830, ordained on 14 Nov., 1831, and returned to Turkey under the auspices of the American board. He married an American lady soon afterward, and resided chiefly in Constantinople during his missionary service of forty-four years, laboring principally among the Jews and Armenians. In 1839 he was instrumental in persuading Sir Stratford Canning, the British minister, to interfere in behalf of members of the latter race that had been persecuted by the Armenian patriarch. For his efforts in behalf of the German colony in Constantinople he received a decoration from the king of Prussia. From 1839 till 1842 he resided in Vienna, engaged in translating and publishing works of religion which was published in that city in two quarto volumes. He made a visit to this country in 1857-8, and from 1873, three years after his retirement from active work, resided here till his death. The University of Halle gave him the degree of D. D. in 1867, and Princeton that of L.L. D. in 1879. Dr. Schaufler was a scholar of fine attainments, being "a man of large learning and ability, but more." Besides the work mentioned above, he was the author of a translation of the Bible into Turkish, which received high praise. His English publications include, besides single sermons, 'Essay on the Right Use of Property' (Boston, 1832), and 'Meditations on the Last Days of Christ' (1857; new ed., 1854 and 1859). His 'Autobiography,' with an introduction by Prof. Edwards A. Park (New York, 1887).

SCHENCK, James Findlay, naval officer, b. in Franklin, Ohio, 11 June, 1807; d. in Dayton, Ohio, 21 Dec., 1882. His ancestor, Rodolf Martense Schenck, emigrated from Holland to New Amsterdam in 1630. He was appointed to the U. S. military academy at West Point in 1828, but entered the navy as midshipman, 1 March, 1825. He became passed midshipman, 4 June, 1831, and lieutenant, 22 Dec., 1835, and in August, 1845, joined the "Congress," in which he served as chief military aide to Com. Robert F. Stockton at the capture of Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and San Pedro, Cal. He also participated in the capture of Guaymas, B. S. Mazatlan in B. S., and vicinity in 1847, when he turned home as bearer of despatches. He was commissioned for efficient service in the Mexican war. Lieut. Schenck then entered the service of the Pacific mail steamship company and commanded the steamer "Ohio" and other steamers between New York and Aspinwall in 1849-52. He was commissioned commander, 14 Sept., 1857, and assigned to the frigate "St. Lawrence," 19 March, 1862, on the West Gulf blockade. On 7 Oct., 1864, he was ordered to command the "Powhatan" in the North Atlantic squadron, and he also received notification of his promotion to commodore to date from 2 Jan., 1863. He led the 3d division of the squadron in the two attacks on Fort Fisher, and was highly commended for his service. Com. Schenck had charge of the naval station at Mobile City till, in 1865-6, was promoted to rear-admiral, 21 Sept., 1868, and retired by law, 11 June, 1869.—His brother, Robert Cumming, diplomatist, b. in Franklin, Ohio, 4 Oct., 1809; d. in Washington, D. C., 23 March, 1899. He was graduated at Miami university in 1827, was a tutor for three years longer, then entered Harvard law and then studied law with Dr. Schenck. He was admitted to the bar, and established himself in practice at Dayton, Ohio. He was a member of the legislature in 1841-2, displaying practical knowledge and pungent wit in the debates, and was then elected as a Whig to congress, and thrice re-elected, serving from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1851. He was a member of important committees, and during his third term was the chairman of that on roads and canals. On 12 March, 1851, he was commissioned as minister to Brazil. In 1832, with John S. Pendleton, who was accredited to the Argentine Republic as charge d'affaires, he arranged a treaty of friendship and commerce with the government of that country and one for the free navigation of the river La Plata and its great tributaries. They also negotiated treaties with the governments of Uruguay and Paraguay. He lectured in Princeton, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, Md., and when his term as minister expired, was re-elected to the Senate. At the close of his second term, he was re-elected by the Senate to the Senate of the Union in 1851.

SCHENCK, Noah Hunt, clergyman, b. in Pennington, Mercer co., N. J., 30 June, 1825; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 4 Jan., 1885. He was graduated at Princeton in 1843, studied law in Trenton, N. J., and was admitted to the bar in 1847, and practiced there till 1848, when he removed to Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1851 he abandoned his profession for the ministry, and after graduation at the theological seminary in Gambier, Ohio, in 1853, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. After having charge of parishes in Ohio, Chicago, Ill., and Baltimore, Md., he was called in 1859 to St. Ann's, Brooklyn, N. Y., where he remained till his death. The new church building, one of the finest in Brooklyn, was erected early in Dr. Schenck's rectoryship, and in 1879 he succeeded in freeing it from debt. Dr. Schenck was active in the missionary work of his church, sat for many years in its general convention, and in 1871 went to St. Petersburg as a delegate and also served as delegate from the Evangelical alliance to memorialize the tsar in favor of Russian dissenters. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1865. Dr. Schenck founded and edited "The Western Churchman" during his pastorate in Chicago, and in 1867 became co-editor of "The Protestant Churchman" in New York. He was the author of numerous published sermons and addresses, of a large editorial collection appearing in book-form (New York, 1855). A memorial of him was issued by the wardens and vestry of St. Ann's church, including an address by Bishop Littlejohn (Brooklyn, 1885).

SCHENCK, William Edward, clergyman, b. in Princeton, N. J., 29 March, 1839. He was graduated at Princeton in 1858, and at the theological seminary in Gambier, Ohio, in 1853. He was a member of the board of visitors of the University of Pennsylvania, and was one of the committee on study of law. After doing missionary work in the Pennsylvania coal region, he was ordained in 1843, and until 1852 held pastorates successively in Manchester, N. J., New York city, and Princeton. He was then superintendent of church extension in the presbytery of Philadelphia till 1854, when he became corresponding secretary of the Presbyterial board of publication. He was also its editor in 1862-70, and in the same years served as permanent clerk of the general assembly of the old-school branch of his denomination. Since 1865 he has been a director of Princeton theological seminary. Jefferson college, Pa., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1865. Dr. Schenck has published "Historical Accounts of the First Presbyterian Church of Princeton, N. J. (Princeton, 1851); "Aunt Fanny's Home" (Philadelphia, 1865); "Children in Heaven" (1866); "Nearing Home" (1867); and sermons and tracts in English and German. He has also prepared a "General Catalogue of Princeton Theological Seminary" (Trenton, 1881), and its neurological reports since 1853.

SCHERESCHESKY, Samuel Isaac Joseph, P. E. bishop, b. in Tamrooz, Russian Lithuania, 6 May, 1831. He was educated partly in his native town and partly at the Rabbinical college, Zhitomir, Russia. He also spent two years in the University of Breslau, Germany. On his arrival in the United States, he went first to West-
He was educated in private schools, and early turned his attention to business, but contributed largely to the religious press. His works include "Message to Ruling Elders, their Office and their Duties" (New York, 1859); "The Foundations of History; a Series of First Things" (1864); "The Bulwark of the Church" (1874); "Children's Bread; a Bible Catechism" (1874); "Words to Christian Teachers" (1874); "Music in our Churches" (1884); "The Church in Ephesus and the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches" (1884); and "People's Hymn-Book" (Philadelphia, 1884).

—His brother, Bradhurst, b. in New York city, 21 Sept., 1824, was educated in his native city, and then entered upon the study of law, in order to follow his grandfather, Jacob Schieffelin. He subsequently became one of the firm of Schieffelin Brothers, and retired from active business on the formation of the present firm. Mr. Schieffelin has been largely interested in political affairs, and has connected himself with the People's party, whose platform is the product of his pen. He believes that no republic can exist where wealth is allowed to accumulate in the hands of a small minority, and favors a law limiting inheritance. In 1883 he was nominated by his party for state senator from the 10th district of New York city, but failed of election.

SCHIMMELN, Alexander Oliver, styled also Oeskielin and Esqueineling, and generally known under the name of Oeskmelin, b. in Prussia about 1615; d. in France in 1707. He studied medicine, but on 2 May, 1666, emigrated as a contract laborer on a vessel belonging to the French company of the West Indies, and was sold for thirty crowns to M. de la Vie, agent of the company in Tortugas. After serving his master for three years, he was freed, and enlisted with the buccaneers, with whom he remained till 1674, when he returned to Europe on a Dutch vessel. Later he made three voyages to South America as surgeon on board Dutch and Spanish vessels. The narrative of his adventures, written originally not in Dutch, as it is claimed, but in French, fell into the hands of Baron de Frontignan, who published them with the title "Histoire des aventuriers et signateurs du commerce de l'Amérique des Indes, contenant ce qu'iell ont fait de remarquable, leurs meurs, leurs entreprises, avec la vie, leurs meurs et les coutumes des habitants de Saint Domingue et de l'ile de la Tortue; une description exacte de ces lieux, ainsi que l'historic de la chambre des comptes des Indes Occidentales" (2 vols., Paris, 1684). The first volume contains also a monograph on the flora and fauna of South America. An enlarged edition (4 vols., Tревoux, 1753) contains the "Relation du voyage fait à la mer du Sud avec les flibustiers en 1685—7," by Ravenne de Lassan, and a "Histoire des pirates Anglais." The Dutch edition, which is claimed by some to be the original, "Geschichte van de Vreemders van America" (Amsterdam, 1700), is asserted by others to be only a translation from a French source.

SCHIMMELPFENNIG, Alexander, soldier, b. in Prussia in 1824; d. in Minersville, Pa., 7 Sept., 1865. He served as an officer of the Prussian army in Schleswig-Holstein in 1848, and soon afterward came to the United States. At the beginning of the civil war he was elected colonel of a Pennsylvania regiment, which he commanded during General Hooker's campaign in Virginia. For his services at Bull Run he was nominated brigadier-general. The appointment was at first rejected, but, on being presented again, was confirmed in March, 1863, the commission dating from 29 Nov., 1802. At Chambersville he commanded a brigade in Gen. Carl Schurz's corps, and served with credit at Gettysburg. In February, 1864, he was sent to St. John's island, near Charleston, and thence crossed to James island. When Charleston was evacuated on the approach of Gen. William T. Sherman's army, Gen. Schimmelpenninck entered and took possession, 18 Feb., 1865. He remained in command of the city for some time, but was finally relieved on account of sickness, the result of exposure, which in a short time terminated in his death. He was the author of "The War between Russia and Turkey" (Philadelphia, 1854).

SCHLAGINTWEIT, Robert von (shlah-shtuv), German explorer. b. in Munich, Bavaria, 27 Oct., 1831; d. in Giessen, Hesse-Darmstadt, 6 Jan., 1885. He assisted his brothers, Hermann and Adbif, in the geological exploration of India in 1854-7, prepared the work entitled "Results of a Scientific Mission to India and High-Asia" (4 vols., Leipsic, 1860-6), and filled the chair of geography in the University of Giessen. In 1867-70 he lectured in German and English throughout the United States, and throughout Germany and Boston, and while in the country explored the Pacific coast. He published "Die Pacificisenschen in Nordamerika" (New York, 1870), and "California" (1871).

SCHLATTER, Michael, clergyman, b. in St. Gall, Switzerland, 14 July, 1716; d. on Chestnut Hill, now a part of Philadelphia, Pa., in November, 1790; was educated at the gymnasia of his native town and at the University of Helmstdedt, Brunswick, taught for several years in Holland, entered the German Reformed ministry, officiated for a few months in Switzerland, and then went to Amsterdam and volunteered his services as a missionary to the destitute congregations of Pennsylvania. He arrived in Philadelphia on 6 Aug., 1746, and on 1 Jan., 1747, was installed as pastor of the united churches of Germantown and Philadelphia. For a great part of the time he was absent on missionary tours among the German Reformed settlers of Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey, and New York. He organized a synod, which met in Philadelphia on 29 Sept., 1747, and drew St. George's Street more than one half of its houses, which promptly invited him in 1751 to visit Europe for the purpose of making a complaint before the synods of South and North Holland. In Amsterdam he published (175I) a journal of his experiences and transactions in America, with an account of the Reformed congregations and their death of pastors. Of this book he made a German translation (Frankfort, 1752), and afterward it was rendered into English by Rev. David Thomson, of Amsterdam, and distributed throughout Great Britain. He returned to Pennsylvania in March, 1752, bringing with him six young ministers and substantial aid in money. As a result of his appeal, a fund of more than $30,000 was collected in England and Holland for the maintenance of a German translation (Frankfort, 1752), and afterward it was rendered into English by Rev. deposited in April, 1544. Schmid sustained Irala, who was the new governor, and in 1546 accompanied him in his expedition to Peru as far as the foot of the Andes, where he was despatched with Nuno de Chaves to President La Gasca. He accompanied Irala on his last and undistinguished expedition of 1546, and, having in 1552 of the death of his elder brother, to whose estate he was to succeed, he obtained his discharge. In Seville he presented to the council of the Indies letters from Irala with the report of his discoveries, and arrived toward the close of 1554 in Strasburg, where he afterward resided. He kept a diary during his wanderings, and wrote an interesting narrative of his adventures under the title of "Wahre Geschicte einer merkwürdigen Reise, gemacht durch Ulrich Schmidel von Strasburg, in America oder der Neuen Welt, von 1534 bis 1554, wo man findet alle seine Leiden in 19 Jahren, und die Beschreibung der Länder und merkwürdigen Völker die erschollen, von ihm selbst geschrieben" (Frankfort, 1557), of which a Latin version appeared in Nuremberg in 1560 as: "Vera historia," etc. Henry Ternaux-Comps has also published a translation of the work in his "Voyages, relations et mémoires," and Barcia in his "Historiadores primitivos de Indias." Schmidel is certainly the first historian of the Argentine, and his narrative is valuable, as it gives the names and tells of the habits of the many Indian nations that existed a century later.

SCHMIDT, Frederick Augustus, clergyman, b. in Leutenberg, Germany, Jan. 3, 1837. In 1841 he came to the United States with his widowed mother to settle in Missouri with relatives that had emigrated in 1839 with the Saxon colony under the leadership of Martin Stephan. He was graduated in 1857 from the theological seminary at St. Louis, Mo. The same year he was ordained to the ministry at Eden, Erie co., X. Y. He served as pastor there and in Baltimore, Md.: was professor in the Norwegian Lutheran college at Decorah, Iowa, in 1861–71; in Concordia theological seminary, St. Louis, Mo., in 1871–76; in the Norwegian Lutheran seminary, Madison, Wis.; and in the Norwegian Lutheran theological seminary at N. Chicago, Ill. He served as a pastor of the Evangeli-Neustadt Congregations in Decorah, Iowa, in 1864–75; "Altes und Neues" in Madison, Wis., in 1860–75; and "Luthersche Bildnisse" in Madison, Wis. (now Northfield, Minn.), in 1882–75; and co-editor of "Kirchentideende," at Decorah, Iowa, in 1865–75; and "Lehre und Wehre" in St. Louis, Mo., in 1872–75. He has published "Intimae" (a collection of testimonies from Lutheran authors on the question of predestination), the "Kontrovers" on which point among Lutherans in America and Europe was started by the publication of "Altes und Neues" in 1880.

SCHMIDT, Henry Immanuel, clergyman, b. in Nazareth, Pa., Dec. 21, 1806; d. in New York city, Nov. 11, 1889. He received his training in the Missouri seminary, was licensed as a Lutheran clergyman, and in 1836 he became a candidate for the ministry, but in 1829 severed his connection with the Moravian church, and was licensed as a Lutheran clergyman. He was pastor of a congregation in Bergen county, N. J., in 1831–33; assistant professor in Hartwick seminary, N. Y., in 1833–36, pastor in Boston, Mass., in 1836–8, professor of German and French in Pennsylvanian college, Gettysburg, Pa., in 1838–9; and of German in the theological seminary there in 1839–43; pastor at Palatine, N. J., in 1843–5, principal of Hartwick seminary, N. Y., in 1857–8, and published "History of Education," and contributed articles on the language and literature in Columbia in 1848–50. On 1 Nov., 1850, he was compelled by failing health to resign the last-named post, and was retired as professor emeritus. In 1850 Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, Pa., conferred on him the degree of D. D. He was a frequent contributor to the "Evangelical Review" (Gettysburg, Pa.) and to other periodicals, and published "History of Education," and contributed part i., "History of Education, Ancient and Modern," and part ii., "Plan of Culture and Instruction based on Christian Principles" (1842); "Inaugural Address," delivered in the chapel of Columbia college (New York, 1848); "Scriptural Character of the Lutheran Doctrine of the Lord's Supper" (1852); and "Course of Ancient Geog-raphy." (1859).

SCHMUCKER, John George, clergyman, b. in Michaelstadt, Darmstadt, Germany, 18 Aug., 1771; d. in Williamsburg, Va., 7 Oct., 1854. His parents emigrated to this country in 1785, and, after a residence of two years in Pennsylvania, settled near Woodstock, Va. In 1789 he began to study for the ministry, a year later he was associated with Dr. Philippi in church work. In 1792 he was ordained. After holding several pastorates he was called, in 1809, to York, Pa., where he remained till failing health compelled him to retire in 1852. He then removed to Williamsburg, Pa., where several of his children resided, and there he remained during the rest of his life. In 1835 he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania, in recognition of his work as one of the founders of the general synod of the Lutheran church in the United States, in 1821, an active supporter of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., and for many years president of its board of directors. He was also active in the establishment of Pennsylvania college, and for more than twenty-one years was one of its trustees. For more than forty years he was a member of the executive council of the Lutheran church in this country, and actively engaged in all its important operations. He was a frequent contributor to periodicals, and a poet of merit. Among his works are: "Vornehmste Weisssagungen der Heiligen Schrift" (Hagerstown, Md., 1817); "Reformations-Geschichte zur Jubelfeier der Reformacion" (York, Pa., 1817); "Prophetische Geschichte der Christian Religion, oder Erklärung der Revelati- onen der St. Joh. (2 vols., Baltimore, 1817); "Schwärmergeist unserer Tage entrifft, zur Warnung erweckten Seden" (York, Pa., 1827; "Von der Anhängung zum Evangel. Gesundbuch der General-Synode" (1833); and "Wächterstimme an Zion's Kinder" (Gettysburg, Pa., 1828).--His son, Samuel Simon, theologian, b. in Hagerstown, Md., 28 Oct., 1799; in Gettysburg, Pa., 26 July, 1873, spent two years in the University of Pennsylvania, and then taught in York in 1816. He began theological studies under the direction of his father, but in 1818 entered Princeton seminary, where he was graduated in 1829. Among his fellow-students at Princeton were Mr. Bish, and Mr. and Mrs. Robert Baird. After being licensed, he was his father's assistant for a few months, and then followed a call to New Market, Va. He was ordained at Frederick, Md., 5 Sept., 1821, and served his first charge in 1820–6. He interested himself at once in the preparation of young men for the ministry.
took an active part in the organization of the general synod in 1821, and was throughout his life one of the leaders of that body. He was the author of the formula for the government and discipline of the Evangelical Lutheran church, which, adopted by the general synod in 1827, has formed the 3rd article of the constitution of the church. From its establishment in 1825 till his resignation in 1864 he was chairman of the faculty, and in 1836 he was installed as the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., and for four years he was the only instructor. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him in 1839 by Rutgers and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1840 he took an active part in the establishment of an ecclesiastical connection between the Lutheran church in Europe and America, and was a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance, which met in London during that year. He was much in preparing the way for the latter by his "Fraternal Appeal" to the American churches, with a plan for union (1838), which was circulated extensively in England and the United States. His published works number more than one hundred. Among them are "A Biblical Theology of Storr and Flott," translated from the German (2 vols. Andover, 1826); "Elements of Modern Philosophy" (London, 1825); "Elements of Popular Theology" (1834); "Kurzgefasste Geschichte der christlichen Kirche, auf der Grundlage der Buschens Werke" (Gettysburg, Pa., 1834); "Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches on Christian Union" (Andover, 1838); "Portraiture of Lutheranism" (Baltimore, 1840); "Retrospect of Lutheranism" (1841); "A Discourse on Natural Philosophy" (New York, 1842); "Dissertation on Capital Punishment" (Philadelphia, 1845); "The American Lutheran Church, Historically, Doctrinally, and Practically Delineated" (1851); "Lutheran Manual" (1855); "American Lutheranism Vindicated" (Baltimore, 1856); "Appeal on behalf of the Christian Sabbath" (Philadelphia, 1857); "Evangelical Lutheran Catechism" (Baltimore, 1859); "The Church of the Redeemer" (1863); "The Unity of Christ's Church" (New York, 1870); and a large number of discourses and addresses, and articles in the "Evangelical Review" and other periodicals.—Samuel Simon's son, Samuel Mosheim, author, b. in New Market, Shenandoah co., Va., 12 Jan., 1826; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 May, 1886, wrote his name Schmucker. He graduated at Washington college, Pa., in 1849. After studying theology and being licensed to preach, he accepted a call from the Lutheran church at Lewiston, Pa. In 1845 he became pastor of the 1st church in Germantown, Pa., but in October, 1848, received an honorable dismissal from his synod, and studied law at the Philadelphia law-academy, where he served as secretary. In January, 1850, he was admitted to the bar, and at once began practice. In March, 1853, he removed to New York city, but after two years returned to Philadelphia, and thereforth employed himself chiefly in writing. His publications include "Errors of Modern Infidelity" (Philadelphia, 1848); "The Spanish Wife, a Play, with Memoir of Edwin Forrest" (New York, 1834); "Court and Reign of Catherine II.; Empress of Russia" (1856); "The Life and Reign of Napoleon III." (Philadelphia, 1856); "History of the Mormons, Edited and Enlarged" (New York, 1856); "Life and Times of Thomas Jefferson" and "The Yankee Slave-Driver" (Philadelphia, 1857); "Memorable Scenes in French History," and "Arctic Explorations and Discoveries" (New York, 1858); "Kent Kent and Other American Explorers" and "History of Napoleon III." (Philadelphia, 1858); "History of the Four Georges" and "History of All Religions" (New York, 1859); "Life, Speeches, and Memorials of Daniel Webster" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Life and Times of Henry Clay," "Life of Washington," etc. (Philadelphia, 1859); "History of the Modern Jews", 2 vols. (London, 1860); "The Publish vol. 1 of: A History of the Civil War in the United States" (1863). Another son of Samuel Simon, Beale Mzelachifon, clergyman, b. in Gettysburg, Pa., 26 Aug., 1827; d. in Pottstown, Pa., 18 Oct., 1888. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college in 1844, studied at Gettysburg theological seminary for a year, in 1847, and in 1849 ordained to the Lutheran ministry by the synod of Virginia. In 1850 he received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He was pastor at Martinsburg, Va., Allentown, Easton, and Reading, Pa., and since 1859 at Pottstown, Pa., and held many offices in connection with his denomination. He was one of the founders of the general council in 1867, and began to every convention since its organization, and uninterruptedly a member of its most important committees. Dr. Schmucker was a fine liturgical scholar, and performed more than any other man for the liturgical and hymnological development of the Lutheran church. He was co-editor of the "Hallesche Nachrichten" (Allentown, Pa., and Halie, G. 1854-1857), edited "The Lutheran Times" (Allentown, Pa., vol. i., 1889), which is the primary source of information concerning the early history of the Lutheran church in this country. Dr. Schmucker also edited "Liturgy of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1860); "Collection of Hymns of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania" (1863); "Church-Book of the General Council" (1868); and "Ministerial Acts of the Ministerial Council" (1887). He published numerous articles on doctrinal, historical, and liturgical subjects, of which many have been republished separately in pamphlet-form.

SCHNECK, Benjamin Shroder, clergyman, b. in Upper Bern, Berks co., Pa., 14 March, 1806; d. in Chambersburg, Pa., 10 April, 1874. He was educated by his father, a German school-master of reading, studying, theology, and was ordained to the ministry of the German Reformed church on 5 Sept., 1826. He was pastor of congregations in Centre county, Pa., till 1834, preaching in both English and German, and then in Gettysburg for one year. He took charge in 1836 of the Weekly Messenger" at Chambersburg, and in 1840 of the "Reformierte Kirchenzeitung," the German organ of his church. He still continued editor of the "Weekly Messenger," with an assistant, till 1844, when he resigned, resuming charge again in 1847, and giving it up finally in 1852. He retired from the editorship of the German paper in 1864, when it was removed to Philadelphia. From 1855 till his death he officiated as pastor of a congregation in Chambersburg. The degree of D. D. was given him in 1845 by Marshall college. He published "Die deutsche Kanzel," a collection of German sermons (Chambersburg, 1845); "The Burning of "Chambersburg"" (Philadelphia, 1865); and "Mercenary"  "Theology"  (1874).

SCHNEIDER, George, banker, b. in Pirmasens, Renishen Bavaria, 13 Dec., 1823. He was educated in the schools of his native place, became a journalist at the age of twenty-one, and, after taking an active part in revolutionary movements, came to this country in July, 1849. He established the "Schoepf" (1851), and in 1854 moved to Chicago, where, in 1861, he was appointed collector of internal revenue. He was subsequently president of the State savings institution till 1871, when he became president of the National bank of Illinois. He was a delegate to the Republican national conventions of 1856 and 1860, presidential elector on the Garfield ticket in 1880, and for a short time in 1857 served as United States minister to Switzerland.

SCHODDE, George Henry, clergyman, b. in Allegheny City, Pa., 15 April, 1834. He was graduated at Capitol university, Columbus, Ohio, in 1852, and at its theological department in 1854, afterward studied in the universities of Tübingen and Leipsic, and in 1856 took at the latter the degree of licentiate of divinity. He was ordained minister in Ohio, and was pastor at Martin's Ferry, Ohio, until 1 Jan., 1889, when he was elected professor in Capitol university. He is eminent as a Semitic scholar, and has done much to promote the study of Hebrew, Arabic, Syriac, Ethiopian, and other languages. He had for several years been an instructor of Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac in the Semitic schools of Pennsylvania under Prof. F. William Harper, of Yale. He has written largely for periodicals, and in the "Bibliotheka Sacra" has published the first complete translation from the Ethiopic of the "Book of Jubilees" (1885-7). His other works are "The Book of Enoch, translated from the Ethiopic, with introduction and notes" (Andover, 1882), and "A Day in Capernaum," translated from the German of Delitzsch (New York, 1885).

SCHÖLCHER, Victor (she-ler), French statesman, b. in Paris, 21 July, 1804; d. there, 26 Dec., 1893. He was the son of a merchant, studied at the College Louis le Grand, became a journalist, opposing the government of Louis Philippe and making a reputation as a pamphleteer. After 1829 he devoted himself almost exclusively to advocacy of the abolition of slavery throughout the world, contributing a part of his large fortune to establish and promote societies for the benefit of the negro race. In 1829-31 he made a journey to the United States, Mexico, and Cuba to study slavery, in 1840-2 he visited for the same purpose the West Indies and in 1843-7 Greece, Egypt, Turkey, and the west coast of Africa. On 3 March, 1848, he was appointed under-secretary of the navy, and caused a decree to be issued by the provisional government which acknowledged the principle of the emancipation of the slaves through the French possessions. As president of a commission, Schoelcher prepared and wrote the decree of 27 April, 1848, which emancipated the French colonies. He was elected to the legislative assembly in 1848 and 1849 for Martinique, and introduced a bill for the abolition of the death-penalty, which was to be discussed on the day on which Prince Napoleon made his coup d'état. After 2 Dec. he emigrated to London, and, refusing to take advantage of the amnesties of 1856 and 1860, returned to France only after the declaration of war with Prussia in 1870. Organizing a legion of artillery, he took part in the defence of Paris, and in 1871 he was returned to the national assembly for Martinique. In 1855 he was elected senator for life. His works include "De l'esclavage des noirs et de la législation coloniale" (Paris, 1833); "Abolition de l'esclavage" (1840); "Les colonies françaises de l'Amérique" (1842); "Les colonies étrangères dans l'Amérique et Hythri" (2 vols., 1843); "Histoire de l'esclavage pendant les deux dernières années" (2 vols., 1847); "La vérité aux ouvriers et cultivateurs de la Martinique" (1850); "Les colonies noires et malteses contre des ascensions coloniales" (1851); "Le précé de la colonie de Marie-Galante" (1851); and "La grande aspiration du pillage et du meurtre à la Martinique" (1855).

SCHÖPF, Albin Franciscus, soldier, b. in Potogsch, Hungary, 1 March, 1822; d. in Buttsville, Md., 15 Jan., 1866. He entered the military academy at Vienna in 1837, became a lieutenant of artillery in 1841, and was promoted captain on the field for bravery. At the beginning of the Hungarian war for independence in 1848 he left the Austrian service, enlisted as a private in Louis Kossuth's army, and was soon made captain, and afterward major. After the suppression of the revolution he was exiled to Turkey, served under General Joseph Gellermann, and after a year returned to Vienna, and afterward became instructor of artillery in the Ottoman service, with the rank of major. In 1851 he came to the United States, and received an appointment in the U. S. coast survey. In 1858 he became an assistant examiner in the patent-office. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 30 Sept., 1861, Gen. Felix K. Zollicoffer, after a series of successes against the Kentucky home-guards, attacked his fortified position, called Wild Cat camp, on the hills of Rock Castle county, Ky., and was defeated; but the prestige thus gained for the National arms was sacrificed by Schoepf's precipitate retreat, by order of his superior officer, a few weeks later from London to Crab Orchard, which the Confederates called the Wild Cat stampede. Gen. Schoepf's incipient line of retreat was so rapid that he had no choice but to crush Schoepf's force at Fishing creek, or Mill springs, encountered Gen. George H. Thomas's entire army, and suffered a disastrous defeat. Gen. Schoepf's brigade fell in the pursuit of the enemy to Monticello. At Perryville he commanded a division under Gen. Charles C. Gillett. He served through the war, and was mustered out on 15 Jan., 1866. Returning to Washington, he was appointed principal examiner in the patent-office, which post he continued to fill until his death.

SCHOFF, Stephen Alonzo, engraver, b. in Danville, Vt., 16 Jan., 1818. He began engraving under the direction of Oliver Pelton, of Boston, with whom he remained until he was nearly of age, subsequently passing a short time with Joseph Andrews, the engraver, whose company in 1840 he visited Europe. There he spent about two years in Paris, studying drawing a part of the time at the school of Paul Delaroche, and perfecting himself in his art. On his return to this country he engaged in bank-note work in New York, and soon was employed upon his first important work, "Cains Mapas on the River" with the artist Albert Fisher. This plate was issued about 1845 and, to celebrate its publication and aid the young artist, the master American engraver, Asher Brown Durand, engraved the head and gave some touches to the figure. Other important works from the bavrin of
Mr. Schofield are William Penn, engraved for the Pennsylvania historical society, a folio portrait of Ralph Waldo Emerson from a drawing by Rowland and "The Bathers," after William M. Hunt. Mr. Schofield's work is executed in pure line, and exhibits much delicacy and a nice appreciation of the feeling of the artist he is reproducing. Recently he has turned his attention to etching, producing some beautiful plates. Mr. Schofield has at different times made Boston, Washington, and New York his home, but at present (1895) he resides at Roxwood, Va., in the active exercise of his profession.

SCHOFIELD, John McAllister, soldier, b. in Chautauqua county, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1831. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1853, in the same class with Philip H. Sheridan, James B. McPherson, and John B. Hood. He was assigned to the 1st regiment of artillery and served in garrison in South Carolina and Florida in 1854-5, and as assistant professor of natural philosophy at the U. S. military academy in 1855-56, being commissioned 1st lieutenant, 31 July, 1856. He was a captain, 14 May, 1861. On his departure from West Point in 1860 he obtained leave of absence and filled the chair of professor of physics at Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., until April, 1861. At the opening of the civil war he entered the volunteer service as major of the 1st Missouri volunteers, 26 April, 1861, and was appointed chief of staff to Gen. Nathaniel Lyon, with whom he served during his campaign in Missouri, including the battle of Wilson's Creek, in which Lyon was killed. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 21 Nov., 1861, and a few days later brigadier-general of Missouri militia, and he was in command of the Missouri forces from November, 1861, till November, 1862, and of the Army of the Frontier and the district of southwest Missouri from that date to April, 1863. He was appointed major-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, and from May, 1863, till February, 1864, was in command of the Department of the Missouri. He was then assigned to the command of the Department of the Ohio, and in April, 1864, joined the forces that were collecting near Chattanooga under Gen. William T. Sherman for the invasion of Georgia. He took part in the Atlanta campaign, being engaged at the battles of Rossea, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, and Atlanta. When Sherman left Atlanta on his march to the sea, Schofield, with the 23d army corps, was ordered back to Tennessee to form part of the army that was then being organized under Gen. George H. Thomas to resist Hood's invasion of Tennessee. Schofield retreated skillfully before the superior forces of Hood, inflicted a severe check upon him in a sharp battle at Franklin, 30 Nov., 1864, and joined him at Nashville, 1 Dec., 1864. For his services at the battle of Franklin he was made brigadier-general and brevet major-general in the regular army. He took part in the battle of Nashville and the subsequent pursuit of Hood's army. In January, 1865, he was detached from Thomas's command and sent with the 23d army corps by rail to Washington, and thence by transports to the mouth of Cape Fear river, the entire movement of 15,000 men with their artillery and baggage over a distance of 1,800 miles being accomplished in seventeen days. He was assigned to the command of the Department of North Carolina on 9 Feb., 1865, captured Wilmington on 22 Feb., was engaged in the battle of Pamlico Sound and joined Johnston at Tarboro on 22 March. He was present at the surrender of Johnston's army on 26 April, and was charged with the execution of the details of the capitulation. In June, 1865, he was sent to Europe on a special mission from the state department in regard to the French intervention in Mexico, and he remained until May, 1866. In August he was assigned to the command of the Department of the Potomac, with headquarters at Richmond. He was in charge of the 1st military district (the state of Virginia) from March, 1867, till May, 1868. Gen. Schofield succeeded Edwin M. Stanton as secretary of war, 2 June, 1868, and remained in that office until the close of Johnson's administration, and under Grant until 12 March, 1869, when he was appointed major-general in the regular army. He was assigned to the Department of the Missouri. He was in command of the Division of the Pacific from 1870 till 1876 and again in 1882 and 1883, superintendent of the U. S. military academy from 1876 till 1881, and in command of the Division of the Missouri from 1883 till 1886, when he took charge of the Division of the Atlantic. He became a major-general of the army, and later lieutenant-general, and was retired, on reaching the age of sixty-four, in 1895. He was president of the board that adopted the present tactics for the army (1879), went on a special mission to the Hawaiian islands in 1873, and was president of the board of inquiry on the case of Lieut. Pond in 1876.

SCHOMBURGK, Robert Herman, German explorer, b. in Freiburg on the Unstruth, Prussia, 4 June, 1804; d. in Schönberg, near Berlin, 11 March, 1865. He entered commercial life, and in 1826 came to the United States, where, after working as a clerk in Boston and Philadelphia, he became a partner in 1828 in a tobacco-manufactory at Richmond, Va. The factory was burned, and he commenced the manufacture of tobacco in portraits in the West Indies and Central America, he went to the island of Anegada, one of the Virgin group, where he undertook to make a survey of the coast. Although he did not possess the special knowledge that is required for such a work, he performed it well, and his reports procured him in 1834, from the geographical society of London and some botanists, means to explore the interior of British Guiana, which was then entirely unknown. After a thorough exploration during 1833-34 he went to London in the summer of 1839 with valuable collections of animals and plants, mostly new species, among them the magnificent water-lilies known now as the Victoria regia and the Elatística sagitaria, and many new species of birds, one of which has since been named for him the Schomburgkia orchis. Schomburgk sailed again from London for Georgetown in December, 1840, as president of a commission to determine the boundary-line between British Guiana and Brazil, and to make further geographical and ethnological observations. He joined General Strode and parties, and was rewarded. On his return to London in June, 1844, Schomburgk presented a report of his journey to the geographical society, for which the queen knighted him in 1845. After a few months' rest, he was given an appointment in the colonial department, and sent to make researches upon the idioms of the aborigines of South America. In 1848 he read before the British association a paper in which he proposed an alphabetical system for the Indian dialects. That same year he was appointed consul-general and charge d'affaires in the Dominican Republic, resigned in 1851 an advantageous commercial treaty for Great Britain, and also secured a truce from Souloque in behalf of the Dominican government. During the following years he contributed to the journal of the Geographical Society valuable papers upon the physical geography of the island. He was promoted in 1851, consul-general at Bangkok, Siam, and resided there till 1854, when declining health compelled him to resign. Schomburgk was a member of various European, American, and Asiatic learned societies, and was a knight of the Legion of Honor, and of the Prussian order of the Red Eagle. His works include: "Voyage in Guiana and upon the Shores of the Orinoco during the Years 1835–39" (London, 1840; translated into German by his brother, Sir Heinrich, and published under the title "Reisen in Brasilien und am Orinoco in den Jahren 1835–39," Leipzig, 1841, with a preface by Alexander von Humboldt); "Researches in Guiana, 1837–39" (1840); "Description of British Guiana, Geographical and Statistical" (1840); "Views in the Interior of Guiana" (1840); "Bananaena Alexandriana et Alexandrimum imperatris" (Brussul, 1845); "Paparea Frederici Augusti et Saxo-Prussianorum regum" (1845), being monographs of plants discovered by the author in British Guiana; "History of Barbadoes" (London, 1847); and "The Discovery of the Empire of Guiana by Sir Walter Raleigh" (1848).—Schomburgk's brother, Moritz Richard, published an account of the expedition in 1840–44, under the title "Reise in British Guiana in den Jahren 1840–44" (3 vols., Leipzig, 1847–8).

SCHOOLCRAFT, Lawrence, soldier, b. in Albany county, N. Y., in 1769; d. in Verona, Oneida co., N. Y., July 7, 1840. His grandfather, James, came from England in the reign of Queen Anne, settled in Albany county as a surveyor, and in later life was a teacher, and adopted the name of "Clerk," to distinguish himself from the clergy. He used the name of Calcraft. The grandson served during the Revolutionary war, and as a colonel in the second war with Great Britain. He was the superintendent of a large glass-factory ten miles west of Albany.—His son, Henry Rowe, ethnologist, b. in Albany county, N. Y., Feb. 21, 1793; d. in Washington, D. C., Oct. 10, 1864, was educated at Middlebury college, Vt., and at Union, where he pursued the studies of chemistry and mineralogy, learned the art of glass-making, and began a treatise on the subject entitled "Vitrology," the first part of which was published (Utica, 1817). In 1817–18 he traveled in Missouri and Arkansas, and returned with a large collection of geological and mineralogical specimens. In 1820 he was appointed geologist to Gen. Lewis Cass's exploring expedition to Lake Superior and the head-waters of the Mississippi river. He was secretary of a commission to treat with the Indians at Chicago, and, after a journey through Illinois and along Wabash and Miami rivers, was in 1822 appointed Indian agent for the tribes of the lake region, establishing himself at South-Baile Magee, and portraits at Michigan, where, in 1823, he married Jane Johnston, granddaughter of Waboojeg, a noted Ojibway chief, who had received her education in Europe. In 1828 he founded the Michigan historical society, and in 1831 the Algonian society. From 1828 till 1832 he was a member of the territorial legislature of Michigan. In 1832 he led a government expedition, which followed the Mississippi river up to its source in Minnesota and in 1833 he negotiated a treaty with the Indians on the upper lakes for the cession to the United States of 10,000,000 acres of their lands. He was then appointed acting superintendent of Indian affairs and in 1839 chief disbursing agent for the northern department. He then returned to Europe in 1842 he made a tour through western Virginia, Ohio, and Canada. He was appointed by the New York legislature in 1845 a commissioner to take the census of the Indians in the state, and collect information concerning the Six Nations. After the performance of this task, Congress authorized him, on March 14, 1847, to obtain through the Indian bureau reports relating to all the Indian tribes of the country, and to collate and edit the information. In this work he spent the remaining years of his life. Through his influence many laws were enacted for the protection and benefit of the Indians. Numerous scientific societies in the United States and Europe elected him to membership, and the University of Geneva gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1846. He was the author of numerous poems, lectures, and reports on Indian subjects, besides thirty-one larger works. Two of his lectures before the Algonian society at Detroit on the "Grammatical Construction of the Indian Languages" were translated into French by Peter S. Dupont, and gained for their author the gold medal from the French institute. His publications include "A View of the Lead-Mines of Missouri, including Observations on the Mineralogy and Geology of Missouri and Arkansas" (New York, 1849); a poem called "Trans-allegoria, or the Gooms of Missouri" (1829); "Journal of a Tour in the Interior of Missouri and Arkansas" (1829); "Travels in Detroit to the Sources of the Mississippi with an Expedition under Lewis Cass" (Albany, 1821); "Travels in the Central Portions of the Mississippi Valley" (New York, 1825); "The Rise of the West, or a Prospect of the Mississippi Valley," a poem (Detroit, 1825); "Indian Melodies," a poem (1839); "The Man of Bronze" (1834); "Narrative of an Expedition through the Upper Mississippi to Itasca Lake" (New York, 1834); "Jesco, or the Vale of Norma" (Detroit, 1834); "Algonic Researches," a book of Indian allegories and legends (New York, 1839); "Cyclopedia indianness," of which only a single number was issued (1842); "Alhalla, or the Land of Tahledegina," a poem published under the pen-name "Henry Rowe Coleray" (1843); "Oneota, or Characteristics of the Red River of America" (1844–5), which was republished under the title of "The Indian and his Wigwam" (1848); "Report on Aboriginal Names and the Geographical Terminology of New York" (1845); "Plan for Investigating American Ethnology" (1846); "Notes on the Iroquois," containing his report on the Six Nations (Albany, 1844); "The United States (Washington, 1848); "American Indians, their History, Condition, and Prospects" (Auburn, 1850); "Personal Memoirs of a Residence of Thirty Years with the Indian Tribes on the American Frontiers, 1812 to 1842" (Philadelphia, 1854); "Historical and Statistical Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States," with illustrations by Capt. Seth Eastman, published by authority of congress, which appropriated nearly $30,000 a volume for the purpose (5 vols., 1851-55); "Scenes and Adventures in the Semi-Alpine Region of the Ozark Mountains of Missouri and Arkansas," a revised edition of his first book of travel (1853); "Summary Narrative of an Expeditionary Exploration to the Mississippi River in 1828, its results and completed by the Discovery of its Origin in the asen Lake in 1829" (1854); "Helderberg, or the Apothesis of the Heroes of the Anti-Rent War," an anonymous poem (Albany, 1855); and "The Myth of Hiawatha, and other Oral Legends" (1856). The Indian Fairy-Book, from Original Legends" (New York, 1855), was compiled from notes that he furnished to the editor, Cornelia Mathews. To the five volumes of Indian researches compiled under the direction of the war department he added a sixth, containing the post-

Columbian history of the Indians and of their relations with Europeans (Philadelphia, 1857). He had collected material for two additional volumes, but the government suddenly suspended the publication of the work. His wife, Mary Howard, b. in Beaufort, S.C., was his assistant in the preparation of his later works, when he was confined to his chair by paralysis and unable to use his hands.

They were married in 1817, five years after the death of his first wife. Mrs. Schenck's family was the author of "The Black Guantlet, a Tale of Plantation Life," the "Memoirs of the Governor," and "The Highlanders East and West," which were shown to the editor, Cornelia Mathews. In 1854, he was appointed one of its members.

ated at Yale in 1830, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1835, and practised in Kingston. He was a member of the state senate in 1834-35, and, as chairman of a special committee on the code drew up amendments that constituted a thorough revision of the act. He was elected to congress as a Whig, and served from 1 Dec., 1851, till 3 March, 1853. In 1854 he was auditor of the canal department, and in 1855-6 he served as superintendent of the bank department of the state of New York. He was president of the Kingston board of education from its establishment in 1853 till 1872, and in 1867 was a member of the State constitutional convention. He had published speeches in congress on "Public Lands" (Washington, 1852) and "The Slave Question" (1852), and is the author of a "History of Kingston from its First Settlement to 1829," which was published in 1888.

SCHOONMAKER, Martinus, clergyman, b. in Rochester, Ulster co., N.Y., in 1787; d. in Flatbush, N.Y., in 1824. He was licensed to preach in 1765, was pastor of the Dutch Reformed church at Gravesend for several years, and till he fixed his residence at Flatbush, and assumed charge of the six congregations in Kingscounty. During the Revolution he was made a deacon and influential Whig. He was the last of the ministers that preached only in Dutch till the end of their lives. The church, six-sided and with a funnel-roof, in which he ministered at New Utrecht, is shown in the illustration.

SCHOTT, Charles Anthony, civil engineer, b. in Mainzheim, Germany, 7 Aug., 1826. He studied at the Lyceum in Mainzheim, and then was graduated as a civil engineer in 1847 at the Polytechnical school in Carlsruhe. In 1848 he came to the United States and entered the service of the coast survey. He was advanced to the grade of assistant in 1856, and still (1888) holds his place. Mr. Schott is a member of the Philosophical societies of Philadelphia and Washington, and a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and in 1872 was elected to the National academy of science. His writings include numerous memoirs of special investigations on hydrography, geology, and particularly on terrestrial magnetism, which appeared in the annual reports of the U.S. coast and geodetic survey since 1854. In addition to these, he has published, through the medium of the Smithsonian institution, "Magnetic Observations in the Arctic Seas," reduced and discussed from material collected by Elisha K. Kane (1858); "Meteorological Observations in the Arctic Seas," likewise collected by Elisha K. Kane during the second Grinnell expedition (1859); "Astronomical Observations in the Arctic Seas," from data collected by Elisha K. Kane (1860); "Tidal Observations in the Arctic Seas" (1860); "Meteorological Observations in the Arctic Seas," from results made on board the arctic searching vessel "Fox" in Baffin bay and Prince Regent's inlet in 1857-9 (1862); and "Physical Observations in the Arctic Seas," from data collected by Isaac I. Hayes (1866); "Results of Meteorological Observations made at Brunswick, Me., between 1807 and 1859 (1867); "Results of Meteorological Observations made at Marietta, Ohio, between 1826 and 1859 inclusive" (1868); "Tables and Results of the Precipitation in Rain and Snow in the United States, and at Some Stations in Adjacent Parts of North America, and in Central and South America" (1852; a second edition under the title "Distribution and Variations of the Atmospheric Temperature in the United States and Some Adjacent Parts of America" (1876); and "Magnetic Charts of the United States," showing the distribution of the declination, the dip and the intensity of the magnetic force (1882 and 1885).

SCHOUTEN, Willem Cornelis (sho'-ten), Dutch navigator, b. in Hoorn in 1567; d. in Antongil bay, Madagascar, in 1625. He had been for years in the employ of the Dutch East India company, when he quarrelled with one of the directors and resigned in 1610. From that time he resolved to find a new route to the Indies, eluding the charter of the East India company. He interested in his scheme Hoorn's richest citizen, Isaac Lemaire, and they formed a company with a capital of 200,000 florins, half being furnished by Isaac Lemaire and an eighth by Schouten. The expedition left the Texel, 14 June, 1615, Schouten being the commander, and a son of Isaac, James Lemaire, acting as his deputy and director-general. The details of the discoveries are to be found in the article LEMAIRE, JAMES. The navigators were arrested at Batavia by George Spielberg for infringing upon the privileges of the East India company, but on Schouten's arrival in Holland, he secured an acquittal, and even compelled the company to pay him heavy damages. He resumed the exercise of his profession, and was returning to Europe after a successful voyage to the Indies, when stress of weather forced him to the bay of Antongil, and he died there. A narrative of Schouten's expedition was written by Aris Chasson, the clerk of the admiral, and published under the title "Scheeps-terurnal en Beschrijving van de bouwende-wijze van de veertien wiggen" (The Hague, 1625).—Willem Cornelis Schouten, geboren te Hoorn, toen hij heeft ontdekt ten Zuiden van de zee-wegte van Magelhao een nieuwe doorgang in de groote Zuidzee" (Amsterdam, 1617). It was translated into French (Amsterdam, 1617), into German (Arnheim, 1618), and into Latin (Amsterdam, 1619). The name of Schouten has been given to an island that he discovered off the coast of Southern California.

SCHREIBER, Collingwood, Canadian engineer, b. in Colchester, Essex, England, 14 Dec., 1831. He came to Canada in 1852, and was engaged on the engineering staff of the Hamilton and Toronto railway till its completion in 1856. He then engaged in private engineering in Toronto till 1860, when he entered the service of the Northern railway of Canada. In 1866 he was engaged by the government of Nova Scotia as division engineer on the Pictou railway, and he continued in this service till 1867, when the works were completed. In 1868 the Dominion government appointed him to take charge of the surveys in connection with the Intercolonial railway, of the route by the way of Lake Timiskaming; and in 1869, as superintendent, he was placed in charge of the extension railway. In 1871 he was appointed superintendent and commissioner's agent for the entire length of the Intercolonial railway, which post he held till 1873, when he was made chief engineer of government railways in operation, and in 1889 he was also made chief engineer of the survey of the Canadian Pacific railway. In 1892 he was appointed chief engineer of the railways and canals in Canada, and deputy minister of the same, which position he still holds.

and meritorious services in the field on 1 Aug., 1864, and major-general. U. S. army, on 13 March, 1865. From 10 Dec., 1865, till 15 April, 1871, he was on special duty in the secretory of war's office and in charge of the inspection bureau, and in 1866-71 was inspector of the U. S. military academy, was on a tour of inspection in Texas, New Mexico, and Kansas, and of the recruiting service in the U. S. army. He was particularly upon the affairs of the Freedmen's bureau in 1873, was on duty in the war department in 1872-76, and was made inspector of the division of the Pacific on 29 May, 1876. From 16 Nov. to 13 Dec., 1877, he was a member of the retiring board in San Francisco, and of the board to examine the case of Rev. William A. Hamburgh, A. M., of the U. S. army. He was retired in January, 1881.

SCHROEDER, John Frederick, clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 8 April, 1809; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1857. After graduation at Princeton with the highest honor in 1819, he studied Hebrew, entered the general theological seminary of the Episcopal church, then in New Haven; he afterwards entered the Baltimore theological seminary in 1823. He was an assistant minister at Trinity church, New York city, from 1824 till 1838, when he travelled in Europe. On his return in 1839 he resigned his charge at Trinity church, and established in Flushing, L. I., a school for girls, which he called St. Ann's hall, and which he removed to New York in 1840, where he was made rector of the Church of the Crucifixion, and to Brooklyn, when he was called to St. Thomas's church in 1852, which charge he resigned shortly before his death. He delivered many lectures, was a member of the New England historic genealogical society, active in public charities, and rendered much service during the cholera epidemics of 1832-4. Princeton and Yale gave him the degree of A. M. in 1823 and of A. M. (now Trinity) college that of S. T. D. in 1836. He edited a volume of original essays and dissertations on biblical literature by a society of clergyman, to which he contributed treatises translated from the German, on "The Authenticity and Canonical Authority of the Scriptures of the Old Testament" and the "Use of the Hebrew Language in Early Christian Literature," published December, 1840. He is the author of "The New Historical Society" (New York, 1828); "A Useful Chart of the Diocese of New York from 1830 to 1850"; "Memoir of Mrs. Mary Anna Boardman" (New Haven, 1849); and "Maxims of Washington" (New York, 1855); and several other books. He left unfinished "The Life and Times of Washington" which was edited by others (1857-61).

SCHUTTE, Conrad Herman Louis, clergyman, b. in Valrel, Hanover, Germany, 17 June, 1813. He was graduated at Capitol university, Columbus, Ohio, in 1863, and at the theological department in 1865, and was ordained to the ministry in the latter year. He was pastor at Delaware, Ohio, in 1865-72, had been professor of mathematics and natural science in Capital university since 1872, and since 1881 also professor of ethics, symbols, and homiletics in the theological department. He is a frequent contributor to the religious press, has been editor-in-chief of the "Columbus Theological Magazine" since 1886, and has published "The Church Member's Manual" (Columbus, 1879); and "The State, the Church, and the School" (1883).

SCHULTZ, John Christian, Canadian senator, b. in Aincberst, Ont., 1 Jan., 1849; d. in Winnipeg, 13 April, 1896. He was educated at 0berlin, in medicine at Queen's university, and Victoria university, Colourg, and was graduated as a physician in 1860. The same year he went to the northwest and practised his profession at Fort Garry (now Winnipeg). He also engaged in the fur-trade, wrote for the "Norwestern," and studied the fauna, flora, soil, and climate of the country. Dr. Schultz was leader of the Canadian party at the time of the first Riel rebellion in 1869-70, and was captured, imprisoned, and sentenced to death by Louis Riel. After suffering great hardships he escaped and reached Duluth, Minn., whence he made his way to Canada. He was appointed a member of the Northwest council in December, 1872, was elected to the Dominion parliament in March, 1874, for Lisgar, Manitoba, and represented that constituency at the general election of 1874, when he was defeated. He became a member of the Canadian senate, 22 Sept., 1882. Dr. Schultz was a member of the Dominion board of health for Manitoba and the Northwest territories, was president of the Northwest trading company, and a director of the Manitoba Northwestern Colonization railway. He was actively engaged in organizing these enterprises, and was president of the theater, and a member of the city council of the Northwest. After resigning his seat in the Senate, he went to England, where he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and was instrumental in having the northwest have the right of representation in Parliament. He held, in the House of Commons, the seat of the late Sir John A. Macdonald, and succeeded him in the presidency of the Northwest. After the death of Sir John, he was succeeded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

jutant, and took part in the defense of Rastadt. On the surrender of that fortress he escaped to Switzerland. In 1850 he returned secretly to Germany, and effected the escape of Kinkel from the fortress of Spandau. In the spring of 1851 he was in Paris, acting as correspondent for German journals, and he afterward spent a year in teaching in London. He came to the United States in 1852, resided three years in Philadelphia, and then settled in Watertown, Wis. In the presidential canvass of 1856 he delivered speeches in German in behalf of the Republican party, and in the following year he was an unsuccessful candidate for lieutenant-governor of Wisconsin. During the contest between Stephen A. Douglas and Abraham Lincoln for the office of U. S. senator from Illinois in 1858 he delivered his famous 'House Divided' speech, which was widely published. Soon afterward he removed to Milwaukee and began the practice of law. In 1859-60 he made a lecture-tour in New England, and aroused attention by a speech in Springfield, Mass., against the ideas and policy of Mr. Douglas. He was a member of the Republican national convention of 1860, and spoke both in English and German on the campaign. President Lincoln appointed him minister to Spain, but he resigned in December, 1861, in order to enter the army. In April, 1862, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and on 17 June took command of a division in the corps of Gen. Franz Sigel, with which he participated in the second battle of Bull Run. He was made major-general of volunteers in March, 1863, and at the battle of Chickamauga commanded a division of Gen. Oliver O. Howard's corps. He had temporary command of this corps at Gettysburg, and subsequently took part in the battle of Chattanooga. During the summer of 1865 he visited the southern states, as special commissioner, appointed by President Johnson, for the purpose of examining their condition. In the winter of 1865-6 he was the Washington correspondent of the New York "Tribune," and in the summer of 1866 he removed to Detroit, where he founded the "Post." In 1867 he became editor of the "Westliche Post," a German newspaper published in St. Louis. He was temporary chairman of the Republican national convention in Chicago in 1868, where he moved an amendment to the platform, which was adopted, recommending a general amnesty. In January, 1869, he was chosen U. S. senator from Missouri, for the term ending in 1875. He opposed some of the chief measures of President Grant's administration, and in 1872 took an active part in the organization of the Liberal party, presiding over the convention in Cincinnati that nominated George B. McClellan for the presidency. After the election of 1872 he took an active part in the debates of the senate in favor of the restoration of specie payments and against the continuation of military interference in the south. He advocated the election of Rutherford B. Hayes in the presidential canvass of 1876, and in 1877 President Hayes appointed him secretary of the interior. He introduced competitive examinations for appointments in the interior department, and successfully carried through reform in the Indian service, and adopted systematic measures for the proper location and settlement of the forests on the public lands. After the expiration of the term of President Hayes he became editor of the "Evening Post" in New York city, giving up that place in January, 1884. In the presidential canvass of that year he was one of the leaders of the "Independent" movement, advocating the election of Grover Cleveland. He became an active member of the civil service reform league. Among his most celebrated speeches are: "The Irrepressible Conflict" (1858); "The Doom of Slavery" (1860); "The Abolition of Slavery as a War Measure" (1862); and "Eulogy on Charles Summer" (1874). Of his speeches in the senate, those on the reconstruction measures, against the annexation of Santo Domingo, and on the currency and the national banking system attracted much attention. He has published a volume of speeches (Philadelphia, 1856) and a "Life of Henry Clay" (Boston, 1857).

SCHUSSELE, Christian, artist, b. in Gnesen, in Pomerania, 5 July, 1821; d. in Munich, 4 Feb., 1882. He studied under Adolphe Yvon and Paul Delaroche in 1842-8, and then came to the United States. Here, for some time, he was employed in decorating and designing, but he had also followed in France, but later he devoted himself almost entirely to painting. His best-known works are "Clear the Track" (1851); "Franklin before the Lords in Council" (1856); "Men of Progress" (1857), in Cooper Institute, New York; "Zelisberger preaching to the Indians" (1859); "The Iron-Worker and King Solomon" (1860); "Washington at Valley Forge" (1862); "Home on Furlough" and "McClellan at Antietam" (1863). About 1863 he was attacked by palsy in the right hand, and in 1865 he went abroad, undergoing severe treatment, with no apparent benefit. On his return, in 1868, he was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of S. T. Aiken in South Carolina. Subsequently, he founded, of drawing and painting in the Pennsylvania academy, which he held until his death. During this period he produced "Queen Esther denomoung Haman," owned by the academy (1859), and "The Abasian Fair" (1870). Most of the paintings that have been named became widely known through the large prints made of them by Sartain and other engravers.

SCHUYLER, Peter, first mayor of Albany, b. in Albany, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1657; d. there, 19 Feb., 1724. He was the second son of Philip Schuyler, the first of the family, who emigrated from Amsterdam, and, settling in Albany, became a well-known merchant in that town. The father was ambitious to become a landed proprietor, and at his death in 1683 he left property not only in Albany, but in New York city and along the Hudson. In 1667 he was made captain of a company of Albany militia, and was conspicuous throughout his life for his friendship with the Indians. Peter began his public career in March, 1665, by receiving an appointment as lieutenant in the militia of Albany, from which he rose to the rank of colonel, the highest grade conceded to a native of New York. He also received during the same year the office of judge of the court of oyer and terminer, and in October, 1855, was made a justice of the peace. On 22 July, 1858, Albany was incorporated as a city, and Peter Schuyler became its first mayor. He was also chairman of the board of county commissioners, and was appointed by the mayor to deal with the savages better than any man of his time. During the difficulties between the French and English on the northern boundary he conducted all negotiations with the Five Nations and other Indians. In 1859 he had command of the army that was sent against the French and Indians, and defeated the invading forces from Canada. He was made a member of the council in 1862 and used every effort to relieve the sufferings of the settlers on the frontiers, who were exposed to the ravages of the Indians. In the expedition against Montreal in 1709 he was second in command, and led one of the New York regiments, but, from lack of supplies and proper support, the French were allowed to retreat, and the expedition proved abortive. He regained their allegiance, looking upon the French as formidable enemies and the English as incompetent protectors, and accordingly an appeal was made to England for means to conquer Canada. Col. Schuyler, accompanied by five chiefs, sailed for England in December, 1709, and was absent for seven months. Queen Anne offered to confer on him the order of Knighthood, but he declined, although he accepted a gold snuff-box and some pieces of silver plate as well as a diamond brooch and earrings for his wife. In July, 1719, he became president of the council, acting as governor until the arrival of Peter Burnet in September, 1720. He continued active in the affairs of the colony thereafter until his death. His nephew, Peter, soldier, b. probably near Newark, N. J., in 1710; d. at Peterborough, his farm (now Newark, N. J.), 7 March, 1762, was left an ample estate by his father, Arent, and, becoming interested in military affairs, qualified himself to assume command of troops should the necessity occur. When it was determined to invade Canada, he was authorized to raise an independent regiment as soon as the newly elected colonel on 7 Sept., 1746, commanding a regiment that became known as the "Jersey Blues." He arrived in Albany early in September, and, although the expedition was abandoned, he was assigned to Fort Clinton, in Saratoga, which he held until 1747, when lack of provisions compelled its abandonment. The peace of Aix la Chapelle in 1748 terminated the war, and he returned to his home in New Jersey. In 1754 the war was again renewed, and, taking the field at the head of his regiment, he was stationed at Oswego, where, in 1756, he and one half of his regiment were captured by Gen. Montcalm. He was taken to Montreal and then to Quebec, where he remained until October, 1757, when he was released on parole. While in prison he spent his money liberally in caring for his fellow-captives, buying the freedom of the Indians, and providing food for his countrymen at his own residence, also supplying them with clothing. He was received with great enthusiasm on his return home. During the campaign of 1759 he served with his regiment under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst, and an attempt with the enemy that closed with the conquest of Canada. At the end of the campaign he settled on his estate, but died a few years later.—Aaron, a descendant of Arent, the first Peter's brother, educator, b. in Seneca county, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1828, was educated at Seneca academy, Ohio, of which he was principal from 1851 till 1862, and from the latter year until 1875 he was professor of mathematics in Baldwin university, Ohio. From 1875 till 1885 he was president of that university, and he is now (1888) vice-president and professor of mathematics and astronomy in Kansas-Wesleyan university, Salina, Kans. He has written "The Development of Algebra with Special Reference to its Graphic Representation," "The Elements of Geometry," "Principles of Arithmetic," "Higher Arithmetic," "Elements of Geometry," "Psychology," "Empirical and Rational Psychology," and "The Bible in the Light of Science."—Montgomery, a descendant of Arent, the first Peter's brother, b. in New York city, 9 Jan., 1814; d. in St. Louis, 19 March, 1896, entered Hobart college in 1830, and, leaving at the end of his junior year, was graduated at Union in 1834. He then studied law, and, after four years of mercantile life, entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church in Ohio. He was ordained a priest in 1857. He has been one of the standing committees of the diocese of Missouri since 1858, and frequently a delegate to the general convention of the church, besides being president of the diocesan conventions that elected the second and third bishops of Missouri. In addition to many sermons, he has published "The Church, Its Ministry and Worship" (Buffalo, 1865); "The Pioneer Church" (Boston, 1867); and "The Historical Discourse of Christ Church, St. Louis" (St. Louis, 1870).—Montgomery's son, Louis Sandford, clergyman, b. in Buffalo, N. Y., 12 March, 1852; d. in Memphis, Tenn., 17 Sept., 1878, was graduated at Hobart in 1871, and entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church in 1874. Afterward he was called to the diocese of St. John the Evangelist, under whose direction he continued his ministry. He volunteered to go to Memphis, Tenn., during the yellow-fever epidemic in 1878, and there fell a victim to the disease. Services in his memory were held in the churches throughout the United States. See: A Memorial of Louis Sandford Schuyler, Priest (New York, 1879).—Montgomery's cousin, Anthony, clergyman, b. in Geneva, N. Y., 8 July, 1816, was graduated at Geneva (now Hobart) college in 1835, after which he studied law in Ithaca, where he practised for ten years. He then studied for the ministry and was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1840. Two years later he was chosen rector of Christ church in Oswego, N. Y., where he continued until 1862, when he was called to Christ church in Rochester. In 1868 he accepted charge of Grace church in Orange, N. J., where he has since remained. He has been chairman of the standing committee on the constitution and canons since the foundation of the diocese of northern New Jersey (now Newark), and has represented that diocese at the general conventions of his church. The degree of S. T. D. was conferred on him by Hobart in 1859, and he has published sermons and addresses, including a series of sermons on "Household Religion" (New York, 1857).

Anthony's son, Montgometry, journalist, b. in Ithaca, N. Y., 19 Aug., 1843, entered Hobart college in 1858, but was not graduated. He became connected with the New York Times, and remained with this journal until 1883, when he joined the editorial staff of the New York "Times." Mr. Schuyler has given special study to architecture, and has published critical papers on that art in "Sinorier's Magazine," "Harper's Magazine," "The American Architect," and similar periodicals, as well as occasional poems. In 1875 and 1876, he was the joint author of "The Brooklyn Bridge." "New York," 1885.

George Washington, great-grandson of the first Peter's brother, Philip, state official, b. in Stillwater, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1840; d. in Ithaca, N. Y., 1 Feb., 1888, was graduated at the University of New York in 1865, and at first studied theology, but then engaged in business in Ithaca, N. Y. In 1865-6 he was treasurer of the state, after which, on 3 Jan., 1866, he was appointed superintendent of the banking department of New York, and served until February, 1870. He was elected to the assembly in 1875, was chairman of its committee on banks and banking, and during his membership obtained the passage of the general savings-bank law, and of a law for the protection of bank engagements. From 1 Jan., 1876, till May, 1880, he was auditor of the canal department, and was the first to propose making the canals free waterways by the abolition of tolls, which was subsequently effected by constitutional amendment.

Mr. Schuyler was a trustee of Cornell university from its foundation, and its treasurer in 1868-74. He was the author of "Colonial New York: Philip Schuyler and his Family," 2 vols., New York, 1885.—George Washington's son, Eugene, diplomatist, b. in Ithaca, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1840; d. in Venice, Italy, 16 July, 1890, was graduated at Yale and at Columbia law-school, after which he practised law, and devoted his leisure to literary pursuits. He entered the diplomatic service of the United States in 1869, and was consul at Moscow in 1867-79, and at Reval in 1880-70, and secretary of legation at St. Petersburg in 1870-6. While holding the last place he was on several occasions acting chargé d'affaires, and in 1873, during a leave of absence, made a journey of eight months through Russian Turkestan, Khokan, and Bokhara. He became secretary of legation and consular-general in Constantinople in 1876, during the summer of that year, was sent to invest the Turkish mandates in Bulgaria, and made an extended report to his government, which did much to influence the subsequent history of that part of Turkey. In 1878 he was sent to Birmingham as consul, and a year later he was transferred to Rome as consul-general, after which, in 1880, he became charge d'affaires and consular-general in Belgrade; in 1882, he was sent to Belgrade to conclude and sign commercial and consular treaties with Roumania and Servia. From 1882 till 1884 he was minister resident and consular-general to Greece, Servia, and Roumania, and he then returned to the United States, where he resumed his literary work, and also lectured. He was elected a corresponding member of the Roumanian academy, and also to the London, Russian, Italian, and American geographical societies, and decorations were presented to him by the governments of Russia, Greece, Roumania, Servia, and Bulgaria. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Williams in 1882, and by Yale in 1885. In addition to contributions to magazines and reviews in the United States and England, he edited John A. Porter's, "Selections from the Kalevai" (New York, 1865); translated Ivan Turgeneff's "Fathers and Sons" (1867); and Leo Tolstoy's "The Cossacks, a Tale of the Caucasus," (1878), and was the author of "Turkistan : Notes of a Journey in Russian Turkestan, Khokan, Bokhara, and Kuldja" (1876); "Peter the Great, Emperor of Russia" (2 vols., 1884); and "American Diplomats and the Furtherance of Commerce" (1896).

Schuyler, Philip John, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 22 Nov., 1755; d. there, 18 Nov., 1804. He was the second son of John, nephew of Peter. He studied at schools in Albany, and received his higher education in New Rochelle, N. Y., where he was placed under the care of a Huguenot minister. In 1755, at the opening of the last French and Indian war, he was authorized by James De Lancey, acting governor of the province, to recruit a company for the army, and he was commissioned its captain on June, 1755. His company served under General Phineas Lyman, and took part in the battle of Lake George on 18 Sept., 1755. Schuyler spent the ensuing winter at Fort Edward, and in the spring of 1756 accompanied Col. John Bradstreet to Oswego as commissary. In an attack that was made on the colonial force on their return by a superior number, he showed unusual ability and military skill. The incapacity of the British generals and apparent indifference of the authorities in London led to his resigning from the army in 1755, but he was frequently consulted in an advisory capacity and at times in providing supplies for the army. In the spring of 1758, at the earnest solicitation of Bradstreet, he joined the army again as his deputy commissary, with the rank of major, and served until the close of the campaign. Much important business was transacted directly by him, owing to Bradstreet's feeble health, and in 1761 he went to England, as the latter's agent, to settle accounts with the home government. After the peace of 1763 he turned to the management of his private business. His property was large, and his estate in the Catskill mountains, purchased in timber, which he transported down the Hudson on his own vessels to New York. He also built a flax-mill, the first of its kind in the country, for which he received a medal from the Society for promoting arts. In 1764 he was appointed by the general assembly of New York a commissioner to manage the controversy on the part of his province respecting the boundary-line between the colony and Massachusetts bay, and later he was concerned in the settlement of the similar difficulty between New York and the New Hampshire grants. He was appointed colonel of a new regiment of militia in the territory lying north of Albany, and in 1768 was chosen to represent Albany in the colonial assembly. He advocated the bold measures of the times in support of the rights of the colonists in spite of the majority, and came to be the acknowledged leader of the opposition. He inspired hope and courage among his constituents, and it was on his nomination in 1770 that Edmund Burke became agent in England for the colony of New York. He was a delegate to the Continental congress convened in Philadelphia in May, 1775, by which he was placed on a committee with George Washington to draw up rules and regulations for the army. On the recommendation of the Provincial congress of New York he was appointed on 19 June one of the four major-generals that were named by congress.

He accompanied Washington from Philadelphia, and was assigned by him to the command of the northern department of New York. Proceeding to Albany, he at once engaged in the difficult task of organizing an army for the invasion of Canada. Troops were collected, but lack of arms, ammunition, and pay delayed any movement. There was also considerable ill feeling between the commanders of the colonial forces as to questions of relative rank, particularly at first between Ethan Allen and Jonathan Titon. The latter was sent to Ticonderoga with the object of placing that fort and Crown Point in a state of defence. Subsequently the failure of Schuyler's health led to his transferring the command to Gen. Richard Montgomery. He then returned to Albany, where he continued his exertions in raising troops and forwarding supplies to the army. After the death of Montgomery he assumed entire command of the American army. Early in 1776 he directed an expedition to Johnstown, where he seized the military stores that had been collected by Sir John Johnson. Jealousy existed among the officers at the front, and the New England contingent, especially, was dissatisfied with his leader, in consequence of which Gen. John Thomas was directed by congress to take command of the army in the field, while Schuyler was continued in Albany exercising the general direction of affairs, and especially the duties of quartermaster-general and commissary-general. During the early part of 1776 he was kept continually busy by the movements of Sir John Johnson and other Tories in the Mohawk valley, the constant receipt of supplies by complaints that were sent by his enemies to Gen. Washington and congress. Schuyler's perfect knowledge of the situation, the topography of the country, and the available supplies, led him to doubt the expediency of continuing the American forces in Canada; but, in opposition to his recommendation, congress persisted in its action, and the weak army under the influence of small-pox, oppressed with want, and lacking in discipline, was kept on the frontier. Meanwhile a strong British force, under Gen. John Burgoyne, had arrived in Canada, and the American army had fallen back on Crown Point greatly reduced in numbers. In May, Gen. Horatio Gates was ordered to the command of the army in Canada, which had been made vacant by the death of Gen. Thomas. On reaching Albany, believing himself in command of the department, he issued orders that conflicted with those of Schuyler, in consequence of which the latter agreed to cooperate with him, and meanwhile submitted the question of precedence to congress, through Gen. Washington. That body, however, decided that the colonel-in-chief should have precedence with each other. Schuyler occupied himself at this time in negotiations with the Six Nations, in virtue of his office of Indian commissioner, and in fitting out a fleet for operations on Lake Champlain. Gates was not satisfied with the action of congress and began to intrigue for the removal of Schuyler, who, on 14 Sept., 1776, formally offered his resignation, but congress declared that it could not dispense with his service, and its president, John Hancock, requested him to continue in command. Great credit is due to Schuyler for conducting the affairs of this department under peculiar adverse conditions; and the success of his resignation was the result of persistent neglect on the part of congress to take action on his appeals for supplies and men, as well as their habit of conferring directly with Gates, who openly used his influence among the New England delegates to have himself confirmed as commanding general. In spite of chronic illness, Schuyler acquiesced in the action of congress, and continued to direct the campaigns of Gates and in preparing defenses to meet Burgoyne, whose invasion was confidently expected. Early in 1777 he was chosen to represent New York in the Continental congress, and was appointed chief of the military in the state of Pennsylvania. He then made his appeal to congress concerning letters of censure that had been sent to him from that body's Pennsylvania delegates. It was clear, however, that he was directed to proceed to the Northern department and take command there. Closing his official work in Pennsylvania, where he had rendered excellent service in organizing the militia, Schuyler returned to Albany early in June, and proceeded with his preparations for an attack from Canada. The advance of Burgoyne forced the American army to retreat until Pennsylvania was evacuated by Gen. Arthur St. Clair on 4 July, his force being wholly inadequate to its defense, and other retrograde movements followed. The great victory at Bennington, however, had been won before 19 Aug., when Gates took command of the army in virtue of a resolution passed by congress on 1 Aug. When this action was taken Gates had been for some time absent from the army in Philadelphia, using his influence to injure Schuyler, whom he charged with neglect of duty in permitting the evacuation of Fort Ticonderoga. The selection of Gates to the command was made by congress after Washington had declined to act. A committee of investigation was authorized by congress, and by a unanimous vote the state of Pennsylvania was reenacted, which declared itself unanimously of opinion that Schuyler was "not guilty of any neglect of duty," and acquitted him "with the highest honor," which proceeding congress tardily confirmed several months later. Schuyler continued with the army in a private capacity until the surrender of Burgoyne. He finally succeeded in effecting his resignation on 14 April, 1779.

Before his vindication by the court-martial he was chosen, in October, 1778, by the New York legislature a representative in congress; but he refused to take his seat until the sentence had been confirmed, after which he was a member of congress until 1781. Meanwhile he continued to act as Indian commissioner, holding council-like meetings with the different tribes of the Six Nations. Although unwilling to enter active military service again, he was appointed in 1779 to confer with Washington on the state of the Southern department, and divided his time thereforth until the close of the war between congress and Washington's headquarters, where he became one of the most trusted counsellors of the commander-in-chief. In 1780 he was elected state senator from the western district of New York, and he served until 1784, again from 1786 till 1790, and finally from 1792 till 1797. Throughout his political life he was a Federalist, and with Alexander Hamilton and John Jay shared the leadership of that party. His influence was strongly exerted in favor of the formation of the Union, and during the administrations of Washington his power was very great. Not only was he chairman of the board of commissioners for Indian affairs, but in 1782 he was made surveyor-general of the state, and also a member of the council of appointment of New York. In December, 1788, he and Rufus King were chosen the first senators of New York, and he held that office from 4 March, 1789, till 3 March, 1791. Again, succeeding Aaron Burr, he filled the same office from 15 May, 1797, till 3 Jan., 1798, when a severe attack of the gout, from which he had been a life-long sufferer, compelled his resignation. For Schuyler may be claimed the paternity of the canal system of New York. As early as 1776 he made a calculation of the actual cost of a canal that should connect Hudson river with Lake Champlain. Later he was a strong advocate of the building of the canal between the Hudson and Lake Erie. He was one of the principal contributors to the code of laws that was adopted by the state of New York, and in 1784 was one of the subscribers to the funds for the building of Union College. His residence in Albany (shown in the illustration) for more than forty years was distinguished by its generous hospitality. There Baron Dieskau became convalescent after his capture, and there the remains of Lord Howe were conveyed after his untimely death at Ticonderoga. During the Revolutionary war the congressional commissioners to Canada—Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Chase, and Charles Carroll—were entertained at this residence in April, 1776. Later, Gen. Burgoyne and his suite made it their home while in Albany, and Lafayette was among the host of guests that partook of its hospitality. Gen. Schuyler was buried with military honors in the vault of Gen. Abraham Ten Breeze, but finally his remains were deposited in the Albany Rural cemetery, where, in 1871, a Doric column of Quincy granite, thirty-six feet in height, was erected to his memory. See “The Life and Times of Philip Schuyler,” by Benson J. Lossing (2 vols., New York, 1860-2; enlarged ed., 1872).—His wife, Catharine Van Rensselaer, d. in Albany, 7 March, 1803, was the daughter of John Van Rensselaer, the great-grandson of Killiam, the first patron of Rensselaerwyck, and married Gen. Schuyler on 17 Sept., 1773. She was the mother of eleven children, of whom Elizabeth married Alexander Hamilton; and Margarita, Stephen Van Rensselaer, the patron.—Philip’s grandson, George Lee, b. in Rhinebeck, N.Y., 9 June, 1811; d. in New York city, 31 July, 1890. He married successively two granddaughters of Alexander Hamilton. Mr. Schuyler was active in peace matters, and in 1889 the “America’s cup” was returned to him, as its sole surviving donor, by the New York yacht club. He at once prepared a new deed of gift, gave it back to the club, to be held as a challenge-cup, and in 1887 was referee in the race between the “Thistle” and “Volunteer.” Mr. Schuyler had taken interest in gathering memorials of his ancestors, and had published “Correspondence and Remarks upon Bancroft’s History of the Northern Campaign in 1817, and the Character of Major-General Mills.” He died at his home, No. 567 Broadway, 25 Feb., 1846. After graduation at the U. S. military academy, he entered the army and joined the garrison and frontier duty until 1857. He also studied law and medicine, and was admitted to the bar of Nebraska in 1875, and received his medical degree at Bellevue hospital medical college, New York, in 1876. On hearing the story of Capt. Thomas B. Barry, who, while on a whaling expedition in Queque bay in 1873-4, was visited by Esquimaux who described strange that had traveled through that region several years before, and who had buried papers in a cavern, where silver spoons and other relics had been found, Lt. Schwatka determined to search for traces of Sir John Franklin’s party, and, obtaining leave of absence, fitted out an expedition. On 19 June, 1878, accompanied by William H. Gilder (q. c.) as second in command, he sailed in the “Ekidrun” for King William’s Land. The party returned on 22 Sept., 1880, having discovered and buried many of the skeletons of Sir John Franklin’s party, and removed much of the mystery of its fate. Lt. Schwatka found the grave of Lt. John Irving, 3d officer of the “Terror,” and, in addition to many interesting relics, a paper which was a copy of the “Prospectus” that was found on the “Eskimo,” by Lieut. William R. Hotham, Sir Leopold McClintock’s expedition, and which contained two records, the latter, under date of 25 April, 1848, stating the death of Sir John Franklin on 7 June, 1847. This expedition was also marked by the longest sledge-journey on record—3,351 statute miles, during which a branch of Back’s river was discovered, which Lieut. Schwatka named for President Hayes. Afterward he explored the course of the Yukon river in Alaska, and rejoined his regiment in July, 1884. In August of that year he resigned the commission of 1st lieutenant, 3d cavalry, to which he had been appointed in March, 1879. He commanded the New York Times’ Alaskan exploring expedition of 1886. Lieut. Schwatka had received the Requête Arctic medal from the Geographical society of Paris, and a medal from the Imperial geographical society of Russia, and was an honorary member of the Geographical societies of Bremen, Geneva, and Rome. He is the author of “Along Alaska’s Great River” (New York, 1888); “Nimrod in the North” (1885); and “The Children of Schuyler,” with Schuyler, “The Franklin Search under Lieut. Schwatka” (Edinburgh and London, 1881); and “As Eskimo unter den Eskimo” by Henry Klutschak (Leipsic, 1881).
SCHWEINITZ, Lewis David von, botanist, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 13 Feb., 1809; d. there, 8 Feb., 1854. In 1798 he went to Germany and was educated in the Moravian college and theological seminary, returning in 1812. He filled important ecclesiastical offices at Salem, N. C., and subsequently at Bethlehem. From early boyhood he devoted himself to the study of botany. By his own researches he added more than 1,400 new species to the catalogue of those which had been forgotten, and more than 1,200 being fungi, which had previously been but little studied. He was a member of various learned societies in the United States, Germany, and France. The University of Kiel, in Denmark, conferred upon him the degree of Ph. D. A new genus of plant was named Schweinitia in his honor, and while a resident of Salem he was elected president of the University of North Carolina, which honor he declined because it involved relinquishing work in the Moravian church. His herbarium, which comprised at the time of his death the largest private collection of plants in the United States, he bequeathed to the Academy of natural sciences at Philadelphia. His principal works are "Consponsa Fungi Americani et Europaei," "Synopsis Fungi Europaei Carminia Superioris," edited by Dr. Schwaeuglein (1818); "Specimen Florae Americae Septentrionalis Cryptogamiae" (Raleigh, 1821); "Monograph of the Limnanth genus Viola" (1821); "Catalogue of Plants collected in the N. W. Territory by Say" (Philadelphia, 1824); "Monograph of the American Species of the genus Feronia" (New York, 1829); "Catalogue of Fungi fungorum in America Boreali Media Degentem" (Philadelphia, 1832). See a "Memoir of Lewis David von Schweinitz" (Philadelphia, 1859), and a "Sketch of the Life and Scientific Work of L. D. von Schweinitz," in the "Journal of the Eliza Mitchell Scientific Society of the University of North Carolina" (Raleigh, 1859).—His son, Emil Adolphus (of Schweinitz), Moravian bishop, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 29 Oct., 1844; d. there, 3 Nov., 1879, was a graduate both of the American and of the German Moravian theological seminaries. After filling various ecclesiastical offices in Pennsylvania and North Carolina, among them that of principal of the Salem female academy, he was appointed president of the governing board of the southern district of the Moravian church in 1856, and of the northern district in 1854. He attended three general synods in succession, at Herrnhut, Saxony, in 1857, 1860, and 1879, and on the last two occasions was constituted one of the vice-presidents of that body.—Another son, Edmund Alexander (de Schweinitz), Moravian bishop, b. in Bethlehem, Pa., 29 March, 1828; d. there, 18 Dec., 1887, was graduated at the theological seminary in his native place, and then continued his studies at the University of Berlin. He began his ministry in 1850 and had charge successively of churches at Lebanon, Philadelphia, Lütz, and Bethlehem. On 28 Aug., 1870, he was consecrated to the episcopacy at Bethlehem, and at his death he was the presiding bishop of the northern district of the Moravian church. In 1871 Congress conferred upon him the degree of S. T. D. He was appointed a delegate to the general synod that met at Herrnhut, Saxony, in 1857; and the one that convened at the same place in 1879, at which he was present in his official capacity, elected him its president, an honor that was never before conferred upon an American bishop. He originated in 1879 and has since conducted the weekly journal of his church, and from 1867 till 1884 he was president of the theological seminary. Besides various sermons and essays and numerous encyclopaedia articles he was the author of "The Moravian Manual" (Philadelphia, 1859; 2d enlarged ed., Bethlehem, Pa., 1862); "The Moravian Episcopate" (Bethlehem, 1855; 2d revised ed., London, 1874); "The Life and Times of David Zeisberger, the Western Pioneer and Apostle of the Indians" (Philadelphia, 1870); "Some of the Fathers of the American Moravian Church" (Bethlehem, 1881); and the "History of the Church since the Union of the Two Branches," the second series of which work, comprising the "History of the Renewed Unitas Fratrum," was engaged at the time of his death.

Scofield, Glenn William, jurist, b. in Chautauqua county, N. Y., 11 March, 1817; d. in Warren, Pa., 30 Aug., 1891. After graduation at Hamilton, he removed to Pennsylvania, and was admitted to the bar in 1843. He was a member of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1850-51 and of the state senate in 1857-59, and in 1861 was appointed president judge of the 18th judicial district. He was then elected to congress as a Republican, and served from 7 Dec., 1863, till 3 March, 1865. He took an active part in the reconstruction measures, and served on important committees, being chairman of that which drafted the plan of reconstruction. He was appointed register of the treasury, and he served until 1881, when he was appointed an associate justice of the U. S. court of claims. Hamilton gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1884.

Scollard, Clinton, poet, b. in Clinton, Ontario co., N. Y., 18 Sept., 1841. After graduation at Hamilton College, in 1861, he studied for two years in Harvard, and traveled in Europe in 1866-7, spending several months in Cambridge university before visiting Greece, Egypt, and Palestine. He has published two volumes of poems, "Pictures in Song" (New York, 1884) and "With Reed and Lyre" (Boston, 1886).

Scoresby, William, English explorer, b. in Crapton, Yorkshire, 5 Oct., 1750; d. in Towner, 21 March, 1837. His father, of the same name, was a daring and successful whale-fisher. The son followed the sea, and in 1806 was chief mate on the voyage in which his father reached the highest latitude (81° 12' 42") that had then been attained on sea. During the intervals between voyages, with the sanction of his father, he devoted himself to study, and in 1830 was graduated at Edinburgh University. During his voyages he made many observations on the electric phenomena of the arctic regions, and was instrumental in inducing Sir Joseph Banks to send out a series of expeditions for the discovery of the north pole. Young Scoresby continued in the whaling service after his father's death, and, when he had made seventeen voyages to Spitzbergen for Greenland, he published "An Account of the Arctic Regions, with a History and Description of the Northern Whale Fishery" (2 vols., 1829). This work added largely to science in the departments of physical geography, natural history, and magnetic observation. In 1822 he made an exploring voyage along the east coast of Greenland, which was then comparatively unknown, and published the results in a "Journal of a Voyage to the Northern Whale Fishery, including Researches and Discoveries on the Eastern Coast of West Greenland, made in the Summer of 1822, in the Ship "Baffin," of Liverpool" (Edinburgh, 1825). On his return to Liverpool he received the intelligence of the death of his wife, who had followed him during his long life. In 1824 he was elected a fellow of the Royal society, and he was subsequently made corresponding member of the Institute of France. When about forty years of age, he deemed it his duty to become a clergyman, and accordingly entered himself at Cambridge, took his degree of B. D. in 1834, and that of D. D. in 1869. He first labored as chaplain of the Mariners' church at Liverpool, then removed to Exeter, and afterward became vicar of Bradford. After several years, his health failing, he resigned his charge, and retired to Taunton, but continued his philanthropic efforts, and his physical researches, the latter mainly in regard to terrestrial magnetism and its relation to navigation. For the further and better prosecution of these researches, in 1847 Dr. Scott made a voyage to the United States, and in 1853 to Australia in the "‘Australia,"" and was named, Dr. Scott wrote "Discourses to Seamen" (1831); "Magnetic Observations" (3 parts, 1839-52); "American Factories and their Female Operatives" (1848); "Lectures on Zoetic Magnetism" (1849); "Sabbaths in the Arctic Regions" (1850); "The Franklin Expedition" (1850); "My Father: being Records of the Adventurous Life of the late William Scotts, Esq., of Whitley (1851); and "Voyage to Australia and Round the World for Magnetic Research," edited by Archibald Smith (1859). His life has been written by R. E. Scoresby-Jackson, M. D. (London, 1861).

SCOTT, Andrew, Scottish poet, b. in Bowden, Roxburghshire, in 1757; d. there, 22 May, 1839. He was of humble parentage, and, after being employed in the country during the Revolution, and was surrendered with Cornwallis' army at Yorktown. While he was encamped on Staten island, Scott composed his "Betsy Roseoe." "The Oak Tree," and many other songs. After the war he settled in his native parish as a farm-laborer. He became a protégé of several well-known literary men, and published "Poems," chiefly in the Scottish "Bussier," (Kelso, 1811); a second volume of poems (Edinburgh, 1821); and "Poems on Various Subjects" (Edinburgh, 1826).

SCOTT, Charles, soldier, b. in Cumberland county, Va., in 1758; d. 22 Oct., 1814. He served as a non-commissioned officer in Braddock's defeat in 1755, and at the beginning of the struggle for independence, was a captain in the company south of James river for the Revolutionary army. He was made colonel of the 3d Virginia battalion on 12 Aug., 1776, served with great credit at Trenton, and on 2 April, 1777, was promoted brigadier-general. During the next two campaigns he was with the army in New Jersey, and at a council of war voted with a minority of four generals to attack Monmouth. He was with Gen. Anthony Wayne at Stony Point in 1779, in the following year was made a prisoner at Charleston, and was not exchanged until near the end of the war. In Lee's retreat at Monmouth he was the last to leave the field. Gen. Scott removed to Woodford county, Ky., in 1785, and served as brigadier-general of Kentucky levies in Gen. Arthur St. Clair's defeat in 1791. Later in that war he commanded in a successful expedition to Wabash river, and in several actions with the Indians. In 1794 he led part of Gen. Anthony Wayne's army in the battle of Fallen-timbers. From 1808 till 1812 he was governor of Kentucky, and a town and county in that state were named in his honor. Gen. Scott was a man of strong natural powers, but rough and eccentric in manner and somewhat illiterate. His brother, Joseph, also served with credit in the Revolution, rose to the rank of major, was wounded at Germantown, and after the war was U. S. marshal for Virginia. -Joseph's son, Edward, lawyer (1774-1852), became a well-known lawyer in Tennessee, served as judge of the state circuit court in 1845-46, and published "Laws of the State of Tennessee" (2 vols, Knoxville, 1821). -Edward's son, Charles, lawyer, b. in Knoxville, Tenn., 12 Nov., 1817; d. in Jackson, Miss., 30 May, 1859. He served in the 1st Tenn. regt. before he was 19, and in 1833, when his father retired to Jackson, Miss., where he married, but he afterward removed to Jackson, Miss., and formed a partnership with George S. Verger. In 1852 he was elected chancellor of the state. His decision in the case of Johnston vs. the State of Mississippi, establishing the liability of the state for the payment of the bonds of the Union bank, attracted much attention. In 1859 he published "A Discourse of the Masonic Order," and "An active Freemason, and published "Anology of Ancient Craft Masonry to Natural and Revealed Religion" (Philadelphia, 1849), and "The Keystone of the Masonic Arch" (Jackson, 1856).

SCOTT, Jed, slave, b. in Missouri about 1810; d. after 1857. He was a negro slave, and about 1854 was taken by his master, Dr. Emerson, an army surgeon, from Missouri to Rock Island, Ill., and then to Fort Snelling, in what was then Wisconsin territory. Here he married, and two children were born to him. On his return to Missouri he sued in a local court in St. Louis to recover his freedom and that of his family, since he had been taken by his master to live in a free state. Scott won his case, but his master now appealed to the state supreme court, which, in 1852, reversed the decision of the lower tribunal. Shortly afterward the family were sold to a citizen of New York, John F. A. Sandford, and, as this afforded him a ground for bringing a similar action in a Federal court, Scott sued again for freedom, this time in the U. S. circuit court in St. Louis in May, 1854. The case was lost, but an appeal was made to the U. S. supreme court, and, the importance of the matter being realized by a few eminent lawyers, several offered to take part in the argument. Those on Scott's side were Montgomery Blair and George T. Curtis, while opposed to him were Reverdy Johnson and Henry S. Geyer. None of these asked for compensation. The case was tried in 1856, and the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. A popular opinion was prepared by Justice Nelson, but before its delivery the Supreme Court declared the case, in view of the importance of the case and its bearing on the whole slavery question, which was then violently agitating the country, Chief-Justice Taney should write a more elaborate one. Taney's opinion was read, 6 March, 1857, two days after the inauguration of President Buchanan, and excited intense interest throughout the country on account of its extreme position in favor of slavery. It affirmed, among other things, that the act of congress that prohibited slavery north of latitude 36° 30' was unconstitutional and void. Thomas H. Benton said of this decision that it made a new departure in the working of the government, declaring slavery to be the organic law of the land, while freedom was the exception. The passage that was most widely quoted and unfavorably commented upon, was that in which Taney described the condition of the negroes at the adoption of the constitution, saying: "They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations, and therefore not entitled to all of the rights of citizens." Afterward Scott and his family passed by inheritance to the family of Calvin C. Chaffee, a member of congress from Massachusetts, and on 23 May, 1857, the steamer "Howard" was completed in St. Louis by Taylor Blow, to whom Mr. Chaffee had conveyed them for that purpose. See Benjamin C. Howard's "Report of the Decision of the Supreme Court, and the Opinions of the Judges thereof, in the Case of Dred Scott" (Washington, 1857); Thomas H. Benton's "Historical and Legal Examination of the Case of Dred Scott," Dred Scott v. Sandford (New York, 1859); Joel Parker's "Personal Liberty Laws and Slavery in the Territories: Case of Dred Scott" (Boston, 1861); and "Abraham Lincoln, a History," by John Hay and John G. Nicolay. A portrait of Dred Scott, probably the only one in existence, painted from an old photograph, is in the possession of the Missouri historical society.

SCOTT, Gavastus hall, lawyer, b. in Prince William county, Va.; d. in Washington, D. C., in 1891. His father, Rev. James Scott, a Scotchman, became a minister of the Episcopal church and came to this country about 1790. Gavastus was educated at King's college, Aberdeen, Scotland, and after his friend, Sir Robert Eden, was made governor of Maryland, removed to that province and practised law with his brother-in-law, Chichester. Some people of Maryland decided to send deputies from all the counties to a convention to be held in Annapolis. 22 June, 1776, he was sent as a delegate from Somerset, and participated in all its subsequent deliberations down to the adoption of the first constitution and the organization of the state government in 1777. He was a member of the Association of the freemen of Maryland, which decided in July, 1775, to throw off the proprietary power and assume a provincial government, and his signature is attached to the original pledge that now (1898) hangs in the state-house at Annapolis. He was a member of the convention that framed the first constitution of Maryland. After the formation of the state government he removed to Dorchester county, and represented it in the assembly in 1789 and again in 1794, when he was elected a delegate to the Continental congress and served till 1785. He was one of the originators of the Potomac canal company in 1784, and one of the committee of the Maryland legislature, to whom was referred the claim of James Rumsey (q. v.), for the exclusive privilege of making the said canal in Maryland. He voted in favor of Rumsey's claim, and the bill was passed. He was also one of the original commissioners appointed to superintend the erection of the capital buildings at Washington, and when the state of Maryland lent the government several thousand dollars for the purpose, the credit of the general government was given to the state. He was elected sheriff of Dorchester county in 1786, and was afterwards elected a regent of the Maryland university.

SCOTT, James, poet, b. In Langside, Scotland, in 1806; d. in Newark, N. J., in 1852. He studied at Glasgow and Belfast, emigrated to this country in 1832, became a lexicographer in 1834, and was pastor at German Valley and Newark, N. J. He was the son of Rev. James Scott, a Scotchman, and was the grandson of Rev. Robert Pollok in his "Life" (New York, 1848), and before his death completed a narrative poem called "The Guardian Angel" (1859).

June, 1861, he commanded the steamer "Keystone State," went out of the Confederate waters, and captured the steamer "Sumter," and capturing the steamer "Maranta" off Tampa, took her to Philadelphia. He commanded the steamer "Howard" in the operations with the army in James river, rendered valuable service in saving stores that were left by the army at Aquia creek, was on the blockade, and had numerous engagements with Confederate batteries in the sounds of North Carolina during August, 1862-3. He was commissioned captain, 4 Nov., 1863, and commanded the steamer "De Soto," in which he captured several blockade-runners in 1864. Subsequently he took charge of the steam sloop "Camalot" on the blockade, and was senior officer at the surrender of Charleston, S. C., in 1865. He was a member of the examining board for the admission of volunteer officers to the regular navy in 1865, served as light-house inspector in 1866-71, and was promoted to commodore, 10 Feb., 1869, and to rear-admiral, 14 Feb., 1873. He was then commander-in-chief of the North Atlantic squadron until 13 June, 1874, when he was retired, having reached the age of sixty-two years.
SCOTT. John, clergyman, b. in Washington county, Pa., 27 Oct., 1820. He was educated in the common schools and under private tutors, entered the ministry of the Methodist Protestant church in 1842, and has been a member of almost every general conference of that denomination since 1854. He has edited the "Methodist Recorder," Pittsburg, Pa., in 1844-70, and since 1879, and also conducted the "Missionary Sunday-School Journal" in that city in 1852-3, and the "Home Companion" in Cincinnati. At the same time, till 1884, he was editor of the Sunday-school publications of his church. Washington college, Pa., gave him the degree of D. D. in 1869. Dr. Scott is the author of "Pulpit Echoes" (Cincinnati, 1853) and "The Land of Salem, or Sketches of Patriarchal Life and Times" (Pittsburg, 1880), and has also written an introduction to Rev. Dr. George Brown's "Recollections of an Itinerant Life." (Cincinnati, 1866), and published various discourses.

SCOTT, John, senator, b. in Alexandria, Pa., 14 July, 1824; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 Nov., 1896. His father was a landholder in Huntingdon county, Pa., and a member of the bar in 1829-31. The son received a common-school education, pursued a classical course with private tutors, and then studied law in Chambersburg, was admitted to the bar in 1846, and practised in Huntingdon. He was prosecuting attorney in 1846-39, and a member of the board of revenue commissioners in 1851, served in the legislature in 1882, and was till 1875, sat in the U. S. senate, having been chosen as a Republican. In the senate, Mr. Scott, on 17 May, 1872, moved the "enforcement bill," authorizing the president to suspend the habeas corpus act in states where "Kn-klux" outrages should occur, and made a speech in its favor. On the expiration of his senatorial term he removed to Pittsburgh, Pa., and became general counsel of the Pennsylvania company, and subsequently he was made general solicitor of the Pennsylvania railroad company in Philadelphia, serving for eight years.

SCOTT, John Morin, patriot, b. in New York in 1730; d. there, 14 Sept., 1784. His grandfather, John, the second son of Sir John Scott, bart., of Anerum, Scotland, came to this country, was made a citizen of New York in 1758, and married Cornelia Fort Hunter, on Mohawk river. John Morin was an only child. He graduated at Yale in 1746, studied law, and was an early opponent of British aggression, with voice and pen. He was one of the founders of the Sons of Liberty, and his bold advocacy of extreme measures cost him an election to the Continental congress in 1774. He was one of the chief members of the New York general committee in 1775, a delegate to the Provincial congress of that year, and on 9 June, 1776, was made a brigadier-general. He was with his brigade in the battle of Long Island, but retired from military service in March, 1777, and became secretary of state of New York, which office he held till 1789. In 1789-93 he was a member of congress, -His only son, Lewis Allaire, succeeded him in the secretarvship. -Lewis Allaire's only son, John Morin, lawyer, b. in New York city, 25 Oct., 1799; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 3 April, 1858, lost his father early in life, and was taken by his mother to Philadelphia. He was graduated at Princeton in 1845, after putting higher studies there for a year longer and the laws at the University of Pennsylvania, under Professor Rawle, and was admitted to the bar. After losing his moderate fortune in a mercantile venture, he entered into active practice, and became a successful lawyer. He served in the war of 1812 as 1st lieutenant of cavalry, and in 1843 was chosen to the legislature, where he served several terms. He afterward for many years a member of the Philadelphia county council, a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1837, and in 1841-3 served as mayor of the city. He delivered many orations and addresses, including one before the Washington benevolent society (Philadelphia, 1813).

SCOTT, John Rudolph, actor, b. in Philadelphia, 17 Oct., 1809; d. there, 2 March, 1856. He made his debut at the New York Park theatre in the part of Malcolm, in "Macbeth," and, while playing at various theatres, he gradually rose to distinction in leading tragic roles. As a robust actor he almost rivalled Edwin Forrest for a time, and contended with him for popularity. His representations of King Lear and Sir Giles Overreach were forcible and scholarly performances. In 1847 Scott went to England, playing at the Princess theatre in London for several years, where he opened as Sir Giles Overreach. Some of the best London critics were delighted with his efforts, but the general public was not attracted. On his return to the United States he became a member of the New York Bowery theatre, and later joined the players at the Chatham street National theatre. Diverting his attention from study to rote performances of melodramatic and sensational parts, Scott soon became careless and neglectful, lapsing into the condition of a conventional performer. At the last his most successful roles were those of sailors and pirates; William, in the nautical play of "Black-Eyed Susan," was one of his favorite parts.

SCOTT, Julian, artist, b. in Johnson, Lamolile county, Va., 14 Feb., 1846. At the opening of the civil war, in 1861, Scott entered the Navy, and contributed some of his sketches in a military hospital having attracted attention, he became a student at the National academy, New York, in 1863, and he subsequently studied under Emmanuel Leutz until 1880. He first exhibited at the Academy of design in 1870, and was elected an associate the following year. He was chosen a life-fellow of the American geographical society in 1873. Among his works, mostly pictures of army life, are "Rearguard at White Oak Swamp," owned by the Union league club (1865-70); "Battle of Cedar Creek," in the state-house at Montpelier, Vt. (1871-2); "Battle of Golding's Farm" (1871); "The Recall" (1873); "On Board the 'Hartford'" (1874); "Old Records" (1875); "Duel of Burr and Hamilton" (1876); "Reserved awaiting Orders" (1877); "In the Cornfield at Antietam" (1879); "Charge at Petersburg" (1882); "The War is Over" (1885); and "The Blue and the Gray" (1886).

SCOTT, Levi, M. E. bishop, b. near Odessa, Del., 14 Oct., 1802; d. there, 13 July, 1882. In April, 1826, after being licensed as a local preacher, he became a member of the Netherfield circuit, in New Castle county. Without much early education, he was a diligent student, and a preacher of remarkable cleanness, force, and thoroughness. After filling several pastoral offices, he was appointed presiding elder in 1834.
This office, then one of very great influence, he filled for two years, and he then returned to the pastorate. From 1840 till 1842 he was principal of Dickinson grammar-school. In 1848 he was made one of the agents of the Methodist book concern in New York City. This position he held for four years, when at the general conference of 1852, at Boston, Mass., he was elected and ordained bishop. The degree of M. A. was conferred upon him by Wesleyan university in 1849, and that of D. D. by Delaware college. He fixed his residence, after being elected bishop, at Odessa, Del. He was very industrious in the discharge of the duties of his office, and had the reputation of great piety. He lived to fourscore, and for several years was enfeebled in mind and body.

SCOTT, Martin, soldier, b. in Bennington, Vt., 17 Jan., 1788; d. near Molino del Rey, Mexico, 8 Sept., 1847. He was appointed a lieutenant in the army in April, 1814, became captain in the 5th infantry in August, 1828, was brevetted major for gallantry at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, 9 May, 1846, and was promoted major on 29 June. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for services at Monterrey, where he led his regiment, and was killed at its head in the battle of Palo Alto. Del. Col. Scott had been famous as a marksman from early youth, and it is of him that the well-known incident is related of the coin that said: "You need not fire, I'11 come down."

SCOTT, Orange, clergyman, b. in Brookfield, Vt., 13 Feb., 1800; d. in Newark, N. J., 31 July, 1847. His parents removed to Canada when he was a child, and remained there about six years, but afterward returned to Vermont. The son's early education was limited to thirteen months' schooling at different places. He entered the Methodist ministry in 1822, and became one of the best-known clergymen of his denomination in New England. He was presiding elder of the Springfield district, Mass., in 1830-4, and of Providence district, R. I., in 1834-5. Mr. Scott was active as a controversialist. About 1832 he became an earnest anti-slavery worker, and his zeal in this cause brought much unpopularity upon him. His bishop preferred charges against him in 1838, before the New England conference, but they were not sustained. Finally, with others, he withdrew from the church in 1843, and on 31 May, 1843, organized the New England Methodist church in a general convention at Utica, N. Y., of which Mr. Scott was president. Till 1844 he conducted "The True Wesleyan," in advocacy of the principles of the new church, which were opposed both to slavery and to the episcopal form of church government. In 1846 failing health forced him to retire from his immense labors, and many contributions to the press, he was the author of "An Appeal to the Methodist Episcopal Church" (Boston, 1848). See his life, by the Rev. Lucius C. Matlack (New York, 1847).

SCOTT, Richard, colonist, b. in Gloucester, Suffolk, England, 1697; d. in Providence, R. I., about 1680. He was a lineal descendant of John Baliol, founder of Baliol college, Oxford. Scott came to Boston in 1634, married Katherine Marbury, sister of Mrs. Anne Hutchinson, about 1637, and soon afterward joined Roger Williams. He was co-proprietor with Williams in the latter's purchase from the Indians, and a signer and the supposed author of the celebrated covenant that was made among the settlers of Rhode Island. In 1657 he became a Quaker, and his wife and daughters were whipped and imprisoned in Boston for their faith. He was a commissioner to Massachusetts in 1655 to settle the controversy with that colony in regard to Shawomet, and a deputy to the assembly in 1666.

SCOTT, Richard William, Canadian senator, b. in Prescott, Ontario, 24 Feb., 1825. He was educated in his native place, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1848. He was mayor of Ottawa in 1852, had a seat in the Canadian assembly from 1857 till 1863, and in the Ontario assembly from 1867 till November, 1873, when he resigned. He was elected speaker of the Ontario assembly, 7 Dec., 1871, but resigned on being appointed a member of the executive council and commissioner of crown lands for that province on the 21st of the same month. He retained this office till 7 Nov., 1873, when he was sworn as a member of the queen's privy council. He was secretary of state in the Mackenzie administration from 9 Jan., 1873, to 17 Sept., 1874, when he was out of power with his colleagues in office. He acted as minister of finance during the absence of Richard J. Cartwright in England in 1874, as minister of inland revenue during the illness of Felix Gouffrin in 1875-6, and as minister of justice during the absence of Edward Blake in England in 1876. He was present at the centennial exhibitions at Philadelphia in May, 1876, and behind the official capacity. Mr. Scott was principally instrumental in securing the passage of the separate school law of the province of Ontario, and the Canadian temperance act, which was framed by him, and which is known as the "Scott act." He became a member of the Dominion senate, 13 March, 1874, and was re-elected in 1877.

SCOTT, Robert Kingston, soldier, b. in Armstrong county, Pa., 8 July, 1826. His grandfather fought in the Revolution, and his father in the war of 1812-15. The son received a good education, studied medicine, and began practice in Henry county, W. Va. In October, 1849, he became lieutenant-colonel of the 65th Ohio regiment of which he was made colonel in 1862. He served at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, and Corinth, led a brigade at Hatchie river, Tenn., commanded the advance of Gen. John A. Logan's division on the march into Mississippi, and was engaged at Port Gibson, Raymond, and Champion Hills. He was afterward at the head of the 2nd Ohio corps, which was made prisoner near Atlanta, but was exchanged on 24 Sept., 1864, and was in Sherman's operations before that city and in the march to the sea. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 12 Jan., 1865, and also received the brevets of brigadier- and major-general in the volunteer army, to date from 30 Jan., and 2 Dec., 1865, respectively. Gen. Scott was assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's bureau in South Carolina in 1865-6, resigned from the army on 6 July of the latter year, and in 1868 became the first governor of the reconstructed state, having been chosen as a Republican. He was re-elected in 1870 by a majority of 53,534 in a total vote of 139,688. In the autumn of 1871 the governor and other state officers were openly charged with a fraudulent use of issue of state bonds. Gov. Scott justified his course in a message to the legislature, and a resolution of censure was referred to the committee in that body. Much excitement was also caused in this year by "An-klux" outrages, and Gov. Scott's appeal to the president to aid in suppressing them, which was done by the use of U. S. troops. Gov. Scott afterward removed to Napoleon, Ohio. On 25 Dec., 1850, he shot and killed Warren G. Drury, aged thirty, who had been shot and wounded in Gen. Scott's hotel and had been drinking together, and while searching for the boy Gen. Scott met the former, when the shooting took place. He was tried, and acquitted on 5 Nov., 1851, the defence being that the discharge of the pistol was accidental.

SCOTT, Thomas, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Lanark, Ontario, in 1841. He was educated at the Perk high-school, became a journalist, and published and managed the Perth "Expositor," in the Conservative interest, from 1861 till 1873, when he removed to Manitoba. He was elected mayor of the city of Winnipeg in 1857, and again by acclamation in 1875, and chosen to the legislature of Manitoba in 1876 and 1879, but resigned to become a candidate for the Canadian parliament for Selkirk in 1881. He was elected, and was re-elected in 1886. He has been for many years in the volunteer service, held a command in the Ontario rifles in the Red river expeditionary force under Col. Garnet (now Lord) Wolseley in 1870, and led the second expedition to the Red river in 1871 to oppose the Fenians. He commanded the 54th battalion during the campaign of 1885 against Louis Riel, and received a medal. He was elected president of the Liberal-Conservative association of Manitoba in 1886, and was appointed collector of customs for Winnipeg in 1887.

SCOTT, Thomas Alexander, railroad-manager, b. in London, Franklin co., Pa., 28 Dec., 1824; d. in Darby, Pa., 21 May, 1881. His father, Thomas, who died when the son was ten years old, kept a tavern in the neighborhood of Philadelphia and Pittsburg. The boy worked on a farm, attended a village school, served in country stores, and became, on 1 Aug., 1841, clerk to Maj. James Patton, collector of tolls on the state road at Columbus, Pa. In 1847 he was made chief clerk to the collector of tolls at Philadelphia, and in 1850 he became connected with the partially constructed Pennsylvania railroad, was appointed its general superintendent, and in 1859 was chosen vice-president. He soon became known as one of the most enterprising railroad men in the country. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed on the staff of Gen. Andrew G. Curtin, and was very energetic in equipping volunteers and sending them forward to Washington. On 27 April, 1861, he was asked by the President to construct a new line from Washington to Philadelphia, which he did by way of Annapolis and Perryville with surprising quickness. He was commissioned colonel of volunteers on 3 May, and on 23 May was given charge of all government railways and telegraphs. On 1 Aug. he was appointed assistant-secretary of war, which office he was the first to hold. Col. Scott was placed in command of two troops of cavalry in the northwest, and in March to perform the same duty on the western rivers. On 1 June he resigned to devote himself to his railway affairs, but on 24 Sept., 1863, he entered the government service again for a time, and superintended the transportation of two army corps to relieve Gen. William S. Rosecrans at Chattanooga. This he did with remarkable speed, connecting different lines by improvised trucks, and sending out trains in great numbers by every available route. Col. Scott was instrumental in furthering the policy by which the Pennsylvania road secured control of its western lines. In 1871, when a separate company was chartered to operate these, he became its president. He was also president of the Union Pacific railroad from March, 1871, till March, 1872, and in 1874 succeeded to the presidency of the Pennsylvania road. Failing health forced him to travel abroad in 1878, and on 1 June, 1880, he signed, resigned health, alertness, and some business principles of Col. Scott may be attributed much of the prosperity that has been attained by the road of which he was an officer. Besides his connection with the Pennsylvania system, he was the projector of the Texas Pacific road, and for many years its president.

SCOTT, Thomas Fielding, P. E. bishop, b. in Fredell county, N. C., 12 March, 1807; d. in New York city, 14 July, 1867. He was graduated at Franklin college, Athens (now University of Georgia), in 1829, was ordained deacon in St. Paul's church, Augusta, Ga., 12 March, 1843, by Bishop Elliott, and priest in Christ church, Macon, Ga., 24 Feb., 1844, by the same bishop. He became at this date rector of St. James's church, Marietta, Ga., and afterward of Trinity church, Columbus, Ga. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Georgia in 1855. He was elected missionary bishop of Oregon and Washington territories, and was consecrated in Christ church, Savannah, Ga., 8 Jan., 1854. On his way to the eastern states, Bishop Scott contracted a fever in crossing the Isthmus of Panama, and he died a few days after landing in New York.

SCOTT, Walter, religious leader, b. in Moffat, Dumfries-shire, Scotland, 31 Oct., 1796; d. in Marsick, Ky., 23 April, 1841. He came of the same ancestry as the novelist. After an academic training he was graduated at the University of Edinburgh, and afterward sailed to the United States, where he arrived, 7 July, 1818. He pursued his studies and taught in New York and Pittsburg, and the latter city in 1821 he formed an acquaintance with Thomas and Alexander Campbell, which soon became a lasting friendship. The three engaged in an earnest and critical examination of the Bible and of the earlier writers, by which they became convinced that the existing forms of Christianity were in wide departure from the simple discipline of the primitive church. In 1822 the Campbells and Scott had arrived at a harmonious agreement concerning the advance and aid of Christianity, and, after a time, they renewed their endeavor to draw men together into the original denomination upon common grounds of orthodox religion. In pursuance of this plan, Alexander Campbell now began the publication of the "Christian Baptist," which obtained a large circulation. Scott wrote for this periodical, and at once took the pulpit and proceeded to point out what he considered the glaring defects in the modern manner of preaching the gospel. His powers of oratory were remarkable, and he lived to see an organized ministry preaching to many followers those views of Christianity which had engaged all the faculties of his life. Scott was deeply concerned at the opening of the civil war, and published "The Union," a pamphlet in the interest of peace (1860). The illness of which he died was intensified by grief at hearing of the attack on Fort Sumter. His published works were "The Gospel Restored" (1854); and "The Messiahship, or the Great Demonstration" (1858), besides brief contributions to the press explaining his religious views. His life has been written by William Bagge (1874).

SCOTT, William Anderson, clergyman, b. in Rock Creek, Baltimore co., Tenn., 31 Jan., 1813; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 14 Jan., 1885. He was graduated at Cumberland college, Tenn., in 1833, studied in Princeton theological seminary in 1833-'4, and in 1835 was ordained by the presbytery of Louisiana. After missionary service in 1853-'6 and teaching in 1854-'5, he was pastor of churches in New Orleans, La., and San Francisco, Cal., after which he went to England in 1861 and was for some time settled over a congregation in Birmingham. On his return he had charge of a church in New York city in 1863-'70, and then of one in San Francisco till his death. He was also professor of mental and moral philosophy and systematic theology in the theological school of the university of the city of Washington, D.C., 1871. The University of Alabama gave him the degree of D. D. in 1844, and the University of the city of New York that of LL. D. in 1872. Dr. Scott edited the New Orleans "Presbyterian," for three years, founded the "Pacific Expositor," and was the author of "Daniel, a Model for Young Men" (New York, 1844); "A Child in El Dorado" (San Francisco, 1853); "Trade and Letters" (New York, 1856); "The Giant Judge" (San Francisco, 1858); "The Church in the Army, or the Four Centuries of the Gospels" (New York, 1862); "The Christ of the Apostles' Creed" (1867); and other works.—His son, Robert Nicholson, soldier, b. in Winchester, Va., 22 Jan., 1840; d. in Fort Worth, Tex., 23 Aug., 1866; attended school in Hartford, Conn.; and New Orleans, La.; and studied law in San Francisco, Cal., but was appointed from California 2d lieutenant of infantry, 21 Jan., 1867, and served on the Pacific coast till the civil war, commanding the U.S. steamer "Massachusetts" during the San Juan difficulties in 1859. He was promoted to captain in September, 1861, and afterward served on staff duty in the adjutant-general's department. He was with the Army of the Potomac till June, 1863, receiving a major's brevet for gallantry at Gaines's Mill, where he was wounded, and in 1863-'4 was senior aide-de-camp to Gen. Henry W. Halleck. He continued to serve on staff duty till 1870, when he was quartered in a military station at Fort Dearborn, Ill., 1872-3, and in 1873-7 commanded Fort Ontario, N. Y. From 1857 till his death he was in charge of the publication of war records in Washington. He was promoted major in 1859, and lieutenant-colonel in 1885. In 1878 he served as military secretary to a congressional committee on the reorganization of the United States army, and was the author of a work on "Genius and Faith, or Poet and Religion in their Mutual Relations," which has received high praise for its depth of thought and its correct literary taste (New York, 1853).

SCOTT, Winfield, soldier, b. in Dinwiddie county, near Petersburg, Va., 13 June, 1789; d. at West Point, N. Y., 29 May, 1866. He was educated at William and Mary college, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1806, and in 1808 entered the army as a captain of light artillery. While stationed at Baton Rouge, La., in 1809, he was court-martialled for remarks on the conduct of his superior officer, Gen. Wilkinson, and was suspended for one year, which he devoted to the study of military tactics. In July, 1812, he was made lieutenant-colonel and aide-de-camp to Gen. Wilkinson; while in the army while the affair of Queenston heights was in progress, he crossed the river, and the field was won under his direction; but it was afterward lost and he and his command were taken prisoners from the refusal of the troops to Lewiston to cross to their assistance. In January, 1813, he was exchanged and joined the army under Gen.Dearborn as adjutant-general with the rank of colonel. In the attack on Fort George, 27 May, he was severely hurt by the explosion of a powder-magazine. In the autumn he commanded the advance in Wilkinson's descent of the St. Lawrence—an operation directed against Montreal, but which was abandoned. In March, 1814, he was made a brigadier-general, and established a camp of instruction at Buffalo. On 3 July, Scott's and Ripley's brigades, with Hindman's artillery, crossed the Niagara river and took Fort Erie and a part of its garrison. On the 5th was fought the battle of Chippewa, resulting in the defeat of the enemy, and on 25 July that of Lundy's Lane, or Bridgewater, near Niagara Falls, in which Scott had two horses killed under him and his shoulder wounded. A second wound in his right shoulder and on the left shoulder was critical, his recovery painful and slow, and his arm was left partially disabled. At the close of the war Scott was offered and declined a seat in the cabinet as secretary of war, and was promoted to be major-general, with the thanks of congress and a gold medal for his services. He assisted in the reduction of the army to a peace establishment, and then visited Europe in a military and diplomatic capacity. He returned to the United States in 1816, and in 1817 married Miss Mayo, of Richmond, Va. A part of his time he now devoted to the elaboration of a manual of firearms and military tactics. In 1832 he set out from Fort Dearborn (now Chicago, Ill.) with a detachment to take part in the hostilities against the Seminoles and Creeks, and the capture of Black Hawk ended the war before Scott's arrival on the field. In the same year he commanded the Federal forces in Charleston harbor during the nullification troubles, and his tact, discretion, and decision did much to prevent the threatened civil war. In 1835 he went to Florida to engage in the war with the Seminoles, and was next in command of the troops at Fort Pulaski, Ga. He was recalled in 1837 and subjected to inquiry for the failure of his campaign, the court finding in his favor. In 1838 he was efficient in promoting the peaceful removal of the Cherokees from Georgia to their present reservation beyond the Mississippi. The threatened collision with Great Britain, growing out of the disputed boundary-line between Maine and New Brunswick, was averted in 1839, mainly through the pacific efforts of Scott, and the question was finally settled by the Webster-Ashburnham treaty of 1842.

By the death of Gen. Macomb in 1841 Scott became commander-in-chief of the army of the United States. In 1847 he was assigned to the chief command of the army in Mexico, to guarding a portion of Taylor's troops operating from the Rio Grande, and assembling his force at Loses island, on March 17th he landed 12,000 men and invested Vera Cruz. The mortar battery opened on the 22d, and the siege guns two days afterwards, and on the 26th the city and the castle of San Juan del Uelo capitulated, after nearly 7,000 missiles had been fired. The garrison of 5,000 men ground armed outside of the city on the 29th. On 8 April, Scott began his march toward Jalapa, and on the 17th reached the Mexican army under Santa Anna, which occupied the strong mountain-pass of Cerro Gordo, in a defile formed by the Rio del Plan. On the following morning at sunrise, 8,500 strong, attacked the Mexican army of more than 12,000, and at 2 p.m. had driven the enemy from every point of his line, capturing 5 generals, 3,000 men, 4,500 stand of arms, and 45 cannon, and killing and wounding more than 1,000, with a loss of less than 500. Paroling his prisoners and destroying most of the stores, Scott marched on the next day to Jalapa, which he captured on 19 April. Puebla was occupied on the 22d, and Puebla on 15 May. Here the army remained, drilling and waiting for re-enforcements till 7 Aug. Gen. Scott had vainly asked that the new troops should be disciplined and instructed in the United States before joining the army in Mexico, and the failure to do this gave Santa Anna an opportunity to create a new army and fortify the capital. Scott on 7 Aug. to advance toward the city of Mexico by the National road, and, while diverting the attention of the enemy by a feint on the strong fortress of El Peñon on the northwest, made a detour to San Augustine on the south. He then attacked and carried successively Contreras and Churubusco, and could have taken the capital, but an armistice till 7 Sept. was agreed upon to allow the peace commissioner, Nicholas P. Trist, an opportunity to negotiate. At its close, operations were resumed on the southwest of the city, defended by 14,000 Mexicans occupying Molino del Rey, and Gen. Worth's loss was in storming Molino del Rey before the attack on the wooded and strongly fortified eminence of Chapultepec. On 8 Sept., Gen. Worth with 3,500 men attacked Molino del Rey, capturing much material and more than 800 prisoners, but losing one-fourth of his command, including fifty-eight officers. On the 13th Chapultepec was stormed and carried, and on the morning of the 14th Scott's army marched into the city and occupied the national palace. There was some street-fighting and firing upon the troops from the buildings, but this was soon suppressed, order was established, and a contribution levied on the city of $150,000, two thirds of which Gen. Scott remitted to the United States to found martial auxiliaries. Taxes were laid for the support of the army, and a civil organization under the protection of the troops was created. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, negotiated by Mr. Trist and other commissioners, Judge Clifford, afterward of the supreme court, of the number, was signed on 2 Feb., 1848, and soon after Mexico was evacuated by the U. S. troops. A court of inquiry into the conduct of the war only rebounded to the fame of Scott. In 1852 he was the candidate of the Wing party for the presidency, and received the electoral votes of Vermont, Massachusetts, Kentucky, and Tennessee, all the other states voting for the Democratic candidate, Gen. Pierce. In 1859 Gen. Scott as commissioner successfully settled the difficulty arising from the disputed boundary-line of the United States and British America through the Straits of Fuca. Age and infirmity prevented him from taking an active part in the civil war, and on 31 Oct., 1861, he retired from service, retaining his rank, pay, and allowances. Soon afterward he made a brief visit to Europe, and he passed most of the remainder of his days at West Point, reading and writing. He died on 21 March, 1866, and was buried in his funeral procession a few days later. Turning to his servant, the old veteran's last words were: "James, take good care of the horse." In accordance with his expressed wish, he was buried at West Point on 1 June, and his remains were accompanied to the grave by many of the most illustrious men of the land, including Gen. Grant and Admiral Farragut.

Gen. Scott was a man of true courage, personally, morally, and religiously brave. He was in manner, association, and feeling, courtly and chivalrous. He was always equal to the danger—great on great occasions. His unswerving loyalty and patriotism were ever conspicuous and of the loftiest character. All who appreciated his military genius regretted, when the war of the rebellion began, that Scott was not as he had been at the period of his Mexican victories. He had not the popularity of several of his successors among the soldiers. He was too stately and too exacting in his discipline—that power which Carnot calls "the glory of the soldier and the strength of armies."
It was to these characteristics that Scott owed his title of "Puss and Feathers," the only nickname ever applied to him. Physically he was "framed in the prodigality of nature." Not even Washington possessed so majestic a presence. As S彝arm was the smallest and physically the most insignificant looking, so was Scott the most imposing of all the illustrious soldiers of the century, possibly of all the centuries. The steel engraving represents him at upward of three score and ten. The vignette is from a painting by Humphrey, taken at the age of thirty-seven. A portrait by Weir, showing Scott as he was at the close of the Mexican war, is in the U.S. military academy. The statue by Henry K. Brown stands in Scranton, Pa. Washington, Gen. Scott was the author of a pamphlet against the use of intoxicating liquors (Philadelphia, 1821): "General Regulations for the Army" (1825); "Letter to the Secretary of War" (New York, 1827); "Infantry Tactics," translated from the French (3 vols., 1835); "Letter on the Slavery Question" (1843); "Abstract of Infantry Tactics" (Philadelphia, 1861); "Memoirs of Lieut.-Gen. Scott, written by Himself" (4 vols., New York, 1864). Biographies of him have been published by Edward Deering Mansfield (New York, 1840; Joel Tyler Headley (1852); and Ovville James Victor (1896). See also "Campaign of Gen. Scott in the Valley of Mexico," by Lieut. Raphael Semmes (Cincinnati, 1852).—His son-in-law, Henry Lee, soldier, b. in New Berne, N. C., 3 Oct., 1814; d. in New York city, 6 Jan., 1886, was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1833, and entered the 4th infantry as 2d lieutenant. After three years' service he was detached, and he took part in the war against the Seminoles, and in 1837-8 was engaged in removing Cherokee to the west, after which, until 1840, he served with his regiment as adjutant. In 1842 he was appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. Winfield Scott, whose daughter, Cornelia, he had married, and accompanied him to Mexico in the capacity of chief of staff. He attained the rank of captain on 16 Feb., 1847, and for his gallantry in the siege of Vera Cruz, the battles of Cerro Gordo and Churubusco, and the capture of the city of Mexico, received the brevets of major and lieutenant-colonel. After the war he was acting judge-advocate of the eastern division in 1848-50, and senior aide-de-camp to Gen. Scott from 1850 till 1861. He had been made lieutenant-colonel on the staff on 7 March, 1855, was promoted colonel on 14 May, 1861, and was inspector-general in command of the forces in New York city until 30 Oct., 1861, when he was retired from active service for "disability resulting from long and faithful services, and from injuries and exposure in the line of duty," after he had accompanied Gen. Scott to Europe on leave of absence, remaining abroad till the close of the war. He tendered his resignation in 1862, but it was not accepted until four years later. He was the author of "A Military Dictionary" (New York, 1861).
He was commissioned brigadier-general of Georgianna militia when the state was invaded by the British from East Florida, commanded a brigade, and, after repeated skirmishes with the enemy between Sunbury and Savannah, received a mortal wound at Midway. Congress ordered the erection of a monument to his memory.

Scribner, Charles, publisher, b. in New York city, 21 Feb., 1821; d. in Leavenworth, Kansas, 26 March, 1892. After an education in the University of New York he entered Princeton college, where he was graduated in 1840, and began the study of law, but was obliged by ill health to make a trip to Europe. On his return he formed a partnership in 1846 with Isaac D. Baker, under the firm-name of Baker and Scribner, and began the publishing business. A year or two later Mr. Baker died, and Mr. Scribner continued under the title of Charles Scribner, and later of Charles Scribner and Co. With Charles Welford (who died in May, 1855) he formed in 1857 the house of Scribner and Welford for the importation of foreign books, which is still carried on under the same firm-name. In 1853 he began the publication of "Hours at Home," a monthly magazine, which in 1870 was merged in "Welford's Monthly" under the editorship of Joseph G. Holland, and which was published by a separate company, Scribner and Co., with Dr. Holland and Rowell Smith as part owners. On Mr. Scribner's death, the next year, the firm of Charles Scribner and Co. was reorganized as Scribner, Armstrong, and Co., the partners being John Blair Scribner, Andrew C. Armstrong, and Edward Seymour, and in 1877 the publication-house was removed to 743 Broadway, its present site. Mr. Seymour died 28 April, 1877, and in 1878, when Mr. Armstrong retired, the firm-name was changed to Charles Scribner's Sons, under which form the business has been conducted since 1829 by Charles Scribner and Arthur H. Scribner, younger brothers of John Blair. In 1881 the firm sold out their interest in the magazine company, on the agreement that the name of the magazine and of the company should be altered, and the names were accordingly changed to the "Century Magazine" and the Century company. Charles Scribner's Sons agreed also not to publish any magazine for five years, but after the expiration of that time, in January, 1887, they began the publication of a monthly magazine entitled "Scribner's Magazine," edited by Edward L. Burlingame (q.v.). The house has been from the beginning solely a publishing firm as distinguished from a printing and publishing firm, and this has had an influence on the character of its publications, which have chiefly been confined to the works of contemporary authors. Besides its valuable list of literary and educational works, it has published a long series of popular books, from which have issued some of the most important and successful publications of the time.

—John Blair, eldest son of Charles, b. in New York city, 4 June, 1850; d. there, 21 Jan., 1879, studied at Princeton, and succeeded his father as head of the firm in 1871.

Sunder, David Colt, missionary, b. in Boston, Mass., 17 Oct., 1843; d. near Perintholum, India, 19 Nov., 1862. He was graduated at Williams in 1855, and at Andover theological seminary in 1859. Having determined to become a missionary, he prepared himself by study of the Eastern languages until his ordination on 25 Feb., 1861, and in 1862 he was given the Perintholum station in the Maizura district of southern India, where he labored until his death. He contributed a series of papers on foreign missions to the New York "In-
His other works include "The Bailey Books," a series of books for children (8 vols., Boston, 1873-74); "The Dwellers in Five-Sisters Court" (1876); "Men and Manners in America" (New York, 1876); "Stories and Romances" (Boston, 1880); "The Children's Book" (1881); "Boston Town" (1881); "Noah Webster," in the "American Men of Letters" series (1882); a "History of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1883), and "Men and Letters." He was joint author with Mrs. Bayard Taylor of "Life and Letters of Bayard Taylor" (Boston, 1884).—David Cott's daughter, Vida Dutton, author, b. in Madura, India, 15 Dec., 1861, was graduated at Smith college in 1884, and subsequently spent a year in higher studies at Oxford, England. In 1887 she became instructor in Wellesley college, which place she now (1898) fills. Miss Scudder has published "How the Rain Sprites were Freed" (Boston, 1885), and "Selected Poems from George Macdonald" (New York, 1887).

SCUDDER, Henry Joel, lawyer, b. in Northport, L. I., in 1835; d. in New York City, 12 Feb., 1886. He was graduated at Trinity in 1846, admitted to the bar of New York City in 1848, and five years later entered into a partnership with James C. Carter, under the firmname of Scudder and Carter, in which he continued until his death, gradually advancing to the front rank in his profession, especially in matters regarding admiralty law. He was chosen to Congress as a Republican in 1872 from a district that had never before been represented by a member of that party, served one term, declined re-nomination, and was an unsuccessful candidate for a seat on the New York supreme bench in 1875. Columbia gave him the degree of A. M. in 1862, and Rensselaer College, Va., that of L. L. D. in 1881.

SCUDDER, John, missionary, b. in Freehold, N. J., 3 Sept., 1733; d. in Wynberg, Cape of Good Hope, Africa, 15 Jan., 1855. He was graduated at Princeton in 1811, and at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1813. He then settled in New York City and practised successfully, but in 1819 went to India as a missionary under the direction of the American board. He was ordained to the ministry of the Dutch Reformed church in 1829, settled in Ceylon, and labored there for nineteen years in the double capacity of clergyman and physician. His most important service was the establishment of a large hospital, of which he was also physician in chief, and he was especially successful in the treatment of cholera and yellow fever. He also founded several native schools and churches. He was transferred to the Madras station in 1839, was in the United States in 1842-4, and, returning in 1847, labored until his death, which occurred on a visit to the Cape of Good Hope that had been undertaken for the benefit of his health. His seven sons and two daughters were all missionaries in southern India. He published "Letters from the East" (Boston, 1839); "Appeal to Youth in Behalf of the Heathen" (1849); "Letters to Pious Young Men" (1846); "Prophecy for Passing over Jordan" (New York, 1853); and many tracts and papers that were published in the "Missionary Herald." See a "Memoir" of him by Rev. John B. Waterbury (1856).—His son, Henry Martyn, clergyman, b. in Pandititeripo, Ceylon, 5 Feb., 1822; d. in Winchester, Mass., 4 June, 1865, was graduated at the University of New York, and at Union theological seminary, and returned to India as a missionary to the Madura station under the care of the American board. He labored successfully at Madras, Arecot, Vellore, Coonoos, and Oolacommed, organized schools and churches, founded the Arecot mission, and established a dispensary there. Having studied medicine, he also practised that profession. He prepared various religious books and tracts in the Sanscrit, Tamil, and Telugu languages. The failure of his health in 1864 compelled his return to this country, and he was pastor of the Howard Presbyterian church in San Francisco, Cal., in 1865-71, of the Central Congregational church in Brooklyn in 1872-82, and from the latter date till 1885 of the Plymouth Congregational church, Chicago, from which he resigned in 1887 to return temporarily to India. His publications include "Liturgical of the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church" (Madras, India, 1862); "The Bazaar Book, or the Venetian Teacher's Companion" (1865); "Sweet Savors of Divine Truth," a catechism (1868); and "Spiritual Teaching" (1870). These are all in the Tamil language. Another son of John, Jared Waterbury, missionary, b. in Pandititeripo, Ceylon, in 1830, was graduated at Western Reserve college in 1850, and at the New Brunswick theological seminary in 1855. He was then ordained a missionary to India under the Reformed Dutch church, and since 1857 has held native charges there. He has published translations from the Tamil of Henry M. Scudder's "Spiritual Teaching," Madras, 1850, and his "Bazaar Book" (1857), and a "History of the Arecot Mission" (1872). He is also a member of the committee for the revision of the Tamil translation of the Bible.—Another son of John, Silas Doremus, physician, b. in Ceylon, India, 6 Nov., 1853; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 10 Dec., 1877, was graduated at Rutgers in 1876, studied medicine, and was licensed to practice in 1877. He went to India as a medical missionary in 1860, established himself at Arecot, and founded a dispensary and hospital there which was supported by English and native residents. He also successfully treated a large native out-door practice, and obtained patients among high-caste Hindu women, for which he had hitherto been accomplished. After thirteen years' labor for the American board he returned to this country on account of an illness which had been occasioned by overwork.

SCUDDER, Nathaniel, patriot, b. near Huntington, Long Island, N. Y., 10 May, 1735; d. near Shrewsbury, N. J., 17 Oct., 1781. He was graduated at Princeton in 1751, studied medicine, and in 1753 was elected to the board of health of the county of Monmouth, N. J. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war Dr. Scudder was made lieutenant-colonel of the 1st regiment of Monmouth, New Jersey, militia. In 1777 he was made colonel of that regiment at the joint meeting of the legislature. During that same year he was a member and a constant attendant upon the council of safety. On 30 Nov., 1777, he was elected a delegate to congress. In the labors and responsibilities of legislation during the Revolutionary war he took an active part. On 13 July, 1778, he made a powerful appeal to the legislature of New Jersey, to confer upon the delegates to Congress the authority to sign the articles of confederation. This letter, published in "New Jersey Revolutionary Correspondence," stamps him at once as a strong writer and clear thinker, and a whole-hearted patriot. He served in Congress during the years 1777-9. From 1778 till 1782 he was a trustee of the College of New Jersey. He was also an elder in the church of the celebrated William Tennent, on old Monmouth battleground. During the Revolution, Monmouth county was frequently excited by the incursions of foraging parties of British troops and Tories. In an engagement with a party of refugees at Black's point near Shrewsbury, Col. Scudder was killed while leading a battalion of his regiment. He was buried with the honors of war in the old graveyard at the Trenton church. He was the only congressman that was killed in battle during the Revolutionary war.

SCULL, Nicholas, surveyor, b. about 1700. About 1722 he was engaged in surveying in Pennsylvania, and occasionally in the public service, acting in Indian affairs in the capacity of runner or as interpreter for the Delaware. He was also a member of Franklin's Junta club. In 1744 he became a physician for six months, and in June 1748, he succeeded William Parsons as surveyor-general of the province, serving till December, 1761. He made a map of the improved parts of Pennsylvania, which was published by act of parliament in January, 1759. He was sheriff of Northampton county in 1755-6. His sons, James, Peter, William, Edward and John were surveyors. William published a map of Pennsylvania in 1770.

SCULL, Benjamin, clergyman, b. in Kent County, N.Y., 1 July, 1706; d. in Hempstead, Long Island, N.Y., 15 June, 1769. He was educated partly at Yale, and was graduated at Harvard in 1724. After becoming a licensed preacher of the Congregationalists in 1726, he was ordained deacon and preached in the church of East Hampton, L.I., from 1731 till 1743, and of St. George's church, Hempstead, L.I., from 1743 till his death, connecting with his work here the charge of a school and the care of mission stations both on Long Island and at Fishkill, N.Y. He is said to have preached at least 6,000 sermons in New York (1742), and a pamphlet entitled "A Modest Reply to a Letter from a Gentleman to his Friend in Dutchess County" (New York, 1759).—His son, Samuel, 1st bishop of the diocese of Connecticut, b. in Groton, Conn., 30 Nov., 1729; d. in New London, Conn., 25 Feb., 1796, was graduated at Yale in 1748, was a catechist of the Society for propagating the gospel, and a student of theology under his father, until 1752, and then for a year a student of medicine at the University of Edinburgh. He was ordained deacon by Dr. John Thomas, bishop of London, 21 Dec., 1756, and priest by Dr. Richard O'Shaldiston, bishop of Carlisle, in London, 23 Dec., 1758. He served as a missionary at New Brunswick, N.J., from 25 May, 1754, became rector of Jamaica, including Flushing and Newtown, L.I., 12 Jan., 1757, and rector of St. Peter's, Westchester, N.Y., 1 March, 1767. There he was prevented from the exercise of his ministry by the Whigs, by some of whom he was at one time seized and imprisoned in New Haven. He then retired to the city of New York, where he supported himself in part by the practice of medicine, serving also as chaplain of the king's American regiment under command of Sir Henry Clinton of 14 Feb., 1778. He was particularly obnoxious to the American party on account of his authorship of the series of pamphlets signed A. W. Farmer, and entitled "Free Thoughts on the Proceedings of the Continental Congress" (Nov., 1774); "The Congress Consounded" (Nov., 1774); and "A View of the Controversy between Great Britain and her Colonies" (Feb., 1775). He received the degree of D.D. from the University of Oxford, 15 Dec., 1777. Dr. Seabury was elected bishop of Connecticut by the Church of England clergy therein at Woodbury, 25 March, 1783, and applied to the English episcopate for consecration in London. He awaited their assent sixteen months, but it was withheld on account of unwillingness to act without the sanction of the civil authority, and failure at that time to procure such sanction; one who was to exercise his office in a foreign state not being able to take the oath of allegiance required by law of those whose consecration was in the English church. He was finally consecrated bishop, 14 Nov., 1784, at Aberdeen, by Bishops Kilgour, Petrie, and Skinner, representing the episcopate of the Scottish church, who could not be deterred from exercising the powers of the episcopal office by the apprehension of the loss of temporary objects of which they had long since deprived. Bishop Seabury exercised episcopal jurisdiction with the acceptance of the laity as well as of the clergy in Connecticut, residing in New London as rector of St. James's church until his death, and also, by its invitation, over the church in Rhode Island. He was the first presiding bishop of the churches in the several states, united under the general convention in 1789, of which these were consubscriptors. Bishops Providence, White, and Madison in the consecration of Bishop Claggett, through whom every bishop of the Anglican communion subsequently consecrated in the United States traces his episcopate. Bishop Seabury's knowledge of and devotion to the church system, applied with remarkable prudence and patience, made him peculiarly valuable to his church in this country in that formative period that succeeded the Revolution. The special benefits for which it is indebted to him are, directly, the transfer to this country of a free, valid, and regular episcopacy, and, indirectly, the clearing of the way for the transmission of the episcopate of the established Church of England by demonstrating the possibility of obtaining consecration from another and equally valid source, and the fact that episcopacy could live in this country, the reunion through him, in the consecration of Claggart, of the lines of the Scottish church and of the English non-jurors with the line of the established Church of England, represented by White, Provost, and Madison; the securing of the just rights of the episcopate in the government of the state of Michigan, which was attained by the amendment of its constitution changing the house of bishops from a mere house of revision to a co-ordinate branch of the legislature; and, lastly, the restoration of the obligation and invocation to the communion office. Two volumes of his sermons (1830) and many occasional papers were published during his life, and a third volume of discourses after his death (1798). See his "Life and Correspondence," by Rev. Eben Edwards Beardsley, D. D. (Boston, 1881). The "Bishop's palace," as his simple residence at New London was jestingly styled, is shown in the accompanying illustration.—His grandson, Samuel, clerk, son of Rev. Charles Seabury, b. in New London, 9 June, 1801; d. in New York city, 10 Oct., 1872, was privately educated, and received the degree of M. A. and D. D. from Columbia college in 1823 and 1837, respectively. He was ordained deacon in 1826, and priest in 1828, by Bishop Hobart, and was professor of languages in Flushing institute and St. Paul's college until 1840, after which he was editor of "The Christian" until 1849. He was rector of the Church of the Annunciation, New York, from 1838 till 1868, and professor of biblical learning, etc., in the General theological seminary, New York, from 1862 till his death. His reputation and influence were chiefly established by his editorial writings. He was the author of "Historical Sketch of Augustine, Bishop of Hippo" (New York, 1833); "The Continuity of the Church of England in the 16th Century" (1853); "The Supremacy and Obligation of Conscience" (1850); "American Slavery distinguished from the Slavery of English Theorists, and justified by the Law of Nature" (1861); "Mary the Virgin" (1868); and "History and Unity of the Church Calendar in the Measure and Distribution of Time" (1872).—The second Samuel's son, William Jones, clerk, b. in New York city, 25 Jan., 1837, was graduated at Columbia in 1856, and admitted to the New York bar in 1858, but, abandoning law for divinity, was graduated at the General theological seminary in 1866, ordained deacon, 5 July, 1866, and priest, 30th June, 1867, by Bishop Horatio Potter. He has been rector of the Church of the Annunciation, New York, from 1868, and professor of ecclesiastical polity and law in the General theological seminary since 1873. He received the degree of D. D. from Hobart college in 1876 and from the general theological seminary in 1885. He has edited Dr. Samuel Seabury's "Memorial" (New York, 1850), and "Discourses on the Nature and Work of the Holy Spirit" (1854), and is the author of "Suggestions in Aid of Devotion and Godliness" (1876), and various pamphlets, including "The Union of Divergent Lines in the Church of England and America" (New York, 1880). He has written a complete bibliography of these four clergymen, see the "American Church Review" for July, 1885.

SEALSFIELD, Charles, author, b. in Poppitz, Moravia, Austria, 3 March, 1793; d. in Solothurn, Switzerland, 26 May, 1864. His real name was Karl Postel. He became a member of a religious order in his youth, but escaped from the convent at Prague in 1829, soon afterward came to this country, where he assumed the name of Sealsfield, and for a short time was connected with the "Courrier des États-Unis" in New York city. He went back to Europe about 1828 as correspondent in Paris of the "Courier and Enquirer," and in 1832 settled in Solothurn, but returned to the United States, and passed several years in Louisiana and on the Missouri and Central rivers. The principal works are "Tokeah, or the White Rose" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1826; German ed., under the title of "Der Leitme und die Republikner," 3 vols., Zurich, 1830; "Transatlantische Reisekizzen" (2 vols., 1838); "Der Virey und die Aristokraten," a Mexican novel (2 vols., 1834); "Lebensbilder aus beiden Hemisphären" (2 vols., 1834); 24 ed., entitled "Morton, oder der grosse Toni," (1840); "Deutsch-amerikanische Wahlverwandtschaften" (5 vols., 1874-75); and "Süden und Norden" (3 vols., 1842-43). His works have been translated into English, and several of them into French. Two complete editions have been published in German (4 vols., Stuttgart, 1843-47; 18 vols., 1846). See "Erfurt-Reims an Sealsfield" (Brussels, 1864).

SEAMAN, Ezra Champion, author, b. in Chatham, N. Y., 14 Oct., 1805; d. in Ann Arbor, Mich., 1 July, 1880. He was educated in the common schools, admitted to the bar at Ballston Spa, N. Y., was chief clerk to the U. S. comptroller of the treasury in 1849-53, and subsequently inspecter of Michigan state prisons. He edited the "Ann Arbor Review" in Michigan, and "Essays of the Progress of Nations" (Detroit, 1849; with additions, New York, 1848; supplement, Detroit, 1852); "Commentaries on the Constitution and Laws, People and History, of the United States" (Ann Arbor, 1863); "The American System of Government" (1870); "Views of Nature" (1873); and essays and pamphlets.

SEAMAN, Valentine, b. in Hempstead, L. I., 2 April, 1770; d. in New York city, 3 July, 1817. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1792, studied medicine under Dr. Nicholas Romeyn, and was a surgeon to the New York hospital from 1796 until his death. He was active in the introduction of vaccination in New York city, sustaining his theory as to its expediency in the face of much opposition. His publications include a "Pharmacopoeia" and "Inaugural Discourse on Opium" (Philadelphia, 1792); "Waters of Saratoga" (New York, 1798; 2d ed., with "Waters of Balston," 1809); "Midwife's Monitor" (1809); and "On Vaccination" (1816).

SEARING, Laura Catherine (Redden), author, b. in Somerset county, Me., 9 Feb., 1840. She became deaf about the age of ten, through an attack of spinal meningitis, and her education was consequently carried on in a somewhat irregular manner. Though she also lost the power of speech, being unable to make herself understood, she retained her memory of sounds and her appreciation of rhythm. She early began writing verse, and contributed both prose and poetry to the press, while attending the Missouri state institution for the deaf and dumb, her parents having removed to St. Louis. In 1840 she became a writer for the "Republican" of that city, adopting the pen-name of "Howard Glyndon." Subsequently she was sent to Washington, D. C., as war correspondent for the "Spirit of the Times," and resided in Europe until the end of 1898, perfecting herself in French, Italian, Spanish, and German. On her return she severed her connection with the New York "Times," for which she had corresponded, and for the next eight years was employed on the "Mail" in the same city. Meanwhile she was taking lessons in articulation from various teachers, among them Alexander Graham Bell, with marked success. In 1876 she married Edward W. Searle, of the New York bar, and in 1886 they removed for her health to California, where she now (1888) resides. Besides being a frequent contributor to periodical literature, Mrs. Searle has published "Notable Men of the Thirty-Seventh Congress" in pamphlet-form (Washington, 1862); "Old South in Poetry and Prose," (Boston, 1863); "A Little Boy's Story," translated from the French (1868); and "Sounds from Secret Chambers" (Boston, 1874).

SEARLE, George Mary, astronomer, b. in London, England, 27 June, 1839. He was graduated at Harvard in 1857, and then became assistant at the Dudley observatory, Albany, where he discovered, on 11 Sept., 1858, the asteroid Pandora. In January, 1859, he entered the service of the U. S. coast survey, and in September, 1862, he was appointed assistant professor in the U. S. naval academy. He returned to Harvard as assistant in the observatory in June, 1866, and remained there until March, 1868, when he joined the Paulists, and was ordained as a priest in that community in March, 1867, having been converted to the Roman Catholic faith in 1862. He has had charge of the science teaching of the seminary that forms part of the home in New York. Father Searle is also a photographer of considerable skill, and has advanced that art by his studies. He has contributed largely to the journals and reviews of the Roman Catholic church and to the Astronomical Journal of the United States Naval Observatory. In 1857, he published "The Planetary System" (New York), and in 1867, "The Planets, their orbits and motions" (New York). His brother, Arthur, astronomer, b. in London, England, 21 Oct., 1837, was graduated at Harvard in 1856, and then was variously engaged for about twelve years. In 1869 he was appointed assistant at Harvard college observatory, where he has since continued in various offices until 1887, when he was made full professor of astronomy. He has published several hundred photometric measurements of certain variable stars, researches in zodiacal phenomena, and observations with the meridian photometer during 1879-82. Prof. Searle's papers have appeared in scientific journals at home and abroad and in the "Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences," of which body he is a member. He is also the author of "Outlines of Astronomy" (Boston, 1874).

SEARLE, James, member of the Continental congress, b. in New York city about 1730; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Aug., 1797. Little is known of his early life, but when he attained his majority he engaged in business with his brother John in Madera, and was admitted to the firm of John Searle and Co. in 1775. He left Madera in 1780, settled in Philadelphia, and in 1785 signed the "non-importation agreement," by which the citizens of Philadelphia bound themselves to order no more goods from Great Britain. He was a manager of the U. S. lottery in 1776-8, and in August of the latter year became a member of the naval board, resigning that office in October on account of his objections to the existing naval regulations. From November, 1787, till July, 1789, he was in the Continental congress, serving as chairman of the commercial committee, and on that to appurtenance the question of the ratification of the Articles of Confederation. He was also a member of the marine committee, and that on foreign affairs. He was sent to Europe as the agent of the state of Pennsylvania in July, 1789, "to negotiate a loan of $2,000,000 in such countries or states as he should judge most likely to favor his views"; but the mission was unsuccessful. He returned to Philadelphia in 1789, and, having lost his fortune, re-entered business and resided for several years in New York city.

SEARS, Barnas, educator, b. in Sandisfield, Mass., 19 Nov., 1802; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 6 July, 1880. He was graduated at Brown in 1825, and completed his theological studies at the Newton seminary in 1829. After a two years' pastorate in Hartford, Conn., he accepted a professorship in Hamilton Academy, and then, in 1835, the chair of Greek and Latin at Madison university, Hamilton, N. Y. On leaving that place in 1833 he spent some time in Germany presenting his studies. During this residence abroad he shared the privilege of establishing Baptist missions in Germany. On his return he was elected a professor in Newton theological seminary, and for several years he was its president. In 1848 he was made secretary and executive agent of the Massachusetts board of education. In 1855 he became president of Brown university, which place he filled with eminent ability and success until 1867, when he accepted the office of general agent of the Peabody educational fund. In the administration of this great trust, for which he was singularly qualified, he remained until his death. His last years were spent in Staunton, Va. He received in 1841 from Harvard the honorary degree of D. D., and from Yale in 1862 that of LL. D. Dr. Sears ranked with the most eminent scholars and educators of his day. Besides contributions to the "Christian Review," of which he was for some time after 1829 the editor, he was the author of an enlarged edition of "Nobden's Essays," (now with 21st edition, 1842); "Essays on Classical Literature," with Bera B. Edwards and Cornelius C. Felton (Boston, 1843); "The Ciceroan, or Prussian Mode of Instruction in Latin" (1844); "Select Treatises of Martin Luther, in the Original German" (1848); "Life of Luther" (Philadelphia, 1850; republished in England as "Mental and Spiritual History of Luther," 1851); "His Life and Times," revised edition (Boston, 1853); and "Discourse at the Centennial Celebration of Brown University" (1864).

SEARS, Edmund Hamilton, clergyman, b. in Sandisfield, Mass., 1810; d. in Weston, Mass., 16 Jan., 1876. He was graduated at Union in 1834, and at Harvard divinity-school in 1837, and was pastor of Unitarian societies in Wayland, Mass., 1829-40; in Lancaster, Mass., 1840-49; and in Newburyport, Mass., 1849-65. He then edited the "Monthly Religious Magazine" for several years, and from 1865 until his death was pastor in Weston, Mass. Union college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1871. He published "Regeneration" (Boston, 1853; 9th ed., 1873); "Pictures of the Olden Time" (1857); "Christian Traveler" (1860); "The Youth's Gospel: the Heart of Christ" (1872); and "Sermons and Songs of the Christian Life" (1875).
SEARS, Edward L., editor, b. in County Mayo, Ireland, in 1819; d. in New York city, 7 Dec., 1876. He was graduated at Trinity college, Dublin, in 1839, came to this country in 1848, and for many years was professor of languages in Manhattan college. He became editor and proprietor of the "National Quarterly," a literary magazine, in 1860, and conducted it until his death. He was a writer of cultivated taste and pure and expressive style, and contributed regularly to English and American reviews. He published, under the pen-name of "H. E. Chevalier," "Legends of the Sea" (New York, 1863).

SEARS, Isaac, pastor, b. in Newlark, Conn., in 1729; d. in Cambridge, China, 28 Oct., 1786. His ancestor, Richard, emigrated from this country to Chechester, England, in 1630. Isaac commanded a privateer against the French in 1758-59, but lost his vessel in the latter year, and then engaged in the West Indian and European trade, making New York city his home. On the passage of the stamp act he ardently engaged in the patriot cause and became an active member of the Sons of Liberty. In November, 1775, with a troop of horse, he went to the printing establishment of James Rivington, editor of the "Royal Gazette," destroyed his presses, and carried off his type, which was afterward converted into bullets. He was a member of the Provincial congress of New York in 1776, and of the assembly in the same year. He lost his fortune by the war, and in 1785 became supercargo on a merchant ship, contracting the fever from which he died on his first passage to China.

SEARS, Robert, publisher, b. in St. John, New Brunswick, 29 June, 1810; d. 17 Feb., 1892. His father was one of the leaders of the Revolution. He was educated in New Brunswick and was engaged in business at St. John, and in 1832 emigrated to New York city, where he opened a small printing-office in Park row. In 1839 he began the publication of illustrated works, which were sold almost entirely by subscription. He was a liberal patron and friend of the earlier wood-engravers, did much to develop that art, and lent his influence, and was often a means of his success while there. He was also finding that taste for pictorial representation which has grown to such large dimensions. He was also one of the first to recognize the value of judicious advertising. He expended many thousands of dollars in making his publications known throughout the United States, and in 1847 procured an extensive recognition of the merits of American wood-engraving from the British public by presenting a complete set of his publications to Queen Victoria and receiving her personal thanks for the same. Among his publications are "Illustrations of the Bible" (New York, 1840); "Bible Biography" (1853); "Wonders of the World" (1845); "Picture History of the United States," his most important work (1857), and "Description of the Rhine and Danube" (1854).

SEATON, William Winston, journalist, b. in King William county, Va., 11 Jan., 1853; d. in Washington, D. C., 16 June, 1895. He was a descendant of Henry Seaton (of the Scottish family of that name), an adherent of the fortunes of the Stuarts, who came as a political exile to Virginia at the end of the 17th century. His mother, whose maiden name was Winston, was a cousin of Patrick Henry. He was taught by a brother of the Earl of Fife, a Scotchman, who for several years kept an academy at Richmond. When eighteen years of age he engaged ardently in politics, and became assistant editor of a Richmond paper. He next edited the Petersburg "Republican," but soon purchased the "North Carolina Journal," published at Halifax, which was then the capital of the state. When Raleigh became the capital, he removed thither and connected himself with the "Register," edited by Joseph Gales, Jr., whose daughter he married. In 1812 he removed to Washington and joined the "National Intelligencer," in which his brother-in-law, Joseph Gales, Jr., which partnership lasted till the death of the latter in 1860. From 1812 till 1820 Messrs. Seaton and Gales were the exclusive congressional reporters as well as editors of their journal, one taking charge of the proceedings in the senate and the other in the house. The "Register" was considered a standard authority. After the death of Mr. Gales, Mr. Seaton was sole editor and manager of the "National Intelligencer" until it was sold a short time before his death. In 1840 he was elected mayor of Washington, and he held that office for twelve successive years. Together with Mr. Gales, he published "Annals of Congress; Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States from 3 March, 1798, till 27 May, 1824" (42 vols., Washington, 1844-56); "Register of Debates in Congress from 1824 to 1837," 14 vols. In 29, 1837-38); and "American State Papers, selected and edited by Walter Lowrie and M. St. Clair Clarke" (21 vols., 1832-41). See his "Life, Letters, and Times of Joseph Gales," 2 vols. (1854).

SEAWELL, Washington, soldier, b. in Virginia in 1802; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 9 Jan., 1888. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1823, assigned to the 7th infantry, and from 1832 till 1834 was disbursing agent of Indian affairs, from which post he was transferred to that of adjutant-general and aide-de-camp on Gen. Taylor. In 1834 he was ordered to the Gulf, and in July, 1836, saw service against hostile Indians, and in the war with Mexico, and was promoted major of the 2d infantry, 3 March, 1847. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 8th infantry, 25 Feb., 1852, colonel of the 6th infantry, 17 Oct., 1860, and was retired from active service, 20 Feb., 1862, in consequence of disability resulting from exposure to fever and malaria, while serving as quartermaster and discharging the duties of that office of the state of Kentucky from March, 1862, till September, 1863, and of the Department of the Pacific from October, 1863, till January, 1864, and was appointed commissary of musters and superintendent of recruiting service of the Department of the Pacific in 1863. He was acting assistant provost-marshal at San Francisco from November, 1863, till June, 1866, and was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1863, for long and faithful services. Gen. Seawell was with the 2d infantry at Monterey, Cal., in 1849, and was consequently one of the California pioneers. At the time of his death he was next to the eldest general on the retired list, living in the Pacific coast since 1864, and owned one of the largest ranches in California, in Sonoma county.

SEBASTIAN, William King, senator, b. in Vernon, Tenn., in 1814; d. in Memphis, Tenn., 20 May, 1865. He was graduated at Columbia college, Tenn., studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised his profession at Helena, Ark. He was prosecuting attorney in 1853-7, circuit judge in 1850-2, and in the latter year was appointed a judge of the state supreme court. He was president of the state senate in 1849, a presidential elector in 1848, and was elected a U. S. senator from Arkansas as a Democrat in place of Chester Ashley, deceased, serving from 1847 till 1853. He was re-elected for the term that ended in 1859, and in the latter year was chosen again for another full term. He was chairman of the committee on Indian affairs, and a member of the committee on territories. Mr. Sebastian was expelled for disloyalty on 14 July, 1861, but it was afterward claimed that he was loyal, and the sentence of expulsion and his full salary to his children. He remained quietly at Helena until the National troops occupied that place, and in 1864 removed to Memphis, Tenn.

SECCOMBE, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Medford, Mass., in 1706; d. in 1769. He was descended from Richard Seccomb, who, coming from England, settled in Lynn, Mass., in 1639. He was graduated at Harvard in 1703, and became minister of Kingston, N. H., in 1737. He published "Plain and Brief Rehearsal of the Operations of Christ as God" (Boston, 1740); "Business and Diversion Inoffensive to God," a discourse (1745); and "The Ways of Pleasure and the Paths of Peace," a discourse.—His brother, John, clergyman, b. in Medford, Mass., 25 April, 1708; d. in Chester, Nova Scotia, in January, 1733, was graduated at Harvard in 1728, and was minister of the Congregational church at Harvard, Mass., from 10 Oct., 1733, till September, 1757. In 1763 he became minister of a dissenting congregation in Chester, Nova Scotia, where he remained till his death. He gained great notoriety as a humorous poet by "Father Abbe's Will," which was published in both the "Gazette of the United States," and "European" magazines in May, 1762. It was reprinted in the "Massachusetts Magazine" in November, 1791, and in 1854 by John Langdon Sibley, with historical and biographical notes. The subject of the poem, Matthew Abdy, held a menial position in connection with Harvard college. He also published an ordination sermon (Halifax, 1770), and a "Sermon on the Death of Abigail Belcher, with an Epistle by Mather Bayles, D. D." (Boston, 1774).

SEDDON, James Alexander, lawyer, b. in Falmouth, Stafford co., Va., 13 July, 1815; d. in Greensville county, Va., 19 Aug., 1889. Thomas Seddon, his father, who was first a merchant and then a banker, was descended, on the side of Seddon, of Leicestershire, Eng., who settled in Stafford county, Va., in colonial days. Susan Alexander, his mother, was a lineal descendant of the Earl of Stirling. Throughout his life Mr. Sed- don was of a frail constitution, and, owing to his delicate health, his early education was much neglected. The knowledge of the ancient classics and literature, for which he was noted in after-life, was mainly self-acquired. At the age of twenty-one he entered the law-school of the University of Virginia, where he was graduated with the degree of B. L. He settled in Richmond in the practice of the law, and almost immediately advanced to the front rank of the bar. In 1845 he was nominated by the Democratic party for congress, and, though the district was a doubtful one, he was elected by a handsome majority. In 1847 he was renominated, but, not being in accord with the resolutions of the nominating con- vention, he declined, and the Whig candidate was elected. In 1849 he was re-elected, serving from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1851. Owing to his health, he declined another nomination at the end of his term, and retired to Subot Hill, his estate near Madison, Va., where he remained till 1854. In 1854 he took part in most of the important debates of the period, and was recognized as a leader of his party. In 1846 he participated actively in the debates upon the revenue bill, advocating the principles of free-trade. In 1850 the excitement of impending war brought him again into politics. On 19 Jan., 1861, he was appointed by the legislature of Virginia to join John Tyler and others to the Peace convention which met at the call of Virginia in Washington on 4 Feb. He represented Virginia in the committee upon resolutions, and, in accordance with the instructions of his state, made a minority report recommending that the constitution should be amended according to the resolutions that had been introduced in the senate by John J. Crittenden and by a further article expressly recognizing the right of any state peaceably to withdraw from the Union. He became a member of the first Confederate con- gress, and in November, 1862, having been chosen by Jefferson Davis as secretary of war, became a member of his cabinet. He devoted himself to the duties of his office until 1 Jan., 1865, when he retired finally from public life to his country estate.

SEDEMO, Antonio, captain de san-diez-von, Spanish soldier, b. in Spain about the end of the 15th century; d. in Carabobo, Venezuela, in March, 1558. He went to Santo Domingo with Diego Columbus in June, 1509, where he served till 1512, when he was appointed by King Ferdinand first treasurer of Porto Rico. In 1515 he became alderman of San Juan. Several years afterward, being accused of peculation in the treasury, he was imprisoned, but escaped to Santo Domingo, where he served till 1528. On his return, an expedition to the Windward islands, especially Trinidad, the headquarters of the Carib Indians, who devastated Porto Rico repeatedly, was suggested by the governor, and Sedeno sailed to Spain, where he obtained a royal permit for the conquest of the island of Trinidad. On his return to Porto Rico, he recruited 150 men, and sailed early in 1530, landing on the southwest coast of the island in the territory of Cacique Chacoman, by whom he was received in a friendly manner. Soon the abuses of his followers caused a general revolt, but, aided by Chacoman, Sedeno defeated the natives in many encounters, and built a fortress, which he called Paria. Leaving Paria, he returned in 1531 to Porto Rico, carrying many Carib prisoners; but on his arrival he was forced to release them. Although meanwhile Geromino Ortal had been appointed adelantado of Trinidad and taken possession of Fort Paria, and Sedeno's claim had been declared void by the audiencia of Santo Domingo, the latter gathered some troops in Porto Rico, to whom he promised the fabulous wealth of the river Meta, which was included in his original grant. He landed in Trinidad during Ortal's absence, captured Fort Paria by surprise, and, entering by the river Pedernales, invaded the mainland, where he had serious disputes with Ortal about the boundaries of his province. He was finally poisoned by his attentive cook in the island of Trinidad.

SEEDWICK, John, soldier, b. in Cornwall, Conn., 13 Sept., 1813; d. near Spotsylvania Court- House, Va., 9 May, 1864. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1837, 24th in a class of fifty members, among whom were Gen. Joseph Hooker, v. —29 immediately after his graduation he served in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians. His first engagement was a skirmish near Fort Clinch, 29 May, 1838. The same year he was employed in removing the Cherokees to their new home beyond the Mississippi. He was made 1st lieutenant of artillery, 19 April, 1839. In the Mexican war he was successively brevetted captain and major for gallant conduct at Contreras, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. He also distinguished himself at the head of his command in the attack on the San Luis, the Sinaloa, the Cerro Gordo, and the Puebla. On 26 Jan., 1849, he was made captain, 2d cavalry, 5 March, 1855, and served in Kansas and on the western frontier.

At the beginning of the civil war he was lieutenant-colonel of the 3d cavalry. On 25 April, 1861, he was promoted to the colonelcy of the 1st cavalry, and on 31 Aug. was commissioned a brigadier-general of volunteers and placed in command of a brigade of the Army of the Potomac, which in the subsequent organization of the army was assigned to the 2d corps, under Gen. Sumner. Gen. Sedgwick assuming command of the 3d division. In this capacity he took part in the siege of Yorktown and the subsequent pursuit of the enemy up the peninsula, and rendered good service at the battle of Fair Oaks. In all the seven days' fighting, and particularly at Savage Station and Glendale, he bore an honorable part, and at the battle of Antietam he exhibited conspicuous gallantry, exposing himself recklessly. On this occasion he was twice wounded, but refused to be taken from the field. On 23 Dec. he was made director-general of volunteers, and in the succeeding February he assumed command of the 6th army corps. At the head of these troops he carried Marye's Heights in the rear of Fredericksburg during the Chancellorsville campaign in May, 1863, and, after the retreat of Gen. Joseph Hooker across the Rappahannock, succeeded only by very hard fighting in withstanding the attack of a superior force, against which he had contended for a whole day, to the left bank of the river. He commanded the left wing of the Army of the Potomac during the advance from the Rappahannock into Maryland in June, and also at the succeeding battle of Gettysburg, where he arrived on the second day of the fighting, after one of the most extraordinary forced marches on record, his spirited leadership inspiring confidence among his troops. During the passage of Rapidan river on 7 Nov., 1863, he succeeded, by a well-executed manœuvre, in capturing a whole Confederate division with guns and colors, for which he was thanked by Gen. Meade in a general order. In command of his corps he took part in the spring campaign of the Wilderness under Gen. Grant, and on 3 and 5 May had position on the National right wing, where the hardest fighting of those sanguinary engagements took place. Three days later, while directing the placing of some pieces of artillery in position in the intrenchments in front of Petersburg Court-House, he was struck in the head by a bullet from a sharpshooter and instantly killed. Gen. Sedgwick was one of the oldest, ablest, and bravest soldiers of the Army of the Potomac, inspiring both officers and men with the fullest confidence in his military capacity. His simplicity and honest manliness endeared him. In discipline and morale in the army. He declined the command of the Army of the Potomac just before it was given to Gen. Meade, but several times held it temporarily during that general's absence. A fine bronze statue of Gen. Sedgwick stands on the pedestal at West Point.

Sedgwick, Robert, soldier, b. in England about 1600; d. in Jamaica, W. I., 24 May, 1656. He had been a member of the Artillery company in London and settled in Charlestown, Mass., in 1656. He engaged in business, became a successful merchant, and was for many years a deputy from Charlestown to the general court. He was one of the members of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery company in 1658, its captain in 1649, and commanded the castle in 1641. In 1643 he became colonel of the Middlesex regiment, and in 1652 commander of all the Massachusetts militia. He was associated with John Winthrop, Jr., in 1643-4, in establishing the first furnace and iron-works in the country. He was employed to expel the French from Penobscot in 1654, was engaged in the expedition against the Spanish West Indies in 1655, when Jamaica was taken, and was one of three commissioners appointed by Cromwell to govern that island. Just before his death the protector advanced him to the sole command with the rank of major-general. His descendant, Theodore, statesman, b. in Hartford, Conn., in 1740; d. in Boston, 24 Jan., 1813, lost his father when he was thirteen years of age, and was aided by his brother to enter Yale, which he entered in 1756, owing to a slight misconduct, without being graduated. He afterward studied divinity, but abandoned it for law, was admitted to the bar in April, 1768, and practiced in Great Barrington, and afterward in Sheffield, Mass. Though always strongly attached to the mother country, he engaged in the war of the Revolution on the side of the colonists, served as aide to Gen. John Thomas in his expedition to Canada in 1776, and was subsequently actively engaged in procuring supplies for the army. He represented Sheffield in the Massachusetts legislature both before and after the Revolution, and was a member of the Continental congress in 1786. In the winter of 1787 he was active in the suppression of Shays's rebellion, and incurred the especial enmity of the insurgents, who frequently threatened his life. His house was attacked by them during his absence in the legislature. He was an active member of the Massachusetts convention that ratified the constitution of the United States in 1788. In 1789 he was elected to Congress, of which he remained a representative by successive elections till March, 1796, when he was elected to the U. S. Senate. He served in this body for three years, and was re-elected in 1792. In 1799 he was again elected to the house of representatives, and was chosen its speaker. In 1802 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, which office he held till his death. Soon after the adoption of the Massachusetts constitution Elizabeth Freeman, a negro slave of great force of character and intelligence, having fled from her master in consequence of cruel treatment, Judge Sedgwick defended her from the latter's suit to recover her slave. The court pronounced her free, thus making the earliest practical application, so far as known, of the declaration of the Massachusetts bill of rights, that "all men are born free and equal." He was an active member of the old Federal party, and an intimate associate of many of its leaders. His judicial opinions are remarkable for correctness of expression and elegance of diction. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, and in 1799 received the degree of LL.D. from Princeton.—His eldest son, Theodore, lawyer, b. in Sheffield, Mass., 31 Dec., 1789; d. in Pittsfield, Mass., 7 Nov., 1839, was graduated at Yale in 1818, studied law with his father, was admitted to the bar in 1801, and practised at Albany till 1821, when he removed to Stockbridge, Mass., owing to impaired health, and retired from the active practice of his profession. He afterward interested himself in agriculture, was repeatedly chosen president of the Agricultural society of the county, was a member of the legislature in 1824, 1825, and 1827, and in the last year carried through a bill for the construction of a railroad across the mountains from Boston to Albany, which had been generally regarded as a chimerical scheme. He was for a series of years the unsuccessful candidate of the Democratic party for lieutenant-governor. He was an earnest advocate of free-trade and temperance, and an opponent of slavery. His death resulted from a stroke of apoplexy, which occurred at the close of an address of the state of Pittsfield. He published "Hints to my Countrymen" (1826); "Public and Private Economy, illustrated by Observations made in Europe in 1836-7" (3 vols., New York, 1838); and addresses to the Berkshire agricultural association (1829 and 1839).—His wife, Susan Ridley, author, b. about 1789; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1867, was a granddaughter of Gov. William Livingston of New Jersey, and the author of "Moral of Pleasure" (Philadelphia, 1829); "The Young Emigrants" (Boston, 1830); "Allen Prescott" (2 vols., New York, 1835); "Alida, or Town or Country" (1844); and "Walter Thorney" (1850). The Sedgwick mansion at Stockbridge is seen in the illustration on page 450. —Henry Dwight, second son of the first Theodore, author, b. in Sheffield, Mass., in 1785; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 23 Dec., 1831, was graduated at Williams college in 1804, and became an eminent member of the New York bar. He contributed to the "North American Review" and other journals, and published an "Appeal to the City of New York on the Proposed Alteration of its Charter," and "Elements of the Common Law" (New York, 1832) was an argument against the complexity and absurdity of that system which was one of the first suggestions of the code of civil procedure afterward adopted by the state of New York. He was an ardent opponent of slavery and an advocate of free-trade, in support of which he published numerous papers, including a series of forty-seven articles in the "Banner of the Constitution." Mr. Sedgwick was instrumental in persuading William Cullen Bryant to remove to New York, and was one of the first to appreciate his talents. During the struggle of the Greeks for independence two frigates that had been built for them in this country were detained to answer exorbitant charges for their construction. Through the exertions of Mr. Sedgwick and his associate counsel one of the ships was discharged from attachment and sent to Greece. His death was caused by paralysis, brought on by his efforts in this litigation. His "Refutation of the Reasons in the Award in the Case of the Two Greek Frigates" was subsequently published (1826).—The first Theodore's daughter, Catherine Maria, author, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 28 Dec., 1789; d. near Roxbury, Mass., 31 July, 1847, received an excellent education. Aged, and on her father's death in 1813, undertook the management of a private school for young ladies, and continued it for fifty years. Her brother Theodore and Henry encouraged the development of her powers. Miss Sedgwick's first work of fiction, "A New England Tale," appeared anonymously (New York, 1822; last ed., with "Miscellanies," 1856), and its very favorable reception encouraged her to prosecute authorship. "Redwood" followed (2 vols., 1824), also anonymously. It was reprinted in England, and translated into French and other European languages. The French translator erroneously attributing the authorship to James Fenimore Cooper. "The Traveller" appeared next (1825); "Hope Leslie, or Early Times in Massachusetts" (2 vols., 1827); "Clarence, a Tale of our Own Times" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1830); "Le Bossu," one of the "Tales of the Glauber Spa" (1822); and "The Linwoods, or Sixty Years Since in America" (2 vols., 1834). This was the last, and by many is thought to be the best, of her novels. That year she also published a collection of her "Sketches and Tales" from the magazines. She next issued a series of papers illustrative of common every-day life, and incalculable moral lessons, under the title of "The Poor Rich Man and the Rich Poor Man" (New York, 1836). In 1837 "Live and Let Live," and in 1838 "A Love-Token for Children" and "Means and Ends, or Self-Training." In the spring of 1839 she visited Europe, travelling for a year, and conveying her impressions in "Letters from Abroad to Kindred at Home," which were published after her return (2 vols., 1841). These were followed that same year by "Historical Sketches of the Old Painters" and biographies of the sisters "Lucetia and Margaret Davidson." Among her other works are "Wilton Harvey, and Other Tales" (1845); "Moral of Manners" (1846); "Facts and Fancies" (1848); and "Married or Single?" (1857). Miss Sedgwick both edited and wrote articles for literary periodical publications, and she contributed largely to the annuals. Collections of these papers constitute several volumes of her works. She is thoroughly American in thought and feeling, and with very marked individuality, of the best New England type. Her delineations of character and manners, as then found, in her native state, are unsurpassed for their picturesqueness and truth. See her "Life and Letters," by Mary E. Dewey (New York, 1871).

Elizabeth Dwight, author, married Charles, a son of the first Theodore, and was well known as a teacher. She wrote "Beautitudes and Pleasant Sundays," "Lessons without Books," "A Talk with my Pupils" (New York, 1863), and "Spanish Complect."—The second Theodore's son Theodore, lawyer, b. in Albany, N. Y., 27 Jan., 1811; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 9 Dec. 1859, was graduated at Columbia in 1829, and admitted to the bar in May, 1833. The following fifteen months he passed in Europe, principally in Paris, as an attaché to the U. S. embassy under Edward Livingston. On his return he practised law successfully in New York till 1859, when failing health forced him to resign for a time from active professional life. President Lincoln tendered him the mission to the Hague in 1857, and he twice declined the office of assistant secretary of state. In January, 1858, he was appointed

U. S. attorney for the southern district of New York, which office he held till his death. He was president of the New York Crystal palace association in 1852. Mr. Sedgwick was a frequent contributor to periodicals and newspapers and published "Mourir of William Livingston" (New York, 1833); "What is Monopoly?" (1835); "Statement of New York Court of Chancery" (1838); "Thoughts on the Annexation of Texas," a series of papers in opposition to that measure (1844); "Treatise on the Measure of Damages, or an Inquiry into the Principles which Govern the Amount of Compensation in Suits at Law" (1845); "The American Citizen: a Discourse, at Union College" (1847); and "Treatise on the Rules which Govern the Interpretation and Application of Statutory and Constitutional Law" (1857; 2d ed., enlarged, with notes by John Norton Pomery, 1874). He edited the political writings of William Leggett (2 vols., New York, 1890). The third Theodore's son, Arthur George, lawyer, b. in New York city, 6 Oct., 1844, was graduated at Harvard in 1864, became 1st lieutenant in the 28th Massachusetts regiment, was captured at Deep Bottom, Va., and confined in Libby prison during the latter part of the summer of 1864. His confinement having produced an illness which incapacitated him for further service, he entered Harvard law-school, and after graduation was admitted to the Boston bar, where he practised law for several years, during part of this time editing the "American Law Review" with Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. Returning to New York in 1872, he practised, and was also for some time one of the editors of the "Evening Post," and also of the "Nation," to which he constantly contributed legal, political, and critical articles. He edited the 5th edition of his father's work on "Damages" (New York, 1889), and with G. Willett Van Nest the 7th (1890). He also published, with E. S. Wait, "A Treatise on the Principles and Practice of Contingent Fee Practice" (1887).

John, grandnephew of the first Theodore, was born in New York city, 22 June, 1829; d. in Norfolk, Conn., 11 Sept., 1897, was graduated at the University of New York, and was assistant district attorney of New York. Since 1 Jan., 1872, he had been judge of the superior court of the city of New York.

SEELY, William Henry, actor, b. in Montgomery, Wales, 4 Dec., 1806; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 17 Jan., 1872. He was the son of a British army officer, who was killed in the peninsular war. The boy left home when he was fourteen years old, joined a company of strolling players, and, assuming the name of W. H. Smith, began to play minor parts in the Shrewsbury theatre. In 1822 he obtained his first regular engagement at the New Theatre, New York. His first appearance in New York, at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia. He won his highest reputation in 1828 at the Tremont theatre, Boston, as Roland in "The Honeycomb." In 1836 he managed the National theatre, Boston, and from 1843 till 1860 he was stage-manager of the Boston museum. His last appearance in New York was at the old Chatham street theatre, 3 Nov., 1849, when he acted Edgar to the Lear of Junius Brutus Booth. He also appeared acceptably as Laetes, Gratiano, and Marc Antony. His last professional appearance in New York was made at the Winter garden, 6 May, 1855. During the few years preceding his death he had been employed at the California theatre, San Francisco, as actor and manager. His wife, formerly a Miss Riddle, b. in Philadelphia in 1811; d. in New York, 27 Sept., 1861, made her début at the Walnut street theatre, in her native city, in 1823, and first appeared in New York at the old Chatham street theatre as Virginia in "Virgins." She was very popular for many years. Their son, Henry, actor, b. in New York, 18th Dec., 1835; graduated at Amherst, studied civil engineering at Rensselaer polytechnic institute, Troy, N. Y., and afterward practised his profession in San Francisco. He subsequently engaged in journalism, was one of the editors of the New York "Times," and the "Evening Post," and for some time was an editor of the "Commercial Advertiser." He is the author of "Duperfield's Rest, a Romance" (New York, 1864), and "Marion Rooke, or the Quest for Fortune" (1865), and also contributed to magazines. He died in New York city, 18 Jan., 1899.

SEELYE, Julius Hawley, educator, b. in Bethel, Conn., 1824; d. in Amherst, Mass., 12 May, 1895. He was graduated at Amherst, Mass., at Amherst, Mass., 1844. In 1849 he was appointed professor of mental and moral philosophy at Amherst college, which position he held until 1874. He was elected to congress in 1874 from Massachusetts without being nominated by any party, serving from 6 Dec., 1875, till 3 March, 1877, and at the end of his term declined a renomination. While in congress, though a Republican, he opposed the electoral commission and the declaration of the election of Rutherford B. Hayes to the office of president of the United States. In 1873 he was installed as president of Amherst college, which office he resigned in 1880. In 1872 he visited India by invitation, and delivered a course of lectures. In 1874 he was appointed by the governor of Massachusetts one of a commission to revise the laws of that state on taxation. During the early years of his presidency at Amherst he inaugurated the "Amherst system" of college self-government, by which the students have a large share in maintaining discipline, and which has been productive of good results. President Seely had been a trustee of the Clarke institute for deaf-mutes, and of Smith college for women, and had served on the board of visitors of Andover theological seminary. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1862, and that of L. L. D. from Columbia in 1876. In addition to articles in various reviews, sermons and addresses, and contributions to religious magazines, he has published: "An American Homer" (New York, 1856); "History of Philosophy" (New York, 1856); "Lectures on Educated Hindus" (Bombay, 1873); republished by the Congregational publishing society, Boston, 1873, under the title "The Way, the Truth, the Life"; also translated into Hindustani, Japanese, and German); "Christian Missions" (New York, 1875); and revised and edited Heck's "Moral Science" (Boston 1880).—His brother, Laurens Clark, educator, b. in Bethel, Conn., 29 Sept., 1837, was graduated at Union college in 1857, studied at Andover theological seminary in 1857-9, and was at Berlin and Heidelberg universities in 1860-2. He afterward traveled in Europe, Egypt, and Palestine, and in 1863 was ordained pastor of the North Congregational church at Springfield, Mass., where he remained two years. He was professor of English literature and oratory at Amherst from 1865 till 1873, and in 1874 became president of Smith college for young women (which he had organized) at Northampton, Mass. His various contributions to reviews include articles on college education and on Celtic literature. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Union college in 1855.

SEEMAN, Berthold, German traveller, b. in Hanover, Germany, 28 Feb., 1825; d. at the Jalalite mine, Nicaragua, 10 Oct., 1871. He was educated at the lycéeum of his native city, took his degree at the University of Göttingen, and was appointed in 1846 naturalist on board the British government vessel "Herald" on an exploring expedition round the world. He subsequently served on three arctic voyages (1846-51), and published "A Narrative of the Voyage of the 'Herald,' and Three Cruises to the Arctic Regions in Search of Sir John Franklin" (London, 1852). Then appeared "Popular History of Palms" (1855), and "Botany of the Voyage of the 'Herald'" (1857). He was appointed in 1869 by the colonial office one of the royal commissioners for the Fiji islands to ascertain their fitness for British colonization, the results of which appeared in "Viti, an Account of a Government Mission to the Viti, or Fiji Islands" (1862). He also issued "Popular Terminology of the American Flora," "Paradisus Vindobonensis," and "Twent-y-four Views of the Coast and Islands of the Peruvian Coast" (London, 1861). He subsequently commanded Captain Bedford Pum on his travels to Central America, and, in collaboration with him, wrote "Noteings on the Roadside in Panama, Nicaragua, and Mosquito" (1869). He was editor of the "Bouplandia" and of the "Journal of Botany, British and Foreign." Dr. Seeman contributed largely to scientific, literary, and political journals in London. The "Flora Vitiensis" he completed only a short time before his death.

SEFTON, John, actor, b. in Liverpool, England, 16 Jan., 1860; d. in New York, N. Y., 1908. He began his study of law, but preferring the stage, entered upon his professional career at the age of sixteen. He came to this country in 1827, played for two seasons at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia, and gained great popularity in New York as Jimmy Twichell in the "Golden Farmer." He was stage-manager at the Astor place opera-house during the Mirocundy riot, and afterward held the same post at the Academy of music, the Pearl street theatre, Philadelphia, at Charleston and Columbia, S. C., and at New Orleans, La. His last appearance was at the Broadway theatre in October, 1867. In certain comic parts he had no superior either in this country or in England.

SEGAR, Joseph E., member of congress, b. in Enfield, New Hampshire, 1 Jan., 1844; d. in 1885. He received a common-school education, and in 1836 was elected to the state house of representatives, where he served for several terms. He was elected to congress as a Unionist from Virginia, serving from 6 May, 1862, till 3 March, 1864, and was chosen U. S. senator from Virginia in the place of Lennard J. Bowden, deceased, but was not admitted to a seat in the Senate on the part of the United States under the United States and Spanish claims convention of 1877.

SEGHERS, Charles John, archbishop, b. in Ghent, Belgium, 26 Dec., 1839; d. in Alaska, 28 Nov., 1886. He studied for the priesthood in the ecclesiastical seminary of Ghent, and afterward in the American college, Louvain, was ordained a priest at Mechlin in 1864 and went to Vancouver's island as a missionary, rising to be vicar-general. During these years he also labored for the conversion of the Indians in British North America. In 1871 he was made administrator of the diocese, and on 29 June, 1873, he was consecrated bishop of Vancouver's island. His accession to the episcopate gave a great impulse to Roman Catholicism in the north-west. He was bishop of his church who attempted the conversion of the Alaskan Indians. In 1878 he visited that territory and all the adjacent islands, travelling on snow-shoes and afterward going on dog-sleds or canoes among the tribes in the interior and along the coast. Toward the end of the year he was appointed coadjutor archbishop of Oregon and reached Portland on 1 July, 1879. He spent a year in exploring the Washington territory, Idaho, and Montana, and published a series of letters in Roman Catholic periodicals in the eastern states, describing his adventures. In 1881 he succeeded to the archbishopric, but for several years he had been anxious to resign his see in order to devote himself to the conversion of the Alaska Indians, and he visited Europe in 1883 to obtain permission from the pope. His resignation was at length accepted, and he was reappointed bishop of Vancouver's island, retaining his title of archbishop. On his return he stopped at Baltimore, Md., to take part in the 3d plenary council in 1884, and he reached Victoria early in the following year. He then set about re-establishing among the Alaska Indians the missions that had come to a stand-still during his absence in Oregon. He left Victoria in July, 1886, for Alaska in company with two Jesuits and a guide named Fuller, according to some accounts an Englishman, according to others an American.
They arrived safely at Chili, and then travelled northward along the coast until they reached the station of the Alaska trading company at the mouth of Stewart's river. Leaving the Jesuits to establish a mission among the Stekin Indians, the archbishop, with Fuller and some Indian guides, set out on 8 Sept., for Mukanlaket, a village near the mouth of the Tanana river, which he reached on 24 Oct. He spent a few weeks in missionary duties among the Indians of the Tanana valley, and then returned to Nulato, 200 miles down the Yukon river. Travelling on sleds, the party arrived at a deserted village about thirty miles from their destination. They entered a hut, and, after making a fire, lay down before it. At daylight the next morning Fuller, who had several times exhibited anger at being drawn farther and farther into these desolate regions, levelled his rifle at the archbishop and shot him. The murderer, while afterward expressing great remorse, gave no sufficient reason for committing the crime. Archbishop Seghers, besides being one of the most adventurous of explorers, was a divine of great erudition and an effective propagator and friend of education.

Seguin, Édouard Sheldon, actor and singer, b. in London, England, 7 April, 1809; d. in New York city, 13 Dec., 1852. He was one of the earliest pupils of the Royal academy of music, from which he retired in 1830 with all the honors. He first appeared at the Queen's theatre, London, in 1831, as Polyphemus in Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and in 1838 came to this country and made his first appearance on the American stage on 15 Oct., at the National theatre, New York, as Gen. Von der Teimer in the opera of "Amelie." He afterward performed in the principal cities with great success as a bass-singer and comic actor. —His wife, whose maiden name was Ann Childe, b. in London, England, in 1814, was a pupil of the Royal academy of music, and appeared for several seasons at Her Majesty's theatre, London. She was long a member of the Italian opera company in that city, and first appeared on the American stage on 15 Oct., 1838, at the National theatre, New York city. She subsequently travelled as a star through the United States and gained great popularity. She made her first appearance in Philadelphia, 4 Nov., 1838, at the New York theatre, but afterward retired from the stage and engaged in teaching in New York, where she died in 1888.

Seguin, Edouard, physician, b. in Châlons, France, 20 Jan., 1812; d. in New York city, 28 Oct., 1880. He was educated at the College of Aix-la-Chapelle and St. Louis, and then studied medicine and surgery under Jean Baptiste Charle. At the suggestion of his father he determined to devote himself to the training of idiots, and thoroughly investigated the causes and philosophy of idiocy and the best means of dealing with it. In 1837 he began to treat an idiot boy, and in 1839 he opened the first school for idiots. He was soon able to obtain remarkable results by his system of training. In 1840 he was commissioned by the Academy of Science in Paris to examine critically and in detail the idiots children, and in their report declared that, up to the time when he began his labors, idiots could not be educated or cured by any means, but that he had solved the problem. After the revolution of 1848 he came to the United States, and after visiting various schools, modelled on his own, that had been established in the United States, and assisting in their organization, he settled in Cleveland, and later in Portsmouth, Ohio. In 1860 he removed to Mount Vernon, N. Y., and he received the degree of M. D. from the medical department of the University of the city of New York in 1861, after which he came to reside in New York city. Subsequent to 1866 he devoted attention to the study of animal heat, adding greatly to the knowledge on that subject by the methods of thermometry that he devised and the instruments he invented, of which the physiological thermometer, largely used by physicians, is the most important. He was a commissioner to the World's fair in Vienna from the United States, and published a special "Report on Education. He was a member of various medical societies, and was president of the Association of medical officers of American institutions for idiotic and feeble-minded persons. Dr. Seguin more than any other person is due the honor of showing to what degree the congenital failures of nature can be remedied and educated to comparative usefulness. According to his testimony, "not one idiot in a thousand has been entirely refractory to treatment, not one in a hundred has not been made more happy and healthy; more than thirty per cent. have been taught to conform to social and moral law, and rendered capable of order, of good feeling, and of working like other men. These third-class, or mentally defective, become capable of the ordinary transactions of life under friendly control, of understanding moral and social abstractions, of working like two-thirds of a man; and twenty-five to thirty per cent, come nearer and nearer to the standard of manhood, till some of them will defy the scrutiny of good judges when compared with ordinary young men and women. His writings, which are thorough, include: "Réséume de ce qui nous ait pendant quatorze mois" (Paris, 1839); "Conséils à M. O. sur l'éducation de son enfant idiot" (1839); "Théorie et pratique de l'éducation des idiots" (2 parts, 1841-2); "Hygiène et éducation des idiots" (1843); "Images graduées à l'usage des enfants arrêtés et idiots" (1845); "Traité moral, hygiénique et éducatif des idiots et des autres enfants arrêtés" (1846), which is accepted as the standard authority on the subject; "Jacob Rodrigue Péreire, notice sur sa vie et ses travaux" (1845); "Historical Notice of the Origin and Progress of the Treatment of Idiots" (translated by John S. Newberry, Hartford, 1856); "Idiocy and its Treatment by the Physiological Method" (New York, 1855); "L'éducation des idiots; les réformes, la théorie qui y est liée; les résultats" (1862); "Report: On the Prevention of Idiocy" (1869); and Remarks concerning the "Idiocy" (1879); "Prescription and Clinical Record" (1876); "Medical Thermometry," with C. A. Wunderlich (1871); "Manual of Thermometry for Mothers" (1873); "Thermomètres physiologiques" (Paris, 1875); "Tableaux de thermométrie mathématique" (1876); and "Medical Thermometry and Human Temperature" (New York, 1876).

Ségur, Louis Philippe, Comte de, French historian, b. in Paris, 10 Dec., 1753; d. there, 25 Aug., 1809. He was the eldest son of the field-marshall Louis de Ségur, studied in the school of artillery at Strassburg, and obtained in 1769 the commission of lieutenant of cavalry. He was promoted captain in 1771, and served in the army of the king's regiment in the campaign of 1776. He became an advocate of the cause of the American colonists at court, and as early as 1777 asked from the king permission to serve in this country as a volunteer, but was reprimanded. He was afterward appointed colonel of the regiment "Suisseaux," and embarked on 5 April, 1781, in the frigate "La Gloire." He served during the remainder of the sequel after the withdrawal of the French forces in 1782 obtained leave to remain, and visited the southern states, Mexico, Peru, and Santo Domingo, where he owned a large estate. A few years later in his "Mélanges" he published the journal of his travels, which attracted much attention. He was minister to Russia in 1784-9, and to Berlin in 1792. Ruined by the revolution, he supported his family during the following years by his pen. He was deputy to the corps législatif in 1801, elected in 1803 a member of the French academy, and afterward became a councillor of state, grand master of the ceremonies, count of the empire in 1810, and a senator, 5 April, 1814. After the restoration of the Bourbons he became a peer of France, 4 June, 1814, and always sided with the liberals in his works in defence of "politiques" (Paris, 1795); "Mélanges" (1796); "Tableau historique et politique de l'Europe, 1780-1796" (3 vols., 1801); "Histoire de Frédéric Guillaume II." (1801); "Politique de tous les cabinets de l'Europe pendant les règles de Louis XV. et Louis XVI." (9 vols., 1824-30); and "Mémoires sur souverains et anecdotes" (3 vols., 1824). His complete works were published in 1824 (33 vols.).

SEGURO, Juan Bautista (say-goo-rah), Spanish missionary, b. in Toledo, Spain; d. in Virginia in February, 1757. He entered the Society of Jesus at Alcala in April, 1736, was appointed vice-provincial of Florida in 1739, and sailed the same year from Cadiz to the East Indies, and on his return he converted the Potomac Indians. Landing at Havana, he made arrangements for the education of young Indians, and then set out for the province of Carlos in Florida. He spent several months in studying the language, at the same time attending to the spiritual interests of the Spanish soldiers. When able to converse with the natives, he labored for about a year in the country of Calonge, without success, but with little success. Thinking that he would have better prospects at a distance from the Spanish ports, he accepted the offer of a converted Indian, Luis de Velasco, who promised to conduct him in safety to his tribe and assist him in his pious endeavors. Accompanied by Luis, a Jesuit, and seven lay brothers, Seguro sailed from Santa Helena on 3 Aug., 1757, entered the Bay of Carolina, ascended the Potomac, and landed on 10 Sept. The missionaries found the natives in a miserable condition, owing to a famine which had prevailed for several years, and therefore sent their vessel back for supplies, especially seed-corn, which they hoped to persuade the Indians to plant. They then pressed on through a vast tract of marsh and wood, expecting to find a village which Luis said was ruled by his brother. They spent more than a month travelling, living on roots and herbs, but without reaching their destination. In February they were deserted by their guide, who went to his brother's village, about five miles distant, promising to prepare his countrymen for their arrival. Some time having elapsed without hearing from him, Seguro sent three of his company to beg him to return. The messengers were attacked and killed by Luis at the head of a band of Indians. Luis then proceeded to the hut which the missionaries had erected and demanded the hatchets and knives which they had with them. Seguro gave them up silently, and then knelt with his companions in prayer. At a signal they were all massacred, only an Indian boy escaping. The name given to the country which Seguro attempted to evangelize was Axacen. It lay between the Potomac and the Rappahannock, probably extending on each side of these rivers. He wrote "Tratado de la Humildad y Obediencia" (Madrid, 1690).

SEIDEL, Nathaniel, Moravian bishop, b. in Lusin, Silesia, 2 Oct., 1718; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 17 May, 1782. He emigrated to this country in 1742, and became the most indefatigable of the early Moravian missionaries among the western settlers and the Indians. For eighteen years his life was an almost uninterrupted succession of journeys. He began such itinerant work with a visit to the aborigines of the Susquehanna in 1743; after that he repeatedly traversed Pennsylvania as far as Susbury, the eastern counties of New York, New England as far as Boston, and Maryland and as far as the Susquehanna. He spent many months working among the western settlers and the Indians. He came back the same year and soon afterward led a company of Moravian settlers to North Carolina, where the church had purchased a large tract of land. It was a hard and perilous journey of forty days. In midwinter he returned to Bethlehem. His next visit was to Surinam, in South America, where in 1755 he selected a site for a mission. On his return he again began to itinerate among the settlers and natives, and continued such labors until 1757. In that year he visited Europe a second time, and on 12 May, 1758, was consecrated to the episcopacy at Hermshut. His first visitation took place in the West Indies in 1759. Two years later he returned to Bethlehem, having been appointed presiding bishop of the church. The enormous duties of this office he discharged with great faithfulness for twenty-one years until his death. He continued to take a warm interest in the Indian mission; and the massacre of nearly 100 converts, in the spring of 1782, at Guadenhutten, Ohio, by a band of whites, on the SEIDENBUSH, Rupert, R. C., bishop, b. in Munich, 13 Oct., 1820; d. in Richmond, Va., 3 June, 1893. He began his theological studies in Bavaria, and emigrated to the United States in 1851. In 1852 he entered the Benedictine order in St. Vincent's abbey, Westmoreland co., Pa. He was raised to the priesthood on 22 June, 1853, was for some years stationed at Newark, N.J., and in 1857 was made abbot of the monastery of St. Louis on the Lake, Minn. The northern part of Minnesota was erected into a vicariate apostolic by a papal brief on 12 Feb., 1875, and he was appointed its vicar apostolic on 30 May following, under the title of bishop of Halba in partibus. The Roman Catholic church has made great progress during his administration. In 20 years he has increased the regulars, 620 students, 90 churches, 50 chapels and stations, 14 convents, a monastery, seminary, college and academy. The Roman Catholic population, including white and Indian, exceeded 45,000.

SEIP, Theodore Lorenzo (s. e.), clergyman, b. in Easton, Pa., 25 June, 1842. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1864, and at the latter in theological studies, Lipsia, in 1867, and in the latter year was ordained to the ministry. Immediately after his ordination he became principal of the academic department of the newly established Muhlenberg college, Allentown, Pa. He was adjunct professor of Greek there in 1867-72, professor of Latin in 1872-80, and professor of the college, and president of the college, 1880-86. He received the degree of D.D. in 1886 from the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Seip has done more than any other man for the successful establishment and endowment of Muhlenburg college. He is a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his church. Besides sermons and addresses, he has published "Inaugural Address as Dean of the College of the City of Philadelphia, Pa., 1886"); "Muhlenberg College," an address delivered before the ministerium of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1887); and "History of the College Association of Pennsylvania," of which he was a founder (1897).

SEISS, Joseph Augustus (s. e.), theologian, b. in Graenhain, Frederick co., Md., 18 March, 1825. His ancestors, whose original name was Seiss, emigrated from the Alsatian mountains and settled near Reading, Pa. His grandfather removed at an early period to the Moravian settlement of Graenhain, Md. His father, who was a farmer, would have preferred him to be a field-laborer, and, on account of his studious habits and thirst for knowledge, called him "dreamer Joseph," but his mother sympathized with him and encouraged him. After his confirmation, in his sixteenth year, as a member of the Moravian church, he determined to devote his life to the ministry. Receiving no encouragement from his father or his church, he was, by the help of a few Lutheran clergymen, enabled to enter Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1839. Here he remained a year or two, afterward pursuing his theological course in private. In 1842 he was licensed to preach by the synod of Virginia, and in 1844 he was ordained to the Moravian ministry. After holding pastorates in Virginia and Maryland he was called to St. John's English Lutheran church, Philadelphia, in 1858. In 1874 the necessity for an English Lutheran church in the western part of the city led to the establishment of the Church of the Holy Communion by members of St. John's congregation, and he was at once elected its pastor. A beautiful Gothic church of green serpentine marble was erected on the corner of Broad and Arch streets, at a cost of 82,500. It was consecrated on 1 Feb., 1877, and contains the finest Protestant churches in Philadelphia. Dr. Seiss is an eloquent pulpit orator. His style is clear, ornate, attractive, and forcible. He has published his first work at the age of twenty-two years, and has now attained a wide reputation as an author. His publications number more than a hundred, and some of them have been republished in England and translated into other languages. A biographical sketch of his published works (Philadelphia, 1887) makes a quarto volume of fifty-seven pages. He was joint editor of the "Lutheran," Philadelphia, in 1860-1, and of the "Lutheran and Missionary" in 1891-76, editor of the same for several years, and editor of "Prophetic Times" in 1863-75. He spent the years 1864-5 in European and Eastern travels, including a tour through China and Palestine. His numerous publications include "Popular Lectures on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (Baltimore, 1846); "The Baptist System Examined" (Philadelphia, 1854; revised ed., 1858); "The Last Times" (1856); "The Lutheran Church" (1859); "Holy Times" (1860); "Petos, or the Wonderful Building" (1862); "Lectures on the Epistles of the Church Year" (2 vols., 1862); "The Apocalypse, with Revised Text" (3 vols., 1862); complete ed., London, 1882; German translation, Basel, 1884-7); "Urd, or, some Occasional Discourses" (1874); "A Miracle in Stone, or the Great Pyramid" (1877); "Recreation Songs" (1878; with supplement, 1887); "Life after Death" (1878); "Practical Sermons" (1879); "Blossoms of Faith" (1880); "Remarks on Indul- dence" (1882); "The Gospel in the Stars" (1882; enlarged ed., 1885); "Luther and the Reformation" (1883); "Lectures on the Epistles of the Church Year" (2 vols., 1885); "Right Life" (1886); "The Children of Silence" (1887); and "Christ's Descent into Hell" (1887). He has also published various liturgical works, including a "Book of Forms" (1890); "How shall we Order our Worship?" (1890); "The Golden Altar" (1892); and several collections of church music.

SELDEN, Samuel Lee, jurist, b. in Lyme, Conn., 12 Oct., 1800; d. in Rochester, N.Y., 20 Sept., 1876. His ancestors settled in the colony of Connecticut in 1636. He began to practise law in Rochester, N.Y., in 1829; was chamber clerk and first judge of common pleas in Monroe county for many years, and in 1847 was elected justice of the supreme court. In 1856 he was elected judge of the court of appeals, which place he resigned in 1862. His brother, Henry Rogers, jurist, b. in Lyme, Conn., 11 Oct., 1803; d. in Rochester, N.Y., 18
Sept., 1883. In 1823 he removed to Rochester, N. Y., where he studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1830. He began practice in Clarkson, Monroe, but returned to Rochester in 1839, and was reporter of the court of appeals in 1851-'7. He was a Democrat, but, being opposed to the extension of slavery, availed himself in the formation of the Republican party, and in 1856 was its successful candidate for the lieutenant-governorship. He attended the Republican national convention at Chicago in 1856, and consequently with his colleague, from New York, voted against the nomination of William H. Seward, but acquiesced in the nomination of Abraham Lincoln. In July, 1862, Mr. Selfridge was appointed a judge of the court of appeals to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of his brother, and he was afterward elected for a full term, but resigned in 1864. In 1872 he attended the Cincinnati convention that nominated Horace Greeley for the presidency, and, though opposed to this course, reluctantly supported him in his canvass. He published "Reports, New York Court of Appeals, 1851-4" (6 vols., Albany, 1853-60).

SELFBRIDGE, Thomas Oliver, naval officer, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 April, 1804. He entered the navy as midshipman, 1 Jan., 1818, was promoted to lieutenant, 3 March, 1827, and served in the Indiaman "American," and the East Indiamen, "Sovereign," and "Pert Pompey." He was commissioned commander, 11 April, 1844, and was assigned to the ship "Columbus," which was the flag-ship of the East India squadron in 1845-6, and subsequently of the Pacific squadron during the Mexican war, 1846-7. In May, 1847, he was transferred to the sloop "Dale," in which he participated in the engagement and capture of the Mexican frigate "Zamora," and the latter place he received a severe wound, in consequence of which he was obliged to relinquish the command of the "Dale," and returned home in June, 1848. He was then on leave and on duty at the Boston navy-yard until 1851, when he had command of the steam frigate "Mississippi," in the Gulf squadron, for a few months. His wound incapacitated him for sea-service, and he had charge of the navy-yard at Mare island, Cal., in 1862-'3. He was promoted to captain, 14 Sept., 1855, and to commodore, 16 July, 1852, and was retired on 24 April, 1866. He was president of the examining board in 1869-'70, lighthouse inspector at Boston, and also member of the examining board in 1870-1, since which time he has been on waiting orders and is now the senior officer of the navy on the retired list. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 25 July, 1886.—His son, Thomas Oliver, naval officer, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 6 Feb., 1837, was graduated at the U. S. naval academy at the head of his class in 1854. He was promoted to lieutenant, 15 Feb., 1859, and was 2d lieutenant of the "Cumberland" when she was surprised by the Seminole Indians in the bay of St. Joseph, Fla. He was detailed to command the "Monitor" after the engagement with the "Merrimac," but was transferred as flag-lieutenant of the North Atlantic blockading squadron. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and commanded the iron-clad steamer " Cairo," which was blown up by a torpedo in Yucatán river, near Vicksburg, in 1862, and was professor of navigation at the expense of Vicksburg, and the steamers "Conestoga" and "Manitou." He commanded the iron-clad "Osage" in the Red river expedition, during which he inflicted a loss of 400 killed and wounded on the Confederates at Blair's plantation. He next commanded the "Vindictor" and the 5th division of the Mississippi river fleet until 1864. He had charge of the steamer "Huron" in both attacks on Fort Fisher, and commanded the 5th division of the landing party of sailors that stormed the fort. He was promoted to commander, 31 Dec., 1869, and in that year took charge of surveys for an interoceancic canal across the Isthmus of Darien. He surveyed the San Blas route in 1870, the lines near Caledonia bay, the De Puydit route, and the Gorgoza route in 1871, and the Attrato river in 1871-'3. He was also a member of the international congress at Paris on the subject of the canal in 1876. The official reports of these surveys were published by congress. He commanded the steamer "Enterprise," North Atlantic station, in 1877-'90, during which cruise he surveyed Amazon river. He was commissioned captain, 24 Feb., 1881, and in January took charge of the torpedo station at Newport, R. I., where he remained until 1885. During his service at the torpedo station he invented a device to protect a ship by suspending torpedoes to a net by which an attacking torpedo would be destroyed. In 1885-7 he commanded the "Omaha," of the Asiatic squadron, and in March, 1887, after he had engaged in target practice off the island of Iwo-Sima, Japan, the bursting of an unexploded shell caused the death of four natives of the island. He became commodore in 1894, rear-admiral in 1897, and was retired in February, 1898.
SELKIRK, Edward, clergyman, b. in Warwick, England, 13 Dec., 1780. He was graduated at Trinity in 1800, and at the General theological seminary in 1803, was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church the same year, and became priest in 1814. He was then rector of Trinity church, Albany, N. Y., in which he continued till 1854, when he became rector emeritus. He was an honorary canon of the Albany cathedral. He had published "An Address on the Laying of the Corner-Stone of Trinity Church" (Albany, 1844) and "History of Trinity Church" (1870).

SELKIRK, Thomas Douglass, Earl of, b. at the family-seat, St. Mary's isle, Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, in June, 1771; d. in Pa., June 8, 1829. He studied at Edinburgh university from 1788 till 1800, early developed a taste for literary pursuits, and was an associate of Sir Walter Scott. He succeeded his brother as Lord Dacre in 1797, and his father as Earl of Selkirk in May, 1799. In 1803 he settled a colony of 500 Scottish Highlanders upon waste land that was given to him by the government in Prince Edward island, and soon afterward he established a small colony in Kent county, Delaware. While there he continued his experiments in the cultivation of potatoes, and in 1812 he conceived the project of planting a colony of evicted Highlanders from the estates of the Duchess of Sutherland in the Red river country. To accomplish this he purchased a large tract of land on the Red river for colonization from the Hudson bay company. His Highland colonists began to arrive in 1811, and in 1812 the Red river colony was established. Trouble arose between the colony and the Northwest trading company, and the emigrants were driven from their new homes. In 1816 Lord Selkirk went to Red river to aid his colonists against their enemies, and, assisted by a small armed force, restored them to their lands and reimbursed them for their losses. He became financially embarrassed in consequence of his efforts to aid his fellow-countrymen, and in 1818 he moved to London, where he purchased the health that he never recovered. Soon after his return to Scotland he went to the south of France to recruit, but he died shortly afterward. He wrote "Observations on the Present State of the Highlands of Scotland, with a View of the Causes and Probable Consequences of the Highland Disturbances of 1798" (1802); "Necessity of a more Effectual System of National Defence" (1808); "Sketch of the British Fur Trade" (1816); "The Red River Settlement" (1817); and "Occurrences in the Indian Countries of North America" (Montreal, 1818).

SELAIR, William, mechanical engineer, b. in Upper Darby, Pa., 19 Sept., 1824. He was educated at a private school, and, at the age of fourteen was apprenticed to the trade of brass-founder in a Philadelphia firm, which remained the same for seven years. In 1845 he was called to the management of the shops of the Fairbanks and Bancroft machine-works in Providence, R. I., and two years afterward he established himself independently in Philadelphia. He was then joined by his former employer, and in 1848 the firm of Bancroft and Sellers was formed, which continued until 1855, when Mr. Bancroft retired, and the style became William Sellers and Co. Mr. Sellers has been active in the improvement of existing forms of tools and machines, as well as in the invention of new patterns, and from his first patent, for an improvement on turning-lathes in 1854, until 1889 he has received seventy patents. His improvements were introduced at the World's Fair in Vienna in 1873 when he was awarded a grand diploma of honor. In 1868 he established the Edgemoor iron company, which now owns the largest plant in this country for building iron bridges and other structures of iron and steel. All of the iron-work for the buildings of the World's fair in Philadelphia in 1876 were supplied by this company, and the Westinghouse steel-works in 1876, and reorganized that concern, which is now one of the largest establishments in the vicinity of Philadelphia. Mr. Sellers was elected president of the Franklin institute in 1864, and while holding that office proposed the first formula that was ever offered for a system of screws, and in which he subsequently became the standard for the United States. He is a member of scientific societies both in this country and SEMMES, Alexander Aldebaran, naval officer, b. in Washington, D. C., 8 June, 1825; d. in Hamilton, Va., 22 Sept., 1885. He attended the naval academy at Annapolis, and became a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847. He was promoted to master, 11 Aug., 1855, and to lieutenant, 15 Sept., 1855. During the civil war he rendered creditable service in command of the steamer "Rhode Island" on the Atlantic coast blockade in 1861, and in the steamer "Wamsutta" on the South Atlantic blockade during which he conducted numerous engagements with forts and batteries on the coasts of Georgia and Florida, where he captured several blockade-runners in 1862-3. He commanded the monitor "Lehigh" in the bombardment of Fort Pringle, and participated in the operations at Charleston until that city surrendered. He cooperated with Grant's army, fought the howitzer batteries, and was present at the fall of Richmond in 1865. He was commissioned a commander, 25 July, 1866, promoted to captain, 24 Aug., 1873, and stationed at the Pensacola navy-yard in 1873-5. In 1880 he was president of the board of inspection, after which he was commandant of the navy-yard at Washington. He was commissioned commodore, 10 March, 1882, and was in command of the navy-yard at the time of his death, but had left the city on account of his health.

SEMMES, Raphael, naval officer, b. in Charles county, Md., 27 Sept., 1809; d. in Mobile, Ala., 30 Aug., 1877. President John Quincy Adams appointed him a midshipman in the U. S. navy in 1826, but he did not enter upon active service until 1832, the intermediate years being spent in study. In 1834, after returning from his first cruise, he was admitted to the bar, but decided to remain a seaman. In 1837 he was promoted lieutenant, and in 1842 he removed to Alabama. At the beginning of the war with Mexico he was made flag-lieutenant under Commodore Conner, commanding the squadron in the Gulf, and in the siege of Vera Cruz he was in charge of one of the naval batteries on shore. He was in command of the U. S. brig "Somers" on the blockade

SELYNS, Henriques, clergyman, b. in Amsterdam, Holland, in 1636; d. in New York city in July, 1701. His ancestors were clergymen in the Reformed church in Holland for a century previous to his birth. He was educated for the ministry, and in 1660 was sent to this country by the classis of Amsterdam to become pastor of the Reformed Dutch church of Breukelen (Brooklyn). To supplement his salary, he was also permitted to engage in trade, and was agent for Pieter Stuyvans's farm, Bouwerie (now Bowery, New York, where he taught negroes and the poor whites. He returned to Holland in 1664, but in 1682 accepted a call from the 1st Reformed Dutch church of New York city, of which he was pastor until his death. He was on intimate terms with the most eminent men of his day, and was the choicest of the early ministers of his church, and to secure for it an independent and permanent foundation under the English government. He and his consistory obtained, in May, 1696, the first church charter that was issued in the colony. Although his original work that has been preserved is scanty, he wrote much, and Cotton Mather says of his poetical powers that "he had so nimble a fancy for putting his devout thoughts into verse that upon this, as well as upon greater accounts, he was a David unto the blocks in the wilderness." He collected all the records of the New York Reformed Dutch church to the date of his own ministry, and transcribed them with his own pen. This volume is still extant and in good preservation in the records of the Reformed Dutch church of New York city. His only publication are "Poems," translated from the Dutch into English by H. Murphy, and printed in his "Anthology of the New Netherlands" in the collections of New York historical society, and a Latin poem (1687) prefixed to some editions of Cotton Mather's "Magna Lib." of the Mexican coast, when the brig founded in a gale, and most of her crew were drowned. Lieut. Semmes served for several years as inspector of light-houses on the Gulf coast, in 1853 was promoted commander, and in 1858 became secretary of the light-house board at Washington. On the secession of Alabama, 15 Feb., 1861, he resigned his commission in the U. S. navy and reported to Jefferson Davis at Montgomery, who instructed him to return to the north and endeavor to procure mechanics skilled in the manufacture and use of ordnance and rifle machinery and the preparation of fixed shot and shell and the war stores and pay material. In Washington he examined the machinery of the arsenal, and conferred with mechanics whom he desired to go south. Within the next three weeks he made a tour through the principal workshops of New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, purchased large quantities of percussion-caps in New York, which were sent to Montgomery without any disguise, made contracts for light artillery, powder, and other munitions of war, and shipped thousands of pounds of powder to the south. He returned to Montgomery on 4 April, to find that he had been commissioned commander in the Confederate navy, and placed in charge of the light-house bureau, which he relinquished within two weeks to give the discharge of his official duties by which he captured eighteen merchantmen. After the blockade of that ship at Tangiers by two U. S. men-of-war, he sold her and went to England, having been promoted meantime to the rank of captain. There the fast steamer “Alabama” was built for him, and in August, 1863, he took command of her at the Azores islands, put to sea, and captured sixty-two American merchantmen, most of which he burned at sea. Upon her loss in the battle with the “Kearsarge,” on 19 June, 1864 (see Wisslow, Joux A.), he returned to England, and in London was presented by officers of the British army and navy with a sword to replace that which he had cast into the sea from the deck of his sinking ship. On 3 Oct., 1864, he sailed for Havana, whence he returned to England, the steamer passing through Texas and Louisiana. He was appointed rear-admiral, and ordered to the James river squadron, with which he guarded the water approaches to Richmond until the city was evacuated. At Greensboro, N. C., on 1 May, 1865, he participated in the capitulation of Gen. Johnston’s army. He returned to Mobile and opened a law office. There, on 15 Dec., 1865, he was arrested by order of Sec. Welles and was imprisoned. The reason, as given by the attorney-general of the United States, was his liability to trial as a traitor, which he had evaded by his escape after the destruction of the “Alabama.” From his prison he wrote to President Johnson a letter claiming immunity for all former actions taken in the capacity of a Confederate agent, as he was a party at Greensboro, and the subsequent quarrel between Mr. Johnson and the Republican majority of congress interrupted any proceedings looking to his trial. He was released under the third of the president’s amnesty proclamations, and in May, 1866, was elected judge of the probate court of Mobile county, but an order from President Johnson forbade him to exercise the functions of the office. He then became editor of a daily paper in Mobile, which he gave up to accept a professor’s chair in the Louisiana military institute. He afterward returned to Mobile and resumed the practice of law, in which he was occupied till his death. He published “Service Abroad and Ashore during the Mexican War” (Cincinnati, 1851); “The Campaign of Gen. Scott in the Valley of Mexico” (1852); “The Cruise of the Alabama and Sumter” (New York, 1864); and “Memoirs of Service Abroad during the War between the States” (Baltimore, 1869). The action of the British government in permitting the “Alabama” and other similar cruisers to be fitted out in its ports gave rise to the so-called “Alabama claims” on the part of the United States, settled by arbitration in 1872. (See Grant, Ulysses S.—His cousin, Alexander Jenkins, surgeon, b. in Georgetown, D. C., 17 Dec., 1828, was educated at Georgetown college, and graduated at the National medical college, Washington, D. C., 1856. He studied in Paris and London, and on his return settled in Georgetown, D. C., but removed to New Orleans, La. He was commissioned a surgeon in the Confederate army in 1861, served in that capacity in Gen. Thomas J. Jackson’s corps in the Army of Northern Virginia, was surgeon in charge in the Jackson military hospital, Richmond, Va., became medical inspector of the Department of Northern Virginia in 1862, inspector of hospitals in the Department of Virginia in 1863, and president of the examining boards of the Louisiana, Jackson, Stuart, and Winder hospitals, Richmond, Va., in 1865. He was visiting physician to the Charity hospital, New Orleans, La., in 1869–70, removed to New Orleans and annuity, and became professor of physiology in the Savannah medical college. Subsequently he took orders in the Roman Catholic church, and in 1886 he became president of Pio Nono college, Macon, Ga. He was a secretary of the American medical association in 1858–9, a member of several professional societies, and the author of medical and other papers. His publications include “Medical Sketches of Paris” (New York, 1854); “Gunshot Wounds” (1864); “Notes from a Surgical Diary” (1866); “Surgical Notes of the Late War” (1867); “The Fluid Extracts” (1869); “Evolution of the Origin of Life” (1873); and the “Influence of Yellow Fever on Pregnancy and Parturition” (1879). SEMPLE, James, senator, b. in Green county, Ky., 5 Jan., 1816; d. in Elshad Landing, Ill., 20 Dec., 1866. His educational advantages were limited to the common schools of Greensburg and the law-school at Louisville, Ky. After his graduation at the latter he removed at once to Edwardsville, Ill., and practised his profession. At the beginning of the Black Hawk war he was commissioned brigadier-general. He represented Madison county several times in the legislature, and was twice speaker of the house. From 1837 till 1842 he was minister at Bogota, Colombia. In 1843 he was elected judge of the superior court, but he soon resigned to enter the U. S. senate, where he served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1847, filling the unexpired term of Samuel McRoberts, deceased. He became an active advocate of the Mexican war, and in the General Court. Returning to his home in 1847, he declined to accept any political office. He expended considerable time and money during the last years of his life in experimenting on a steam road-wagon which he had made, but it proved a failure. SEMPLE, Robert, British author, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1796; d. in Fort Douglas, British America, 19 June, 1861. He was nominated chief governor of all the factories and territories of the Hudson bay company in 1815, and, sailing from England, reached York factory, British America, in August of the same year. He made a tour of inspection of all the posts of the company immediately upon his arrival, and did not reach his headquarters at Fort Douglas (now part of Winnipeg) until the spring of 1816. For some time previous to the arrival of Gov. Sempé there had been a conflict of authority between the Hudson bay company and the North-west trading company, which resulted in bloodshed on several occasions. On 19 June, 1816, Cuthbert Grant, a half-breed, representing the North-west company, in command of a band of Indians and others, marched against Fort Douglas, attacked Gov. Simcoe, severely wounded him and a number of his followers by means of an ambush, and killed him and twenty-seven others. He was represented as a mild, just, and honorable man. Among other works he wrote "Walks and Sketches at the Cape of Good Hope," (London, 1803); "Charles Ellis, or the Friends," a novel (1806); "A Journey through Spain and Italy" (2 vols., 1807); "Spanish Post-Guide," "Second Journey in Spain" (1810); "State of Caracas" (1812); and "Tour from Hamburg" (1814).

SEMPLE, Robert Baylor, clergyman, b. in King and Queen county, Va., 20 Jan., 1799; d. in Fredericksburg, Va., 25 Dec., 1831. After receiving a good education he taught in a private family and then began to study law, but abandoned it and devoted himself to the ministry. In 1799 he was chosen pastor of the Richmond Baptist church, and he continued in this relation until his death. He soon became one of the most useful and popular men in Virginia, performed frequent and extensive preaching tours, and with equal vigor and wisdom promoted the new enterprises of benevolence that were beginning to attract the attention of his denomination. The interest of missions and education found in him a powerful friend. He received many testimonials of public confidence and esteem. He was for some time financial agent of Columbian college, and president of its board of trustees, declined an invitation to the presidency of Transylvania university in 1815, and in 1819 was elected president of the Baptist triennial convention, continuing to hold this office until his death. He received the honorary degree of D. D. from Brown in 1816. Dr. Semple was the author of a "Catechism" (1809); a "History of Virginia Baptists" (1810); "Memoir of Elder Stranghan"; "Letters to Alexander Campbell," etc.

SENECAL, Louis Adelard, Canadian senator, b. in Varennes, Lower Canada, 10 July, 1829; d. in Montreal, 11 Oct., 1887. He was educated in his native city, receiving a good classical and afterwards engaged in business. He was a member of the Quebec assembly for Drummond and Arthabaska from 1867 till 1871, and of the Dominion parliament for Yamaska from 1867 till 1872, and became a member of the Dominion senate, 13 March, 1887. In 1857 he opened to navigation the Yamaska river between Sorel and St. Aime, and the St. Francis river between Sorel and St. Francis. He has constructed numerous railways, including the ice railway on the St. Lawrence from Montreal to Longueuil, which he worked for two winters. Under his management the Richelieu line was extended from Hamilton and Toronto to Chichester, a distance of about 1,000 miles. He was a general superintendent of the government railways of the province of Quebec between Out and the North Shore railway, the Montreal City Passenger railway, and the Richelieu and Ontario navigation company. He was a commander of the French Legion of honor.

SENER, James Beverley, lawyer, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., 18 May, 1807. He received an academic preparation, attended lectures at the University of Pennsylvania, and was graduated in several of the schools of the university. He then studied law at Lexington, Va., was admitted to the bar in March, 1830, and served as sergeant (or sheriff) of the city of Fredericksburg, Va., in 1833-5. He was army correspondent of the Southern associated press, with Gen. Lee's Army of Northern Virginia in 1862-5, and from 1865 till 1875 was editor of the Fredericksburg "Ledger." Mr. Sener was a delegate from Virginia to the National Republican conventions of 1872 and 1875 and served as a member of the national convention from 1875 till 1880. He was a member of congress in 1873-5, and was the chairman of the committee on expenditures in the department of justice, being the first chairman of such a committee. He was chief justice of Wyoming territory from 18 Dec., 1879, till 10 March, 1884.

SENEY, Joshua, member of the Continental congress, b. on the eastern shore of Maryland in 1761; d. there in 1799. He was educated by private tutors, engaged in planting, and supported the patriot cause during the Revolution. He was a member of the Continental congress in 1787-8, and of the 1st congress in 1789, and served by election till 1 May, 1792, when he resigned. He was a presidential elector in that year, supporting Washington. He married a daughter of Com. James Nicholson.—His grandson, George Ingraham, banker, b. in Astoria, L. I., 12 May, 1826; d. in New York, 7 April, 1863, was the son of a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church. George was a student in 1845 at Wesleyan, from which he received the degree of A. M. in 1846, was graduated of the University of Virginia in 1847, and was licentiate of the Metropolitan bank, New York city, to the presidency of that institution, holding the latter office in 1877-84, when the bank was suspended and Mr. Seney lost a fortune of several million dollars, a large part of which he afterward regained. His contributions to charitable and educational institutions include $410,000 to the Methodist general hospital of Brooklyn, $100,000 to the Long Island historical society, $250,000 to Emory college and Wesleyan female college, Macon, Ga., and $100,000 to benevolent objects in Brooklyn. He founded the Seney scholarships and largely endowed Wesleyan university, and had contributed to miscellaneous charities more than $1,000,000. His gallery ofspecimens, which was sold for $28,000 in 1855, and he also presented several valuable paintings to the Metropolitan museum of art, New York city.

SENTER, Isaac, physician, b. in New Hampshire in 1755; d. in Newport, R. I., 20 Dec., 1799. He went to Newport, R. I., early in life, studied medicine with Dr. Thomas Moffat, was a surgeon in the Revolutionary army, and accompanied Benedict Arnold's expedition to Quebec, an interesting account of which he published in the "Bulletin of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania." He afterward practised in Pawtucket, but finally settled in Newport, and became one of the most eminent surgeons and practitioners in the state. He was an honorary member of the medical societies of London, Edinburgh, and Massachusetts, and for many years president of the Cincinnati of Rhode Island. He contributed to the medical journals, and published "Remarks on Phthisis Pulmonalis" in the "Transactions of the College of Physicians of Philadelphia" (1795).

SEPTENVILLE, Charles Edouard Langlois (say-tong-lees), Baron de, French author, b. in Paris, 17 Nov., 1805. He devoted himself to historical researches, especially upon the early history of South America. In March, 1876, he was elected a deputy by the city of Amiens, and he is member of various learned SERCY, Pierre César Charles Guillaume, Marquis de, French naval officer, b. near Autun, 26 April, 1753; d. in Paris, 10 Aug., 1836. He entered the navy in 1769, was commissioned ensign in May, 1779, and served under the Count de Guichen. For his participation in several dangerous enterprises during the siege of Pensacola, Fl., he was made lieutenant and given the cross of St. Louis. On his return to France he was ordered to the command of "La Surveillante" in 1780, and sailed for Martinique. He was promoted captain in 1792, and in January, 1793, was ordered to convey to France all the merchant vessels in those waters. The fleet was laden with valuable cargoes, when the rising of the negroes on Santo Domingo occurred. He rescued 6,000 of the colonists. As his scanty supply of provisions and the feebleness of his naval force did not permit of his attempting to cross the Atlantic, he set sail for the coast of New England, where he arrived in safety. On his return to France in December, he was imprisoned for six months for being of noble birth. In December, 1795, he was given command of the naval force that was detailed to accompany the two civil commissioners that were charged with the execution of the decree giving liberty to the blacks in Martinique and Réunion. Sercey, fearing that scenes similar to those he had witnessed at Santo Domingo might be enacted there, warned the colonists of the nature of the commissioners' errand, and they were in consequence not allowed to land. In 1804, at his earnest request, he was placed on the retired list, and sailed for Martinique, which he gallantly defended against the English in 1810. On the declaration of peace in 1814 he was appointed provisional legation to the British at Angers, in France, for the exchange of French prisoners. On his return to France he was promoted vice-admiral, again placed on the retired list in April, 1812, and became a member of the house of peers.

SERGEANT, John, missionary, b. in Newark, N. J., in 1719; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 27 July, 1749. His grandfather, Jonathan, was a founder of Newark in 1665. John was graduated at Yale in 1729, and served as tutor there in 1731-5. He began to preach to the Indians at House tone, in western Massachusetts, in 1734, and the next year permanently settled among them and taught them in their own language. In 1736, when the general court purchased of the Indians all the land at Skateboard, and in return granted them the township which is now called Stockbridge, he was made owner of one sixtieth part, and ordained "settled missionary to the Indians" there and at Kaunamoke. A short time before his death he established a manual-labor school at Stockbridge that was in successful operation several years. He translated into the Indian language parts of the Old and New Testaments, of Titus and of the Book of Revelation, and published a "Letter on the Indians" (1743) and "A Sermon" (1743).—His son, Erastus, physician, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 7 Aug., 1742; d. there, 14 Nov., 1814, passed two years at Princeton, and studied medicine with his uncle, Dr. Thomas Williams, in Deerfield, Mass. He then settled in Stockbridge, and was the first practitioner in that town. He was a skillful surgeon, and the principal operator within a circle of thirty miles radius. He entered the Revolutionary army in 1775 as major of the 7th Massachusetts regiment, and served with it on Lake Champlain from December, 1776, till April, 1777, and subsequently till Burgoyne's surrender.—Another son of John, John, missionary, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1747; d. there, 8 Sept., 1834, studied at Princeton two years, was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church, and in 1775 took charge of the Indian part of the Stockbridge congregation. When they removed to New Stockbridge, N. Y., he followed them and labored among them until his death. One of his daughters established a temperance society for Indian women. Mr. Sergeant possessed little worldly wisdom, and was better known for his useful and blameless life than for his intellectual gifts, but he exercised great influence among the Indian tribes, and, on hearing of his expected death, one of the chiefs said: "We shall lose a friend as if it were our own kin, and we do not know what darkness will succeed."—The first John's nephew, Jonathan Dickinson, lawyer, b. in Newark, N. J., in 1746; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Oct., 1796, was the grandson of Jonathan Dickinson, the first president of Princeton. He was graduated there in 1762, studied law, and began practice in his native state. He took his seat in the Continental congress a few days after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, served in 1776-7, and in July, 1777, became attorney-general of Pennsylvania. In 1778, congress having ordered a council of war-making a court-martial of three in the trial of Gen. Arthur St. Clair and other officers in relation to the evacuation of Ticonderoga, he was appointed by that body, with William Patterson, of New Jersey, to assist the judge-advocate in the conduct of the trial. He resigned the office of attorney-general in 1780, settled in his profession in Philadelphia, was counsel for the state of Pennsylvania in the controversy with Connecticut concerning the Wyoming lands in 1782, and was conspicuous in the management of many other important cases. When the yellow fever visited Philadelphia in 1793 he was appointed one of the health committee, and in consequence refused to leave the city. He distributed large sums among the poor, nursed the sick, and was active in sanitary measures, but fell a victim to the epidemic.—Jonathan Dickinson's son, John, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 5 Dec., 1739; d. there, 25 Nov., 1852, was graduated at Princeton in 1760, and, abandoning his intention to become a merchant, was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1799. For more than half a century he was known throughout the country as one of the most honorable and learned members of his profession and its acknowledged leader in Philadelphia. He entered public life in 1801, when he was appointed commissioner of bankrupt by Thomas Jefferson, was a member of the legislature in 1808-10, and of congress in 1813-22. He was president of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention in 1839, and Whig candidate for the vice-presidency on the ticket with Henry Clay in 1832. He declined the mission to England in 1841, and his last public service was in the capacity or a long-pending controversy. The question at issue concerned the title to Pea Patch island as derived by the United States from the state of Delaware, and by James Humphrey claiming through Henry Gale from the state of New Jersey. This involved the question of the boundary between the two states, or, in other words, the claim to Delaware river, and the decision in favor of the United States incidentally decided the boundary dispute in favor of Delaware.—Another son of Jonathan Dickinson, Thomas, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., April 14, 1782; d. there, 8 May, 1860, was graduated at Princeton in 1798, studied law under Jared Ingersoll, and was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1802. He was in the legislature in 1812-14, in the latter year was appointed associate justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and was secretary of the commonwealth in 1817-19. While holding that office he began the formation of the state law library at Harrisburg. He was attorney-general in 1819-20, postmaster of Philadelphia in 1828-32, and in February, 1834, became associate-justice of the supreme court, which office he held till his resignation in 1848. His judicial decisions were estemed for their brevity, and simplicity, and it is said that he was the only judge that ever sat on the Pennsylvania bench not one of whose decisions was reversed. He was the chief exponent of the limited equity jurisdiction of the court, and was of service in bringing this into an intelligible and convenient shape. He returned to the bar in 1847, and successfully practised until the failure of his health compelled his gradual abandonment of professional labor. He was provost of the law academy of Philadelphia in 1844-55, for many years president of the Pennsylvania historical society, a member of the American philosophical society, and a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania. He married, on 14 Sept., 1813, Sarah Bache, a granddaughter of Benjamin Franklin. His publications include "Treatise upon the Law of Pennsylvania relative to the Proceedings by Foreign Attachment" (Philadelphia, 1811); "Reports of Cases adjudged in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania," with William Rawle, Jr. (17 vols., 1814-29); "Constitutional Law" (1822); "Sketch of the National Judiciary Powers exercised in the United States prior to the Adoption of the Federal Constitution by an Analysis and View of the Land Laws of Pennsylvania." (1838).

Serra, José de la (sair-nah), last viceroy of Peru, b. in Jerez de la Frontera, Spain, in 1770; d. in Cadiz in 1832. At an early age he entered the army, seeing his first service as a cadet in the defense of Centa against the Moors in 1784. He served against the French in Catalonia in 1790, under General Wurmser, against the British in 1797, and in the second siege of Saragossa in 1809, where he was captured and carried to France as a prisoner. Soon he escaped, and, after travelling for some time in Switzerland and the Orient, returned in 1811 to Spain, and served under Wellington till the expulsion of the French in 1813. In 1816 he held the rank of major-general and was appointed to take command in Peru. He arrived on 22 Sept., in Callao, and, proceeding at once to Lima, took charge of the army in Cotagastta on 12 Nov. The viceroy, confronted with the fact of having to begin offensive operations against the province of Truxman, which was occupied by the Argentine patriots, Serna objected to the insufficiency of his forces, but Pozuela insisted, when suddenly they were surprised by the victorious march of San Martin across the Andes and the reconquest of Chile. The army of upper Peru was henceforth reduced to a defensive war, the viceroy desiring insurrectionary movements in several parts of the country. Serna's opposition to the viceroy increased, and at last he asked for permission to retire to Spain. His leave of absence arrived in May, 1819, and in September he resigned the command of the army to Gen. Canterac. On his arrival in Lima in December, his partisans made a demonstration in favor of not allowing Serna to leave Peru on the eve of a threatened invasion from Chili, and the viceroy, to avoid disagreement, promoted him lieutenant-general and appointed him president of a consulting council of war. After the landing of San Martin in Pisco, 8 Sept., 1820, Serna, through secret machinations, obtained an appointment as commander-in-chief of the army that was gathered at Ayacucho for the purpose of crushing the advance of San Martin and was ordered by the viceroy to march to Chancay. On 29 Jan., 1821, the principal officers of the camp, partisans of Serna, presented a petition to the viceroy, requesting him to resign in favor of the latter. Pozuela refused, and ordered Serna to subdue the mutiny; but the latter pretended to be unable to do so, and, after vainly urging the president of the junta to leave the executive on the evening of the same day. When San Martin threatened the capital, a Spanish commissioner, Capt. Manuei Alben, arrived from Europe with orders to negotiate for a pacific arrangement, and Serna sent him to make proposals to San Martin. The negotiations lasted from 5 May till 24 June, but produced no result, and on the next day hostilities began again. As the situation became daily more dangerous, Serna abandoned the capital on 6 July, 1821, and retired to Junin, where he reorganized his army, sending Gen. Canterac on 24 Aug., with a force of 4,000 men to relieve Callao. Afterward Serna established his headquarters at Cuzco, but after a campaign of variable success there were dissensions in the army, and Gen. Olafeta refused obedience and maintained an independent position in upper Peru. Canterac was defeated on 6 Aug., 1824, by Bolivar, at Junin. The viceroy now resolved to crush the patriot army by a supreme effort, and left Cuzco in October with a well-disciplined army of 10,000 infantry and 1,600 cavalry. He met the patriot army in the mountain plain of Ayacucho on 8 Dec., and, regardless of the day's defeat, he returned to Lima. Gen. Sucre and wounded and taken prisoner. The Spanish army lost 2,000 wounded and dead and 3,000 prisoners, and as the rest was entirely dispersed. Gen. Canterac, the second in command, signed an honorable capitulation the next day, and the viceroy; who on the date of the battle had been created by the king Count de los Andes, was soon afterward permitted to sail for Europe. He was honorably received at court, his administration was approved, and he was appointed captain-general of several provinces.

Serra, Angel (sair-ehl), Mexican linguist, b. in Zitacuaro, Michoacan, about 1640; d. in Queretaro about 1700. He entered the Franciscan order in Mexico, and became guardian of the Convent of San Pedro y San Pablo, where he studied the Tarasco language, in which he soon became the recognized authority in Mexico. Wishing to utilize his knowledge, he was sent to the Sierra Gorda as missionary to the Indians, and was appointed parish priest of Ozares, a village in Queretaro. He wrote "Manual Trilingüe, Latino, Castellano y Tarasco, para administrar los Sacramentos a los Españoles y a los Indios" (Mexico, 1855); "El Catacsmo del P. Bartolome Castillo, traducido al Tarasco" (Queretaro, 1699); and "Arte, Diccionario y Confesionario en Tarasco," which was ready for publication in 1860.

SERRANO Y DOMINGUEZ, Francisco, Duke de la Torre, Spanish soldier, b. at San Fernando, near Cadiz, 17 Oct., 1810; d. in Madrid, 26 Nov., 1885. He was the son of a Spanish general, entered the military college as a cadet in 1822, and in 1825 became ensign. He served till 1833 in the coastguard, but after the death of Ferdinand VII, he espoused the cause of his brother-in-law, Isabella II. He was promoted in 1840 major-general and second chief of the cavalry of Valencia, and in 1843 elected to the Cortes, of which he became vice-president. He joined in the overthrow of the regency of Espartero on 24 July, and the declaration that Queen Isabella was of age. In November of the same year he was for ten days minister of war, and many military promotions, and in February, 1844, was exiled for participation in the insurrection of Saragossa. In June he returned to take part in the successful revolution under Espartero and O'Donnell, and in July, 1846, he joined the latter in his successful coup d'état, and was sent in 1857 as ambassador to Paris. In 1859 he went as captain-general to Cuba, and during his administration established order and discipline, and the city was made capital of the Spanish crown was brought about. For this, although it cost the nation millions of money and thousands of lives, he was created Duke de la Torre, on his return to Spain, and made captain-general of the army. In 1896 he was imprisoned in Alicante for his protest, as president of the senate, against the illegal dissolution of the Cortes, and in July, 1868, was exiled to the Canary islands, but on 19 Sept. he landed at Cadiz, and aided in overthrowing the government of Queen Isabella, vanquishing the royal troops at Alosca on 28 Sept. On 8 Oct. he became chief of the provisional government, and on 16 June, 1869, he was elected regent of the kingdom, which place he occupied till the proclamation of the king by Prince Amadeus, who in January, 1871, made him prime minister. In 1872 he took the field as commander-in-chief against the Carlists, and, after the proclamation of the republic in 1873, he retired to France. He returned to Spain toward the end of the year, and after the coup d'état of Gen. Paxin was made chief of the executive, 4 Jan., 1874, negotiating privately, it is thought, with Martinez Campos the restoration of the monarchy under Alfonso XIII, on 9 Jan., 1875. He continued to take an active part in politics as chief of the right centre, and in 1888 was appointed ambassador of Spain to France. He married a Cuban lady of great beauty, and left a son and two daughters.

SERRELL, Edward Wellman, civil engineer, b. in New York city, 5 Nov., 1826. He was educated at schools in his native city, and then studied surveying and civil engineering under the direction of an elder brother. In 1843 he became assistant engineer in charge of the Central railroad of New Jersey, and two years later, served in a similar capacity on the construction of other roads. He accompanied the expedition that in 1845 located the route of the railroad between Aspinwall and Panama, and on his return, a year later, was engaged in building the suspension-bridge across the Niagara river at Lewiston; also that at St. Louis, New Brunswick. Mr. Serrell was in charge of the Hoosac tunnel in 1873, and in the construction of the Bristol bridge over Avon river, in England, which had the largest span of any bridge in that country at the time it was built. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the 1st New York volunteers as lieutenant-colonel, soon became its colonel, and served as chief engineer of the 10th army corps in 1863. He was chief engineer and chief of staff under Gen. Benjamin Butler in 1864, and designed and personally superintended the construction of the "Swamp angel" battery that bombarded Charleston. Many valuable improvements of guns and processes, that proved of practical service during the war, were suggested by him, and the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers was conferred on him in 1863, as chief of engineers. After the war he settled in New York, and engaged principally in the building of railroads, becoming in 1867, president and consulting engineer of the Washington County railroad. In addition to papers on scientific and technical subjects, he has published nearly fifty reports on railroads and bridges.

SERVİEN, Claude (sair-ven), Flemish missionary, b. in Antwerp, 1755; d. in Mexico in 1814. After finishing his studies in Brussels, he went to the New World in quest of fortune, and served in Cuba and Mexico. But the cruelty of the conquerors to the Indians so affected him that he resolved to devote his life to their relief, and in 1827 entered the Dominican order in Mexico. Later he became secretary of Las Casas, and in 1831 he went to Panama to report on the condition of the Indians in India. He was appointed bishop of Veracruz and Guatamala, and served the Indians in Guatemala a model farm and garden for the benefit of Indians that he had persuaded to lead an agricultural life. But, as he refused, after the departure of Las Casas, to employ them in work for the benefit of the order, he was sent in 1845 to Seville. The vessel that carried him was taken by French corsairs, and he was brought to La Rochelle, whence he set out for Rome. There he presented to the holy see a memoir in which he exposed the evils that had resulted from the course of the Spanish conquerors toward the Indians. The pope ordered inquiries to be made, and sent a commission of two priests to visit the South American missions. Servien accompanied them and labored in many parts of Mexico. On their arrival he was arrested by the authorities, and imprisoned in the main convent of the Dominican order, where he died.

SERVOSS, Thomas Lowery, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Oct., 1786; d. in New York city, 30 Nov., 1866. He was educated in his native city, and then engaged in the shipping business. In 1808 he settled in Natchez, Miss., where he purchased cotton and sold goods that were consigned to him from the north, and in 1817 he moved to New Orleans, where he continued his mercantile career. Meanwhile, in 1814, when the seaports of the United States were threatened by the British navy, Mr. Servoss was in New York, and, on learning that New Orleans was about to be attacked, he left at once for that city by way of Pittsburg, where he found two keel-boats laden with muskets. He took passage on one of these, and by his knowledge of river navigation he placed the troops and other men in the arms; otherwise, as has been said by John H. Eaton in his "Life of Andrew Jackson," New Orleans would have been in the hands of the British. In 1827 Mr. Servoss settled permanently in New York. He built, in 1831, the first five packet ships that ran regularly between New York and New Orleans, and was agent of the line. Mr. Servoss was active in charitable enterprises, and held office in various benevolent societies. He contributed articles on popular topics to journals, and presented a series of historical reminiscences to the New York historical society in 1858. He married a daughter of John Pintard.

SETON, Elizabeth Ann, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 28 Aug., 1774; d. in Emmettsburg, Md., 4 Jan., 1821. She was the daughter of Dr. Richard Bavley, a physician of New York, and married William Seton, of the same city. Her husband's father, William Seton (1716-1798), belonged to an impoverished noble Scottish family, emigrated to New York in 1758, and became superintendent and part owner of the iron-works of Ringwood, N. J. He was a lawyer, and the last public officer for the city and province of New York during that war. His silver notarial seal, dated 1779, is still in the possession of his family. He was ruined financially at the close of the Revolution, but remained in New York, where he founded the once famous mercantile house of Seton, Maitland and Co. In 1808 he went to Ireland to recover his lost property.

On the death of her husband she returned to the United States, and in 1805 she was received into the Roman Catholic church. To support her children she opened a school in New York, but not meeting with success, she was about to remove to Canada, when she made the acquaintance of Dr. William Louis Dubourg, then president of St. Mary's college, who invited her to reside in Baltimore and open a school for girls. Before this she had formed the design of founding a congregation of women for the service of children and orphans, and $8,000, given by a young convert to Dr. Dubourg for charitable uses and transferred by the latter to Mrs. Seton, enabled her to carry out this purpose.

A farm was purchased at Emmettsburg, Md., and on 22 June, 1809, Mrs. Seton moved thither, with three companions, forming the nucleus of an order that afterward spread over the United States. The community increased rapidly in numbers, and pupils flocked to the school. In 1814 Mother Seton adopted the rules and constitution of St. Vincent de Paul, with some modifications, and the institution, having received the sanction of the highest ecclesiastical authority, became a religious order. Afterward a group of buildings, embracing a residence for the Sisters, a novitiate, a boarding-school for young girls, a school for poor children, and an orphan asylum, was erected. In 1814 Mother Seton sent a colony of Sisters to Philadelphia to take charge of an orphan asylum. In 1818, in response to another application from New York, another body came to that city. At her death there were more than twenty communities of Sisters of Charity, conducting free schools, orphanages, boarding-schools, and hospitals, in the states of Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Delaware, Massachusetts, Virginia, Missouri, and Louisiana, and in this District of Columbia. In 1820 the constitution of her order, no one could be elected to the office of mother-superior for more than two terms successively, an exception was made in her favor by the unanimous desire of her companions, and she held the office during life. See "Memoirs of Mrs. Seton," written by herself; A Fragment of Real History" (Elizabethtown, N. J., 1817); "Life of Mrs. Seton, Founderess and First Superior of the Sisters of Charity in the United States," by Rev. Charles I. White, D. D. (4th revised ed., Baltimore, 1872); and "Vie de Madame Elizabeth Seton," by Madame de Barbary (Paris, 1868). A collection of her letters and papers, edited by her grandson, Monsignor Seton, has been published (2 vols., New York, 1893).—Her grandson, William, a member of the order, became Bishop of Pittsburgh in 1870, of William, an officer, in the U. S. navy. He is recognized by Burke's "Peerage," as the head of the ancient family of the Setons of Parbrook, senior cadets of the Earls of Winton in Scotland.

He was educated at Mount St. Mary's college, Emmettsburg, Md., and by private tutors, and served as captain of the 4th New York volunteers, during the first part of the civil war, until he was disabled at Antietam. He is a frequent contributor to periodicals and journals, and has published "Romance of the Charter Oak" (New York, 1870); "The Pride of Lexington; a Tale of the American Revolution" (1871); "Rachel's Fate and Other Tales" (1882); "The Poor Millionaire; a Tale of New York Life" (1884); and "The Shamrock and the Vedder and Mound Tale of the Tyroil" (New York, 1884). He is also the author of "The Pioneer," a poem (1874).—Robert, another grandson of Elizabeth Ann, clergyman, b. in Pisa, Italy, 28 Aug., 1839, was educated in Mount St. Mary's college, Emmettsburg, Md., and in the Academia ecclesiastica, Rome, where he was graduated with the degree of D. D. In 1860 he was raised to the rank of private chamberlain to Pope Pius IX. He is the first American that was honored with the Roman Prelatura, and is the dean of all the monsignori in the United States. He was made prothonotary apostolic in 1867, and rector of St. Joseph's church, Jersey City, in 1876. He has written "Memoirs, Letters, and Journal of Elizabeth Seton" (2 vols., New York, 1860) and "Essays on Various Subjects, chiefly Roman Catholic," a frequent contributor to Roman Catholic periodicals.

SETON, Samuel Waddington, educator, b. in New York city, 23 Jan., 1789; d. there, 29 Nov., 1869. He was educated in the schools of New York, engaged in mercantile pursuits, and made a voyage to China. After his return to New York he was a banker till 1827, when he was elected president of the Public school society, in which capacity he was visitor of their schools, and had charge of their extensive system of supplies and libraries. He held the office until the society was merged in the present board of education in 1853. He was then appointed assistant superintendent, which post he held till his death.
took a warm interest in religious matters, and during the forty-eight years in which he held the office of Sunday-school superintendent was absent from his post only twelve times.

SETTLE, Thomas, jurist, b. in Rockingham county, N. C., in 1791; d. there, 5 Aug., 1857. He received a common-school education, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Wentworth, N. C. He entered public life in 1810 as a member of the house of commons, and was in congress in 1817-21, having been elected as a Democrat. He was again in the legislature in 1826-8, the last year was speaker of the house, and in 1832-54 was a judge of the supreme court of North Carolina, and eminent for his piety. His son, James, b. in Rockingham county, N. C., 23 Jan., 1811; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 1 Dec., 1883. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1830, read law, served in the legislature in 1834-9, was speaker of the house the latter year, and a presidential elector in 1856, casting his vote for James Buchanan. He supported Stephen A. Douglas for the presidency in 1860 in the hope to prevent secession, but, when the civil war began, entered the Confederate army as captain in the 3d North Carolina regiment. After a service of twelve months he returned to civil life and became solicitor of the 4th judicial district. He united with the Republican party in 1863, was elected to the state senate in that year, became its speaker, and took an active part in reconstruction measures. He was a judge of the state supreme court in 1865-71, and resigned to become U. S. minister to Peru, but held office for only a few months on account of the failure of his health, was an unsuccessful candidate for congress in 1872, and in June of that year was president of the National Republican convention held in Philadelphia. He was reappointed a justice of the state supreme court in 1873, and was defeated for governor in 1876. In 1877 he became United States district judge of the northern district of Florida.

SEUSEMAN, Joachim, missionary, b. in Hesse-Cassel; d. in Jamaica, W. I., in 1772. He came to Pennsylvania with the first Moravian colony in 1742, and settled on the western slope of the Alleghanies, and, by his courage, address, and military ability, became one of the principal men in the colony. When Lord Dunmore's war began in 1773 against the Shawnee and other Indian tribes, he resumed his rank in the Virginia line, served throughout the campaign, and on 10 Oct., 1774, took part in the battle of Point Pleasant. At the beginning of the Revolution he drew up the memorial of the citizens of Watanga to the North Carolina legislature asking to be annexed to that colony, that "they might aid in the unhappy contest, and bear their full proportion of the expenses of the war." Their petition was granted and the whole of what is now Tennessee was organized into a county of North Carolina, then known as Washington county. Sever was chosen a delegate to the State convention, and in the "declaration of rights" introduced a clause thus defining the limits of the state: "That it shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment of one or more governments westward of this state, by consent of the legislature," showing that he had already in mind the establishment of a separate commonwealth beyond the Alleghanies. In the spring of 1777 the legislature of North Carolina met, and Sever was again a representative from Watanga, and procured for the settlement the establishment of courts and the extension of state laws. On his return he was appointed clerk of the county and district judge, SEVERANCE, Luther, editor, b. in Montague, Mass., 28 Oct., 1797; d. in Augusta, Me., 25 Jan., 1855. After leaving the printer's trade in Petersburg, N. Y., he worked in Washington, Philadelphia, and several other cities, and in 1825 settled in Augusta, Me., and established the "Kennebec Journal." He served in the legislature in 1829-30, in the state senate in 1835, and again in the legislature in 1838-42. He was in congress in 1843-7, having been elected as a Whig, and in 1850 was appointed United States minister to the Sandwich islands, which post he held four years.

SEVIER, John, pioneer, b. in Rockingham county, Va., 23 Sept., 1743; d. near Fort Definur, Ga., 24 Sept., 1815. He was descended from an ancient French family who spelled their name Xavier. His father, Valentine, emigrated to this country from London about 1740, and settling in Rockingham county, John was educated until he was sixteen years of age, at the academy in Fredericktown, Va., married the next year, and founded the village of Newmarket in the valley of the Shenandoah. He there became celebrated as an Indian fighter, was a victor in many battles with the neighboring tribes, and in 1772 was appointed captain in the Virginia line. In the spring of that year he removed to Watanga, a settlement on the western slope of the Alleghanies, and, by his courage, address, and military ability, became one of the principal men in the colony. When Lord Dunmore's war began in 1773 against the Shawnee and other Indian tribes, he resumed his rank in the Virginia line, served throughout the campaign, and on 10 Oct., 1774, took part in the battle of Point Pleasant. At the beginning of the Revolution he drew up the memorial of the citizens of Watanga to the North Carolina legislature asking to be annexed to that colony, that "they might aid in the unhappy contest, and bear their full proportion of the expenses of the war." Their petition was granted and the whole of what is now Tennessee was organized into a county of North Carolina, then known as Washington county. Sever was chosen a delegate to the State convention, and in the "declaration of rights" introduced a clause thus defining the limits of the state: "That it shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment of one or more governments westward of this state, by consent of the legislature," showing that he had already in mind the establishment of a separate commonwealth beyond the Alleghanies. In the spring of 1777 the legislature of North Carolina met, and Sever was again a representative from Watanga, and procured for the settlement the establishment of courts and the extension of state laws. On his return he was appointed clerk of the county and district judge, and with James Robertson was in reality in control of all judicial and administrative functions in the settlement. He was elected colonel by the over-mountain people in the same year, enlisted every able-bodied male between the ages of sixteen and thirty-five in the militia, and led that force in innumerable Indian fights. He entered the territory of the savages in 1730, burned their towns, and fought the successful battle of Boyd's Creek. With Col. Isaac Shelby, in 1780, he planned the battle of King's Mountain, raised 480 men, was appointed their colonel, and in a brilliant moment of the action rushed on the enemy, up the slope of the mountain, within short range of their muskets, and turned the fortunes of the day. For this service he received thanks and a sword and pistol from the North Carolina legislature. A fellow-soldier says of him, in that battle: "His eyes were flames of fire, and his words were electric bolts crashing down the ranks of the enemy." He subsequently rendered important services at Musgrove's mill and in defending the frontier against the ravages of the Indians. In 1781 he conducted several expeditions against the Chickamauga towns, was foremost in many skirmishes as well as treaties and negotiations with the Indians, and was revered and loved by the settlers as their father and friend. At the close of the war the Watauga settlement had widely extended its borders, and contained a larger population; the new nation, and it was evident that a territory which is now the state of Tennessee, comprising about 29,000,000 acres, brought with its possession the obligation to bear a correspondingly large part of the Federal debt. Therefore, in June, 1781, the legislature of North Carolina ceded it to the general government. When the news of this act reached the settlers they determined to form a government of their own, and they applied for admission into the Union. They were the more ready to do this as they considered themselves neglected by the North Carolina government. Accordingly, on Aug. 23, 1784, they called a convention, organized a constitution and state government, elected John Sevier governor, and named their state Franklin, in honor of Benjamin Franklin. In the mean time, before the establishment of a legal government, the legislature of North Carolina met again and made haste to undo what had been done at the former session. They gave the Watauga settlers a superior court, formed the militia into a brigade, and appointed Sevier brigadier-general. After this Sevier earnestly opposed the scheme of a separate government, and advised all his compatriots to take no further steps toward it; but public opinion was strongly against a return to North Carolina, and he finally consented to accept the governorship of the new state, taking the oath of office on 1 March, 1785. Within sixty days he established a superior court, reorganized the militia, and founded Washington college, the first institution of classical learning west of the Alleghenies. He also entered into treaties of peace with the Cherokee Indians after continued warfare for fifteen years, and for two years governed with unbroken prosperity. But dissatisfaction arose in North Carolina, and at the end of that time Gov. Richard Caswell issued a proclamation declaring the new government to be a revolt and ordering that it be at once abandoned. Vexed by this to the attempt to subdue it, but the settlers finally submitted to a superior force. Sevier was captured and imprisoned, but rescued, and the country was ceded to the U.S. government under the title of the "territory south of the Ohio river." Sevier then took an oath of allegiance to the United States, was commissioned brigadier-general of that section in 1789, and in 1790 chosen to represent as the first representative from the valley of the Mississippi. He conducted the Etowah campaign against the Creeks and Cherokees in 1793, which completely broke the spirit of the Indians, so that they were not heard of in any form or at any time. He also visited the Holston settlements again during Sevier's lifetime, and in 1796, when the territory was admitted into the Union as the state of Tennessee, he was chosen its first governor. He served three consecutive terms, was re-elected three successive times after 1803, and was chosen a member of Congress in 1811, and returned to that body for a third term in 1815, but died before he could take his seat. Near the close of his congressional career he was appointed by President Monroe to act as U.S. commissioner to settle the boundary-line between Georgia and the Creek territory in Alabama. But the labor was too great, and he died in his tent, attended only by a few soldiers and Indians. His biographer, James R. Gilmore, says of him: "He was in the active service of his country from a boy of eighteen till he died at the age of seventy years. During all this period he was a leader of men, and a prime mover in the important events which occurred beyond the Alleghanies. His sway was potent and undisputed in civil as well as military affairs. As long as he lived he was the real seat of power. A rule like his was never before nor since seen in the frontier. His attachment to his honor is erected in Nashville, and Sevier county, Tenn., is named for him. See "The Rear-Guard of the Revolution," by James R. Gilmore (New York, 1886), and "Life of John Sevier," by the same author (1887).—His nephew, Ambrose Hunsley, senator, b. in Greene county, Tenn., 4 Nov., 1801; d. in Little Rock, Ark., 51 years, 1852. He was raised from early education, removed to Arkansas territory in 1822, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1823. He was clerk of the territorial legislature and a member of that body in 1823-5, a delegate to congress in 1827-36, having been chosen as a Democrat, and U.S. senator from the latter year till 1848. During this service he was chairman of the committee of the House of Representatives on Indian affairs for three years in succession of that character, and in 1848 was a U.S. commissioner to negotiate peace with Mexico.

SEVILLA, José, philanthropist, b. in Peru, S. A., about 1829; d. in New York city in March, 1888. He settled in New York city late in life, and bequeathed his property, valued at upward of $1,000,000, for the establishment of an unsectarian home for unfortunate children. Both sexes were to be freely admitted and educated in such a manner as to become self-supporting.

SEWALL, Samuel, jurist, b. in Bishopstone, England, 28 March, 1652; d. in Boston, Mass., 1 Jan., 1759. His early education was received in England before his parents came to New England. They went to Newbury, Mass., and his lessons were continued there. He was admitted to enter Harvard in 1667, and took his first degree in 1671, his second in 1675. He studied divinity and had preached once before his marriage, but after that event, which took place on 28 Feb., 1677, he left the ministry and entered public life. His wife was Hannah Hull, the daughter and only child of John and Judith (Quincy) Hull. The position which his father-in-law held as trader and mint-master undoubtedly had something to do with the change in the young man's plans. One of his first ventures after his marriage was to assume charge of the printing-press in Boston. This was under his management for three years, when other engagements compelled him to relinquish it. His family connections, both through his marriage and on the maternal and paternal sides, brought him in contact with some of the most prominent men of the day. In 1684 he was chosen an assistant, serving for two years. In 1688 he made a voyage to England, and remained abroad a year in the transaction of business, visiting various points of interest. In 1692 he became a member of the council and judge of the probate court. Judge Sewall appeared prominently in judging the witches during the time of the Salem witchcraft. His character was shown more clearly at that time and immediately afterward than at any other time during his long life. He was extremely conscientious in the fulfillment of duty, and yet, when he found he was in error, was not too proud to acknowledge it. Of all the judges that took part in that historic action, he was the only one that publicly confessed his error. The memory of it haunted him for years, until in January, 1697, he confessed in a "bill" which was read before the congregation of the Old South church in Boston by the minister. During its reading, Sewall remained standing in his place. The action was indicative of the man. During the remaining thirty-one years of his life he spent one day annually in fasting and meditation and prayer, to keep in mind a sense of the enormity of his offence. In 1699 he was appointed commissioner for the English Society for the propagation of the gospel in New England. Soon afterward he was appointed their secretary and treasurer. His tract, entitled "The Selling of Joseph," in which he advocated the rights of the slaves, was published in 1700. He was very benevolent and charitable, and his sympathies were always with the down-trodden races of humanity. In 1718 he was appointed chief justice, and served till 1728, when he retired on account of the increasing infirmities of old age. He also published "The Accomplishment of Prophecies" (1713); "A Memorial Relating to the Kenebec Indians" (1721); "A Description of the New Heaven" (1727).

The Massachusetts historical society have published his diary, which covers the larger portion of his life, in their "Historical Collections," and it has also published his letter-book, in which he kept copies of his important letters. These throw light upon the civil and social life of the day in a marked degree, and strengthen the opinion that he was a man of eminent ability and of sterling character. In addition to his diary, he kept a "commonplace book," in which he recorded quotations from various authors whose works he had read. At the time of his death he had also filled twelve manuscript volumes with abstracts of sermons and addresses that he had heard at various times. His funeral sermon, by the Rev. Thomas Prince, was highly eulogistic, but evidently a just tribute to one of the most remarkable men of his age.

His son, Joseph, b. in Boston, Mass., 26 Aug., 1688; d. there, 27 June, 1769, was graduated at Harvard in 1707, studied theology, and was ordained on 16 Sept., 1713, as Ebenezer Pemberton's colleague in the pastorate of the Old South church, Boston. He was elected president of Harvard in 1724, but declined. He was one of the commissioners appointed by the London corporation for propagating the gospel in New England, and a corresponding member of the Scottish society for promoting Christianity abroad. The University of Glasgow gave him the degree of D.D. in 1731.

He was a rigid Calvinist and a foe to free discussion and neutral opinions, but gave his support and approval to Whitefield's revival in 1740. He contributed to the support of indigent students, and gave many books to replenish Harvard college library when it was burned in 1764. His benevolence gained him the familiar epithet of "the good," while his religious fervor caused him to be sometimes called "the weeping prophet." Many of his sermons were published. — Samuel's nephew, Stephen, jurist, b. in Salem, Mass., 18 Dec., 1704; d. 10 Sept., 1760, was graduated at Harvard in 1721, and was librarian of the college in 1726-8, and then a tutor till 1739, when he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts. In 1752 he was made chief justice, and he served in that capacity, and also as a member of the council, till 1763, when he left public life. He expressed the belief of the legal officers of assistance, which were demanded by the customs authorities for the purpose of suppressing illicit trade, yet before he could finally pass judgment upon the question he died, to the general regret of the patriot party.—Samuel's grandson, Samuel, engineer, b. in York, Me., in 1724; d. there, 28 July, 1815, was the inventor of various useful improvements. He is said to have been the first to drive piles as a foundation for bridges, introducing this device at York in 1761. In 1786 he erected the Charlestown bridge on this plan.—Stephen's nephew, Jonathan, lawyer, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 Aug., 1728; d. in St. John, New Brunswick, 30 Sept., 1798, was graduated at Harvard in 1748, taught in Salem till 1756, studied law, and began practice in Charlestown in 1758. He inclined to the patriotic side of the disputes with Great Britain until he was chagrined by the refusal of the legislature to pay the debts left by his uncle and by the opposition of James Otis and his father to his petition. He was rewarded for his subsequent adhesion to the cause of the crown with the posts of solicitor-general, attorney-general (which appointment he received in 1757), advocate-general, and judge of admiralty, his emoluments amounting to £5,000 a year. He was offered the appointment of judge of admiralty at Halifax in 1768, but declined. No lawyer in Massachusetts surpassed him in elo-quency or acuteness. In 1769, in the suit of James against Lechmere, he secured the release of a negro slave. In 1777 the common right of freedom was defined in the English courts by the decision of the Somerset case. He was esteemed one of the ablest writers in New England, and defended the doctrines of coercion with force and learning in the columns of the Tory newspapers. John Trumbull satirizes him in "McFingal" as "the Haranguing, Exclamations, works of toil, In true sublime, of scarecrow style: With forces, too, 'gainst Sons of Freedom.

All for your good, and none would read 'em."

The papers in the "Massachusetts Gazette," signed "Massachusettsensis," were attributed to him until, more than a generation later, Daniel Leonard, of Taunton, was discovered to have been their author. After Judge Sewall signed an address to Gov. Thomas Hutchinson, his mansion in Cambridge was wrecked by a mob in September, 1774. He fled to Boston, and a few months later took ship for England, where he lived for a short time in London, and afterward mostly in Bristol. His estate in Massachusetts was confiscated under the act of 1774. In 1778 he removed to St. John, New Brunswick, where he resided legally practised. His wife and the wife of John Hancoek were daughters of Edmund Quincy, of Boston.—The second Samuel's brother, Stephen, Hebraist, b. in York Me., 4 April, 1744; d. in Boston, Mass., 23 July, 1804, was graduated at Harvard in 1761, taught in the grammar-school at Cambridge, and in 1765 became librarian and instructor in Hebrew at Harvard. Two years later he was installed as the first Hancoek professor of Hebrew, occupying the chair till 1785. He was an active Whig during the Revolution, and represented Cambridge in the general court in 1777. His wife was a daughter of Edward Wigglesworth. He published seven Greek and Latin poems in the "Pictas et gratulatio" (Cambridge, 1761); a Hebrew Grammar (1763); a funeral oration in Latin on Edward Holvoke (1769); an English oration on the death of Prof. John Winthrop (1779); a Latin version of the first book of Edward Young's "Night Thoughts" (1789); "Carmina saepta quae Latine Graeceque comitavit America" (1789); "The Scripture Account of the Shechina" (1794); and the "Scripture couplet, "Sodom and Gomorrha." (1796). He left a manuscript Chaldee and English dictionary, which is preserved in the library of Harvard College.—Another brother, David, jurist, b. in York, Me., 7 Oct., 1755; d. there, 22 Oct., 1825, was graduated at Harvard in 1775, studied law, and established himself in practice in York in 1780. He was appointed justice of the peace in 1783, and register of probate in 1786. Like his friend and classmate, John Adams, he was an earnest Whig, and was an active patriot from the beginning of the Revolution. He was representative for York in 1776, was chosen a member of the council of Massachusetts, and was appointed in 1777 a justice of the superior court. From 1789 till 1818 he was U. S. jointed justice of the peace in 1803, and register of probate in 1796. Like his friend and classmate, Johnathan Mitchell, poet, b. in Salem, Mass., in 1748; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 29 March, 1808, was brought up in the family of his uncle, and educated at Harvard. He left college to engage in mercantile business, afterward studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised with success. In 1774 he was a volunter member of the council for Grafton county, N. H. Afterward he settled in Portsmouth. In the early part of the Revolution he wrote "War and Washington," a favorite song of the soldiers of the revolutionary army. He produced other patriotic lyric,屯ches, epistles, Ossian, epoques, and epigrams. In an "Epilogue to Cato," written in 1778, drawing a parallel between the characters and events of the Revolution and those of the play, occurs the couplet,

"No pent-up Uria contracts your powers,

But the whole boundless continent is yours,

With harp and frame, and the munificence of your paper, "The New World." His poems, which were mostly the productions of his youth, were collected into a volume (Portsmouth, 1801).—Joseph's grandson, Samuel, jurist, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 Dec., 1757; d. in Wiscassett, Me., 8 June, 1814, was graduated at Harvard in 1776, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Marblehead, Mass. He was frequently a member of the legislature, was elected to Congress for two successive terms, and served from 15 May, 1797, till 10 Jan., 1800, when he resigned on being appointed a judge of the Massachusetts supreme court. In the same year he was a member of the electoral college of Massachusetts. He became chief judge in 1813, and died while holding court in Wiscassett, where a street was named to his memory by the members of the bar.—The second Samuel's brother, Joseph, Jotham, clergyman, b. in York, Me., 1 Jan., 1766; d. in Chesterville, Me., 3 Oct., 1850, was a maiden in his youth, and received only a rudimentary education, yet, after a theological examination in 1788, he was licensed to preach, and on 18 June, 1800, was ordained as an evangelist. From that time till the close of his life he labored as a missionary. He was installed as pastor of the Congregational church in Chesterville on 22 June, 1820, but continued his missionary tours, preaching wherever a few could be gathered together, on week days as well as on Sundays, and organizing many new churches. His ministry extended over a period of fifty years, and in this time he preached four and a half times on an average every week. His field was confined chiefly to Maine and parts of New Hampshire and Rhode Island, though his journeys extended into eleven other states and into New Brunswick. A memoir was published by his son, Jotham (Boston, 1832).—The third Samuel's son, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Marblehead, Mass., 1 June, 1783; d. in Burlington, Mass., 18 Feb., 1808, was graduated at Harvard in 1796, studied theology in Cambridge, and was pastor of the Congregational church at Burlington, Mass., from 1804 till his death. He was fond of antiquarian studies, and left a "History of Woburn, Mass., from the Grant of its Territory to Charlestown in 1649 to 1800," which was published, with a memorial sketch, by his brother, Rev. Charles Chauney Mitchell, in the "New England Magazine," and published a work under the title of "The Pathology of Drunkenness" (Albany), which was translated into German, and established his reputation as an original investigator in Europe as well as in the United States.—Jotham's grandson, Rufus King, author, b. in Edgecomb, Me., 21 Jan., 1814, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1837, and at Bangor theological seminary in 1838. He supplied pulpits in Vermont and Massachusetts, SEWARD, Theodore Frelinghuysen, musician, b. in Florida, N. Y., 25 Jan., 1845. He is a cousin of J. B. Frelinghuysen, who farmed at the age of eighteen to study music under Lowell Mason and Thomas Hastings, became organist of a church in New London, Conn., in 1857, and in Rochester, N. Y., in 1859, removed to New York city in 1867, and conducted the "Musical Pioneer," and afterward the New York "Musical Gazette." He first became interested in the tonic sol-fa system during a visit to England in 1859, and on his return endeavored ineffectually to introduce the method without adopting the notation. He subsequently took charge of the performances of the " Jubilee singers," wrote down more than one hundred of their plantation melodies, and, while making the tour of Europe with them, in 1877-8, became more impressed with the advantages of the new system of musical instruction. After a course of study at the Tonic sol-fa college in London, he returned to the United States in 1877, intending to make the establishment of the system his sole purpose. Besides writing on the subject for many religious and educational journals, and lecturing before gatherings of teachers, he helped in the promulgation of the

SEWARD, William Henry, statesman, b. in Florida, Orange co., N. Y., 16 May, 1801; d. in Auburn, N. Y., 10 Oct., 1873. His father, Dr. Samuel S. Seward, descended from a Welsh emigrant to Connecticut, combined medical practice with a law course at Yale, and then joined the Methodist church and studied theology. After his ordination he was sent to the Western Reserve, and after some years returned to Connecticut, where he died in 1827. His wife, Frances Adeline, who died in 1843, was the daughter of Eliphalet Adelaine, who was a member of the political convention of Cayuga county, in which he arranged the "Albany regency" and denounced the methods of Martin Van Buren's supporters. He delivered an anniversary address at Auburn on 4 July, 1835. He was one of the committee to welcome Lafayette, and in February, 1827, delivered an oration expressive of sympathy for the Greek revolutionists. On 12 Aug., 1831, he presided at Utica over a great convention of young men of New York in support of the re-election of John Q. Adams. He declined the anti-Masonic nomination for congress in 1828, but joined that party on the dissolution of the National Republican party, with which he had previously acted, consequent upon the setting aside of the National Bank law. In 1838 he was elected as the anti-Masonic candidate for the state senate, in which body he took the lead in the opposition to the dominant party, and labored in behalf of the common schools and of railroad and canal construction. He proposed the collection of documents in the archives of European governments for the "Colonial History of New York," advocated the abrogation of the New York direct tax, won the support of the popular vote, and furthered the passage of the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt. At the close of the session he was chosen to draw up an address of the minority of the legislature to the people. On 4 July, 1831, he gave an address to the citizens of Syracuse on the "Prospects of the United States." On 31 Jan., 1832, he defended the U. S. bank in an elaborate speech in the state senate, and at the close of that session again prepared an address of the minority to their constituents. In 1833 he travelled through Europe, writing home letters, which were afterward published in the "Albany Evening Journal." In January, 1834, he denounced the removal of the U. S. bank deposits in a brilliant and exhaustive speech. In the fall of 1833 he delivered an address at the close of this his last session in the legislature. On 16 July, 1834, he delivered a eulogy of Lafayette at Auburn.

The Whig party, which had originated in the opposition to the Jackson administration and the "Albany regency," nominated him for governor on 13 Sept., 1834, in the convention at Utica. He was defeated by William L. Marcy, and returned to the practice of law in the beginning of 1835. On 3 Oct. of that year he made a speech at Auburn on education and internal improvements. In July, 1836, he quitted Auburn for a time in order to assume an agency at Westfield to settle the differences between the Holland land company and its tenants. While there he wrote some political essays, and in July, 1837, delivered an address on the subject of education. He took an active part in the political canvass of 1837, which resulted in a triumph of the Whigs. He was again placed in nomination for governor in 1838, and after a warm canvass, in which he was charged with having oppressed settlers for the benefit of the land company, and was assailed by anti-Masons and by Whig Populists who were anxious to reduce the expression of abolitionist principles, he was elected by a majority of 10,421. The first Whig governor was hampered in his administration by rivalries and

but the condition of his health prevented him from accepting a permanent pastorate. He resided for five years in St. Augustine, Fla., studied law with his uncle, Kiah B. Sewall, of Mobile, Ala., returned to Maine before the civil war, was admitted to the bar in 1860, and has since practised in Wiscasset. He is the author of a "Memoir of Joseph Sewall, D. D." (Boston, 1846); "Lectures on the Holy Spirit and his Converting Power" (1846); "Sketches of St. Augustine and environs" (published by his son, Samuel F. W., New York, 1849); and "Ancient Dominions of Maine" (Bath, 1859)—Joatham's grandson, John Smith, educator, b. in Newcastle, Me., 20 March, 1830, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1850, went with the expedition of Col. Matthew C. Perry on the " Saratoga" as captain's clerk to China and Japan, taught for a year after his return, then entered Bangor theological seminary, and was graduated in 1857. He was pastor of the Congregational church at Wenham, Mass., till 1857, when he became professor of rhetoric and English literature at Bowdoin. He exchanged this chair in 1855 for that of homiletics at Bangor theological seminary.

After the death of Zachary Taylor many Whig senators and representatives accepted the presidential honor of President Fillmore, but Seward resisted it with all his energy. He approved the nomination of Winfield Scott for the presidency in 1852, but would not sanction the platform, which upheld the compromise of 1850. In 1853 he delivered an address at Columbus, Ohio, on "The Destiny of America," and one in New York city on "The True Basis of American Independence." In 1854 he made an oration on "The Physical, Moral, and Intellectual Development of the American People" before the literary societies of Yale college, which gave him the degree of LL.D. His speeches on the repeal of the Missouri compromise and on the admission of Kansas made a profound impression. He was re-elected to the Senate in 1855, in spite of the vigorous opposition of both the National American party and the Whigs of southern sympathies. In the presidential canvass of 1856 he zealously supported John C. Fremont, the Republican candidate. In 1857 he journeyed through Canada, and made a voyage to Labrador in a fishing-schooner, the Log " of which was afterward published. In a speech at Rochester, X. Y., in October, 1858, he alluded to the "irrepressible conflict," which would only terminate in the United States becoming either entirely a slave-holding nation or entirely a free-labor nation. He travelled in Europe, Egypt, and Palestine in 1859.

In 1860, as in 1856, Seward's pre-eminent position in the Republican party made him the most conspicuous figure in the contest for that party's presidential nomination. He received 173 votes in the first ballot at the convention, against 102 given to Abraham Lincoln, who was eventually nominated, and in whose behalf he actively canvassed the western states. Lincoln appointed him secretary of state, and before leaving the senate to enter on the duties of this office he made a speech in which he disappointed some of his party by advising patience and moderation in debate, and harmony of action for the sake of maintaining the Union. He cherished hopes of a peaceful solution of the national troubles, and, while declining in March, 1861, to enter into negotiations with commissioners of the Confederate government, he was in favor of evacuating Fort Sumter as a military necessity and political measure, while re-enforcing Fort Pickens, and holding every other post then remaining in the hands of the National government. He issued a circular note to the ministers abroad on 9 March, 1861, deprecating foreign intervention, and another on 24 April, defining the position of the United States in regard to the rights of neutrals. Negotiations were carried on with European governments for conventions determining such rights. He protested against the meddlesome interferences between the British cabinet and agents of the Confederate states, and refused to receive despatches from the British and French governments in which they assumed the attitude of neutrals between belligerent powers. On 21 July he sent a despatch to Charles F. Adams, minister at London, defining the position of congress to close the possible line of conflict with the British. When the Confederate commissioners were captured on board the British steamer “Trent,” he argued that the seizure was in accordance with the British doctrine of the “right of search,” which the United States had resisted by the war of 1812. The release of these prisoners, at the demand of the British government, would now commit both governments to the maintenance of the American doctrine; so they would be “cheerfully given up.” He firmly rejected and opposed the proposal of the French emperor to unite with the English and Russian governments in mediating between the United States and the Confederate government. He made the Seward-Lyons treaty with Great Britain for the extinction of the African slave-trade. The diplomatic service was thoroughly reorganized by Sec. Seward; and by his cool despatches and the uncensuring presentation of his views and arguments, through able ministers, to the European cabinets, the respect of Europe was retained, and the efforts of the Confederates to secure recognition and support were frustrated. In the summer of 1862, the army having become greatly depleted, and public opinion of the fact being deemed unwise, he went to the north with letters from the president and secretary of war, met and conferred with the governors of the loyal states, and arranged for their joint proffer of re-enforcements, to which the president responded by the call for 300,000 more troops. Mr. Seward firmly insisted on the right of American citizens to redress the depredations of the “Alabama,” and with equal determination asserted the Monroe doctrine in relation to the French invasion of Mexico, but, by avoiding a provocative attitude, which might have involved his government in foreign war, was able to defer the decision of both questions till a more favorable time. Before the close of the civil war he intimated to the French government the irritation felt in the United States in regard to its armed intervention in Mexico. Many despatches on this subject were sent during 1865 and 1866, which gradually became more urgent, until the French forces were withdrawn before the Mexican empire fell. He supported President Lincoln’s proclamation liberating the slaves in all localities in rebellion, and three years later announced by proclamation the abolition of slavery throughout the Union by constitutional amendment. In the spring of 1865 Mr. Seward was thrown from his carriage, and his arm and jaw were fractured. While he was being carried to the hospital, a man who had been a juries President Lincoln was murdered and on the same evening, 14 April, one of the conspirators gained access to the chamber of the secretary, inflicted severe wounds with a knife in his face and neck, and struck down his son, Frederick W., who came to his rescue. His recovery was slow and his suffering were severe. He concluded the treaty with Russia for the cession of Alaska 1867. He negotiated treaties for the purchase of the Danish West India islands and the Bay of Samana, which failed of approval by the senate, and made a treaty with Colombia to secure American control of the Isthmus of Panama, which had a similar fate.

Sec. Seward sustained the reconstruction policy of President Johnson, and thereby alienated the more powerful section of the Republican party and subjected himself to bitter censure and ungenerous imputations. He opposed the impeachment of President Johnson in 1868, and supported the election of Gen. Grant in that year. He retired from office at the end of eight years of tenure in March, 1869. After a brief stay in Auburn, he journeyed across the continent, returning through California, Oregon, British Columbia, and Alaska, returning through Mexico as the guest of its government and people. In August, 1870, he set out on a tour of the world, accompanied by several members of his family. He visited the principal countries of Asia, northern Africa, and Europe, being received everywhere with great honor. He studied their political institutions and their ethnological characteristics, and their commercial capabilities. Returning home on 9 Oct., 1871, he devoted himself to the preparation of a narrative of his journey, and after its completion to a history of his life and times, which was not half finished at the time of his death. The degree of L.L. D. was given him by Union in 1866. He published, besides occasional addresses in numerous political speeches, a volume on the “Life and Public Services of John Quincy Adams” (Auburn, 1849). An edition of his “Works” was published, which contains many of his earlier essays, speeches, and addresses, with a memoir by George E. Baker, reaching down to 1853 (3 vols., New York, 1856). To this a fourth volume was added in 1862, and in fifth in 1884, containing his later speeches and extracts from his diplomatic correspondence. His official correspondence during the eight years was published by order of congress. The relation of his “Travels Around the World” was edited and published by his adopted daughter, Olive Risley Seward (New York, 1874). Charles P. Adams published an “Address on the Life, Character, and Services of Seward” (Albany, 1873), which was thought by some to have extolled him at the expense of President Lincoln’s fame, and elicited replies from Gideon Welles and others. Mr. Seward’s “Autobiography,” which extends to 1834, has been
continued to 1846 in a memoir by his son, Frederick W., with selections from his letters (New York, 1877). The vignette portrait represents Gov. Seward in early life, and the other illustration is a view of his residence at Auburn. There is a bronze statue of Mr. Seward, by Randolph Rogers, in Madison square, New York.—His son, Augustus Henry, lawyer, b. in Auburn, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1856; d. in Montrose, N. Y., 11 Sept., 1890. He was a member of the U. S. nautical academy in 1867, served through the Mexican war as lieutenant of infantry, afterward in Indian territory till 1851, and then on the coast survey till 1859, when he joined the Utah expedition. He was made a captain on 19 Jan., 1859, and on 27 March, 1861, a major on the staff. He served as paymaster during the civil war, receiving the brevets of lieutenant-colonel and colonel at its close.—Another son, Frederick William, lawyer, b. in Auburn, N. Y., 8 July, 1830, was graduated at Union in 1849, and after he was admitted to the bar at Rochester, N. Y., in 1851, was associate editor of the Albany “Evening Journal” till 1861, when he was appointed assistant secretary of state, which office he held for the eight years that his father was secretary. In 1859 he was a member of the New York legislature in 1857, and introduced the bill to incorporate the New York elevated railroad and the amendments to the constitution providing for a reorganization of the state canal and prison systems, placing each under responsible heads, and abolishing the old boards. He was assistant secretary of state again in 1857-'58, while William M. Evarts was secretary. Union conferred on him the degree of LL. D. in 1878. His principal publication is “The Story of the Life of William H. Seward” (3 vols., New York, 1891). Mr. Seward resides at Montrose-on-the-Hudson.—Another son, William Henry, soldier, b. in Auburn, N. Y., 18 June, 1859, was educated by a private tutor, and in 1861 engaged in banking at Auburn. He entered the volunteer service as lieutenant-colonel of the 138th New York infantry, and afterward made colonel of the 9th New York heavy artillery. In 1863 he was sent on a special mission to Louisiana. Col. Seward was engaged at Cold Harbor and the other battles of the Wilderness campaign. He afterward commanded at Fort Foot, Md., and took part in the battle of Monocacy, where he was wounded, but retained his command. He was commissioned as brigadier-general on 13 Sept., 1864, was commandant for some time at Martinsburg, Va., and resigned his commission on 1 June, 1865, returning to the banking business at Auburn. He is president of the Auburn city hospital, and an officer in various financial and charitable institutions.—William Henry’s nephew, Clarence Armstrong, lawyer, b. in New York city, 7 Oct., 1828; d. 24 July, 1897, was a member of his uncle’s family, his parents having died when he was a child. He was graduated at Hobart in 1843, studied law, and began practice in Auburn as a partner of Samuel Blatchford, whom he assisted in the compilation of the “New York Civil and Criminal Practice” (Auburn, 1849). In 1851 he established himself in New York city. He was judge-advocate-general of the state in 1856-'60. After the attempted assassination of Sec. Seward and his son, Frederick W., he was appointed acting assistant secretary of state. He was a delegate to the National Republican convention of 1856, and a presidential elector in 1880. His practice had brought him extensive business, companies, patents, and extractions.—Another nephew of William Henry, George Frederick, diplomatist, b. in Florida, N. Y., 8 Nov., 1840, was prepared for college at Seward institute in his native village, and entered Union with the class of 1860, but was not graduated. In 1861 he was appointed U. S. consul at Shanghai, China. In the exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction he had to pass judgment on river pirates claiming to be Americans, who infested the Yang-tze-Kiang during the Taiping rebellion, and by his energy and determination checked the evil. In 1863 he was made consul-general, and introduced reforms in the consular service in China. He returned to the United States in 1866 to urge legislation for the correction of abuses in the American judicial establishment in China, which he was only able to effect on a second visit to the United States in 1869. He went to Spain in 1868 to arrange a difficulty that had arisen in regard to the interpretation of the treaty with that country. He was appointed U. S. minister to Corea in 1869, but at his suggestion the sending of a mission to that country was deferred, and he did not enter on the duties of the office. In 1873 he landed the crews of two American vessels-of-war, and, as dean of the consular corps, was commissioned a force of volunteers for the suppression of a riot which endangered the European quarter. On 7 Jan., 1876, he was commissioned as minister to China. During his mission he was called home to answer charges against his administration, in congress, and was completely exculpated after a long investigation. He declined to undertake the task of negotiating a treaty for the restriction of Chinese immigration, and, in order to carry out the views that prevailed in congress, he was recalled, and James B. Angell was appointed his successor on 9 April, 1880. After his return to the United States, Mr. Seward became a broker in New York city. He was president of the North China branch of the Royal Asiatic society in 1866-'67. Besides his official reports and diplomatic correspondence, he has written a book on “Chinese Immigration in its Social and Economical Aspects,” containing arguments against anti-Chinese legislation (New York, 1881).
accordance with a decision rendered by him in 1818. He held the office of president of the executive council from 1808 till 1824, and that of speaker of the legislative council from 9 Jan., 1809, till his death. He went to England in 1814 to answer complaints that were made against the rules of practice that he enforced in his court, which charges were dismissed by the privy council. While there Judge Sewell, a member of the Council of Canada, published a "Plan for a General Federal Union of the British Provinces in North America" (London, 1815). The degree of LL.D. was conferred on him by Harvard in 1832. He was the author of an "Essay on the Judicial History of France so far as it relates to the Law of the Province of Lower Canada" (Quebec, 1824).—His son, Edmund Wil- longhby, clergyman, b. in Quebec, Canada, 3 Sept., 1800, received a classical education in Quebec and in English schools, studied for clerical orders, and was ordained a priest of the Church of England on 27 Dec., 1827. He was a member of the Church of the Holy Trinity at Quebec, and an assistant minister of the cathedral till 1805.—Jonathan’s grandson, William Grant, journalist, b. in Quebec, April 11, 1818, was for a time the managing editor for the bar, but preferred journalism, and in 1833 removed to New York city and became translator and law reporter for the "Herald." He was afterward connected for six years with the New York "Times," becoming one of its principal editors.

Infirmary of health compelled him to pass three winters in the West Indies, and, while there, he studied the results of emancipation, which he reviewed dispassionately in "The Ordeal of Free Labor in the West Indies" (New York, 1861).

SEWELL, William Joyce, senator, b. in Castletown, Ireland, 6 Dec., 1855. He was left an orphan, came to the United States in 1851, was for a time employed in mercantile business in New York city, made several voyages as a sailor on merchant vessels, afterward engaged in business in Chicago, Ill. At the beginning of the civil war, being in the eastern part of the country, he entered the army as a captain in the 5th New Jersey regiment. He rose to be colonel in October, 1862, and commanded a brigade at Chancellorville, where he led a brilliant charge and was badly wounded. He was breveted major-general of volunteers for bravery at Chancellorville, and that of major-general for his services during the war. He served for nine years in the New Jersey senate, of which he was president for three years. He was a delegate to the Republican national conventions of 1880, 1884, and 1888. He entered the U. S. senate on 4 March, 1881, and served till 3 March, 1887.

SEWERT, Adam, chemist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 May, 1773; d. in Paris, France, 2 May, 1855. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1793, and then spent some time at the École des mines in Paris, also studying at the universities of London, Edinburgh, and Cambridge, and, after returning to Philadelphia, and acquiring a collection of minerals, devoted his attention specially to the practice and study of chemistry and mineralogy. In 1805 he was elected as a member to name the few specimens that at that time constituted the collection belonging to Yale. Dr. Seybert was elected as a member to congress, and served from 27 Nov., 1809, till 2 March, 1813, and again from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 Dec., 1819. He was chosen a member of the American philosophical society in 1795, and contributed his papers on "Experiments and Observations on Land and Sea Air" and "On the Atmosphere of Mars" to its transactions during that year. His publication of "The Statistical Annals of the United States from 1789 till 1818" (Philadelphia, 1818) was reviewed by Sydney Smith in the "Edinburgh Review" for January, 1821. In this article occurs the oft-quoted question, "Who reads an American book?" He was the first to suggest the importance of studying the Andes and the Magellanic islands, and $500 for the Philadelphia museum. His son, Henry (1802-1883), was educated at the École des mines, and achieved considerable reputation by his analyses of American minerals. Shortly after the death of his father his attention became diverted from science.

SEYFFARTH, Gustavus, clergyman, b. in Utrigen, Saxony, 13 July, 1786; d. in New York city, 17 Nov., 1855. He studied in the gymnasium at Leipzig, afterward in the university, and in 1826 in Paris under the direction of Champaignon, the celebrated French Egyptologist. He became well known as a scientist and archæologist and a decipherer of Egyptian hieroglyphics. In 1823 he published his "Lexis Hieroglyphicum Egyptiacum," in 1828—33 his "Grundriss der Archæologie" in the University of Leipzig, during which time he published the most important of his numerous scientific and archæological works. In 1855 he emigrated to the United States, and was elected professor of archæology and exegesis in Concordia Lutheran theological seminary, St. Louis, Mo., where he remained until 1871. From this date until his death he resided upon a farm in retirement. In 1873 he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his doctorate, and he received from the University of Leipzig an annual pension, in recognition of original investigations in archæology. He claims to have been the first to decipher the hieroglyphics on the celebrated Rosetta stone; he translated numerous Egyptian manuscripts in the collection of the New York historical society, and the characters on the obelisk in Central park, New York. He published numerous treatises, both in Germany and in the United States, many of which have been translated into different languages. Among his published works are: "De Sensis literarum grecarum tum genuinis tum falso," 1821; "Manuskripte, die zum Nachweis der typographischen oder lithographischen, papyri, hieroglyphica, etc. explicationes, xvi. specimen hieroglyphicum" (1826): "Beiträge zur Kenntniss der Literatur, Kunst, Mythologie und Geschichte des alten Aegypten" (1826); "Brevis Defensio hieroglyphicarum inventae Fr. Avg. Spohui et G. Syfarth" (1827); "Kapelle aux objections de Mon. Champollion contre le même système" (1827); "Systema Astronomicum Egyptiacum" (1853); "Chronologia Sacra: eine Untersuchung über das Geburtsjahr Christi" (1846); "Theologische Schriften der alten Aegypten, nach dem Turnier Papyrus, zum ersten Male übersetzt" (Gotah, 1855); "Grammation Egytacice: erste Abbrehung zur Übersetzung alt-aegyptischen Literatur-Werken, mit Herrn Gymnix des Hieroglyphicum Schülern" (1855); "Summary of Recent Discoveries in Biblical Chronology, Universal History, and Biblical Archæology, with Special Reference to Dr. Abbott's Egyptian Museum, together with a Translation of the First Sacred Books of the Ancient Egyptians" (New York, 1857); "Die wahre Zeitrechnung des alten Testaments, nebst einer Zeittabel zum neuen Testamente" (St. Louis, Mo., 1858); "An Astronomical Inscription concerning the Year 22, B. C." (1860); "Amerikanischer Kalendermann" (1869); "Chronologia Veterum" (1871); and "Die Allgemeinheit der Studiluth." SEYFFERT, Anton, Moravian missionary, b. in Kudrich, German Bohemia, 15 Aug., 1712; d. in Zest, Holland, 19 June, 1785. He united with the Moravians in 1728. In 1734 he was sent to Georgia with the first colony of Moravians, to establish a mission among the Creek and Cherokee Indians, but, owing to hostilities between Florida and Georgia, the enterprise was abandoned. In 1740 he removed to Pennsylvania, where he served in the church schools and in the ministry till April, 1745, when he returned to Europe.

SEYFFERT, Charles Bailey, editor, b. in London, 23 Oct., 1829; d. in New York city, 2 May, 1869. He came to New York in 1849, and became connected with the "Times," serving as musical and dramatic editor until his death. From January to July, 1863, he was associated with Theodore Hagen in editing the New York "Weekly Review." He was correspondent for the "Times" at the Paris exposition of 1867, where his services as one of the American commission procured him a medal from the emperor. He was the author of "Self-Made Men" (New York, 1858).

SEYFFERT, George Franklin, D. E. bishop, b. in New York city, 3 Jan., 1828. He was graduated at Columbia in 1850, at the head of his class, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary in New York in 1854. He was ordained deacon in New York city, 17 Dec., 1854, by Bishop Potter, and priest in Greenburg (Dobbs Ferry), N. Y., 23 Sept., 1855, by the same bishop. His first field of labor was as mission-ary at Amandale, Dutchess county, N. Y., from January, 1855, to July, 1857. As part of the result of his activity a church was built, and a training institution for orders was founded. The latter was chartered by the legislature of New York, under the title of St. Stephen's college, and Mr. Seyffert was chosen to be its first warden. He became in November, 1861, rector of St. Mary's church, Manhattanville, New York city, in October, 1862, of Christ church, Hudson, N. Y., and a year later of St. John's church, Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1865 he was elected professor of ecclesiastical history in the General theological seminary, and in 1873 he became dean of the same institution, in conjunction with his professorship. During his connection with the seminary he was invited to rectorships of churches in Chicago, San Francisco, and Troy, N. Y., but declined. He was also active in securing $30,000 for new chapel and library buildings, and earnestly opposed the removal of the seminary from the city into the country. From 1867 till 1873 he served as chaplain to the House of mercy, New York, without salary. He was also superintendent of the Society for promoting religion and learning in the state of New York until 1878. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Racine in 1857, and that of D. C. D. in Columbia in 1878. Dr. Seyffert was elected in 1874 bishop of Illinois in succession to Bishop Whitehouse; but the house of deputies, in general convention then assembled, owing, it is understood, to strong feeling against ritualism and its ramifications, refused to confirm the election. He was unanimously chosen bishop of the new diocese of Springfield, Ill., 19 Dec., 1877. This election was confirmed by the standing committees and the bishops, but Dr. Seymour declined in April, 1878.

SEYMOUR, Charles Bailey, editor, b. in London, 23 Oct., 1829; d. in New York city, 2 May, 1869. He came to New York in 1849, and became connected with the "Times," serving as musical and dramatic editor until his death. From January to July, 1863, he was associated with Theodore Hagen in editing the New York "Weekly Review." He was correspondent for the "Times" at the Paris exposition of 1867, where his services as one of the American commission procured him a medal from the emperor. He was the author of "Self-Made Men" (New York, 1858).

SEYMOUR, Horatio, statesman, b. in Pompey Hill, Onondaga co., N. Y., 31 May, 1810; d. in Utica, N. Y., 13 Feb., 1886. He attended school in his native village until he was ten years of age, when he was sent to Oxford academy. In the spring of 1824 he entered Geneva academy (now Hobart college), and remained there a year, going thence to Bard's military school at Middle-town, Conn. He studied law with Greene E. Bronson and Samuel Beardsley, and was admitted to the bar in 1832, but he never practised his profession, the care of the property he had inherited taking up much of his time. He became military secretary of Gov. William L. Marcy in 1833, and held the place until 1839. In 1841 he was elected to the state assembly as a Democrat, and in 1842 was elected mayor of Utica by a majority of 130 over Spencer Kellogg, the Whig candidate. In 1843 he was renominated, but was beaten by Frederick Hollister by sixteen votes. In the autumn of the same year he was elected again to the assembly, and in the session that began in 1844 he distinguished himself among men like John A. Dix and Horatius G. Frémont in the Hoffman. He was chairman of the committee on canals, and presented an elaborate report, which was the basis of the canal policy of the state for many years. He advocated the employment of the surplus revenue to enlarge the locks of the Erie canal and proceed with the construction of the Black river and Genesee valley canals, and he showed thorough confidence in the development of trade with the west. He was once more elected to the assembly in the autumn of 1844, and was chosen speaker in the legislature of 1845. In 1850 he became the candidate of the Democratic party for governor, as a man acceptable to all its factions; but he was defeated by the Whig candidate, Washington Hunt, by a majority of 302, though Samuel E. Church, his opponent, with a vote of 322, was elected lieutenant-governor. In 1852 he was a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Baltimore, and did all in his power to have the vote of the New York delegation cast wholly for William L. Marcy, but failed. The same year he was again nominated as the Democratic candidate for governor, and was elected by a majority of 22, over Mr. Henry A. Perrin, Washington Hunt. During his term there was a strong temperance movement in the state, and the legislature passed a prohibitory law, which Gov. Seymour vetoed, declaring its provisions to be unconstitutional, and denying its good policy. In 1854 he was re-nominated for the governorship, and received 156,495 votes, to 156,804 cast for Myron H. Clark, the Whig and temperance candidate, 124,992 for Daniel Ullman, the "Know-Nothings" candidate, and 35,500 for Greene C. Bronson, the candidate of the "Hawk-shell" Democrats. The vetoed law was again passed by the legislature, approved by Gov. Clark, and afterward declared unconstitutional by the court of appeals. In 1856 Mr. Seymour was a delegate to the Democratic national convention at Cincinnati, and he supported the Democratic candidates. Voorhees of New Jersey and Brockenridge, actively in the presidential canvass of that year. In a speech delivered at Springfield, Mass., 4 July, 1856, he set forth the political principles that he had previously followed and afterward adhered to. This speech was the key to his whole political career. He argued against centralization and for local authority: "That government is most wise which is in the hands of those best informed about the particular questions on which they legislate, most economical and honest when controlled by those most interested in preserving frugality and virtue, most strong when it only exercises authority which is beneficial to the governed." He argued against the attempt to reform by legislative restraint, instancing a prison as a type of society perfectly regulated and yet vicious. He argued for a liberal policy in regard to immigration, saying that it was bringing acquisitions of power, peacefully and easily, such as no conqueror ever won in blood, but did not deny the right of the people of this country to regulate immigration or even to forbid it altogether, which he asserted many years afterward in regard to the importation of Chinese. He argued that the growth of the south was so much more rapid than that of the south that political supremacy had passed into the hands of the free states. He argued for the right of the people of the territory to settle the slavery question for themselves, assuming that under such a policy there would be a rapid increase of free states.

In 1857 Mr. Seymour received from President Buchanan the offer of a first-class foreign mission, but declined it; and he took no prominent part in politics again until the secession movement began. He was a member of the committee appointed to report resolutions at the convention held in Tweedle hall, Albany, 31 Jan., 1861, after the secession of six states, to consider the feasibility of compromise measures; and he delivered a speech designed mainly to show the peculiar dangers of civil war. When the war began in 1861, Mr. Seymour was in Madison Wis., and the Democratic convention met in the legislature, then in session, called him into consultation as to the proper course of political action. He counselled the simple duty of loyalty, to obey the laws and maintain the national authority, and he was active in raising one of the first companies of Wisconsin volunteers. When he returned home in the autumn he spoke at a Democratic ratification meeting held in Utica, 28 Oct., 1861, saying: "In common with the majority of the American people, I deplore the election of Mr. Lincoln as a great calamity; yet he was chosen in a constitutional manner, and we wish, as a defeated organization, to show ourselves giving him a just and generous support." He was an active member of the committee appointed by Gov. Edwin D. Morgan to raise troops in Oneida county, and he contributed liberally to the fund for the volunteers. In the following winter he delivered at Albany an address on the state and national defences; at a meeting of representative Democrats, held in the state capital in the disastrous summer of 1862, he introduced a resolution that "we were bound in honor and patriotism to send immediate relief to our brethren in the field"; and, at the request of the adjutant-general of the state, he became chairman of the committee to take charge of recruiting in his own neighborhood. On 10 Sept., 1862, the Democratic state convention nominated him for governor. He took the view that holding the state in the Union meant that his party must accept the nomination, that he must take office, and act as governor; that the candidates must be free to canvass in which he asserted on all occasions the right of criticising the administration and the duty of sustaining the government, he was elected, defeating Gen. James S. Wadsworth by a majority of 10,752 votes. Perhaps the fairest statement of his position in regard to the war at that period is to be found in the following passage from his inaugural message of 7 Jan., 1863: "The assertion that this war was the unavoidable result of slavery is not only erroneous, but it has led to a disastrous policy in its prosecution. The opinion that slavery must be abolished to restore our Union creates an antagonism between the free and the slave states which ought not to exist. If it is true that slavery must be abolished, then the people of the government, that the south must be held in military subjection, that four millions of negroes must for many years be under the direct management of the authorities at Washington at the public expense, then, indeed, we must endure the waste of our armies in the field, further drains upon our population, and still greater burdens of debt. We must convert our government into a military despotism. The mischievous opinion that in this contest the north must subjugate and destroy the south to save our Union has weakened the hopes of our citizens at home and destroyed confidence in our success abroad." This argument against the probability of success along the path that finally led to it was of course supplemented by an unfeigned declaration of the constitutionality of the war and the supremacy of the constitution. On 23 March, 1863, President Lincoln wrote to Gov. Seymour a letter seeming to suggest a personal pledge of co-operation, and the governor sent his brother to Washington to convey assurances of loyal support, but along with them a protest against the attitude of the North. On 20 April, 1863, Gov. Seymour sent to the legislature a message suggesting a constitutional amendment as a necessary preliminary to a law allowing soldiers in the field to vote; and on 24 April he vetoed a bill to extend the elective franchise to qualified voters of the army and navy of the state of New York, on the ground that it was unconstitutional. The amendment that he had recommended was afterward adopted. In everything pertaining to the raising of troops Gov. Seymour's administration showed conspicuous energy and ability, but especially in the effort to meet Lee's invasion of the north in the early summer of 1863. On 15 June the secretary of war telegraphed to Gov. Seymour asking for help, and within three days 12,000 state militia, "well equipped and in good spirits," were on their way to Harrisburg. The good will for such an achievement was not rare during the war, but it was not often joined with the necessary executive ability, and President Lincoln and Sec. Stanton both sent their thanks to Gov. Seymour for his promptitude. On 2 July, Gov. Curtin, of Pennsylvania, telegraphed for aid, and on the two following days troops were sent to his assistance.

During the absence of the New York militia the draft riots began. They had their pretext, if not their origin, in three grievances, which were afterward abolished. One was the commutation clause in the draft law, which provided that any drafted man might obtain exemption by paying the government three hundred dollars. The poor regarded this as a fraud upon them in the desperate lottery of life and death. The other was a discrimination against New York state, and especially New York city, in the allotment of quotas. Gov. Seymour had been anxious to have this injustice corrected, and to have the draft postponed, but it began in the metropolis on Saturday, 11 July, 1863. On Sunday the names of those drawn were published, and on Monday the rioting began. The rioters stopped at no outrage, not even the murder of the innocent and helpless. That night the governor reached the city, and the next day he issued two proclamations, the first calling upon all citizens to retire to their homes and preserve the peace, and the second declaring the city in a state of insurrection. The same day he took measures for enrolling volunteers and gathering all available troops. On Tuesday he also spoke to a mob in front of the city-hall. Then, and ever afterward, his impromptu speech was the subject of bitter criticism. It seems clear, from various reports, that he promised to the crowd that if they had grievances they would be redressed, declared himself their friend, and urged the necessity of obedience to law and the restoration of order. The design of the speech was twofold—to persuade the crowd to disperse, and, in any event, to gain time for the concentration of the forces within reach of Gen. John E. Wool, with but slight aid from the National forces, order was restored within forty-eight hours. The rioting lasted from Monday afternoon until Thursday evening, cost about a thousand lives, and involved the destruction of property estimated at from half a million to three million dollars in value. On Saturday evening Gen. Wool telegraphed President Lincoln admitting out the injustice done in the enrollment, and asking to have the draft stopped, in order that New York might fill her quota with volunteers. The president conceded that there was an apparent unfairness in the enrollment, but refused to stop the draft. A commission, appointed by the war department to investigate the matter, declared that the enrollment under the act of 3 March, 1863, was imperfect, erroneous, and excessive, especially with reference to the cities of New York and Brooklyn. On 16 April, 1864, a Republican legislature passed a resolution thanking Gov. Seymour for his "prompt and efficient efforts" in pointing out the errors of the enrollment and procuring their correction. He took an active part in the state canvass of 1863, making many speeches in defence of his own record and the principles of his party, and attacking the policies of the administration. In the election the state gave a Republican majority of about 39,000. On 22 April, 1864, the governor sent to the legislature a message urging the payment of interest on the state debt in gold; and this action was construed by political opponents as a covert attack on the national credit. On 3 Aug., 1864, the Democratic national convention met in Chicago, and Gov. Seymour presided, refusing to be a candidate for the presidential nomination. But he became a candidate for the governorship that year, and was defeated by Robert E. Fenton, Republican, by a majority of 8,393.

After the close of the war Mr. Seymour remained a leader in politics. He made speeches in the state canvasses of 1865, 1866, and 1867, opposing strongly the reconstruction policy of the Republican party, and criticizing sharply its financial methods. He presided over the state conventions of his party, 3 Oct., 1865, and 11 March, 1868, and over the National convention that met in New York city, 4 July, 1868. In spite of previous declarations that he would not be a candidate before he was easy, agreeable, and powerful, plausible and candid in ordinary argument, and yet rising often into truth eloquence. He made many speeches on other than political occasions; he loved farming, and often delivered addresses at agricultural gatherings; he was a member of the Protestant Episcopal church and frequently took part in its conventions as a lay delegate; he was a member of the commission for the state survey, and was an active and influential champion of the canal system. It may be said broadly that he was master of everything connected with the history, topography, and institutions of New York. Mr. Seymour married, 31 May, 1853, Mary Bleeker, of Albany, who survived him only twenty days. They had no children.

SEYMOUR, Moses, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn., 23 July, 1742; d. in Litchfield, Conn., 17 Sept., 1826. He was fifth in descent from Richard, the ancestor of all of his name in the United States, who settled in Hartford in 1635. Richard is supposed to be the son of Chaplain Richard of Popham's expedition, who was the first to preach the gospel to the Indians in this country. Moses removed to Litchfield in early life, became captain of a troop in the Fifth Company of militia regiment, and in 1756 was given the same rank in the fifth cavalry, with which he served in repelling Tryon's invasion in 1777, and at the surrender of Burgoyne. He also did good service as commissioner of supplies at Litchfield, which was then a depot for military stores. In 1783 he retired with the rank of major. Mr. Seymour held the office of town-clerk for thirty-seven years consecutively from 1789 till his death, was elected annually to the legislature from 1795 till 1811, and was active in the affairs of the Protestant Episcopal church. He was greatly instrumental in securing the proceedings of the sale of the Western Reserve for the promotion of common-school education, and is said to have originated the plan. He is one of the figures in Col. Trumbull's painting of the surrender of Burgoyne.—Moses's son, Horatio, senator, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 31 May, 1778; d. in Middlebury, Vt., 21 Nov., 1857, was graduated at Yale in 1797, studied law at Litchfield law-school, and removed in October, 1799, to Middlebury, Vt., where he continued his studies with Daniel Chipman, and was admitted to the bar in 1802. He was elected to the state council from 1809 till 1817, and in October, 1829, was elected to the U. S. Senate as a Clay Democrat, serving two terms, from 1821 till 1833. While in the Senate he was chairman of the committee on agriculture. At the expiration of his second term he resumed the practice of his profession. He was the Whig candidate for governor of the state in 1838, but was defeated by Jonas II. Jennison. In October, 1847, he was appointed by the legislature judge of probate for the district of Addison. Mr. Seymour had acquired a competency, but lost it, chiefly through becoming surety for others. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1847.—Another son, Henry, merchant, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 30 May, 1799; d. in Utica, N. Y., 26 Aug., 1866, served as a private in the War of 1812, and in the Mexican War, and was granted a pension by the government. In 1829 he married at Utica, N. Y., accumulated a fortune, and afterward removed to Utica. He served in both branches of the New York legislature, and was mayor of Utica, canal commissioner, and president of the Farmers' loan and trust company.—Henry's son, Horatio, governor of New York, is noticed elsewhere.—Moses's granddaughter, Sallie D. Seymour, was graduated at Yale in 1874; d. there, 12 Aug., 1881, was the son of Ozias Seymour, who was for many years sheriff of Litchfield county. He was placed in a mercantile house in New York at the age of fourteen, but illness forced him to return home, and he then entered Yale. An affection of the eyes compelled him to learn his lessons by hearing them read to him, and the training that this gave to his memory had much influence on his subsequent career. He was graduated in 1824, read law, was admitted to the bar in 1826, and engaged in active practice. He was county clerk in 1826-'44, served in the legislature in 1842, 1849, and 1850, and in the last year was speaker of the house. In the same year he was chosen to congress as a Democrat, serving two terms. He was one of the small number of anti-Nebraska Democrats whose opposition nearly defeated the Kansas-Nebraska bill, but in the contest that followed he adhered to the Democratic party. In 1855 he became a judge of the state superior court, but in 1863 the Republican legislature refused to re-elect him and his Democratic colleague, through fear that they might interfere with the National draft by writs of habeas corpus, though they had been War Democrats. In 1864 he was an unsuccessful candidate for governor, and in 1870 a legislature whose majority was Republican chose him to the bench of the Supreme Court of the state. He succeeded to the chief justiceship, and in 1874, by constitutional limitation of age, he retired. After that he was employed chiefly as committee and arbitrator in the trial of causes. In one county the majority of the cases on the superior court docket were referred to him by agreement for decision. In 1875 he was chairman of the commission that settled the longstanding boundary dispute between Connecticut and New York, and in 1878 he was at the head of the one that prepared the new state practice act. From 1876 till his death he delivered an annual course of lectures at Yale law-school. He was elected to office for the last time in 1881, when he was again a member of the legislature. Judge Seymour was an active member of the Protestant Episcopal church and a delegate to every general convention from 1868 till his death. Trinity gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1866, and Yale in 1873. A memorial of him was printed privately (Hartford, 1882).—Origen Storr's son, Edward Woodruff, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 30 Aug., 1832; d. there, 16 Oct., 1882, was educated at Yale and Harvard, and attained reputation at the bar. He served in the lower house of the Connecticut legislature four times, was in the senate in 1876, and in 1882 was chosen to congress, serving two terms, and later was supreme court judge.—Origen Storr's daughter-in-law, Mary Harrison, author, b. in Oxford, Conn., 7 Sept., 1820; is the wife of Rev. Origen Storr O. Seymour, of Hartford, Conn. She was educated in Brooklyn, N. Y., and Baltimore, Md., and, besides many contributions to periodicals, chiefly for children, has published "Mollie's Christmas Stocking" (New York, 1865); "Sunshine and Starlight" (Boston, 1868; London, 1870); "Posy Winton's Picnic" (Boston, 1889); "Maid, Mother, and Miss" (New York, 1877); "Every Day," (1877), republished as "A Year of Promise, Prayer, and Joy." London, 1879; and "Through the Darkness" (New York, 1884).
ing officer of the Hartford light-guard. He then studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Hartford about 1833. He soon attained to a fair practice, but never aspired to a high position in his profession. In 1837-8 he became editor of a Democratic paper, "The Jeffersonian," and about the same time was judge of probate for the district. His popular manners and address soon threw him into politics, and in 1840 he was elected a member of the New England district. At the expiration of his term he declined a renomination.

In March, 1846, he was commissioned major of the 9th or New England regiment of volunteers in the Mexican war. On 13 Oct., 1847, Col. Ramsay, its commander, having fallen in the assault on Chapultepec, Maj. Seymour led the troops, scaled the height, and with his command was the first to enter the city. He was promoted to the command of the regiment, and took part in the capture of Mexico. In 1849 he was nominated for governor, but, though gaining largely over the vote of the preceding year, he was not elected. The next year he was again a candidate, and was chosen by a handsome majority, and re-elected in 1851, 1852, and 1853. In 1852 he was presidential elector. In the autumn of 1853, President Pierce appointed him U. S. minister to Russia, and resigning the governorship, he filled the office for four years. He formed a warm personal friendship for both the Czar Nicholas and his son, and received from them many costly tokens of their regard. After nearly a year of European travel he returned to the United States in 1858. When the civil war began, his sympathies were largely with the south, and he could not keep his opposition to the war until its close as the leader of the Connecticut Peace Democrats. In 1862 the state senate voted that his portrait, with that of Isaac Toney, should be removed from the chamber till the comptroller should be satisfied of his loyalty. In 1863 he was again a candidate for governor, but was defeated by William A. Buckingham, after an exciting contest.

SEYMOUR, Truman, soldier, b. in Burlington, Vt., 23 Sept., 1824; d. in Florence, Italy, 30 Oct., 1891. He was a kinsman of Moses, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, assigned to the 1st artillery, and in the war with Mexico won the brevet of 1st lieutenant for gallantry at Cerro Gordo, and that of captain for capturing the town of Chihuahua. He was captain of the 13th artillery, 26 Aug., 1847, and in 1850-3 was assistant professor of drawing at West Point. He served against the Seminoles in Florida in 1856-8, was made captain, 29 Nov., 1860, and took part in the defence of Fort Sumter in 1861, for which he received the brevet of major. He commanded the 5th artillery and the V. S. Artillery at Chickamauga, Pa, from December, 1861, till March, 1862, and was then chief of artillery of Gen. George A. McClellan's division till 28 April, 1862, when he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. He served in the various campaigns in Virginia and Maryland in 1862, commanding the left wing at Mechanicsville, 29 June, leading a division at Malvern Hill, 1 July, and gaining the brevets of lieutenant colonel and for South Mountain and Antietam respectively. After 18 Nov., 1862, he was in the Department of the South, serving as chief of staff to the commanding general from 8 Jan. till 23 April, 1863, leading a division on Folly Island, S. C., on 4 July, taking part in the attack on Morris island on 10 July, and commanding the division till 18 July, when he was severely wounded. He was in charge of an expedition to Florida in February, 1864, and took possession of Jacksonville on 7 Feb. He left that town with 5,000 men on the 18th, and on the 29th met the enemy under Gen. Joseph Fincegan near Olustee. After a three-hours battle, Gen. Seymour was forced to retire to Jack- sonville. He returned to Virginia after commanding the district of Florida till 28 March, 1864, led a brigade in the 6th corps of the Army of the Potomac, and was taken prisoners in the Wilderness, 6 May, 1864. After being taken to Charleston, S. C., where he was exposed, by order of Gen. Samuel Jones, to the fire of the National batteries on Morris island, he was exchanged on 9 Aug., and led a division in the Shenandoah valley and the Richmond campaign, being engaged in the assault on the Confederate picket-line at Petersburg, on 14 March, 1865, and the general attack of 2 April, which ended the siege of that place. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers "for ability and energy in handling his division, and for gallantry and valuable services in action," and brigadier-general, U. S. army, for gallantry at the capture of Petersburg, both commissions to date from 19 March, 1865. He was present at Lee's surrender at Appomattox, was ordered to take the city, 24 Aug., 1865, and became major of the 5th artillery, 13 Aug., 1866. After the war he commanded forts in Florida, Fort Warren, Mass., in 1865-70, and Fort Preble, Me., in 1870-5, and on 1 Nov., 1876, he was retired from active service. Since his retirement he has resided in Europe, chiefly in Florence. Williams college gave him the degree of A. M. in 1865.

SHACkELFORD, James M., soldier, b. in Lincoln county, Ky., 7 July, 1827. After receiving an education in private schools, he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1864, and practised in Kentucky. He served in the war with Mexico as a lieutenant. During the civil war he was colonel of the 23rd Kentucky volunteers, and subsequently of the 8th Kentucky cavalry, and was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 2 Jan., 1863. His command captured Gen. John H. Morgan in Columbus county, Ohio, in July, 1863. Since the war he has practised his profession in Evansville, Ind. In 1880 he was a Republican presidential elector for Indiana.

SHAFER, Helen Almira, educator, b. in Newark, N. J., 30 Aug., 1848. After graduation at Oberlin college in 1868, she was a teacher of mathematics in the Central high-school in St. Louis, Mo., from 1868 till 1875, and in 1877 became professor of mathematics at Wellesley college, near Boston, Mass. She was made president of this institution in January, 1888, and died there, 20 Jan., 1894.

SHAFFNER, Taliferro Preston, inventor, b. in Smithfield, N. C., 1817, in Troy, N. Y., 11 Dec., 1891. He was chiefly self-educated, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but gave much time to invention. He was an associate of Samuel F. B. Morse in the introduction of the telegraph, built the line from Louisville, Ky., to New Orleans, and that from St. Louis to Jefferson City in 1851, and held office in various telegraph companies. He was a projector of a North Atlantic cable via Labrador, Greenland, Iceland, the Faroe islands, and Scotland, and was the inventor of several methods of blasting with nitroglycerine and other high explosives, for which twelve patents were issued. In 1864 he was in the service of Denmark during the Danish-Prussian war. He was a recipient of various medals of honor. Mr. Shaffner published the "Telegraph Companion: devoted to the Science and Art of the Morse American Telegraph" (2 vols., New York, SHALER, Oscar Lovell, jurist, b. in Athens, Va., 19 Oct., 1812; d. in Florence, Italy, 25 Jan., 1873. His grandfather, James Shaffer, fought at Bunker Hill, Bennington, and Saratoga, and for twenty-five years served in the Vermont legislature. He became county judge, a member of the Constitutional convention of 1836, and of the legislature. After graduation at Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn., in 1834, Oscar studied law at Harvard, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise in Wilmington, Va., in 1836. In 1854 he removed to California, and practised his profession there until 1864, when he became associate justice of the state supreme court for a term of ten years; but he resigned this post in 1867, owing to impaired health, and resided in Europe until his death.—His brother, James McMillian, received his early education in St. Joseph's college, near Susquehanna, and afterward studied for the priesthood in St. Charles Borromeo seminary, Philadelphia. He was ordained a priest on 3 July, 1859, and placed in charge of the preparatory seminary at Glen Riddle. The see of Harrisburg was created in 1868, and Dr. Shanahan was consecrated its first bishop on 18 July of that year. He returned to his diocese, and since his death his name has been associated with its parochial schools, academies, and charitable institutions.

SHANK, David, British soldier, b. in Virginia; d. in Glasgow, Scotland, 16 Oct., 1831. He was appointed a lieutenant under Lord Dunmore in Virginia in 1775, participated in the defence of Yorktown and other skirmishes, and served as a volunteer in the battle of Long Island, 26 Aug., 1776. In March, 1777, he became a lieutenant-general in the army and accompanied Gen. Howe's army into New Jersey. He was engaged in the battle of the Brandywine, 11 Sept., 1777, commanded the picket at Germantown on 4 Oct., and checked the American column that attacked the right of the British army. He was also present at Monmouth, and succeeded to the command of a company in October, 1778. In August, 1779, he led a troop of dragoons and, after the capture of the Queen's Rangers in Virginia, with which he sustained a severe action at Spencer's Ordinary. In October, 1783, he returned to England, and in 1792 assisted in raising, under the patronage of the Marquis of Buckingham, a light-infantry corps of 400 men called the Queen's Rangers for Canada, in which company he was commissioned senior officer, and he commanded the troops in Upper Canada in 1796 after receiving the brevet of major on 1 March, 1794. He was made lieutenant-colonel in January, 1798, and in 1799 returned to England. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the Canadian colonies on 3 Sept., 1803, was promoted to colonel in 1808, and was commissioned major-general in 1811 and brigadier-general in 1815.

SHANKS, William Franklin Gore, author, b. in Shelbyville, Ky., 20 April, 1837. He was educated in Louisville, and wrote for the Louisville "Journal" and the "Courier." At the beginning of the civil war he became a correspondent of the New York "Herald," and joined its staff in 1863. In 1866 he contributed regularly to Harper's "Weekly" and "Monthly," and prepared an index of the contents of the latter for the first forty volumes. On the death of Henry J. Raymond, he transferred his services from the "Times" to the "Tribune," remaining there until 1880. While city editor of the "Tribune" he was imprisoned for contempt of court for refusal to divulge the name of the writer of an article in the paper, taking the ground that he was a privileged witness. After his release on a writ of habeas corpus he brought charges against District Attorney Winchester Britton, who was removed by Gov. Dix. In 1880 he instituted suit, for the first time in this country, against the vendor of a libel, recovering two judgments, and the court of appeals sustained the legal point at issue. In 1885 he organized the National press association, which he has since directed as president, and he is still a contributor to various newspapers. He has published "Recollections of Distinguished Generals" (New York, 1865), edited "Bench and Bar" (1868); and printed privately "A Noble Treason," a tragedy (1876).

SHANNON, Charles Dawson, journalist, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 9 March, 1811; d. in Arlington, Fla., 15 Aug., 1875. He was graduated at Trinity college, Dublin, in 1834, and, after holding the office of assistant secretary of the department of public works in the administration of Daniel O'Connell, he settled in New York, and became connected with the press of that city. In 1860 he was one of the chief contributors to "Vanity Fair," and at one time he was its editor. In 1855—6 he conducted "Mrs. Grundy." His writings consisted of essays and descriptive articles, poems, and ballads, some of which were imaginative and pathetic, while others were satirical or humorous. They were contributed to the "New York Leader," "Weekly Review," "Albion," and "Atlantic Monthly," and other literary papers, while on the daily journals he was a regular writer on social events and passing trifles. He was an expert draughtsman of comic sketches, and passionately fond of painting. Of his writings, there were published in book-form, illustrated by Henry L. Sargent, "A Summer in England;" "Scots in America," (New York, 1869): "The Monkey of Porto Bello" (1869); and "The Truant Chicken" (1866). His best-known poems are "Civil War" and "The Walker of the Snow."—His brother, Walter, Canadian engineer, b. at the Abbey, Stradbally, Queen's county, Ireland, 11 Oct., 1819, was educated privately, afterward prepared himself for civil engineering, and came to Canada in 1857, settling in the county of Middlesex. He was resident engineer, under the Canadian board of works, on the Beauharnois and Welland canals from 1843 till 1848, resident engineer Northern New York railroad, 1848—51, chief engineer of the Ottawa and Prescott railway in 1851—3, of the western division of the Grand Trunk railway in 1853—9, and general manager of the same line from 1867 till 1882. His greatest achievement in engineering was the completion of the Hoosac Mountain tunnel, in Massachusetts, in 1869—73, in which enterprise he was assisted by his brother, Francis. He was chief engineer of the Canada Atlantic railway, 1873—83, and later he was consulting engineer of that line. He sat in the Canadian assembly in 1875—7, when he was elected to the House of Commons and parliament as a Conservative. He was an unsuccessful candidate in 1872 and 1874, re-elected by acclamation on the death of the sitting member in July, 1883, and again elected in February, 1887.

SHANNON, Wilson, governor of Ohio and of Kansas, b. in Belmont county, Ohio, 24 Feb., 1822; d. in Lawrence, Kan., 31 Aug., 1877. He was graduated at Athens college, Ohio, and at Transylvania university, Ky., and became a lawyer. He began practice at St. Clairsville, Ohio, and in 1855 was prosecuting attorney for the state. He was governor of Ohio in 1858—9, and again in 1842—4, and in 1844 he went as U. S. minister to Mexico. He was a representative in congress in 1853—5 and territorial governor of Kansas in 1855—6. During Gov. Shannon's administration in Kansas the troubles between the free-state and pro-slavery parties began to assume a threatening aspect. The governor favored the latter, though he tried to be cautious. He succeeded in peacefully terminating the "Wakarusa war," in 1855, but hostilities were resumed in the following year, ending in the burning of the town of Lawrence by a band of "border ruffians." Shannon was commissioned a U. S. marshal's posse. Shannon was finally removed, and succeeded by John W. Geary. He subsequently practised law in Lawrence.
SHARKEY, William Lewis, senator, b. in Musiel Shoals, Tenn., in 1797; d. in Washington, D. C., April 29, 1873. He removed with his parents to the territory of Mississippi in 1804, and, as a substitute for his uncle, was present at the battle of New Orleans. After graduating at Greenville college, Tenn., he studied law and entered the bar of Mississippi in 1823, and began practice at Vicksburg. He removed to Vicksburg in 1825, was elected a member of the legislature in 1827, and was chief justice of the court of errors and appeals in 1832–35. In 1853 he was appointed provisional governor, and in 1859 was elected U. S. senator.

SHARP, William, capitalist, b. in Smithfield, Guyan, Md., Jan. 1, 1808; d. in Nov., 1885. He received a good education and studied law, but relinquished it to engage in banking in Nevada. He became largely interested in silver-mines in that state, and amassed great wealth. He afterward became a trustee of the Bank of California, in San Francisco, and during the troubles of that institution arising out of the death of its president, he brought its affairs to a satisfactory settlement. He was United States senator from Nevada from 1875 till 1881. He gained notoriety as a defendant in a case for divorce that was instituted against him by Sarah Atlee Hill, who, claiming to be his wife, gained her suit, and married Judge David S. Terry, who was her counsel in the case.

SHARP, Daniel, clergyman, b. near Baltimore, Md., 23 April, 1783; d. near Baltimore, Md., 25 April, 1853. He came to this country in 1805 to engage in commercial pursuits, but soon abandoned them to devote himself to the ministry. After a course of study in Philadelphia, he became, in 1809, pastor of the Baptist church in Newark, N. J. From 1812 until his death he was pastor of the first church in Boston. For several years he was associate editor of the "American Baptist Magazine," and was president of the board of trustees of Newton theological seminary for eighteen years, a fellow of Brown university from 1828 to the time of his death, and an overseer of Harvard. He received the honorary degree of D. D. from Brown in 1828, and from Harvard in 1843. Dr. Sharp published numerous discourses and sermons. The "Recognition of Friends in Heaven" passed through four editions.

SHARP, Jacob, capitalist, b. in Montgomery county, N. Y., in 1817; d. in New York city, 5 April, 1888. He was of humble parentage and worked on a farm till 1857, when he began rafting on the Hudson river. He purchased timber, and furnished the material for the building of piers and bulkheads in New York city. In 1850 he conceived the scheme of a street railroad to be constructed on Broadway, and in 1884, after years of scheming against powerful opposition, he succeeded in his object. He was afterward arrested on the charge of bribing the New York board of aldermen in connection with securing the resolution for the construction of the Broadway street railway, and on 14 July, 1887, was sentenced by Judge Barrett to confinement for four years and a half in the state prison, and to pay a fine of $5,000. The court of appeals, on 29 Nov., 1887, set aside the conviction, and Sharp was released in 1888, but continued to suffer from the effect of his conviction and imprisonment.

SHARPE, George Henry, lawyer, b. in Kingston, N. Y., 26 Feb., 1824; d. in New York city, 13 Jan., 1900. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1847, was admitted to the bar in 1854, practised until he entered the army in 1861 as captain in the 20th New York infantry. He became colonel of the 120th New York infantry, and took part in all the battles of the Army of the Potomac. He served upon the staffs of Gen. Hooker, Meade, and Grant, and was brevetted brigadier-general in 1864, and major-general in 1865. He was attached to the U. S. legation in Vienna in 1861, and was a special agent of the state department in Europe in 1867. In 1870–73 he was U. S. marshal for the southern district of New York, and took the census that demonstrated the great election frauds of 1868 in New York city, which led to the enforcement of the Federal election law for the first time in 1871. He was surveyor of customs for New York from 1873 till 1878. He was a member of the assembly in 1879–82, and in 1889–90 was the speaker. He delivered the address upon the centennial of the university of Oxford, at Oxford, England, 25 Dec., 1873; d. near Baltimore, Md., 25 April, 1883. He came to this country in 1805 to engage in commercial pursuits, but soon abandoned those to devote himself to the ministry. After a course of study in Philadelphia, he became, in 1809, pastor of the Baptist church in Newark, N. J. From 1812 until his death he was pastor of the first church in Boston. The "Recognition of Friends in Heaven" passed through four editions.

SHARPE, William, congressman, b. in Cecil county, Md., 16 Dec., 1743; d. in Tredyffri county, N. C., in July, 1818. He received a classical education, studied law, and in 1763 began practice at Mecklenburg, N. C. He was a member of the Provincial congress that met at New Bern in April, 1773, at Hillsborough in August following, and at Halifax in 1775. He was aide to Gen. Griffith Rutherford in 1775 in his campaign against the Indians, and in 1777 was appointed one of the commissioners to treat with them. He was a member of the Continental congress in 1777–82.

SHARPLESS, James, artist, b. in England about 1754; d. in New York city, 26 Feb., 1811. He was intended for the priesthood, but studied art. He came to this country in 1794, but, after remaining here several years, revisited England, returning to this country in 1809. He is buried in the churchyard of St. Peter's in Barclay street, New York. The only known work of Sharpless that is unquestionably authentic is a collection of small portraits in pastel. These are usually in profile, although some give the full face. Sharpless used a thick gray paper, softly glazed.
and of woolly texture. His colored crayons, which he manufactured himself, were kept finely powdered in small glass vials, and applied with a camel's-hair pencil. He is said to have worked with great rapidity, wholly completing in two hours a portrait for which he charged $15 for a profile, and $20 for a full face. He usually made a replica of each portrait, which he retained for his own use. This personal collection came into the possession of a gentleman in Virginia, it is said, as a purchase of one of his replicas, and the portraits remained his. Each one originally had the name of the subject attached to it, but during the civil war a descendant of the owner removed them from his home, and many of the names were lost, out of 130 only 70 were named. Subsequently an effort was made to identify them, but with only partial success. At the Centennial exhibition in 1876, forty of them were purchased for the National museum in Independence hall, Philadelphia, where they now are. Among them are portraits of George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, James Monroe, Anthony Wayne, Horatio Gates, James Wilkinson, Elias Dayton, James Clinton, De Witt Clinton, Charles Brockton Brown, Chancellor Kent, Judge Webster, Fisher Ames, Aaron Burr, Alexander Hamilton, Benjamin Rush, Henry Cruger, John Langdon, James McClellan, and the wives of James Madison and Richard Stockton. Sharpless took Washington's portrait in profile in 1806 in Phila-adelphia. The likeness has always been estimated as a very correct one. He made many copies in pastel, and his wife copied it on ivory in miniature. In 1854 there were brought from England what pur-ported to be three original oil-portraits by Sharpless, two of Washington, one profile and the other full face, and one of Mrs. Washington. They were exhibited in New York, and created much interest. In 1882 they were again brought to this country and exhibited more widely, and again in 1886-7, when they were offered for sale at an extravagant price, but an investigation threw doubt on their authenticity and caused their withdrawal. Sharpless had a turn for mechanics as well as art, and in the first volume of the "Medical and Philosophical Register" (1811) is published a paper by him on stein-carriages. His widow returned to England and had a sale of his effects at Bath, but his two sons were then surgeons to the naval hospital at Liverpool and settled in the south. It was probably from one of them that the Virginia gentleman obtained the collection of pastel portraits.

SHARPS, Christian, inventor, b. in New Jersey in 1811; d. in Vernon, Conn., 13 March, 1874. He early developed a talent for mechanics, became a machinist, and was conversant with every depart-ment of engineering. He was the first to manufacture the Sharps breach-loading rifle. In 1854 he removed to Hartford, Conn., to superintend the manufacture of this rifle, and he subsequently invented other firearms of great value, and patented many ingenious implements of various kinds.

SHARWOOD, George, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 July, 1810; d. there, 29 May, 1882. He was the grand-daughter of George Sharswood, of England, who settled at New London, Conn., before 1665. His grandfather, James (b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 April, 1747; d. there, 14 Sept., 1836), was a lumber merchant, served in the Revolutionary war, and was an original mem-er of the Democratic party, and served in the general assembly of Philadelphia, and also in the select council. He was actively interested in founding the Farmers and Mechanics Bank, and in 1817 wrote numerous articles against the Bank of the United States and the bank in the age of twenty-two, and before the son's birth, and his early training devolved entirely on his widowed mother. He was educated by his grandfather, Capt. James Sharswood, a wealthy citizen of Philadelphia, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1828 with the highest honors of his class, and, after studying law under Joseph R. In-cerell, was admitted to the bar. He did not meet with marked success in the early years of his practice, and devoted himself to study. In 1837-8 and 1842-3 he served in the legislature, and in 1845 the governor commissioned him as judge of the district court of Philadelphia. In 1848 he became its president, which post he continued to hold until 1857, when he was elected a justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. In 1878 he became chief justice, and retired from the bench in 1882, at the expiration of his term of office. In 1859 he received the law department of the University of Pennsylvania, which had been established in 1790 by James Wilson, but whose operations had been suspended, and he was the senior professor of law there until 1867, when he resigned his professorship. He contributed largely to the literature of the law, beginning in 1834 with an article in the "American Law Review" on "The Revised Code of Pennsylvania." He is the author of "Professional Ethics, a Compendium of Lectures on the Aims and Duties of the Profession of the Law" (Philadelphia, 1854); and "Popular Lectures on Common Law" (1856). The work which for a generation has made his name familiar is "Shars-wood's Blackstone's Commentaries" (1859). In 1853 he undertook the work of editing the several volumes of English common-law reports, republished for the use of the American bar. His editions of English text-writers were numerous. "Adams on Equity," "Russell on Crimes," "Byleson Bills," "Leigh's nisi Prima," and "Starkie on Evidence" are a few of the works that received his attention. In 1856 he published his "Lectures on Commercial Law." While he was a judge of the district court, his written opinions numbered more than 5,000. His opinions in the supreme court are to be found in the "Pennsylvania State Reports" from volumes viii. to xii. inclusive. His judicial career won for him the reputation of being one of the most eminent jurists that have sat on the bench in Pennsylvania, and his urbanity toward the bar gave him a popularity that has never been surpassed in the life of any jurist. These were in part made manifest by a dinner which was tendered him by the bar of Philadelphia, in the Academy of music, on his retirement from the bench, by the attendance of more than 500 lawyers at the meeting of the bar, held a few days before the event in the old Philadelphia Subscription Hall on the Fifteenth Street, and settled in the south. It was probably from one of them that the Virginia gentleman obtained the collection of pastel portraits.

of Ph.D. in 1859. He has published "Studia Physica," a series of monographs (Vienna: "Ele, mo,

a Drama" (Philadelphia, 1863; reissued as "The Retracted," 1885); and "The Miscellaneous Writings of William Sharswood" (vol. 1, 1862), besides contributions to scientific journals.

SHATTUCK, Aaron Draper, artist, b. in Francetown, N. H., 9 March, 1832. He became in 1850 the pupil of Alexander Ramsom in Boston, and two years later entered the schools of the Academy of Fine Arts in Philadelphia. From the instructions that he exhibited at the academy was a "Study of Grasses and Flowers" (1856). The following year he was elected an associate, and he became an academician in 1861. In 1867 he held the post of recording secretary. His works include "White Mountains in October" (1865); "Sunday Morning in New England" (1879); "Sheep and Cattle in Landscape" (1874); "Autumn near Stockbridge" (1876); "Granny's Pastures" (1877); "Cows by the Meadow Brook" (1881); "Cattle" (1882); and "Peaceful Days" (1884). He invented in 1883-5 a stretcher-frame with keys, a great improvement on the old methods of tightening canvases.

SHATTUCK, George Cheyne, physician, b. in Templeton, Mass., 17 July, 1853; d. in Boston, 18 March, 1904. He was graduated at Harvard University in 1879 and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1881, and became a sucessful physician in Boston. He was at one time president of the Massachusetts medical society. Dr. Shattuck, by his will, devised more than $600, 000 to charitable objects. He contributed largely to Dartmouth college, and built its observatory, which he furnished with "all his instruments, "Shattuck school," at Fairbank, Minn., a collegiate boarding-school under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal church, of which Dr. Shattuck was a liberal patron, was named for him. He received the degree of L.L. D. from Dartmouth in 1883.
Dr. Shattuck published two Boylston prize dissertations, entitled "Structure and Physiology of the Skin" (Boston, 1889), and "Causes of Bilious Secretions" (1880), and "Yellow Fever of Gibraltar in 1828," from the French (1839).

SHATTUCK, Lemuel, author, b. in Ashby, Mass., 15 Oct., 1783; d. in Boston, 17 Jan., 1859. He taught in various places, and was a merchant in Concord, Mass., from 1823 till 1833. He was afterward a bookseller and publisher of the official monthly of the common council of that city, and for several years a representative in the legislature. In 1844 he was one of the founders of the New England historic-geological society, and he was its vice-president for five years. He was also a member of various similar societies. He published "History of Concord, Mass." (Boston, 1865); "With Statistics of North American Birds," (Boston, 1844); "The Early History of Boston" (1845); "Report on the Sanitary Condition of Massachusetts" (1850); and "Memorials of the Descendants of William Shattuck" (1855).

SHAUBENA, Ottawa chief, b. near Maumee river, Ohio, about 1775; d. near Morris, Ill., 27 July, 1859. His name is also spelled Shabonee. Shab-o-nie, Shab-o-nee, Chamblie, and in other ways. He accompanied Tecumseh from 1806 till the battle of the Thames in 1813. In 1816 he accompanied Tecumseh and Capt. Billy Caldwell (see Sauganash) to the homes of the Pottawattamies and other tribes residing in what are now Illinois and Wisconsin, with the hope of securing the cooperation of Indian braves in driving the white settlers out of the country. At the battle of the Thames he was by the side of Tecumseh when he fell, and at the death of their leader Shabonee and Caldwell lost faith in their British allies, and never again took sides with them. They soon afterward met Gen. Lewis Cass at Detroit, and agreed to submit to the United States. In the effort made by Black Hawk in February, 1832, to incite the Pottawattamies and Ottawas to make war against the whites, Shabonee frustrated his plans, and thus incurred the hatred of the Sauk chief. In early manhood Shabonee married the daughter of a Pottawattamie chief, whose village was on the Illinois river, five miles north of Ottawa. Here he lived a few years, but removed to a twenty-five miles north, to what is known as Shabonee's grove, in DeKalb county. There he and his family resided till 1837, when he was removed to western Missouri. Unfortunately, his tribe and that of Black Hawk had reservations near each other. War began between them. His eldest son and a nephew were killed, and Shabonee went back to his old home in Illinois. After spending three years in Kansas on a new reservation, he returned again to Illinois, but found his land occupied by strangers, who readily drove him from the grove that bore his name. The Washington officials had decided that he forfeited his title when he moved from his land. Some of his friends subsequently bought two claims near the Kalamazoo river, and called it Shabonee, Ill., where he died. He was a superb specimen of an Indian. See "Life of Shabonee," by N. Matson (Chicago, 1879).

SHAW, George Frederick, inventor, b. in Ripley, Chautauqua co., N. Y., 4 Nov., 1855. He was educated at the high-school of his native town, and from 1875 till 1879 was in the employ of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern railroad. He has recently been engaged in the introduction of his improved mechanical telephone, was president of the Consolidated telephone company in 1883-6, and since 1887 has been vice-president and general manager of the Shaver corporation, which has charge of that and other of his inventions. The principal features of Mr. Shaw's telephone are the manner of carriers, the line around curves, and the way in which it is fastened to the diagram. His other devices include a self-righting and self-bailing life-boat, which has been used by the U. S. and Canadian governments, a compound automatic mail-catcher, a dynamophone to enable deaf persons to hear, a type-writer, and an autom

SHAW, Albert Duane, consul, b. in Lyme, Jefferson co., N. Y., 27 Dec., 1841. He was educated at Lawrenceville academy and graduated in the Yale New Regimen in 1861-3, and was elected to the legislature in 1867. He was appointed U. S. consul at Toronto, Canada, in 1868, and in 1878 promoted to Manchester, England, where he served till 1885. Mr. Shaw is known for his valuable consular reports to the state department, on foreign manufactures, and tariff and revenue.

On his retirement from office in Manchester the citizens gave him a public reception in the city-hall, and presented him, through the mayor, with a silver casket and address. He has been active in politics as a Republican orator.

SHAW, Annie Cornelia, artist, b. in West Troy, N. Y., 16 Sept., 1832. She studied in Chicago, and was elected an associate of the Chicago academy of design in 1873, and an academician in 1876. Her principal works are “On the Calumet”, (1870), “Willow Island”, and “Keene Valley
N. Y.” (1877); “Ed” Tide on the Coast of Maine” (1876); “Head of a Jersey Bull” (1877); “Returning from the Fair” (1878); “In the Rye-Field” and “Read to the Creek” (1880); “Close of a Summer Day” (1882); “July Day” and “In the Clearing” (1883); “Fall Ploughing” “Ashen Days,” and
“The Corn-Field” (1884); and “The Rustet Year.” (1885). Here “Flying Prairie” was at the Centenarial exhibition in 1873.

SHAW, Charles, lawyer, b. in Bath, Me., in 1782; d. in Montgomery, Ala., in 1828. He was graduated at Harvard in 1805, and practised law for several years in Lincoln county, Me., but removed to Alabama, and was judge of a court in Montgomery at the time of his death. He published “Topographical Historical Description of Boston from the First Settlement,” which was highly praised (1817).

SHAW, Henry, philanthropist, b. in England,
24 July, 1800; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 25 Aug., 1859. He came to this country in 1819, and in May of that year established himself in the hardware business in St. Louis with a small stock of goods. When he was forty years of age he retired from business with what at that time was considered a large fortune. He then spent nearly ten years in travel, and on his return founded the nucleus of the Missouri botanical garden. As it grew more attractive he conceived the idea of making his garden a public resort, and opened his gates to all comers, maintaining the property, which covered about fifty acres, at his own expense, and extending to all the hospitality of his residence. In 1870 he gave to the city of St. Louis a tract of 190 acres of land adjoining his garden, on condition of its maintenance as a public park by the city. It was laid out under the supervision of Mr. Shaw, who enriched it with many works of art. In June, 1883, he gave to Washington university improved real estate valued at $25,000, with an income, in accordance with his wishes, was used in organizing and maintaining a school of botany as a department of the university. At the same time the Missouri botanical garden and arboretum were placed in such relation to the school as to secure their full uses for scientific study and investigation to the professor and students for all time to come.

SHAW, Henry Wheeler, humorist, b. in Lanesborough, Mass., 21 April, 1818; d. in Monterey, Cal., 14 Oct., 1885. His father, Henry Shaw, was a member of the Massachusetts legislature for twenty-five years, and was also a member of congress in 1818–21. The son was admitted to Hampton about 1832, but, becoming captivated with stories of western life and adventure, abandoncd all thought of law and ran his head westward. He worked on steamboats on Ohio river, then became a farmer, and afterward an auctioneer. In 1858 he settled in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., as an auctioneer, and in that year he wrote his first article for the senior editor of this work, followed in 1859 by his “Essay on the Mule.” No attempt was made of Into and guard his style by him, and Mr. Shaw concluded that an author he was a failure. A year later he was induced to make another effort, and decided to adopt a method of spelling that more nearly represented his style of emuneration. The essay on the mule became “An Essay on the Mule,” by Josh Billings, and was sent to a New York paper. It was reprinted in several of the comic journals, and extensively copied. His most successful literary venture was a travesty on the “Old Farmers’ Almanac,” published for many years by the Thomas family, “Josh Billings’ Manual” (New York, 1876). Two-thousand copies were first printed, and for two months or few were disposed of, but during the next three months over 30,000 were printed and sold.
For the second year 12,000 copies were distributed, and for the ten years of its existence the subscription was very large. He began to lecture in 1861, his lectures being a series of witty sayings without care or order, delivered in an apparently awkward manner. Their quaintness and drollery, coupled with mannerisms, peculiarly his own, made him a popular orator. For twenty years previous to his death he contributed regularly to the “New York Weekly,” and the articles appearing in the “Century” magazine under the pen-name of “Uncle Esek” are said to be his.
Besides the books mentioned above, he published “Josh Billings, his Savings” (New York, 1866); “Josh Billings on Ice” (1875); “Every Body’s Friend” (1876); “Josh Billings’s Complete Works,” in one volume (1877); and “Josh Billings’s Spice-Box” (1881). See his “Life,” by Francis S. Smith
(New York, 1883).

SHAW, James Boylan, clergyman, b. in New York city, 25 Aug., 1804; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 8 May, 1860. He was fitted for the profession of law, but, instead of entering college, began the study of medicine, then the law, and afterward prepared for the Presbyterian ministry, being licensed to preach in 1832. He was for nearly fifty years in charge of the Brick church in Rochester, and then became pastor emeritus. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Rochester in 1852. Dr. Shaw was moderator of the general as-ssembly of his church in 1863, and in 1873 chairman of the first committee that was sent by the Presbyterian church in the United States to the established church of Scotland. He was a trustee of Genesee college, Hamilton college, and Auburn theological seminary, and a corporate member of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. He published occasional sermons.

SHAW, John, naval officer, b. in Mount Mellick, Queen’s county, Ireland, in 1755; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Sept., 1823. He was the son of an English officer, and, after receiving an ordinary education, came to this country with an elder brother in December, 1790, and settled in Philadelphia, Pa. He became a sailor in the merchant marine, and in 1797 was master of a brig that fitted to the West Indies. When hostilities with France began, he entered the U. S. navy as a lieutenant, 3 Aug., 1798. In December of the following year he was given command of the “Enterprise,” one of two schooners that had been built especially for chases and conflicts with small fast-sailing privateers. She was of 162 tons burthen, carrying 12 light guns, and a crew that varied from 90 to 75 men. In this vessel, during a cruise of eight months, he captured eight French privateers, and recovered eleven American prizes, fighting five spirited actions, two of them with vessels of superior force. His most serious action, which was fought off the coast of Canada, was the nearest conflict of the war, was with the "Flambeau," of 14 guns and 100 men; which, after a lively chase, he forced to fight and to strike her colors after a little more than an hour. The French vessel lost about half her crew in killed and wounded, to the "Enterprise's" ten. Lieut. Shaw cruised in the Mediterranean in the "George Washington" in 1801, and in the "John Adams" in 1805; meanwhile he had been promoted to master-commandant, 22 May, 1804. He became captain, 27 Aug., 1807, and commanded the squadron in 1814 that was blockaded by the enemy in Thames river between New London and Norwich, Conn. In 1816-17 he had charge of the Mediterranean squadron, and afterward he commanded the navy-yards at Boston, Mass.

SHAW, John, poet, b. in Annapolis, Md., 4 May, 1758; d. at sea, 10 Jan., 1809. He was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, in 1775, studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, and was appointed surgeon in the fleet that was sent to Algiers in December, 1789. He also served as secretary to Gen. William W. Eaton in Tunis, but returned in 1796, and then went, in 1801, to continue his studies in Edinburgh. Dr. Shaw went to Canada with the Earl of Selkirk in 1805, but removed to Baltimore, Md., in 1807. He died on a voyage from Charleston, S. C., to the Bahamas islands. Dr. Shaw was a contributor to "The Portfolio." His poems, with a memoir, and extracts from his foreign correspondence and journals, were published (Philadelphia, 1810).

SHAW, Oliver, musician, b. in 1776; d. in Providence, R. I., 1 Jan., 1849. He was well known as a singer and teacher, and composed numerous ballads, which were very popular at one time. They include: "Mary's Tears," "Nothing True but Heaven," "The Sweet Little Ann," and "The Death of Fawcett." Frederic L. Ritter refers to him as the "old blind singer."

SHAW, Samuel, merchant, b. in Boston, Mass., 2 Oct., 1754; d. at sea, 30 May, 1794. His father, Francis, a merchant of Boston, was associated with Robert Gould in 1750 in founding the town of Gouldsborough, Me. Operations were begun on a large scale; but the Revolution put a stop to them, and Shaw lost much money in the enterprise. Samuel early entered the counting-house of his father. He was an ardent patriot, and before the Revolution had a squabble with Lieutenant Wragg of the British army, who was billeted at his father's house. A duel was presented only by the interposition of Maj. John Pitcairn. Young Shaw was commissioned a lieutenant of artillery, 1 Jan., 1776, served from Dorchester Heights to Yorktown, and at the close of the war had attained the rank of major, and aide-de-camp to Gen. Henry Knox. He went to Canton in February, 1784, as supercargo, and on his return, a year after the following May, Gen. Knox made him first secretary of the war department. He made several more voyages between New York and Canton, and in February, 1788, was appointed U. S. consul at the latter place. He died on his way from that city to Boston. His friend, Josiah Quincy, published: "The Journal of Major Samuel Shaw, the First American Consul at Canton, with a Life of the Author." (Boston, 1847.)

His nephew, Robert Gould, merchant, b. at Gouldsborough, Me., 4 June, 1757; d. in Boston, Mass., 3 May, 1853, was the son of Francis Shaw, who, with his father, Francis, was interested in founding the town of Gouldsborough, Me., and lost much money when the enterprise failed. Robert went to Boston about 1789, and was apprenticed to his uncle William. When he came of age he entered business for himself, which he continued till 1810 in various partnerships. From the latter year till his death he conducted his affairs alone. He resided for several years in London, and in 1807 invested largely in lands in Maine. He accumulated a fortune, and bequeathed $810,000 to be put at interest until it should amount to $400,000. This is to be designated the "Shaw fund," and is to be devoted to the support of an asylum for mariners' children. He also left $10,000 to purchase a site for the institution.—Robert Gould's eldest son. Francis George, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Oct., 1809; d. in West New Brighton, Staten island, N. Y., 7 Nov., 1882, entered Harvard in 1825, but left in 1828 to enter his father's counting-room. He engaged actively in business. In 1841, his health being impaired, he withdrew to the West Roxbury, near Brook Farm, where an experiment in associative life, in which he was interested, was begun under the leadership of George Ripley. In 1847 he left West Roxbury, and, after living more than three years upon the north shore of Staten island, he went to Europe with his family. After four years he returned in 1855 to Staten island, and, where he resided until his death. While living at West Roxbury he was a member of the school committee and one of the overseers of the poor, a justice of the peace, and president of the first common council of Roxbury when that town became a city. He was also foreman of the jury of Norfolk county that first proposed the establishment of the State reform-school of Massachusetts. During his residence on Staten island he was a trustee of the village in which he lived, a trustee of the Seaman's retreat and of the S. R. Smith infirmary, treasurer of the American union of associationists and of the Sailer's fund, president of the Freedman's relief association and of the New York branch of the Freedman's union commission, and connected with the American and English organizations. He was also a hereditary member of the Massachusetts Society of the Cincinnati. Possessed of an ample fortune, he held it as a trust for the unfortunate. All good causes, the help of the poor, the ignorant, the criminal, and the enslaved, had always his ready sympathy and his hearty support. He was the author of several translations from George Sand, Fourier, and Zelaphke.—Francis George's son, Robert Gould, soldier, b. in Boston, 19 Oct., 1837; d. at Fort Wagner, S. C., 18 July, 1863, entered Harvard in 1856, but left in March, 1859. He enlisted as a private in the 5th New York regiment on 19 April, 1861, became 2d lieutenant in the 3d Massachusetts on 28 May, and 1st lieutenant on 8 July. He was promoted to captain, 10 Aug., 1862, and on 17 April, 1863, became colonel of the 54th Massachusetts, the first regiment of colored troops from a free state that was mustered into the U. S. service. He was killed in the assault on Fort Wagner while leading the advance with his regiment. A bust of him has been made by Edmund Leoni, the sculptor, and a tablet to the memory of him by William Page. He is buried in Memorial hall, Harvard university. In May, 1897, a handsome equestrian monument by Augustus St. Gaudens was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies on Boston Common.
SHAYS, Thompson Darrah, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 20 Aug., 1801; d. in Germantown, Pa., 26 July, 1874. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 20 May, 1829, was commissioned lieutenant, 17 May, 1828, and served in the West Indies in 1831-2. He was transferred to the "Natchez" in April, 1836, and then to the "Lex- ington" as flag-lieutenant of the Brazilian squadron, and subsequently as an officer of that ship until 1835. He was on leave at Philadelphia for two years, and was then 1st lieutenant of the frigate "Constitution," of the Pacific squadron, in 1838-41. During the Mexican war he commanded the schooner "Petrel," and was highly complimented for his conduct at Tompkins "Vera Cruz," and Tepan in 1846-7. Upon his return to Philadelphia a committee of citizens presented him with a sword and epaulets. He was commissioned commander, 7 Aug., 1850, had charge of the naval rendezvous at Philadelphia in 1852-4, and in 1854-5 commanded the sloop "Falmouth" in the Home squadron. He was placed on the retired list in 1855, but claimed that this did him an injustice, and was restored to his rank by a naval court in 1857. He was then on leave until the civil war began, when he took command of the steamer "Montgomery," in the Gulf blockading squadron. He was retired, 26 Feb., 1862, on his own application, after more than forty years' service. He was continued on special duty at New York. He was called out of the Navy when theapt was restored to commodore on the retired list on 4 April, 1867, after which he was unemployed. See "Defence of Thompson Darrah Shaw before the Naval Court of Inquiry," by his counsel Robert K. Scott (Washington, 1857).

SHAW, William Smith, lawyer, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 12 Aug., 1778; d. in Boston, Mass., 25 April, 1829. He was graduated at Harvard in 1798, became private secretary to his uncle, President John Adams, and at the close of the latter's administration began to study law in Boston with William Sullivan. He was admitted to the bar in April, 1804, and in the same year became treasurer of the Anthology society, the nucleus of the Boston atheneum. He devoted much of his time to the collection of the society's library, and under his direction, the library was known as "Athenaeum Shaw." He was the first to suggest making the library public, and connecting with it a reading-room. After the incorporation of the institution he was its secretary and librarian till 1833, and its secretary alone till 1824. At his decease he left it collections of coins, pamphlets, and books to the value of $41,000. For many years after 1806 he was chief of the 1st district court, and he took part in politics as secretary of the state Federalist committee. Mr. Shaw was a fellow of the American academy, an original member of the American antiquarian society, and an officer of the Linnean society. Besides his connection with the "Monthly Anthology and Boston Review," the publication of the Anthology society, he was a promoter of the "North America Review." His portrait, by Gilbert Stuart, was painted by order of the trustees of the Athenaeum on his retirement from office. See "Memorials of William Smith Shaw," by Joseph B. Felt (Boston, 1852).--His cousin, Lemuel, jurist, b. in Barnstable, Mass., 9 Jan., 1781; d. in Boston, Mass., 30 March, 1861. His other brother, Samuel, was pastor of the West Parish of Barnstable from 1790 till his death in 1807. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1800, and, after serving for a year as usher in the Franklin school in Boston, began the study of law in that city. He had also been an assistant editor of the Boston "Gazette," and in 1802 proposals were issued for the publication by subscription of his translation of a French work on the "Civil and Military Transactions of Bonaparte." He completed the translation, but it met with no financial support. He was admitted to the bar in 1804, began the practice of law in Boston, and rose gradually to eminence in his profession. He was several times a member of the legislature between 1811 and 1819, and in 1820 was a delegate to the constitutional convention. In 1821-2 and 1828-9 he sat in the state senate. He draughted the charter of the city of Boston, and held various minor town offices, but never allowed these to interfere with his legal practice. In January, 1829, at a meeting that was held in opposition to the recently established tariff, he was the head of a committee to draught a memorial to congress. In 1830, on the death of Chief-Justice Isaac Parker, of the Massa- chusetts, Shaw was appointed his successor, though he had never held any judicial office. He declined peremptorily at first, but finally accepted. He took his seat in September, 1830, and held it till his resignation, 31 Aug., 1850. During this period he gained a high reputation for his judicial ability, and he is regarded as one of the foremost jurists that New England has pro-duced. Few men have contributed more to the growth of the law as a progressive science. Among other noted cases he presided at the trial of the convent rioters in 1834, and at that of Prof. John W. Webster for the murder of Dr. George Parkman. His charge to the jury in the latter case was widely condemned as harsh, but public opinion generally sustained him. In 1850 Judge Shaw was elected to congress, where he was equally well received by members of the bar. He was an over-summer of Harvard for twenty-two years, and for twenty-seven years one of its corporation, and held membership in many learned societies. His reported decisions fill a large part of fifty volumes, and include many in novel and complicated cases. Among his published addresses are a "Fourth-o- July Oration" (1854); "Anecdotes" (1849); and "Address at the Opening of the New Court-House, Worcester" (1845).

SHAYS, Daniel, insurgent, b. in Hopkinton, Mass., in 1747; d. in Sparta, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1825. He served as an ensign at the battle of Bunker Hill, and attained the rank of captain in the Continental army, but "resigned his commission for reasons quite problematical." He then resided at Pelham (now Prescot), and in 1786 took part in the popular movement in western Massachusetts for the redress of alleged grievances. This had begun as early as 1782, and had increased as popular discontent, incident on the unsettled condition of affairs at the close of the Revolution, became general. Conventions were held in several western counties, lists of grievances were drawn up, committees of correspondents were established, and the same machinery was sought to be used against the state government that had been successful in overturning British rule in 1775. The complaints were divers, but were, in general, that the governor's salary was too high, the senate aristocratic, the lawyers exorbitante, and taxes too burdensome. Among the demands were, that the general court should no longer sit in Boston, and that a large issue of paper money should be made. Though the conventions deprecated violence, there were uprisings in several counties, directed against the courts, which were popularly regarded as the instruments of legal oppression, especially in the collection of debts. The tribunals were prevented from sitting, in many cases, and the malcontents grew bolder. The militia was often powerless, as its members largely sympathized with the riots. An attempt by the legislature to repress some of the disturbances at Springfield, was made. Shays and his followers, who had become known as a leader in the rebellion when, at the head of about 1,000 men, he appeared at Springfield to prevent the session of the supreme court at that place. The court-house, by the governor's order, had been occupied by a somewhat smaller body of militia under Gen. William Shepard, which sustained the court, but, after sitting the whole day, it was closed and business, and on the fourth day both parties dispersed. Shays was also present at the large gathering of insurgents that took place in Worcester in December, and retired at the head of a large part of them to Rutland, Vt., on 9 Dec. At this time it seems to have regretted his part in the agitation, as, in his former letters to colleagues in the state, he expressed his desire to desert his followers and receive a pardon. The officer was afterward empowered to offer him one on that condition, but had no opportunity to do so. In January, 1787, three bodies of insurgents concentrated on Springfield, where they hoped to capture the Continental arsenal, which was defended by Gen. Shepard, with 1,000 men. Two large bodies, under Gen. Shays, numbered 1,100 men, and approached by the Boston road. Meanwhile the state government had raised and equipped an army of 4,000 men, under Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, whose approach made hasty action necessary. Shays sent a message to Luke Day, the leader of one of the other bodies of insurgents, saying that he should attack the arsenal. Day sent him a letter to this effect. The latter answered that he could not move till the 26th, but the despatch was intercepted by Gen. Shepard, and the militia were therefore in readiness. Before advancing, Shays had sent a petition to Gen. Lincoln, who was then two days march from Springfield, proposing a truce till the next session of the legislature, but before a reply could reach him he attacked the arsenal early on the afternoon of the 26th. After repeated warnings, and two volleys over the heads of the approaching body, the militia fired directly into their ranks, killing three men and wounding one. Shays attempted to rally his men, but they retreated precipitately to Litchfield, ten miles distant, and on the next day effectually a junction with the forces of Capt. Parsons, the Berkshire leader, after losing about 200 by discharge. After the arrival of Gen. Lincoln's army, and the consequent flight of Day and his men, Shays continued his retreat through North Hadley to Amherst. He was pursued by the state troops to this point, and then took position on two high hills in Pelham, which were rendered difficult of access by deep snow. On 30 Jan., Gen. Lincoln summoned him to lay down his arms, and Shays returned a conciliatory answer, suggesting a truce till a reply could be obtained to a petition that had just been sent to the general court. Gen. Lincoln refused. Meanwhile the legislature met, declared the state to be in rebellion, and rejected the petition, which too much resembled a communication from one independent power to another. On 3 Feb., the insurgents moved to Petersham, under cover of a conference between one of their leaders and a state officer, and they were followed by the state troops in a forced march of thirty miles through a blinding snow-storm and in a bitter north wind. When they were overtaken the insurgents made little resistance. They were pursued for about two miles beyond the town; 150 were captured, and the rest dispersed. This ended Shays's rebellion. Several of its leaders were sentenced to be hanged, but they were finally pardoned. Shays, after living in Vermont about a year, asked permission to go to France as a citizen of Sparta, N. Y. He was allowed a pension in his old age, for his services during the Revolution. See "History of the Insurrections in Massachusetts in the Year 1786, and the Rebellion Consequent Thereon," by George R. Minot (Boston, 1816), and Josiah G. Holland's "History of Western Massachusetts," 2 vols. (Springfield, 1836).

SHAYS, John Aubrey, author, b. in Cork, Ireland, in 1802; d. in New York, 15 Aug., 1845. He emigrated to this country in 1827, and engaged in journalism. He published "Ruddeki, an Eastern Romance of the Seventh Century, in Verse" (Cork, 1826); "Adolph, and other Poems" (New York, 1831); "Parnassian Wild Flowers" (New York, 1837; and "Clonarif, a Narrative Poem" (New York, 1843). A volume of his poems was published after his death by his son, George Augustus Shea (1836). He left in manuscript "Di Vasaari," an unfinished tragedy, a life of Byron, and a poem entitled "Time's Mission." His most popular piece is "The Ocean."—His son, George, lawyer, b. in Cork, 10 June, 1828; d. in New York city, 15 Jan., 1865, emigrated to the United States in early life and settled in New York. After being called to the bar, he attained distinction in his profession, and was appointed corporation attorney of New York from 1863 to 1867. He became chief justice of the Marine court of New York in 1870, and held the position up to 1882. He was associate counsel with Charles O'Connor in determining the famous "Marine" case. His Kings county elevated railroad in Brooklyn, establishing its charter by a decision of the court of appeals, reversing the special and general terms in Brooklyn. He wrote "Hamilton, a Historical Study" (New York, 1877). An enlarged edition was issued under the title "The Life and Epoch of Alexander Hamilton, a Historical Study" (Boston, 1886).

SHEA, John Dawson Gilmary, author, b. in New York city, 22 July, 1824; d. in Elizabeth, N. J., 22 Feb., 1892. He was educated at the grammar-school of Columbia college, of which his father was principal, was admitted to the bar, but devoted himself to literature. He edited the "Historical Magazine" from 1839 till 1866, was one of the founders and first president of the United States Catholic historical society, was a member or corresponding member of the principal historical societies in this country and Canada, and corresponding member of the Royal academy of history, Madrid. He had received the degree of L.L. D. from St. Francis Xavier college, New York, and St. John's college, Fordham. His writings include "The Discovery and Exploration of the Mississippi Valley" (New York, 1853); "History of the Catholic Missions among the Indian Tribes of the United States" (1854; German translation, Würzburg, 1856); "The Fallen Brave" (1861); "Early Voyages up and down the Mississippi" (Albany, 1862); "Novum Belgiam an Account of the New Netherlands in 1643-4” (New York, 1862); “The Operations of the French Fleet under Count de Grasse” (1864); “The Lincoln Memorial” (1865); translations of Charlevoix’s “History and General Description of New France” (6 vols., 1866-72); Hennepin’s “Description of Louisiana” (1860); Le Clerc’s “Establishment of the Faith” (1861); and Pennebaker’s “Expedition” (1862); “Catholic Hierarchy of the United States” (1864); and “Life and Times of Archbishop Carroll” (1868). He also translated De Coueroy’s “Catholic Church in the United States” (1856); and edited the Cramoisy series of narratives and documents bearing on the early history of the French-American colonies (29 vols., 1857-68); Washington’s Private Diaries (1861); and Coldwell Colton’s “History of the Five Indian Nations,” edition of 1727 (1866); Alsop’s “Maryland” (1860); a series of grammars and dictionaries of the Indian languages (15 vols., 1860-74); and “Life of Pius IX.” (1875). He had also published “Bibliography of American Catholic Bibles and Testaments” (1859), corrected several of the very erroneous Catholic Bibles, and revised by the Vulgate Chart’s original Bible of 1750 (1838) several prayer-books, school histories, Bible dictionaries, and translations.

SHEAFE, James, senator, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 16 Nov., 1755; d. there, 5 Dec., 1829. He was graduated at Harvard in 1773, was for several years a member of the board of selectmen of the town of Portsmouth, a representative, and subsequently a senator, in the New Hampshire legislature, and a member of the State executive council. He was a representative in congress from New Hampshire from 1779 till 1801, and U. S. senator from 7 Dec., 1801, till 1802, when he resigned. He was defeated as the Federalist candidate for governor in 1816 by William Plumer, a Democrat. Mr. Sheafe was a merchant and ship-owner.

SHEAFER, Peter Wenrick, mining engineer, b. in Halifax, Pa., 31 March, 1819. He completed his education in the academy at Oxford, N. Y., in 1837, and was associated with Henry D. Rogers in the first geological survey of Pennsylvania in 1838. In this connection he was specially engaged in tracing the geological features of the range of mountains that extends from near Pottsville to beyond Shamokin and Tamaqua. In 1840 he published “Report on the Geological and Mining Conditions of the Allegheny Mountains, and he has been specially active in the development of the coal and iron interests of that district. The management of the coal-mines of the Philadelphia and Reading coal and iron company, and of those that were bequeathed by Stephen Girard to Philadelphia, were for a long time confided to him. He has been consulted frequently in controversies relating to mining law, and has testified in court as an expert in these subjects. In 1849 he secured the passage of a bill for completing the first state survey, and in 1873 he was influential in securing the appointment of J. P. Lesley (q. c.) to undertake the charge of the second survey of Pennsylvania. Mr. Sheaffer is a member of various societies, including the American Institute of mining engineers, to whose transactions he has contributed professional papers. He issued in 1875, under the auspices of the Pennsylvania historical society, a map of Pennsylvania as it was in 1775.

SHEAFFE, Sir Roger Hale, bart., British soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 July, 1763; d. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 17 July, 1851. He was the third son of John Sheaffe, of Customs, at Boston. After the death of the boy’s father, Earl Percy, whose quarters were at his mother’s house, took charge of his education, and procured him a commission in the 5th foot, 1 May, 1778. He became a lieutenant-colonel in 1788, served in Holland in 1793, and in the expedition to the Baltic in 1801. He was on duty in Canada from September, 1802, till October, 1811, on 29 July, 1811, received the brevet rank of colonel, and on 4 June, 1811, became a major-general. He served again in Canada from 29 July, 1812, till November, 1813, and commanded the British troops after the fall of Gen. Sir Isaac Brock at Queenston, where he defeated the American troops, and for this service was made a baronet, 16 Jan., 1813. He defended York (now Toronto) when it was attacked in April, 1813. Sir Roger had been appointed administrator of the government of Canada West after the death of Brock, and continued as such, and in command of the troops, till June, 1814. He was promoted lieutenant-general, 19 July, 1821, was advanced to the full rank of general, 28 June, 1838, and became colonel of the 36th regiment, 31 Dec., 1829.

SHEARMAN, Thomas Gaskell (shear-man), lawyer, b. in Birmingham, England, 25 Nov., 1834. He came with his parents to New York when he was nine years old, was educated privately, studied law, was admitted to the bar in Kings county in 1859, and became successful in practice in New York city. Since 1859 Mr. Shearman has been an active worker in the cause of free-trade. He was joint author of “Tillinghast and Shearman’s Practice, Pleadings, and Forms” (New York, 1861-5), and “Shearman and Reifield on Negligence” (1869), prepared for the commissioners of the code of the whole of “The Book of Forms” (Albany, 1861), and is one of those of the civil code that relates to obligations, etc. (Albany, 1865), and has written numerous pamphlets on free-trade, protection, indirect taxation, and cognate subjects.

SHEECUT, John Liamens Edward Wh Ditridge, author, b. in Beaufort, S. C., 4 Dec., 1770; d. in Charleston, S. C., in 1836. He was graduated in medicine at Philadelphia in 1791, and soon afterward began practice in Charleston, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was actively concerned in founding the South Carolina homespun society, the first cotton-factory in the state, and in 1813 organized the Antiquarian society of Charleston, now the Literary and philosophical society of South Carolina. Dr. Sheecut maintained that a predisposing cause of yellow fever was the derange- ment of the thermometer consequent upon its being deprived of its due proportion of electricity, and he is said to have been the first physician in Charleston to apply electricity in the treatment of this disease. He was the author of “Flora Carolinensis, a Historical, Medical, and Economic Display of the Vegetable Kingdom” (2 vols., Charleston, 1816); “An Essay on the Yellow Fever of 1817” (1817); “A History Into the Properties and Powers of the Electric Fluid, and its Artificial Application to Medical Uses” (1819); “Sheecut’s Medical and Philosophical Essays” (1819); “Elements of Natural Philosophy” (1826); and “A New Theory of the Earth” (1826).

SHEELEIGH, Matthias, clergyman, b. at Charlestown, Chester co., Pa., 29 Dec., 1821. He is a descendant of a German family that came to this country early in the 18th century, and whose name originally was Schillich. He studied in West Chester, Pa., and in Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1840-4, and was graduated at the theological seminary there in 1842. In the same year he was ordained to the ministry of the Lutheran church, and in 1887 he received the degree of D.D. from Newberry college, Newberry, S. C. He has filled various pastorates in New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, and since 1869 has been at Fort Washington, Pa., near Philadelphia. He was secretary of the general synod in 1866, 1868, and since 1868 has been one of the members of the Lutheran board of publication since 1859, and its president in 1869-71, and a director of Gettysburg theological seminary since 1864. In 1868 he was appointed by the general synod one of its delegates to the meeting of the World’s evangelical alliance that was held in New York in 1873. He has won reputation as a poet and statistician, and is a frequent contributor to religious periodicals. He has been editor of the “Sunday-School Herald,” in Philadelphia, since 1860, and of the “Lutheran Almanac and Year-Book” since 1871. Besides numerous doctrinal and historical articles in theological reviews, and many contributions in poetry and prose to periodicals, he has published “Hymns for the Seventh Jubilee of the Reformation” (Philadelphia, 1867); “An Ecclesiastical: A Jubilee Poem before the General Synod” (1871); “A Gettysburgiad: A Jubilee Poem before the Gettysburg Theological Seminary” (1876); and “Luther: A Son’s Tribute, more than Fifty Original Poems, on the 400th Anniversary of Luther’s Birth” (1883). A large number of his hymns have found a place in collections, and he has a volume of original sonnets nearly ready for publication. Besides these, he has published “Old Torhållson, an Icelandic Narrative,” translated from the German (1870);
A man with a knife in his hand.

"Outline of Old Testament History" (1839); "Outline of New Testament History" (1837); "Herald Picture Books" (12 vols. 1837); and a "Brief History of Martin Luther" (1839).

SHEFFIELD, Daniel, lawyer, b. in Frederick, Md., in 1759; d. in Staunton, Va., 3 Dec. 1830. He was bred a shoemaker in his father's shop, but, although without advantages, acquired through his own exertions a respectable education. He emigrated to Virginia when twenty-one years of age, followed his trade in Winchester, at the time his father's house was admitted to the bar. His original character and natural ability soon brought him into notice, he acquired a large practice, and, removing to Staunton, won reputation at the bar, and was for many years a member of the legislature. He was elected to congress as a Federalist in 1810, and served by re-election from 1816 till 1817. His speech in favor of the renewal of the charter of the first United States bank was a masterly effort, and was listened to by the house for three hours in profound silence. He opposed the war of 1812. He often engaged in controversy, with John Randolph, who on one occasion, in commenting on his speech, said: "The shoemaker ought not to go beyond his last." Mr. Sheffield retorted: "If that gentleman has ever been on a shoemaker's bench, he would know what I have left it.

SHEFFIELD, Joseph Earle, donor, b. in Southport, Conn., 19 June, 1783; d. in New Haven, Conn., 16 Feb. 1882. He received a common-school education, and in 1808, when only fifteen years of age, began his business career as a clerk in New Berne, N.C. In 1843 he became a partner in a New York house, but remained in New Berne to represent the business there. He travelled extensively in the south on business matters, and, visiting Mobile, Ala., he decided to transfer his southern business to that city, and in a few years became its chief cotton merchant. In 1855 he returned to his native state, and established himself in New Haven. He took an active part in the construction of the New Haven and Northampton canal, and was one of the most energetic in securing the charter for the New York and New Haven railroad. His next enterprise was building the Chicago and Rock Island railroad, which proved very profitable to him. His donations to Yale have been munificent. In 1869 the name of its scientific department, which was reorganized and placed on a firm basis by his liberality, was changed to the Sheffield scientific school in his honor. Its two buildings are called respectively Sheffield hall and North Sheffield hall. He gave to other colleges, seminaries, and religious institutions, and his gifts amounted to more than $8,000,000.

SHEFFIELD, William Paine, senator, b. on Block island, R. I., 30 Aug., 1819. He was educated at Kingston academy; R. I., and privately under a Harvard law-school in 1843, and admitted to the bar in 1844. He was a member of the legislature in 1842-5, 1849-52, 1857-61, 1863-73, and 1875-84. He was chosen to congress as a Unionist in 1869, served one term, and in 1888 was appointed by the governor to fill out the unexpired term of Henry B. Anthony in the United States Senate, and served one year till 22 Feb., 1888, when the vacancy was filled by the legislature. He was a member of the Rhode Island constitutional convention in 1841, and of the one that framed the existing constitution in 1843. He was a commissioner to revise the state laws in 1871-2, has been president of the People's library since its foundation, and a trustee of the Redwood library, in Newport, for many years. His publications include many speeches and memoirs, especially concerning alterations on the constitution of Rhode Island; "Historical Sketch of Block Island" (Newport, 1876); "Historical Sketch of Newport" (1876); and "Rhode Island Privateers" (1883).

SHEGGUE, James Henry, artist, b. about 1810; d. 7 April, 1829. He devoted himself mainly to portraiture, but produced also landscape and genre pieces. His first exhibited at the Academy of Fine Arts, New York, in 1835, was elected an associate in 1841, and became an academician two years later. From 1848 till 1852 he was corresponding secretary of the academy.

SHELBY, Evan, pioneer, b. in Wales in 1720; d. at King's Meadows (now Bristol), Tenn., 4 Dec. 1794. At the age of fifteen he emigrated with his father's family to North Mountain, near Kingstown, Md. He received a meager education, but when quite young became noted as a hunter and woodsman. In the old French war he rose from the rank of private to that of captain, in which capacity he served throughout the campaign of Gen. John Forbes. He then engaged in trade with the Indians, and afterward embarked extensively in herding and raising cattle on the Virginia border. He was in the employ when, in 1774, war began with the Shawnees and Delawares. Raising a body of fifty volunteers in the Watagua district, he led them on a march of twenty-five days through a trackless wilderness, and joined the Virginia army on the eve of the battle of Point Pleasant. Toward the close of the action, all his ranking officers being either killed or disabled, the command devolved upon him, and he utterly routed the enemy. In 1779 he led a successful expedition against the Chickamauga Indians. He subsequently served with the Virginia army on the seacoast, rising to the rank of colonel, and then to that of general.—His eldest son, Isaac, governor of Kentucky, b. in North Mountain, Md., 11 Dec. 1750; d. near Stanford, Ky., 18 July, 1836, acquired a common English education, and the principal copies of surveying at Fredericktown, and before he was of age served as deputy sheriff of Frederick county. In 1772 he removed with his father to the present site of Bristol, Tenn., and followed with him the business of herding cattle till 1774, when, being appointed lieutenant in his father's company, he served in the battle of Point Pleasant, which he was instrumental in winning. He commanded the fort that at last fell to the British, and when his troops were disbanded by Lord Dunmore, lest they should join the patriot army. During the following year he was employed at surveying in Kentucky, but, his health failing, he returned home in July, 1776, just in time to be at the battle of Long Island flats. At the first furious onset of the savages, the American lines were broken, and then Shelby, present only as a volunteer private, seized the command.
refounded the troops, and inflicted upon the Indians a severe defeat, with the loss of only two men killed and seven wounded. This and John Sev- iber's defence of Wataga, frustrated the rear- attack by which the British hoped to envelop and crush the southern colonies. Soon afterward Gov. Patrick Henry promoted Shelby to a captaincy and made him commissioner-general of the Virginia forces. When Sevier, in 1779, projected the expedition that captured the British stores at Chickamauga, Colonel Sevier and John Se- ced the right of his individual credit. In this year he was commissioned a major by Gov. Thomas Jefferson, but, when the state line was run, his residence was found to be in North Caro- lina. He then resigned his commission, but was at once appointed to the colony of Sullivan county by Gov. Caswell. He was in Kentucky, perfecting his title to lands he had selected on his previous visit, when he heard of the fall of Charle- ton and the desperate situation of affairs in the southern colonies. He at once returned to engage in active service against the enemy, and, crossing the mountains into South Carolina, in July, 1780, he won victories over the British at Chickory, Cedar Springs, and Musgrove's Mill. But, as the declaration of independence was made after the last engagement, he was obliged to retreat across the Alleghenies. There he soon concerted with John Sevier the remarkable expedition which resulted in the battle of King's Mountain, and turned the tide of the Revolution. For this in- portant service he and Sevier received the thanks of the North Carolina legislature, and the veteran a pair of pistols. Having been elected to the general assembly, Shelby soon afterward left the army to take his seat, but, before he left, sugges- ted to Gen. Horatio Gates the expedition which, carried out by Morgan under Gen. Greene, resulted in the victory at Cowpens. Being soon afterward recalled to South Carolina by Gen. Greene, he marched over the mountains with Col. Sevier and 500 men, and did important service against the British in the vicinity of Charleston. In the winter of 1782-3 he was appointed a commissioner to survey the lands along the Cumberland that were allotted by North Carolina to her soldiers, and this done, he repaired to Boonesborough, Ky., where he settled as a planter. He was a delegate to all the conventions held in Kentucky, and was a member of the separation of Kentucky from Virginia, and suc- ceeded, in connection with Thomas Marshall and George Muter, in thwarting the reasonable scheme of Gen. James Wilkinson and his associates to force Kentucky out of the Union and into an alliance with Spain. When, in 1792, Kentucky was admitted as a state, Shelby was almost unanimously elected its first governor. During nearly the whole of his administration the western country was in a state of constant irritation, in consequence of the conclusion of the Mississippi by Spain; but, by his firm and sagacious policy, this discontent was kept from breaking out into actual hostilities. Finally, by the treaty of 20 Oct., 1795, the Spaniards con- ceded the navigation of that river: and Shelby's term of office expiring soon afterward, he refused to be again a candidate, and returned to the cultivation of the farm which he had reluctantly left at what he deemed the call of his country. He subsequently refused all office except that of presi- dential elector, to which he was chosen six times successively under Jefferson, Madison, and Mon- roe; but, on the eve of the second war with Great Britain, his state again peremptorily demanded his services. Our first western army had been cap- tured. Michigan was in the hands of the enemy, and the whole frontier was threatened by a strong con- solidation of negroes, armed by Great Britain. In- surgently the people turned to Shelby, and he consented to serve as governor "if there should be a war with England." Organizing a body of 4,000 volunteers, he had them mounted on his own re- sponsibility, and at the age of sixty-three led them in person to the re-enforcement of Gen. William Henry Harrison, whom he joined just in time to enable that general to destroy the British army on Lake Erie. For his services in this campaign Shelby received a gold medal and the thanks of congress and of the Kentucky legislature. In March, 1817, he was tendered the post of secretary of war by President Monroe; but he declined, and never again held any office except that of commis- sioner for the purchase from the Chickasaws of their remaining lands in Tennessee and Kentucky.

SHELDON, Alexander, physician, b. in Suffield, Conn., 23 Oct., 1756; d. in Montgomery county, N. Y., 10 Sept., 1836. He was graduated at Yale in 1776, settled in Montgomery county, N. Y., took an active part in politics, was speaker of the New York assembly in 1804, 1806, and 1812, and a judge of the county court. He was graduated at Yale in 1776, and New York university in 1812, and became eminent in his profession. He was a regent of the University of New York state, a member of the convention that framed the State constitution in 1820, and chairman of the committee on the executive departments. In the presidential contest between John Adams and Thomas Jefferson the warmly espoused the cause of the latter. He was the author of a pamphlet on the proceedings of the New York assembly that wore the coked hat, the badge of that office.—His son, Smith, publisher, b. in Montgomery county, N. Y., 13 Sept., 1811; d. in N. Y., 30 Aug., 1884, was educated at Albany academy, acquired a fortune in the dry-goods trade in that city, and, removing to New York in 1834, established the publishing-house of Sheldon and Co., of which his son, Isaac E., Sheldon, is now (1858) the head. His latter life was devoted to benevolent enterprises, especially to the education of the colored population of the south, to which cause he gave liberally and for which he collected large sums of money. He was an original incorporator of Vassar college and chairman of the board of trustees for the Free school for colored youth, and an incorporator of Madison university.

SHELDON, David Newton, b. in Suffield, Conn., 26 June, 1807; d. in Waterville, 4 Oct., 1889. He was graduated at Williams, studied in Newington theological seminary, and was pastor of Baptist churches in Maine till 1836, when he became a Unitarian. In 1841-53 he was president of Waterville college (now Colby university). By Brownian methods he obtained the degree of D. D. He published several works and "Sin and Redemption" (New York, 1856).

SHELDON, Edward Austin, educator, b. in Perry Centre, N. Y., 4 Oct., 1833; d. in Oswego, 16 Sept., 1897. He studied at Hamilton, but was not graduated. In 1869 that college gave him the degree of A. M. He was superintendent of public schools at Syracuse, N. Y., in 1851-3, occupied the same post in Oswego in 1855-7, and since 1862 had been principal of the Oswego state normal training-school. He was the first to introduce into this country a systematic course of objective in- struction in the public schools, and in 1861 organiz- ed the first training-school for teachers, and his system was subsequently adopted by the normal schools of New York state. He published "First Reading Book and Reading Charts." (New SHELTON, George William, author, b. in Summerville, S. C., 28 Jan., 1843. He was graduated at Princeton in 1863, and served during 1864 at City Point, Va., in charge of the sick and wounded of Gen. Grant's army. In 1865 he was appointed tutor in Latin and belles-lettres in Princeton, and in 1869 he became instructor in the oriental languages at Union theological seminary, New York, where he remained until 1873, after which he studied for two years in the British museum. Mr. Sheldon then devoted himself to journalistic work and was art critic of the New York "Evening Post" in 1876-82, and dramatic critic and city editor of the New York "Commercial Advertiser" in 1882. He has published "American Painters (New York, 1879); "The Story of the Volunteer Fire Department of the City of New York" (1882); "Hours with Art and Artists" (1882); "Artistic Homes" (1882); "Artistic Country - Seats" (1886); "Selections in Modern Art" (1886); and "Recent Ideals of American Art" (1888).

SHELTON, Lionel Allen, soldier, b. in Otsego county, N. Y., 30 Aug., 1829. He was brought up on a farm in Ohio, educated at Oberlin, taught for several years, and after attending the law-school in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., was admitted to the bar in 1851, and settled in Elyria, Ohio. He served one term as judge of probate, supported John C. Fremont for president, and was chairman of the Philadelphia Republican convention in 1856, was commissioned brigadier-general of militia in 1860, and actively engaged in raising recruits for the National army at the beginning of the civil war. He became captain of cavalry in August, 1861, was chosen major soon afterward in the 2d Ohio cavalry, transferred as lieutenant-colonel to the 42d Ohio infantry, became colonel in 1863, and commanded the latter regiment in West Virginia, Kentucky, and eastern Tennessee. In November of that year, when his regiment was placed under Gen. William T. Sherman at Memphis, he commanded a brigade which participated in the battles of Chickasaw Bayou and Arkansas Post. He led a brigade in the 13th army corps in 1863, was wounded at the battle of Fort Gibson, became colonel in 1863, and commanded the Vicksburg and in subsequent skirmishes. In March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. After the war he settled in New Orleans, La., practiced his profession, and in 1869-75 was in congress, having been elected as a Republican. During this service he was chairman of the committee on militia. He was appointed governor of New Mexico in 1881, served till 1885, and was receiver of the Texas and Pacific railway in 1885-7.

SHELLABARGER, Samuel, b. in Clark county, Ohio, 10 Dec., 1817; d. 6 Aug., 1896. He was graduated at Miami in 1832, studied law under Gen. Sumon Mason, was admitted to the bar in 1847, was a member of the first legislature in Ohio that met under the present constitution, and in 1869 was elected to congress as a Republican. He took his seat in the special session that met in accordance with President Lincoln's call, on 4 July, 1861, and served as representative from 1863, in 1865-6, and in 1870-2. He was chairman of the committee on commerce, that on charges by Frey against Rebecca Cookey, and that on the provost-marshall's livery, and was on the special committees on the assassination of President Lincoln, civil service, and the New Orleans riots. He was U. S. minister to Portugal in 1869-70, and in 1874-5 was one of the civil service commission. He then resumed the practice of his profession in Washington, D. C.

SHELTON, Frederick William, author, b. in Jamaica, Long Island, N. Y., in 1814; d. in Carthage Landing, N. Y., 29 June, 1881. He was graduated at Princeton in 1834, studied for the ministry, and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1847. He was rector of the church in Hunt-ington, L. I., for several years, also of the church in Fishkill, N. Y., and in 1884 accepted a call to Montgomery, Va. About ten years later he removed to Carthage Landing, N. Y., and devoted himself chiefly to author-ship. Mr. Shelton's publications were "The Trollopian, or Travelling Gentleman in America," a satirical poem (New York, 1837); "Salander and the Dragon," a romance (1851); "The Rector of St. Randolph's, or Superannuated" (1853); "Up the River," a series of rural sketches on the Hudson (1853); "Chrys-talline, or the Heiress of Fall~Down Castle," a romance (1853); and "Peeps from a Hitory or Parish Sketch-Book" (1855). He also published several lectures on popular topics, and was a frequent contributor to the "Knickerbocker Magazine" and other periodicals. To the former he contributed a series of local humorous sketches, beginning with "The Knishow Property, a Tale of Cromwell in 1848," followed by "The Tannecum Papers," and including criticisms of Charles Lamb, Vincent Bourne, and other authors. Two of his lectures are entitled "The Gold Mania" and "The Use and Abuse of Reason." Mr. Shelton was the intimate friend of William Wilson, the poet-publisher, Gulian C. Verplanck, Frederic S. Cozens, and other literary men. With the above-named writers he was a contributor to the "Knicker-booker Galley," including the benefit anonymous article. Gaylord Clark (g.e.) after his retirement from the editorship of the "Knickerbocker Magazine."

SHELTON, William, clergyman, b. in Fairfield, Conn., 11 Sept., 1798; d. there, 11 Oct., 1883. He was the son of Rev. Philo Shelton (1734-1825), the first clergyman ordained by a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States. He was graduated at the General theological seminary in New York city in 1823, was ordained deacon by Bishop Brownell, and priest in 1826 by the same bishop. He officiated for a time at Paltzberg, New York, and in Fairfield, Conn. In 1829 he accepted the rectoryship of St.
Paul's church, Buffalo, N. Y., where he served for fifty years, and then became rector emeritus. His death occurred while he was on a visit to his native place. Dr. Shelton published no contributions to church literature, but devoted himself wholly to his pastoral work and to his share in the work of the church large.

SHEPARD, Charles Upham, mineralogist, b. in Little Compton, R. I., 29 June, 1804; d. in Charleston, S. C., 1 May, 1886. He was graduated at Amherst in 1824, and spent a year in Cambridge, Mass., studying botany and mineralogy with Thomas Nuttall, and at the same time gave instruction in these branches in Boston. The study of mineralogy led to his preparation of papers on that subject which he sent to the "American Journal of Science," and in this manner he became acquainted with the elder Silliman. He was invited in 1827 to become Prof. Silliman's assistant, and continued so until 1831. Meanwhile for a year he was curator of Franklin Hall, an institution that was established by the merchants of New London, Conn., for popular lectures on scientific subjects to mechanics. In 1839 he was appointed lecturer on natural history at Yale, and held that place until 1847. He was associated with Prof.
Silliman in the scientific examination of the culture and manufacture of sugar that was undertaken by the latter at the special request of the secretary of the treasury; and the states of Florida, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia, were assigned to him to report upon. From 1834 till 1861 he filled the chair of chemistry in the Medical college of the state of South Carolina, which he relinquished at the beginning of the civil war, but in 1865, upon the urgent invitation of his former colleagues, he resumed his duties for a few years. While in Charleston he discovered rich deposits of phosphate of lime in the immediate vicinity of that city. Their great value in agriculture and subsequent use in the manufacture of superphosphate fertilizers proved an important addition to the chemical industries of South Carolina. In 1845 he was chosen professor of chemistry and natural history in Amherst, which chair was created for him by the board of trustees. He resumed the lectures on natural history until 1877, when he was made professor emeritus. He was associated in 1855 with Dr. James G. Percival in the geological survey of Connect-

SHEPARD, Charles Upham, chemist, b. in New Haven, Conn., 4 Oct., 1812, was graduated at Yale in 1835, and at the University of Göttingen in 1841, with the degree of M. D. On his return he was appointed to a professor-ship in mineralogy in the college of the state of South Carolina, which he held until 1863, and since that time he has devoted himself entirely to the practice of analytical chemistry. Dr. Shepard has been active in developing the chemical resources of South Carolina, and has paid special attention to the nature and composition of the phosphate deposits of that state. In 1867 he performed the second casting of minerals that was left by his father, numbering more than 15,000 specimens, to the collections at Amherst, and his cabinet of representatives of more than 200 different meteorites has been deposited in the U. S. national museum in Washington, D. C. He is a member of scientific societies and has contributed to the literature of chemistry.

SHEPARD, Elliott Fitch, lawyer, b. in Jamestown, N. Y., 25 July, 1822; d. 24 March, 1893. He was educated at the University of the city of New York, admitted to the bar in 1848, and for many years practised in New York. In 1861 and 1862 he was aide-de-camp to the staff of Gen. Edwin D. Morgan, was in command of the depot of volunteers at Elmina, Wisconsin, was engaged in organizing, equipping, and forwarding to the field nearly 50,000 troops. He was instrumental in raising the 51st New York regiment, which was named for him the Shepard rifles. He was the founder of the New York state bar association in 1876, which has formed the model for the organization of similar associations in other states. In March, 1888, he purchased the New York "Mail and Express.

SHEPARD, Isaac Fitzgerald, soldier, b. in Natick, Mass., 7 July, 1816; d. 23 Aug., 1889. He was graduated at Harvard in 1832, was principal of a Boston grammar-school in 1843-57, and served in the legislature in 1856-60. He became lieutenant-governor, and served as a delegate to Congress. Gen. Nathaniel Lyman in 1861, colonel of the 3d Missouri infantry in 1862, and in 1863 colonel of the 1st regiment of Mississippi colored troops, commanding all the colored troops in the Mississippi valley. On 27 Oct., 1863, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. He was adjutant-general of Missouri, and in 1870-71 appointed commander of the 1st U. S. Regiment of Mississippi volunteers. On 14 Feb., 1871, he was commissioned major, and on 26 Mar., 1871, was promoted to the rank of colonel. He was at the head of a large force of volunteers, consisting of the 1st U. S. Regiment of Mississippi infantry and the 1st U. S. Regiment of Mississippi colored troops, when he was ordered to report to Gen. Nathaniel Lyon at St. Louis, Mo., on 14 May, 1861, and on 15 May, 1861, was appointed major-general of volunteers. He was adjutant-general of Missouri, and in 1870-71 appointed to the command of the 1st U. S. Regiment of Mississippi volunteers. On 14 Feb., 1871, he was commissioned major, and on 26 Mar., 1871, was promoted to the rank of colonel. He was at the head of a large force of volunteers, consisting of the 1st U. S. Regiment of Mississippi infantry and the 1st U. S. Regiment of Mississippi colored troops, when he was ordered to report to Gen. Nathaniel Lyon at St. Louis, Mo., on 14 May, 1861, and on 15 May, 1861, was appointed major-general of volunteers.
He edited the Boston "Daily Rec" in 1846-7, the "Missouri Democrat," in 1858-9, the "Missouri State Atlas" in 1857-2, and had published "Pebbles from Castilian," poems (Boston, 1830); "Poetry of Feeling" (1844); "Scenes and Songs of Social Life" (1846); "Household Tales" (1861); and several single poems and orations.

SHEPARD, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Salisbury, Mass., 22 June, 1759; d. in Westfield, Mass., 14 Nov., 1835. He was the sixth of sixteen he removed to New Hampshire, and after studying medicine settled in Brentwood, where he soon won reputation in his profession. In 1770 he united with a Baptist church, and in 1771 he was ordained to the ministry. He preached through a wide extent of country, and in his double office of minister and physician looked after the cure of both soul and body. While pastor of the church at Brentwood he had the oversight of several other churches that were branches of this central body. He was thus a sort of Baptist diocesan bishop. No man in the history of his denomination in New Hampshire was better known in his day. He published several tracts, chiefly relating to baptism.

SHEPARD, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Townes- ter, Mass., 16 May, 1804; d. in Westfield, Mass., 25 Aug., 1849. He was graduated at Cambridge, 1827, ordained in the established church, and in 1830 silenced for non-conformity. He was subsequently tutor and chaplain in the family of Sir Richard Darby, whose cousin he married. He was silenced again in 1833, and in October, 1835, sailed for this country, settled in Boston, and from that time till his death, was pastor of the church in Cambridge, succeeding Thomas Hooker. He soon became involved in the Antinomian controversy, actively opposed the innovators, and was a member of the synod that silenced them. His second wife, Joanna, whom he married in 1837, was the daughter of Thomas Hooker. He was active in founding Harvard, and instrumental in placing it at Cambridge. Nathaniel Morton, the historian, says of him: "By his death not only the church and people of Cambridge, but all New England, suffered a great loss." By his third wife, Margaret Borodale, he was the ancestor of President John Q. Adams. He was a vigorous and popular writer on theological subjects, and published New England's Lamentations for Old England; or London in 1660. A Selection of the Gospel Breaking out on the Indians of New England" (1648; New York, 1865); "Theses Sabatianae." (1849); and left in manuscript numerous sermons that were subsequently printed in England. These include "Submission to Christ," with a memoir of him by Samuel Mather and William Greenhill (London, 1680); and "A History of the Presbyterians in Scotland" (1690; new ed. Aberdeen, 1838). His autobiography was published (Cambridge, Mass., 1829), and his collected works, with a memoir of him by Rev. Horatio Alger (3 vols., Boston, 1853). Cotton Mather also wrote his memoir in the "Magnum," and in his "Lives of the Chief Fathers of New England."—His son, Thomas, clergyman, b. in London, England, 5 April, 1805; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 22 Dec., 1867, was graduated at Harvard in 1835, and from 1838 till his death was assistant pastor of the Cambridge church. He published an election sermon (1872), and edited a volume of miscellaneous sermons (1873).

SHEPHERD, William, soldier, b. near Boston, Mass., 1 Dec., 1757; d. in Westfield, Mass., 14 Nov., 1817. He enlisted in the police in 1775, at the age of fourteen years, served in 1775-83, was a captain under Sir Jeffrey Amherst, and participated in the battles of Fort William and Crown Point. He became colonel of the 4th Massachusetts regiment in 1777, and served till 1783, participating in twenty-two engagements, and winning a reputation for efficiency and courage. He settled on a farm in Medway, Mass., after the peace, was a member of the executive council in 1788-90, a brigade-general of militia, and in that capacity during June and July of 1786 prevented thousands of insurgents from seizing the Springfield Arsenal. He was subsequently major-general of militia, and in Congress in 1797-1803.

SHEPHERD, Nathaniel Graham, author, b. in New York city in 1853; d. there, 23 May, 1893. He studied art in New York, taught drawing in Georgia for several years, returned to his native city, and engaged in the insurance business, devoting his leisure to study and to writing poems. At the beginning of the civil war he became a war correspondent for the New York "Tribune." He contributed largely to periodicals and journals, and was the author of "The Dead Drummer-Boy," "The Roll-Cal1," "A Summer Reminiscence," and other poems, which were widely circulated.

SHEPHERD, Oliver Lathrop, speaker, b. in Clifton, N. Y., 15 Aug., 1837; d. in Westfield, Mass., 16 April, 1894. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and assigned brevet 2d lieutenant, 4th infantry, was promoted 3d lieutenant, 3d infantry, on 2 Oct., 1840, served in the Seminole war, and became 1st lieutenant in the 3d infantry, 3 Nov., 1845. In 1846 he was selected by Gen. Zachary Taylor as commissioner of the supply train in its march from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, and served in the war with Mexico, receiving the brevet of captain for gallant and meritorious conduct at Contreras and Churubusco, and that of major for Chapultepec. He was appointed captain on 1 Dec., 1847, served on the frontier, and commanded Fort Defiance, New Mexico, which he defended with three companies against a night attack of the Navajo Indians, with about 2,500 braves on 80 April, 1849, and was afterward stationed at Fort Hamilton, N. Y. He then commanded a battalion of the 3d infantry in the defense of Washington, became lieutenant-colonel of the 18th infantry, 14 May, 1861, served in the Tennessee and Mississippi campaign in the Army of the Ohio, and was engaged in the pursuit of Maj. Gen. Price's retreat from Corinth, 30-31 May, 1862, receiving the brevet of color for service during the siege of Corinth, 17 May, 1862. He participated in Gen. Don. Carlos Buell's movement through Alabama and Tennessee to Louisville, Ky., in July and September, and also in Gen. William S. Rosecrans' Tennessee campaign, serving with the Army of the Cumberland from November, 1862, till April, 1863, and commanded a brigade of regular troops from 31 Dec., 1862, till 3 Jan., 1863. He became colonel of the 15th infantry on 21 Jan., 1863, and was brevetted brigadier-general on 13 March, 1865, for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Stone River, Tennessee, and from 7 May, 1863, till 13 Feb., 1866, he was superintendent of the regimental recruiting service of the State of Kentucky to December, 1865. He was brevetted major general for service during the Reconstruction of that state in 1868, in which he performed an important part, and was also a commissioner of the Freedmen's bureau for Alabama. Consolidating the 15th and 53d infantries, he marched them to New Mexico in 1869. He was repeatedly brevetted to the rank of major general.

was placed of governor of Maine. He graduated in 1811, studied law at South Berwick, was admitted to the bar in 1814, and began to practise in Saco. He was a member of the legislature in 1819, a delegate to the convention that framed the constitution of Maine in 1820, and U. S. district attorney for that state from 1821 till 1833. He had removed to Portland about 1821. He was elected a U. S. senator as a Democrat, serving the term from 1833 to 3 March, 1836, when he resigned, having been chosen a justice of the supreme court of Maine, of which he was chief justice from 1849 until 1855. In 1856 he was appointed sole commissioner to revise the statutes of Maine. He received the degree of LL. D. from Waterville (now Colby University, in 1842, and from Dartmouth in 1843. While serving on the bench he furnished the materials for twenty-six volumes of reports, and published "The Revised Statutes of Maine" (Hallowell, 1852), and "Speech in Congress on the Removal of the Deposits," in which he vindicated the course of President Jackson (1857).—Ether's son. George Forster, soldier, b. in Saco, Me., 1 Jan., 1819; d. in Portland, Me., 20 July, 1878, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1837, and, after studying law at Harvard, began practice in Bangor, Me., in 1840, but in 1844 removed to Portland. From 1853 till 1861 he was U. S. district attorney for Maine, during which period he had drawn important cases in the U. S. supreme court. In 1860 he was a delegate at large to the National Democratic convention in Charleston, and attended its adjourned session in Baltimore. He was commissioned colonel of the 12th Maine volunteers at the beginning of the civil war, and participated in Gen. Benjamin F. Butler's expedition against New Orleans, commanding as acting brigadier-general a brigade at Ship Island, and at the capture of New Orleans he led the 3d brigade, Army of the Gulf. On the occupation of that city he was appointed military commanding and acting mayor, and assigned to the command of its defenses, resigning in June, 1862, when he was appointed military governor of Louisiana, serving until 1864. On 18 July, 1862, he was made brigadier-general of volunteers. After the inauguration of a civil governor of Louisiana, Gen. Shepley was placed in command of the military district of eastern Virginia, became chief of staff to Gen. Godefroy Weitzel, and for a short time during the absence of that officer commanded the 25th army corps. He continued with the Army of the James to the end of the war, entered Richmond on 3 April, 1865, and was appointed the first military governor of that city. Resigning his commission on 1 July, 1865, he declined the appointment of associate judge of the supreme court of Maine, but in 1869 accepted that of U. S. circuit judge for the first circuit of Maine, which office he held until his death. Dartmouth gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1878. His decisions are reported in Jabez S. Holmes's "Reports" (Boston, 1877).

ton, S. J., 1821. After graduation at Princeton in 1845 he studied law, and in 1848 was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia, where he had since practised. He was district attorney in 1868-71, and again in 1874-7. In the latter term he gave special attention to the prompt despatch of criminal cases during the Centennial exhibition of 1876. By establishing a magisterial court's court under the private act of 1875, he succeeded in having offenders arrested, indicted, tried, and sentenced within a few hours after the commission of the offence. This rapid proceeding was popularly designated "Sheppard's railroad," and it entirely broke up the preparations of the criminal class of the country for paying upon the thousands of daily visitors to the exhibition. For several years he had been a trustee of Jefferson medical college, a member of the American philosophical society, and an inspector of the Eastern state penitentiary in Philadelphia. Mr. Sheppard was the author of "The Constitutional Text-Book: a Practical and Familiar Exposition of the Constitution of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1855), and an abridged and modified edition of the same, entitled "The First Book of the Constitution" (1861). He had also contributed to the "Vocabulary of the Philosophical Sciences," edited by Prof. Charles P. Krauth, D. D.

SHEPPARD, John Hannibal, author, b. in Grocester, Gloucestershire, England, 17 March, 1789; d. in Boston, Mass., 25 June, 1878. In 1793 his parents settled in Harwich, Mass., but in 1805 they removed to Harvard, which he left in his junior year, but in 1867 the university placed his name among the graduates of 1808. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and practised in Wiscasset, Me. From 1817 till 1834 he was registrar of probate for Lincoln county, and in 1842 he settled in Boston, Mass. He was an early and efficient member of the New England historico-geographical society, its librarian in 1801-9, and contributed to its "Register." The degree of A. M. was given to him by Bowdoin in 1830, and by Harvard in 1871. In addition to several masonic and antiquarian addresses, he was the author of occasional poems, of "Reminiscences of the Vaughan Family" (Boston, 1869), and "The Life and Times of Commodore in the American Revolution" (1898).

SHEPPARD, Moses, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1771; d. in Baltimore, Md., 1 Feb., 1857. He was early thrown upon his own resources, owing to the forfeiture of the property of his father, Nathan Sheppard, who adhered to the mother country during the Revolutionary war, and entered the employ of John Mitchell as a clerk. In a few years he was made partner, and after the death of Mr. Mitchell conducted the business alone, from which he retired in 1832. Mr. Sheppard took an active interest in the question of American slavery, in common with the Society of Friends, of which he was a member, and added with counsel and money the American colonization society. He proved skilled at the art of Dr. Brutus Reed and other colored men that became eminent in Liberia, and his influence prevented the passing of a law to banish free negroes from Maryland. His fortune was bequeathed to found the Sheppard asylum for the insane in Baltimore. — His grandson, Nathan, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., 9 Nov., 1844; d. in New York city, 29 Jan., 1888, was lecturer in French, German, and Italian. He was also a special American correspondent of the London "Times," and a contributor to "Fraser's Magazine" and "Temple Bar." In 1873 he became lecturer on modern English literature, and teacher of rhetoric, at the University of Chicago, and four years later he accepted a similar charge at Alleghany college. He spent four years in Europe, and lecture on subjects of English literature at Oxford and Cambridge, and in 1879 delivered a course before the Edinburgh philosophical society and on "Public Speaking" before the Universities of Aberdeen and St. Andrew's, Scotland, which has been issued as "Before an Audience" (New York, 1886). In 1884 he settled in Saratoga Springs, founded the Saratoga Athenaeum, and was its president until his death. He also compiled and edited "The Dickens Reader" (1881); "Character Readings from George Eliot" (1883); "The Essays of George Eliot," with an introduction (1883); "Darwinism Stated by Darwin Himself" (1884); and "Saratoga Chips and Carlsbad Wafers" (1887).

SHERATON, James Paterson, Canadian clergyman, b. in St. John, New Brunswick, 29 Nov., 1841. After graduation at the University of New Brunswick in 1862 he studied theology in the University of King's college, Windsor, Nova Scotia, took orders in the Church of England in 1864—5, and became rector of Shediac, New Brunswick, in 1865, and of Picton, Nova Scotia, in 1874. In 1877 he became principal and professor of exegetical and systematic theology in Wycliffe college, Toronto. He was rector of St. Paul's church, the principal of the academy of King's college, and a member of the senate of the University of Toronto in 1885. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Queen's university, Ontario, in 1882. He was editor of "The Evangelical Churchman" from 1877 till 1882, and since that date has been its principal editorial contributor, and he is the author of essays on education, the church, and Christian unity. He was a British soldier, b. about 1764; d. in Claverton, Nottinghamshire, England, 14 Feb., 1830. He entered the British army, in which he became captain in 1783, lieutenant-colonel in 1794, colonel in 1798, lieutenant-general in 1811, and colonel of the 33d regiment in 1818. He served with credit in the taking of Seringapatam in 1799, and in 1809 was appointed master of the artillery in the Duke of Wellington, being second in command at the battle of Talavera, 27—28 July, 1809. For his conduct there he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, and in 1816 he was transferred to the governorship of Lower Canada. At this time the farmers had suffered from the total loss of their wheat crop, and he advanced for their relief £11,210, which partition augmented by the additional sum of £35,500. During his administration he collected the admission of the speaker of the assembly, ceased a Baptist clergyman, and resigned his office in 1818, returned to England, and was made general in May, 1827.

SHERBURN, Andrew, soldier, b. in Roc, N. H., 30 Sept., 1765; d. in Augusta, Oneida co., N. Y., in 1831. He sailed before the mast at an early age, was shipwrecked, captured by the British, confined in the Old Mill prison in England, and afterward was pensioned for his services in the navy during the Revolution, and wrote his own "Memoirs" (Uiten, 1828; 2d ed., Providence, 1831).

SHERBURN, John Samuel, jurist, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1557; d. there, 2 Aug., 1830. After graduation at Dartmouth in 1766 he studied law at Harvard, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise in Portsmouth. He served as a brigade major on the staff of Gen. William Whipple, and lost a leg at the battle of Bluts Hill, R. I., 29 Aug., 1778. He was elected a representative to congress from New Hampshire, serving from 2 Dec., 1783, till 3 March, 1787, and was subsequently appointed by President Jefferson U. S. district attorney for New Hampshire, serving from 28 Nov., 1787, till 1820. He was a U. S. judge for the district of New Hampshire—his son, John Henry, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1704; d. in Europe about 1850, entered Phillips Exeter academy in 1869. In 1823 he became register of the navy department in Washington, D. C., and for several years was foreign correspondent for the Philadelphia "Saturday Courier." He published "Oedipus," a tragedy: "Erratic Poems": a "Life of John Paul Jones" (Washington, 1825): "Naval Sketches" (Philadelphia, 1845): "The Tourist's Guide in Europe, or Peningsell in England and on the Continent": and "Suppressed History of the Administration of John Adams, 1797—1801," as printed and suppressed by John Wood in 1802 (1846).—His son, John Henry (1814—1849), was a U. S. naval officer and served in the Mexican war.

SHERIDAN, Philip Henry, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., 6 March, 1834; d. in Nonquitt, Mass., 5 Aug., 1888. After attending the public school he was entered as a cadet in the United States military academy, 1 July, 1848. On account of a quarrel with a cadet file-closer in 1850, whose conduct toward him he observed, he was suspended from the academy for a year, but returned, and was graduated, 1 July, 1853, standing thirty-fourth in a class of fifty-two, of which James B. McPherson was at the head. Gen. John M. Schofield and the Confederate Gen. John B. Hood were also his classmates. On the day of his graduation he was appointed a brevet 2d lieutenant in the 1st infantry. In 1854, while on the coast of Washington and Oregon, he was made 2d lieutenant in the 4th infantry, 22 Nov., 1854, 1st lieutenant, 1 March, 1861, and captain in the 13th infantry, 14 May, 1861. In December of that year he was chief quartermaster and commissary of the army in southwestern Missouri. In the Mississippi campaign from April to September, 1862, he was quartermaster general of the army, and in the advance upon Corinth, it then became manifest that his true place was in the field. On 29 May, 1862, he was appointed colonel of the 2d Michigan cavalry, and on 1 July was sent to make a raid on Boonville, Miss. He did excellent service in the pursuit of the enemy from Corinth to Baldin, and in many skirmishes during July, and at the battle of Boonville.
In reward for his skill and courage he was appointed, July 1, a brigadier-general of volunteers, and on 1 Oct. was placed in command of the 11th division of the Army of the Ohio, in which capacity he took part in the successful battle of Perryville, on 8 Oct., between the armies of Gen. Buell and Gen. Bragg, at the close of which the latter retreated from Kentucky. In this action Sheridan was principally distinguished. When after he had driven back McCook's corps and were pressing upon the exposed left flank of Gilbert, Sheridan, with Gen. Robert B. Mitchell, arrested the tide, and, driving them back through Perryville, re-established the broken line. His force marched with the army to the relief of Nashville in October and November. He was then placed in command of a division in the Army of the Cumberland, and took part in the two days' battle of Stone River (or Murfreesboro), 31 Dec., 1862, and 3 Jan., 1863. Russell had been relieved from the command of the army on 30 Oct., and Rosecrans promoted in his place. The Confederate army was still under Bragg. The left of Rosecrans was strong, and his right weak. Sheridan was ordered to advance and drive the enemy to hold its ground while the left should cross the river. The project of Bragg, well-conceived, was to crush the National right, and he almost succeeded. Division after division was driven back until Chantall attacked him in front, while Cleburne essayed to turn his flank, and Sheridan was reached; the fate of the day seemed to lie in his hands. He resisted vigorously; his troops advanced and drove the enemy back, changing front to the south (a daring movement in battle), held the overwhelming force in check, and retired only at the point of the bayonet. This brilliant feat of arms enabled Rosecrans to form a new line in harmony with his overpowered right. Sheridan said laconically to Rosecrans, when they met on the field, pointing to the wreck of his division, which had lost 1,630 men: "Here are all that are left." After two days of indecision and desultory attempts, Bragg abandoned Murfreesboro and fell back to Tullahoma, while Rosecrans waited for a rest at that place.

Sheridan's military ability had been at once recognized and acknowledged by all, and he was appointed a major-general of volunteers, to date from 31 Dec., 1862, to 18 May, 1863. He marched to Van Dorn to Columbus and Franklin during March, and captured a train and many prisoners at Englewood. He was with the advance to Tullahoma from 24 June to 4 July, 1863, taking part in the capture of Winchester, Tenn., on 27 June. He was with the army in the crossing of the Cumberland mountains and of the Tennessee river from 15 Aug. to 4 Sept., and in the severe battle of the Chickamauga, on 19 and 20 Sept. Bragg manœuvred to turn the left and cut Rosecrans off from Chattanooga, but was foiled by Thomas, who held Roseville road with an iron grip. During the battle there was a misconception of orders, which left a gap in the centre of the line which the enemy took advantage of. The right being thus thrown out of the fight, the centre was greatly imperilled. For some time the battle seemed irrecoverably lost, but Thomas, since called "the Rock of Chickamauga," held firm: Sheridan rallied many soldiers of the retiring right, and joined Thomas; and, in spite of the fierce and repeated attacks, the line was not lost. It was not until this point was re-established that the enemy retired upon Roseville, being afterward withdrawn within the defences of Chattanooga, whither Mc Coe, Crittenden, and Rosecrans had gone. Rosecrans was superseded by Thomas, to whom was presented a problem apparently inscrutable of solution. He was ordered to hold the place to the point of starvation, and he said he would. The enemy had possession of the approaches by land and water, men and animals were starved, and forage and provisions had to be hauled over a long and exceedingly difficult wagon-road of seventy-five miles.

Gen. Grant was then invested with the command of all the troops then obtained in the new military division of the Mississippi, encompassing the departments of the Ohio, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee. He reached Chattanooga on 23 Oct., and the condition of affairs was suddenly changed. He ordered the troops relieved by the capture of Vicksburg to join him, and Sherman came with his corps. Sheridan was engaged in all the operations around Chattanooga, under the immediate command and personal observations of Gen. Grant, who played an important part in the battle of Mission Ridge. From the centre of the National line he led the troops of his division from Orchard Knob, and, after carrying the intrenchments and rifle-pits at the foot of the mountain, instead of using his guns in a direct attack, he moved his division forward to the top of the ridge and drove the enemy across the summit and down the opposite slope. In this action he first attracted the marked attention of Gen. Grant, who saw that he might be one of his most useful lieutenants in the future—a man with whom to try its difficult and delicate problems. A horse was shot under him in this action, but he pushed on in the pursuit to Mission Rolls, with other portions of the army of Thomas harrying the rear of the enemy. For Bragg, having abandoned all his positions on Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga Valley, and Missionary Ridge, was in rapid retreat toward Dalton.

After further operations connected with the occupation of east Tennessee, Sheridan was transferred by Grant to Virginia, where, on 4 April, 1864, he was placed in command of the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac, all the cavalry being consolidated to form that command. Here he seemed in his element: to the instincts and talents of a general he joined the fearless dash of a dragoon. Entering with Grant upon the overland campaign, he took part in the bloody battle of the Wilderness, 5 May, 1864. On that day many batteries of the enemy, or on the wings, he was engaged in raids, threatening the Confederate flanks and rear. His fight at Todd's Tavern, 7 May, was an important aid to the movement of the army; his capture of Spotsylvania Court-House, 8 May, added to his reputation for timely dash and daring; but more astonishing was his great raid from the 9th to the 24th of May. He cut the Virginia Central and the Richmond and Fredericksburg railroads, and made his appearance in good condition near Chaffield station on 25 May. In this raid, having under him kindred spirits in Merritt, Custer, Wilson, and Gregg, he first made a descent upon Beaver Dam on 10 May, where he destroyed a locomotive and a train, and captured about 400 men who had been made prisoners. At Yellow Tavern, on 11 May, he encountered the Confederate cavalry under J. E. B. Stuart, who was killed in the engagement. He next moved upon the outer defences of Richmond, rebuilt Meadow's bridge, went to Bottom's bridge, and reached Haxall's on 14 May. He returned by Hanover and Totopotomy creek, having done much damage behind lines and strong positions, and had won great renown with little loss. He led the advance to Cold Harbor, crossing the Pamunkey at Hanoverontown on 25 May, fought the cavalry battle of Hanover's Shop on the 28th, and held Cold Harbor until Gen. William F. Smith came up with the 6th corps to occupy the place. The bloody battle of Cold Harbor was fought on 26, 27, May and 3 June. Setting out on 7 June, Sheridan made a raid toward Charlottesville, where he expected to meet the National force under Gen. Hunter. This movement, it was thought, would force Lee to detach his cavalry. Unexpectedly, however, Hunter made a detour to Lynchburg, and Sheridan, unable to join him, returned to his point on the James river. After again cutting the Virginia Central and Richmond and Fredericksburg railroads and capturing 500 prisoners, he rejoined for a brief space the Army of the Potomac. In quick succession came the cavalry actions of Treveillian station, fought between Wade Hampton and Torbert, 11 and 12 June, and Tunstall station, 21 June, in which the movements were foiled to cover the railroad-crossings of the Chickahominy and the James. There was also a cavalry affair of a similar nature at St. Mary's church on 24 June. Pressed by Grant, Lee fell back on 28 July, 1864.

The vigor, judgment, and dash of Sheridan had now marked him in the eyes of Grant as fit for a far more important station. Early in August, 1864, he was placed in command of the Army of the Shenandoah, formed in part from the army of Hunter also retreated from the command, and from that time till the end of the war Sheridan seems never to have encountered a military problem too difficult for his solution. His new army consisted at first of the 6th corps, two divisions of the 8th, and two cavalry divisions, commanded by Gen. Torbert and Wilson, which he took with him from the army of Hunter. Four days later, 7 Aug., the scope of his command was constituted the Middle Military Division. He had an arduous and difficult task before him to clear the enemy out of the valley of Virginia, break up his magazines, and relieve Washington from chronic terror. Sheridan grasped the situation at once. He posted his forces in front of Berryville, while the enemy under Early occupied the west bank of Opequon creek and covered Winchester. In his division, besides the 6th corps under Wright and the 9th under Crook, Sheridan had received the addition of the 19th, commanded by Emory. Torbert was placed in command of all the cavalry, having great confidence in Sheridan, Grant yet acted with proper caution before giving him the first decisive blow. He ordered Maj. Gen. Ord to Harper's Ferry to meet Sheridan, and told him he must not move till Lee had withdrawn a portion of the Confederate force in the valley. As soon as that was done he gave Sheridan the lasonic direction, "Go in." He says in his report: "He was off promptly on time, and I may add that I have never since deemed it necessary to order cavalry for such a duty ever again." On the morning of 19 Sept., Sheridan attacked Early at the crossing of the Opequon, caught him all day, drove him through Winchester, and sent him "whirling up the valley," having captured 5,000 prisoners and five guns. The enemy did not stop to reorganize until he had reached Fisher's Hill, thirty miles south of Winchester. Here Sheridan overtook him and disposed his divisions, drove him through Harrisonburg and Staunton, and in scattered portions through the passes of the Blue Ridge. For these successes he was made a brigadier-general in the regular army on 10 Sept. Returning leisurely to Strasburg, he posted his army for a brief repose behind Cedar creek, while Torbert was despatched on a raid to Staunton, with orders to devastate the country, so that, should the enemy return, he could find no subsistence, and this was effectually done. To clear the way for an advance, the enemy now sent "a new cavalry general," Thomas J. Rosser, down the valley; but he was soon driven back in confusion. Early's army, being re-enforced by a part of Longstreet's command, again moved forward with celerity and secrecy, and, turning the north fork of the Shenandoah, on 18 Oct., approached Rapidan, and unsuited, under a favor of fog and darkness, was driven by a column of Sheridan's left flank, which was formed by Crook's corps. When, on the early morning of the 19th, they leaped upon the surprised National force, there was an imme- diate retreat and the appearance of an appalling disaster. The 8th corps was rolled up, the exposed centre in turn gave way, and soon the whole army was in retreat. Sheridan had been absent in Washington, and at this juncture had just returned to Winchester, twenty miles from the field. Hearing the sound of the battle, he rode rapidly, and arrived on the field at ten o'clock. As he rode up he shouted to the retreating troops: "Face the other way, boys; we are going back! Many of the Confederates had left their ranks for plunder, and the attack was made upon their disorganized battalions, and was successful. A portion of their army, ignorant of the swiftly coming danger, was in fact, and had determined to give a finishing-blow to the disorganized National force. This was caught and hurled back by an attack in two columns with cavalry supports. The enemy's left was soon routed; the rest followed, never to return, and the valley was thus finally rendered impossible of occupancy by Confederate troops. They did not stop till they had reached Staunton, and pursuit was made as far as Mount Jackson. They had lost in the campaign 16,652 killed or wounded and 13,000 prisoners. Under orders from Grant, Sheridan devastated the valley. He has been censured for this, as if it were wanton destruction and cruelty. He destroyed the barns and the crops, mills, factories, farming-instruments, etc., and drove off all the cattle, sheep, and horses. But, as in similar cases, his government and the people must have been much suffering and some unrequired for rigor, this was necessary to destroy the resources of the enemy in the valley, by means of which they could continually menace Washington and Pennsylvania. The illustration is a representation of "Sheridan's Ride," a statuette, by James E. Kelly. The steel portrait is taken from a photograph made in 1884. The term of the president's order making Sheridan a major-general in the army were: "For personal gallantry, military skill, and just confidence in the courage and patriotism of his troops, displayed by Philip H. Sheridan on the 19th of October at Cedar Run, where, under the blessing of Providence, his routed army was reorganized, a great national disaster averted, and a brilliant victory achieved over the rebels for the third time in pitched battle within thirty days, Philip H. Sheri-
After the war Sheridan was in charge of the military division of the Gulf from 17 July to 15 Aug., 1866, which was then created the Department of the Gulf, and remained there until 11 March, 1867. From 12 Sept. to 16 March he was in command of the Department of the Missouri, with headquarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. Thence he conducted a winter campaign against the Indians of the Indian Territory, and in 1867 he took charge of the military division of the Mississippi, with headquarters at Chicago. When Gen. Usses S. Grant became president, 4 March, 1869, Gen. William T. Sherman was made general-in-chief and Sheridan was promoted to lieutenant-general, with the understanding that both these titles should disappear with the men holding them.

In 1870 Sheridan visited Europe to witness the conduct of the Franco-Prussian War. He was with the German staff during the battle of Gravelotte, and presented some judicious criticisms of the campaign. He commanded the western and southwestern military divisions in 1878. On the retirement of Sherman in 1883, the lieutenant-general became general-in-chief. In May, 1888, he became ill from exposure in the campaign against the Cheyennes and Sioux, and in recognition of his claims, a bill was passed by both houses of congress, and was promptly signed by President Cleveland, restoring to him and during his lifetime the full rank and emoluments of general. He was the nineteenth general-in-chief of the United States army. Sheridan never was defeated, and often placed victory out of the jaws of defeat. He was thorough commander, trusted, admired, and loved by his officers and men. He bore the nickname of "Lute Phil," a term of endearment due to his size, like the "petit corporal" of Napoleon I. He was below the middle height, but powerfully built, with a strong countenance indicative of valor and resolution. Trustful to a remarkable degree, modest and reticent, he was a model soldier and general, a good citizen in all the relations of public and private life, thoroughly deserving the esteem and admiration of all who knew him. In 1879 Sheridan married Miss Rucker, the daughter of Gen. Daniel H. Rucker, of the U. S. army. He was a Roman Catholic, and devoted to his duties as such. He was the author of "Personal Memoirs" (2 vols. New York, 1886-7).
SHERMAN, Henry, lawyer, b. in Albany, N. Y., June 6, 1808; d. in Washington, D. C., 28 March, 1879. After graduation at Yale in 1829 he studied theology and then law, returning in 1832 to Albany. He soon removed to New York city, and in 1850 to Hartford, Conn. and was employed in the U. S. treasury department in Washington from 1861 till 1865, when he resumed his law-practice in that city. He was a personal friend of President Lincoln, who on the morning before his assassination offered him the chief justiceship of New Mexico. He was afterward commissioned by President Johnson, but soon resigned. Mr. Sherman was the author of "An Analytical Digest of the Law of Marine Insurance to the Present Time" (New York, 1841); "The Governmental History of the United States of America" (1845); enlarged ed., Hartford, 1860; and "Slavery in the United States of America." (Hartford, 1838).

SHERMAN, John, clergyman, b. in Dedham, England, 26 Dec., 1613; d. in Watertown, Mass., 8 Aug., 1685. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was called a "College Puritan," came to New England in 1634, and preached in Watertown in the open air. After continuing for some time in Connecticut, he was chosen a magistrate of that colony. On 27 May, 1641, and from 1644 until his death, he was pastor of the Congregational church in Watertown, Mass. He was a fellow of Harvard, delivered lectures there for many years, and was a popular preacher and an eminent mathematician. In 1682 he delivered a discourse before the convention of Congregational ministers in Massachusetts, the first sermon on that occasion that is now upon record. He published several almanacs, to which he appended pious reflections.

SHERMAN, Roger, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Newton, Mass., 19 April, 1721; d. in New Haven, Conn., 23 July, 1793. His great-grandfather, Capt. John Sherman, came from England to Watertown, Mass., about 1635. His grandfather and father were farmers in moderate circumstances. In 1738 the family removed to Stonington, Mass., where he spent his boyhood and youth. He had no formal education, except what he acquired by his own unaided exertions, which was of the common schools, but by his own unaided exertions, which was of the various branches of learning, especially mathematics, law, and politics. He was early apprenticed to a shoemaker, and continued in that occupation until he was twenty-two years of age. It is said that while at work on his bench he was accustomed to have before him an open book, so that he could devote every spare minute to study. At the age of nineteen he lost his father, and the principal care and support of a large family thus devolved upon him, with the charge of a small farm. In 1748 he removed with his family to New Milford, Conn., performing the journey on foot and taking his shoemaker's tools with him. Here, in partnership with his brother, he engaged in mercantile business. In 1745 he was appointed surveyor of lands for the county in which he resided, a post for which his early attention to mathematics qualified him. Not long afterward he furnished the astronomical calculations for an almanac that was published in New York, and he continued this service for several years. Meanwhile, encouraged by this step, he was elevated to the calling of a lawyer, and made such progress that he was admitted to the bar in 1754. In 1755 he was elected a representative of New Milford in the general assembly of Connecticut, and the same year he was appointed a justice of the peace. In 1759 he was made one of the judges of common pleas in Litchfield county. Two years later he removed to New Haven, where he made appointments to the corporation and his family, and in addition to this, he became treasurer of Yale college, from which, in 1765, he received the honorary degree of M. A. In 1766 he was appointed judge of the superior court of Connecticut, and in the same year was chosen a member of the upper house of the legislature. In the former office he continued twenty-three years, and in the latter, nineteen. When Washington was inaugurated, Roger Sherman devoted himself unreservedly to the patriot cause. In such a crisis he was obliged to be a leader. In August, 1774, he was elected a delegate to the Continental congress, and was present at its opening on 5 Sept. following. Of this body he was one of the most active members. Without showing gifts of popular speech, he commanded respect for his knowledge, judgment, integrity, and devotion to duty. He served on many important committees, but the most decisive proof of the high esteem in which he was held is given in the fact that, with Adams, Franklin, Jefferson, and Livingston, he was appointed to prepare a draft of the Declaration of Independence, to which document he subsequently affixed his signature. Though a member of congress, he was at the same time in active service on the Connecticut committee of safety. In 1783 he was associated with Judge Richard Law in revising the statutes of the state, and in 1784 he was elected mayor of New Haven, which office he continued to hold until his death. He was chosen, in conjunction with Dr. Samuel Johnson and Oliver Ellsworth, a delegate to the convention of 1787 that was charged with the duty of framing a constitution for the United States. The extraordinary proof that exists that a number of the propositions that he offered were incorporated in that instrument. In the debates of the Constitutional convention he bore a conspicuous part. He was also a member of the State convention of Connecticut that ratified the constitution, and was very influential in securing that result. A series of papers that he wrote under the signature of "Citizen" powerfully contributed to the same end. Immediately after the ratification of the constitution he was made a representative of Connecticut in congress, and took an active part in the discussions of that body. In February, 1790, the Quakers having presented an address to the house on the subject of "the licentious wickedness of the African trade for slaves," Mr. Sherman supported its reference to a committee, and was successful in his efforts, though he was strongly opposed. He was promoted in 1791 to the senate, and died while holding this office. The career of Roger Sherman most happily illustrates the possibilities of American citizenship. Beginning life under the heaviest disadvantages, he rose to a career of usefulness, honor, and success. He was never removed from an office except by promotion or because of some legislative restriction. Thomas Jefferson spoke of him as "a man who never said a foolish thing"; and Nathaniel Macon declared that "he had more common sense than any man I have ever known." In early life he united with the Congregational church in Stornton, and through his long career he remained a devout and practical Christian. Mr. Sherman was twice married. His first wife was the daughter of William M. Evarts and George F. Hoar.—His nephew, Roger Minot, lawyer, b. in Woburn, Mass., 22 May, 1753; d. in Fairfield, Conn., 30 Dec., 1844, was graduated at Yale in 1792, and served as tutor there during 1795. He was admitted to the bar at Fairfield in 1796, was a member of the general assembly in 1798 and of the state senate in 1814-18, and of the Hartford convention of 1814. He was judge of the superior court and the supreme court of errors in 1840-2.

—Roger's grandson, John, clergyman, b. in New Haven, Conn., in 1752; d. in Trenton Falls, N. Y., 2 Aug., 1828, was graduated at Yale in 1793, became pastor of the 1st church at Mansfield, Conn., in 1797, and remained in this relation until 1805, when he removed from Mansfield to Dedham, Mass., where he held the pastorate of the church of Unitarian views. He was for a short time pastor of a Unitarian church at Trenton Falls, the first of that denomination that was organized in the state of New York. At this place he established and for several years conducted a flourishing academy. He was the author of a work entitled "One and Only People Only," which is said to have been the first elaborate defense of Unitarianism that appeared in New England (1825); also of "The Philosophy of Language illustrated" (1826): "Description of Trenton Falls" (1827); and of various minor publications.

SHERMAN, Thomas West, soldier, b. in Newport, R. 1., 26 March, 1817; d. there, 10 March, 1870. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1836, assigned to the 3d artillery, served in the Florida war until 1842, became 1st lieutenant on 14 March, 1838, and subsequently was employed in recruiting and garrison service until 1846. He became captain on 28 May, 1846, engaged in the war with Mexico, and was brevetted major for gallant and meritorious conduct at Buena Vista, 23 March. He commanded a division of garrison and frontier duty from 1848 till 1861, during which time he engaged in quelling the Kansas border disturbances, and commanded an expedition to Kettle lake, Dakota. On 27 April, 1861, he became major, and, until 10 May, 1861, commanded a battery of U. S. artillery and a battalion of Pennsylvania volunteers at Elkton, Md. From 21 May till 28 June he was chief of light artillery in the defence of Washington, D. C., having been made lieutenant-colonel, 5th artillery, on 14 May, and brigadier-general, U. S. volunteers, on 17 May, 1861. He organized an expedition for seizing and holding Bull's bay, S. C., and Fernandina, Fla., for the use of the blockading fleet on the southern coast, commanded the land forces of the Port Royal expedition from 21 Oct. till 31 March, 1862, and led a division of the Army of the Tennessee from 30 April till 1 June, 1862. He participated in the siege of Corinth, Miss., commanded a division in the Department of the Gulf from 18 Sept., 1862, till 9 Jan., 1863, and in the defence of New Orleans from 9 Jan. till 19 May, 1863, when he joined the movement toward his Hudson home, and commanded the 21st division of the 9th army corps, which formed the left wing of the besieging army. While leading a column to the assault on 27 May he lost his right leg, in consequence of which he was on leave of absence until 15 Feb., 1864. He was made colonel of the 3d artillery on 1 June, 1863. On his return to duty he was in command of a reserve brigade of artillery in the Department of the Gulf, of the defences of New Orleans, and of the southern and eastern districts of Louisiana. On 13 March, 1863, he was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for gallant services at the capture of Port Hudson, La. On 6 May, 1863, he was appointed general of volunteers and major-general, U. S. army, for meritorious services during the war. After the war he commanded the 3d artillery at Fort Adams, R. I., the Department of the East, and the post of Key West, Fla. He was retired from active service as major-general on 31 Dec., 1870, for disability.

SHERMAN, William Teenmeh, soldier, b. in Lancaster, Ohio, 8 Feb., 1820; d. in New York, 14 Feb., 1891. His branch of the family is traced to one who came to this country in 1634 with his brother, the Rev. John Sherman, and his cousin, Capt. John Sherman. Roger Sherman, signer of the Declaration of Independence, traces his lineage to the captain, and Gen. Sherman to that of the Rev. John, whose family settled in Woodbury and was long prominent in that town. He was born in Lancaster, Fairfield co., Ohio, in 1810. The father of Gen. Sherman was a lawyer, and for five years before his death in 1829 judge of the supreme court. His mother, who was married in 1810, was Mary Host. They had eleven children, of whom William was the sixth and John the eighth. William was adopted by Thomas Ewing, and attended school in Lancaster until 1836. In the fall of that year he was sent as a cadet to West Point, where he was graduated in 1840 sixth in a class of forty-two members. Among his class mates was George H. Thomas. As a cadet, he is remembered as an earnest, high-spirited, honorable, and outspoken youth, deeply impressed, according to one of his early letters, with the grave responsibility properly attaching to "serving the country." He also at that time expressed a wish to go to the far west, out of civilization. He was commissioned as a 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery, 1 July, 1840, and sent to Florida, where the embarks of the Indian war were still smouldering. On 30 Nov., 1841, he was made a 1st lieutenant, and commanded a small detachment of this regiment in the capture of Yerba Buena from the Mexicans. He was returned to the rolls of the 3d artillery at Monterey, Mobile Point, Ala., and later at Port Monttrie, Charleston harbor, where he indulged in hunting and society, the immediate vicinity of the fort being a summer resort for the people of Charleston. In 1843, on his return from a short leave, he began the study of law, not to make it a profession, but to render himself a more intelligent soldier. When the Mexican war began in 1846 he was sent with troops around Cape Horn to California, where he acted as adjutant-general to Gen. Stephen W. Kearny, Col. Mason, and Gen. Persifer E. Smith. Returning in 1850, on 1 May he married Miss Ellen Boyle Ewing, at Washington, her father, his old friend, then being secretary of the interior. He was appointed a captain in the commissary department, 2 Sept., 1850, and sent to St. Louis and New Orleans. He had already received a brevet of captain for service in California, to date from 30 May, 1848. Seeing little prospect of promotion and small opportunity for his talents in the army in times of peace, he resigned his commission, 6 Sept., 1855, the few graduates of West Point being at that period in debt and in many ways of civil life. He was immediately appointed (1853) manager of the branch bank of Lucas, Turner and Co., San Francisco, Cal. When the affairs of that establishment were wound up in 1857 he returned to St. Louis, and lived for a time in New York as agent for the St. Louis firm. In 1838-9 he was a counsel-at-law in Leavenworth, Kans., and in the next year he was superintendent of the State military academy at Alexandria, La., where he did good work; but when that state seceded from the Union he promptly resigned and returned to St. Louis, where he was for a short time president of the Fifth street railroad.

Of the civil war he took what were then considered extreme views. He regarded President Lincoln's call for 75,000 three-months' men on April 15, in connexion with a military matter, deploring the rise of the secessionists was not a mob but to be put down by the posse comitatus, but a war to be fought out by armies. On 13 May he was commissioned colonel of the 13th infantry, with instructions to report to Gen. Scott at Washington. That officer had matured a plan of campaign, and was about to put it into execution. Sherman was put in command of a brigade in Tyler's division of the army that marched to Bull Run. His brigade comprised the 53d, 69th, and 79th New York and the 21 Wiscons. regiments. The enemy's left had been fairly turned, and Sherman's brigade was hotly engaged, when the Confederates were re-enforced; the National troops made fatal delays, and, struck by pieces of the artillery, Sherman's brigade had lost 111 killed, 265 wounded, and 293 missing. On 3 Aug., 1861, he was made a brigadier-general of volunteers, to date from 15 May, and on 28 Aug. he was sent from the Army of the Potomac to be second in command to Gen. Robert Anderson in Kentucky. Few persons were prepared for the curious problem of Kentucky politics. What has been called the Munson struggle was at least partially successful. On account of broken health, Gen. Anderson soon asked to be relieved from the command, and he was succeeded by Sherman on 17 Oct. It was expected by the government that the men, to keep Kentucky in the Union, could be recruited in that state, and that the numbers required would be but few; but this expectation was doomed to be disappointed, Sherman looking for a great war, and declared that 60,000 men would be required to drive the enemy out of the state and 200,000 to put an end to the struggle in that region. Most men looked upon this prophetic sagacity as craziness. He was relieved from his command by Gen. Buell on 12 Nov. and ordered to report to Gen. Halleck, commanding the Department of Missouri. The 7th.
against Vicksburg from the river, which resulted in its capture, with 31,000 prisoners, on 4 July, 1863, thereby opening the Mississippi and fully accomplishing the original purpose. During this brilliant campaign Gen. Sherman was most active, and therefore was appointed a brigadier-general in the regular army, to date 4 July, 1863.

Meanwhile, Rosecrans, having expelled the enemy from middle Tennessee, had forced him to evacuate Chattanooga, fought the bloody battle of Chickamauga, and fell back into Chattanooga, where he was in a precarious condition. On 4 Oct., Sherman was ordered to take his corps, the 15th, from the Big Black to Memphis, with such other troops as could be sent him, to cross the Memphis and Charleston railway, toward Chattanooga. He moved, repairing the road as he went, according to the express orders of Gen. Halleck. But on the 27th he received orders from Gen. Grant to discontinue all work and march rapidly toward Bridgeport on the Tennessee. He lost no time in doing so. Sherman's 15th corps, with other commands, by the rapid movement for Chattanooga, was now getting into position; he was preparing to cross the river from the west bank, below the mouth of the Chickamauga, with the purpose of attacking the northern end of Mission ridge, while a division of cavalry was sent to the enemy's right and rear to cut the railroad behind him. At 1 o'clock, on the morning of the 31st, Sherman completed the preparations, and by 3 o'clock p.m. he was intrenched at the north end of Mission ridge. Thus the disposal of troops in Grant's line of battle was: Sherman on the left, in front of Tunnel Hill; Thomas in the center, at Fort Wood and Orchard Knob; while Hooker was to come up from Wauhatchie, take Lookout mountain, and crossing to Rossville, advance upon the mountain ridge in the rear, thus completing the operations of the army. There was open communication between these bodies by special couriers. While preparations were making for the centre attack under Thomas, it was evident that the enemy's design was to crush Sherman. Fierce assaults were made upon him in quick succession, which he resisted, and thus performed his duty in service drawing the fire of the foe, while Thomas, after Sherman's main attack upon the ridge, which was successful, on the morning of the 25th Sherman pursued the enemy by the roads north of the Chickamauga, arriving at Ringgold on that day, and everywhere destroying the enemy's communications.

During these operations Gen.Burnside was besieged by Longstreet in Knoxville, Tenn., and was in great straits. On 3 Dec., under orders from Grant, which another commander was slow to obey, Sherman made forced marches to Burnside's relief, and reached Knoxville not a minute too soon, and after supplying Burnside with all the assistance and re-enforcements he needed marched back to Chattanooga. Toward the end of January, 1864, he returned to Memphis and Vicksburg, whence with parts of McPherson's and Harbort's corps, then unemployed, he marched to Jackson and Meridian, where he broke up the Confederate combinations and destroyed their communications. On 2 March, Grant had been made lieutenant-general; on the 12th he assumed command of all the armies of the United States, with the purport of conducting in person the campaign of the Army of the Potomac. On 12 March he assigned Sherman to the command of the military division of the Mississippi, comprising the Departments of the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Cumberland, and the Arkansas—in a word, of the entire southwestern region, with temporary headquarters at Nashville. In a letter of 4 March, 1864, Grant acknowledges to Sherman his great gratitude for the co-operation and skill which so largely contributed to his own success, and on 19 Feb., 1864, Sherman received the thanks of Congress for his services in the Chattanooga campaign. On 25 March he began to preserve his command for active, but not the railways in good condition, and protect them and to make provision for the supplies of the army in its approaching campaign. On 10 April he received his final instructions from Grant to move against Atlanta. Ordering his troops to rendezvous at Chattanooga, he made it his headquarters on 28 April. His force consisted of a division of McPherson's and two of McArthur's corps, and 24,000 men. At 9 June, 1864, Sherman, Grant, Halleck, and the Ohio, John M. Schofield, it was 99,000 strong, with 254 guns, while the Confederate army, under Johnston, about 41,000 strong, soon re-enforced up to 62,000 men, was prepared to resist his advance, and if Sherman had the advantage of attack, Johnston had that of fighting behind intrenchments and natural obstacles. Moving from Chattanooga, Sherman came up with him at Dalton, 14 May, and turned his position at Buzzard's Roost by sending McPherson through Snake Creek gap, when Johnston fell back to Resaca. After an assault, 15 May, Johnston retreated to Cassville and behind the Etowah on the 17th. After the turning of Allatoona pass, which he made a secondary object of his movement, and a defeat at the Hope church, in the neighborhood of Dallas, Johnston still further retreated to a strong position on Kenesaw mountain, having contracted and retired his flanks to cover Marietta. Sherman advanced his line with each retrograde movement of the enemy and pressed operations, continually gaining ground. Both armies habitually fought from behind log parapets and shield, now directed against the fortified lines, 27 June, but did not succeed in breaking through. He then determined to turn the position, and moved Gen. James B. McPherson's army on 3 July toward the Chattahoochee, which compelled Johnston to retire to another intrenched position on the northwest bank of that river, whence he fell back on Atlanta as Sherman began to encircle him. In consequence of this, the enemy held up a part of the army on the west rear with a part of the army, while the rest lay intrenched in his front. On 17 July began the direct attack on Atlanta. Gen. John B. Hood, who had superseded Gen. Johnston on 17 July, made frequent sorties, and struck boldly and fiercely. There was a severe battle at Peach Tree creek on 20 July, one on the east side of the city two days later, and on the 28th one at Ezra church, on the opposite side of Atlanta, in all of which the National forces were victorious. After an ineffective cavalry movement against the railroad, Gen. Sherman left one corps intrenched on the Chattahoochee and moved with the other five corps on the enemy's only remaining line of railroad, twenty-six miles south of Atlanta, when he bent him in Jem'sboro', occupied his line of supply, and finally, on 1 Sept., the enemy evacuated the place.

Here Hood's presumption led to his own destruction. Leaving the south almost defenseless, he moved upon Nashville, where he was disastrously defeated by Thomas. Sherman had sent Thomas to that city purposely to resist his advance, and with the diminished army he moved upon Savannah, threatening Augusta and Macon, but finding little to oppose him in his march to the sea. Sherman moved steadily forward until he reached the defensive works that covered Savannah and blocked Savannah river. These were promptly taken by assault, and communications were opened with the fleet, which furnished ample supplies to his army. Savannah thus became a marine base for future operations. Sherman announced in a brief note to President Lincoln the evacuation of the city. "I beg to present you," he writes, "as a Christmas gift, the city of Savannah, with 150 heavy guns, plenty of ammunition, and 25,000 bales of cotton." His army had marched 200 miles in twenty-four days, through the heart of Georgia, and had lived in plenty all the way. The value of this splendid achievement cannot be overestimated. On 12 April, he had been appointed major-general in the U.S. army, and on 10 Jan. he received the thanks of congress for his "triumphal march." After the occupation of Savannah the question arose whether Sherman should come north by sea or march with his army through the Atlantic states. He preferred the latter plan. Schofield, leaving Thomas in Tennessee, was sent by rail and steamers to the coast of North Carolina, with his corps (23d) to march upon Goldsboro', N.C., to co-operate with him. Sherman left Savannah in February, moved through the Salkehatchie swamp, flanked Charleston, compelled its evacuation, and entered Columbia on the 17th. Thence he moved on Goldsboro' by way of Wimsville, Cheraw, and Fayetteville, opening communication by Cape Fear river with Schofield on 12 March, fighting at Averysboro' and Bentonville, where the enemy resisted his advance vigorously. At Averysboro' on the 16th Gen. Henry W. Slocum with four divisions attacked the intrenched position of Gen. William J. Hardee, and, turning his left flank, compelled him to fall back, while the cavalry, under Gen. Hugh Judson Kilpatrick, were attacked and driven back by the Confederate infantry of Gen. Lafayette McLawson the road to Bentonville. At the latter point Gen. Johnston's force was attacked in a strongly intrenched position on the 19th by the left wing of Sherman's army, under Gen. Slocum, whose right flank had been broken and driven back. After an obstinate contest, the Confederates withdrew in the night. Sherman and Schofield met at Goldsboro' on 23 and 24 March as originally planned. Leaving his troops there, he visited President Lincoln and Gen. Grant at City Point, returning to Goldsboro' on the 30th. The interview on board the "Ocean Queen" is represented in the accompanying vignette copy of a painting by G. P. A. Healy, entitled "The Peacemakers," the fourth member of the group being Admiral Porter. Sherman is shown at the moment that he said to Mr. Lincoln: "If Lee will only remain in Richmond till I can reach Burkeville, we shall have him between our thumb and fingers," sitting the action to the word. He was now ready to strike the Danville road, break Lee's communications, and cut off his retreat, or to reinforce Grant in front of Richmond for a final attack. He would be ready to move on 10 April. Johnston at Greensboro' received news of Lee's surrender on the 12th, and on the 14th sent a flag of truce to Sherman to know upon what terms he would receive his surrender. "I am fully empowered," Sherman wrote to him, "to arrange with you any terms for the suspension of hostilities, and am willing to confer with you to that end. That a base of action may be had, I undertake to abide by the same conditions entered into by Gen. Grant and Lee at Appomattox Court-House, Va., on the 9th inst." After considerable correspondence and a long interview with Gen. Johnston, having in view an immediate and complete peace, Sherman made a memorandum or basis of agreement between the armies, which was considered by the government as at once toolenient and exciding his powers. It included in terms of capitulation not only the army of Johnston, but all the Confederate troops remaining in the field. By the 5th article it was announced in general terms that "the war is to cease; a general amnesty so far as the executive of the United States can command, on condition of the disbandment of the Confederate army, the distribution of arms, and the resumption of peaceful pursuits by officers and men hitherto composing said armies." In order to secure himself against the assumption of power, the article is thus continued: "Nothing fully empowered by our respective principals to fulfill these terms, we individually and officially pledge ourselves to promptly obtain authority, and will endeavor to carry out the above programme." It was an honest effort on the part of a humane commander to put an end to the strife at once. Perhaps affairs were somewhat complicated by the assassination of President Lincoln on 14 April, which created great indignation and sorrow. It not only affected the terms between Johnston and Sherman, but it caused the latter to fall under the suspicion of the secretary of war. On their arrival in Washington they were promptly and curtly disapproved by a despatch sent, not to Sherman, but to Gen. Grant, on the morning of 24 April, directing him to go at once to North Carolina, by order of Sec. Stanton, to repudiate the terms and to negotiate the whole matter as in the case of Lee. Gen. Sherman considered himself entitled to his own opinion. It was supposed that in the terms of agreement there was an acknowledgment of the Confederate government and a proposed re-establishment of the state authorities and that it might furnish a ground of claim for the payment of the Confederate debt in the future. Such certainly was not its purpose, nor does it now appear that such could have been its effect. Sherman was a soldier treating with soldiers, and deserved more courteous and considerate treatment from the government authorities, even if in his enthusiasm he had exceeded his powers. On 10 March, Sherman set out for Alexandria, Va., and arrived on the 19th. He determined then not to revisit Washington, but to await orders in camp; but he afterward, at the

Grim-visaged War has smoothed his wrinkled

His association with his friends and comrades is exceedingly cordial, and his affection for those allied to him is as tender as that of a woman. A life of Gen. Sherman has been written by Gen. Manning, F. Force in the "Great Commanders" series (New York, 1891), and he has published "Memoirs of Gen. William T. Sherman," by Himself (2 vols., New York, 1874; new ed., 1885). His brother, John, statesman, b. in Lancaster, Ohio, 10 May, 1823, after the death of their father in 1829, leaving the large family with but limited means, the boy was cared for by a cousin named William A. Howard, of Michigan, the duty of preparing the report devolved upon Mr. Sherman. Every statement was verified by the clearest testimony, and has never been controverted by anyone. This report, when presented to the house, created a great deal of feeling, and intensified the antagonisms in congress, being made the basis of the canvass of 1856. He acted with the Republican party in supporting John C. Fremont for the presidency that party resisted the extension of slavery, but did not seek its abolition. In the debate on the submarine telegraph he showed his opposition to monopolists by saying: "I cannot agree that our government should be bound by any contract with any private incorporated company for fifty years; and the amendment I desire to offer will reserve the power to congress to determine the proposed contract after ten years. All bills making appropriations for public expenditures were closely scrutinized, and the then prevalent system of making contracts in advance of appropriations was denounced by him as illegal. At the close of his second congressional term he was recognized as the foremost man in the house of representatives. He had from deep and unchanged conviction adopted the political faith of the Republicans of the South, was the victim of any partisan rancor or malignity toward the South.

He was re-elected to the 36th congress, which began its first session amid the excitement caused by the bold raid of John Brown. In 1859 he was the Republican candidate for the speakership. He had subscribed, with no knowledge of the book, for Hilton R. Helper's "Impending Crisis," and this fact was brought up against him and estranged from him a few of the southern Whigs, who besought him to declare that he was not hostile to slavery. He refused, and after eight weeks of balloting, in which he came within three votes of election, he yielded to William Pennington, who was chosen. Mr. Sherman was then made chairman of the committee of ways and means. He took a strong stand against the publication of information upon appropriation bills, saying: "The theory of appropriation bills is, that they shall provide money to carry on the government, to execute existing laws, and not to change existing laws or provide new ones." In 1860 he was again elected to congress, and, when that body convened in December, the seceding members of both houses were excluded from the house. At the beginning President Buchanan's administration the public indebtedness was less than $200,000,000, but by this time it had increased to nearly $100,000,000, and in such a crippled condition were its finances that the government had not been able to pay the salaries of members of congress and many other demands. Mr. Sherman proved equal to the occasion in providing the means for the future support of the government. His first step was to secure the passage of a bill authorizing the issue of what are known as the treasury-notes of 1860.

On the resignation of Salmon P. Chase, he was elected to his place in the senate, and took his seat on 4 March, 1861. He was re-elected senator in 1867 and in 1882. During most of his senatorial career he was chairman of the committee on finance, and served also on the committees on agriculture, the Pacific railroad, the judiciary, and the patent-office. After the fall of Fort Sumter, under the call of President Lincoln for 75,000 troops he tendered his services to Gen. Robert Patterson, was appointed aide-de-camp without pay, and remained with the Ohio troops till the meeting of congress in July. After the withdrawal of the army he returned to Ohio, and received authority from Gov. William Dennison to raise a brigade. "Largely at his own expense, he recruited two regiments of infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and a battery of artillery, comprising over 2,300 men. This force served during the whole war, and was known as the Ohio regiment. The services rendered by him to the Union cause were his efforts in the senate to maintain and strengthen the public credit, and to provide for the support of the armies in the field. On the suspension of specie payments, about the first of January, 1862, the issue of United States notes became a necessity. The question of making them a legal tender was not at first received with favor. Mainly through the efforts of Senator Sherman and Sec. Chase, this feature of the bill authorizing their issue was carried through congress. They justified the legal-tender clause of the bill on the ground of necessity. In the debates on this question Mr. Sherman said: "I do believe there is a pressing necessity that these demand-notes should be made legal tender, if we want to avoid the evils of a depreciated and dishonored paper currency. I do believe we have the constitutional power to pass such a provision, and that the public safety now demands its execution here." The clause as thus proposed was made the only speech in the senate in favor of the national-bank bill. Its final passage was secured only by the personal appeals of Sec. Chase to the senators who opposed it. Mr. Sherman's speeches on state and national banks are the most important that he made during the war. He introduced a refunding act in 1867, which was adopted in 1870, but without the resumption clause. In 1874 a committee of nine, of which he was chairman, was appointed by a Republican caucus to secure a concurrence of action. They agreed upon a bill fixing the time for the resumption of specie payment at 1 Jan., 1879. This bill was reported to the caucus and the senate with the distinct understanding that there should be no debate on the side of the Republicans, that Mr. Sherman would use his influence to manage it according to his own discretion. The bill was passed, leaving its execution dependent upon the will of the secretary of the treasury for the time being.

Mr. Sherman was an active supporter of Rutherford B. Hayes for the presidency in 1876, as a member of the committee that visited Louisiana to witness the close of the elections in that state. He was appointed secretary of the treasury by President Hayes in March, 1877, and immediately set about providing a redemption fund by means of bonds. Six months before 1 Jan., 1879, the date fixed by law for redemption of specie payments, he had accumulated $140,000,000 in gold, and he had the satisfaction of seeing legal-tender notes gradually approach gold in value until, when the day came, there was practically no demand for gold in exchange for the notes. In 1880 Mr. Sherman was an avowed candidate for the presidential nomination, and his name was presented in the National convention by James A. Garfield. During the contest between the candidates of Gen. Grant and those of James G. Blaine, which resulted in Mr. Garfield's nomination, Mr. Sherman's votes ranged from 90 to 97. He returned to the senate in 1881, was re-elected in 1887 and again in 1893, resigning in 1897 to enter President McKinley's cabinet as secretary of state. His advanced age induced him to resign his office soon after the declaration of war with Spain, in May, 1898. In December, 1898, he was then present at the session of congress when he declined re-election at the close of his senatorial term in 1897. His name was presented by Joseph B. Foraker in nomination for the presidency at the National convention held in 1884, but the Ohio delegation was divided between him and James G. Blaine, so that he received only 30 votes from his home state. Again in 1888 his name was presented by Daniel H. Hastings, in behalf of the Pennsylvania delegation at the National convention, and on the first ballot he received 229 votes and on the second 249, being the leading candidate, and continued so until Benjamin Harrison received the support of those whose names were withdrawn. Mr. Sherman has published "Selected Speeches and Reports on Finance and

H., served an apprenticeship to a clothier in Groton, Mass., and after graduating at Harvard in 1825, taught an academy in Lexington, Mass., in 1825-6. He was a tutor in mathematics at Harvard in 1826-7, and from 1828 till 1838 was sub-master of the English high-school of Boston, of which he had charge from that date until his death. This school was reputed a model of its kind. He was an originator of the normal institute of instruction in 1830, its president in 1833-4, a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, was active in establishing the Massachusetts institute of technology, and was president of the Massachusetts teachers' association in 1845. He was the author of "An Elementary Treatise on Algebra" (Boston, 1841).—He was married, 11 Oct., 1834, to Miss Cora Wilson, member of congress from New Hampshire, and married John Sherwood, a lawyer of New York city. She is well known as a society leader, and has devoted special attention to the advancement of literary and artistic pursuits. One of her sons married, in 1857, Rosina Emnet, the artist. Mrs. Sherwood has given readings that have been exceedingly successful, was written for various periodicals, and is the author of "The Sacrament of Destiny" (New York, 1873); "Home Amusements" (1881); "Amenities of Home" (1881); "A Transplanted Rose" (1882); "Manners and Social Usages" (1884); "An Epistle to Posterity" (1897); and "Here, There, and Everywhere" (Chicago, 1898).

SHERWOOD, William Hall, pianist, b. in Lyons, N. Y., 31 Jan., 1834. He took for music manifested itself at a very early age, and when he was nine years old he began to appear in concerts in New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada. He afterward gave lessons also at Lyons musical academy, which was founded by his father, Rev. Lyman H. Sherwood. In 1871 he became the pupil of William Mason, and in 1878 removed to New York city. He studied for seven months under Theodore Kullak, and subsequently also with Dopp, Ernst Friedrich E. Richter, and Carl Friedrich Weitzmann. During this period he frequently appeared before the public, at the Beethoven festival in Berlin, at Weimar with Liszt, and on other occasions, meeting with much success. In 1876 he returned to the United States, and appeared in most of the principal cities, playing frequently in Philadelphia during the Centennial exhibition. In the autumn of the same year he settled in Boston, and soon became widely known as a soloist and teacher. Since then he has played at various times in all the larger cities of the Union, and is noted for his excellent technique, variety of interpretations, and depth of musical feeling. His work as a composer is limited to about twenty pieces for the piano, and many more in manuscript.

SHERWIN, John, author, b. in Fishkill, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1814; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 22 Oct., 1890. He was educated by private tutors, studied theology under Rev. George Armstrong in Fishkill, was licensed to preach in 1834, and was pastor of the Presbyterian church at New Windsor, N. Y., from 1835 till 1840; at Middletown, N. He was editor of the "American National Preacher" in 1836-9, of the "Biblical Repository" from 1837 till 1851, and of the "Ecclectic Magazine" from 1864 till 1871. Mr. Sherwood was the founder of the "Home at Home" in 1865, which he edited until 1880, and he was the editor of the "Presbyterian Review" from 1857 till 1871, and of the "Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review" in 1872-8. He conducted the "Homiletic Review" from September, 1881, and also was the editor of the "Missionary Review." He was engaged as a reader of manuscripts for various publishing-houses, and wrote numerous reviews. He was the author of "Plea for the Old Foundations" (New York, 1856); "The Lamb in the Midst of the Throne, or the History of the Cross" (1858); and "Books and Authors, and how to use Them" (1856). He also edited the "Memoirs" and two volumes of "Sermons" of the Rev. Ichabod Spencer, D. D. SHIELDS, James, soldier, b. in Sangamon County, Ill., in 1810; d. in Ottumwa, Iowa, 1 June, 1879. He emigrated to the United States in 1826, studied law, and began practice at Kaskaskia, III., in 1832. He was seated as a member of the legislature in 1836, elected state auditor in 1839, in 1843 appointed a judge of the state supreme court, and in 1845 made commissioner of the general land-office. When the war with Mexico began he was appointed a brigadier-general, his commission dating from 1 July, 1846, and was assigned to the command of the Illinois contingent. He served under Gen. Zavala on the Rio Grande, under Gen. John E. Wool in Chihuahua, and through Gen. Winfield Scott's campaign. At Cerro Gordo he gained the brevet of major-general, and was shot through the lung. After his recovery he took part in the operations in the valley of Mexico, commanding a brigade composed of marines and of New York and South Carolina volunteers, and at Chapultepec and Pavon he was severely wounded. He was mustered out on 20 July, 1848, and in the same year received the appointment of governor of Oregon territory. This office he resigned on being elected U. S. senator from Illinois as a Democrat, and served from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1855. After the expiration of his term he removed to Minnesota, and when the state government was organized he returned to the United States as one of the representatives of the new state, taking his seat on 12 May, 1857, and serving till 3 March, 1859. At the end of his term he settled in California, and at the beginning of hostilities in 1861 was in Mexico, where he was engaged in superintending a mine. Hastening to Washington, he was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers on 19 Aug. He was assigned to the command of Gen. Frederick W. Lander's brigade after the latter's death, and on 23 March, 1862, at the head of a division of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks's army in the Shenandoah valley, he opened the second campaign with the victory at Winchester, Va., after receiving a severe wound in the preparatory movements on the preceding day. He was in command at Port Republic on 9 June, and was defeated by Gen. Thomas J. Jackson. Resigning his commission on 28 March, 1863, he settled in California, but soon removed to Carrolton, Mo. He was elected senator from Missouri in 1872, and is believed to be the only man who has successively represented three states in the U. S. senate.

SHIELDS, Mary, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 Jan., 1820; d. there, 8 Oct., 1880. She was a daughter of John Shields, a wealthy merchant of that city, and inherited a large estate from him and from her brother. She was active in benevolent work, and bequeathed $140,000 for charitable purposes. The Pennsylvania deaf and dumb asylum, the Institution for the blind, the Old man's home, the House of mercy for the care of consumptives, the Indigent and single woman's society, received each one sixth of this sum, and the remaining sixth was divided between the Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia "to relieve and make more comfortable the sick and insane poor at the almshouse."

SHIELDS, Patrick Henry, jurist, b. in York county, Va., 16 May, 1773; d. in New Albany, 6 June, 1848. In accordance with his father's will he was educated for the legal profession at Hampden Sidney and William and Mary colleges. Inheriting a large tract of land near Lexington, Ky., he removed to that state in 1801, but found the title to the estate defective. In 1805 he passed into Indiana territory, and joined his classmate and lifelong friend, William Henry Harrison. He was commissioned the first judge of Harrison county in 1806, and it is recorded of him that he fought gallantly in the battle of Tippecanoe. His house was often the headquarters of a number of Indian authorities. He was a member of the Constitutional convention at Corydon in 1816, and filled judicial offices until the time of his death. Judge Shields, as one of the founders of the state, took an active part in reforming the territorial courts, in organizing the school-system, and in maintaining the congressional ordinance of 1787, which prohibited the introduction of slavery into Indiana, though this was at the time himself a slave-holder. According to family tradition, he was the author of the constitutional article which confirmed Indiana as a free state.---His grandson, Charles Woodruff, educator, b. in New Albany, Ind., 4 April, 1825, entered Princeton as an advanced student, and was graduated with distinction in 1844. After a course of four years in the classics, he went to the University of Pennsylvania and was licensed to preach by the presbytery of New Brunswick, N. J., in 1848. In 1849 he was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian church of Hempstead, L. I., and in 1859 he was installed as pastor of the 2d Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, Pa. He had been early imbued with a philosophical spirit, and published in 1861 an elaborate treatise entitled "Philosophia Ultima," in which he expanded an academic scheme of irreligious studies for the connection of religion and science. His friends, profoundly impressed by this exposition, created for him in Princeton a new professorship of the harmony of science and revealed religion. This chair was the first of its kind in any American college. He held it at the university for the period of four years. His novel in theory that its utility and even its orthodoxy were questioned, but its usefulness as well as its timeliness was soon abundantly vindicated. He was appointed professor of modern history in 1871, but soon resigned this added chair that he might not be diverted from the aim of his life, which he has pursued in college lectures, in papers before the philosophical society of Washington, in contributions to periodicals, and in elaborate published works. He received the honorary degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1861, and that of D. L. D. from Columbia university, Washington, in 1877. Dr. Shields has advocated the restoration of theology, as a science of religion, to its true philosophical position in a university system of culture, as dis-

Palmer, was pastor of a Congregational church at Beaumont, and when she was three years old he removed with her to Charleston, S.C., where she was educated. In June, 1833, Miss Palmer married Charles F. Dana, and removed with him first to New York, and in 1857 to Bellington, Iowa. On his death, soon afterward, she returned to her family in Charleston. Here she began to write, and became well known as a poet. In May, 1848, she married the Rev. Robert D. Shindel, a clergyman of the Episcopal church, who was for a time professor in Shively college, Kentucky. She removed with her husband in 1850 to Upper Marlborough, Md., and in 1859 to Nacogdoches, Tex. She has published "The Southern Harp" (Boston, 1840); "The Northern Harp" (New York, 1841); "The Parted Family, and other Poems" (1842); "The Temperance Lyre" (1842); "Charles Morton, or the Young Patriot" (1843); "The Young Sailor" (1841); "Forecastle Tour" (1841); and "Letters to Relatives and Friends on the Trinity" (1845). She had, before her death in 1883, been a frequent contributor to popular periodicals. SHINGASK (swampy ground overgrown with grass), called by the whites "King Shingask," Indian chief, lived in the 18th century. He was a brother of Tamqua, or King Bearer, and ranked first among Indian warriors during the French and Indian war. The brothers of Pennsylvania suffered severely from the forays of this Delaware, and Gov. William Donny in 1756 set a price of $200 upon his head or scalp. Although he was an implacable foe in battle, he was never known to treat a prisoner with cruelty. SHINN, Asa, clergyman, b. in New Jersey, 3 May, 1781; d. in New York, 12 February, 1855. When he was seven years old his parents removed to Virginia. He was entirely self-educated, united with the Methodist church in 1788, and in 1800 became an itinerant preacher. After being admitted on trial by the Baltimore circuit in 1801, he was sent in 1803 to form a new circuit in the wilderness of the Ohio, on the waters of the Hoopocky. After his return west and in Maryland, he withdrew in 1829 from the Methodist Episcopal church and united with the newly organized Methodist Protestant church.
When the Ohio annual conference of that body was organized in October, 1829, he was elected president, and stationed at Cincinnati; and in 1831, when the Pittsburg conference was formed, he was chosen its president. From 1834 till 1836 he was associate editor of the "Methodist Protestant" at Baltimore. He was subject to attacks of insanity, and died in an asylum. He published "An Essay on the Plan of Salvation" (Baltimore, 1813); and "The Benevolence and Restritude of the Supreme Being" (Philadelphia, 1840).

SHIPPEN, George Wolfe, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Dec. 1829. He was educated at the public schools, at Virginia theological school, and the Philadelphia divinity-school, and was graduated at the latter in 1863. He entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and has been rector of churches in Philadelphia, Shamskin, and Lock Haven, Pa., Troy, N. Y., and of Grace church, Newton, Mass., where he still (1898) remains. He has been head master of St. Paul's school, Troy, for ten years. "The Teachers' Assistant," contributed articles to church periodicals, and has published "Manual of Instruction upon the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels for the Christian Year" (New York, 1874); "Manual of the Prayer-Book" (1875); "Manual of Church History" (1876); "Stories for the Happy Days of Christmas Time" (1876); and "Questions that trouble Beginners in Religion" (1882); and edited a "Prayer-Book and Hymnal for the Sunday-School" (1885).

SHIPMAN, George Elias, physician, b. in New York city, 4 March, 1829; d. in Chicago, 20 Jan., 1893. He entered Middlebury, was graduated at the University of New York, and four years later completed his studies in the medical schools of physicians and surgeons. In 1846 he removed to Chicago, where he soon had a large and lucrative practice. In 1848 he founded the "Northwestern Journal of Homoeopathy," and was its successful editor four years. Since that date he had contributed many articles to medical journals, and in 1865 he became editor of the "United States Medical and Chirurgical Convention," and of the "Northwestern Homoeopathic Guide." In 1861 he conceived the idea of establishing a home for foundlings; or, as he firmly believed and declared, he founded the home in obedience to the expressed desire of God. With $75,38 on hand he opened it, 30 Jan., 1871, trusting in the Lord to furnish the needed funds as wanted. On 9 May, 1874, possession was taken of a new building that cost $40,837. To this an addition was made in 1883-4, making the aggregate cost of buildings $88,690. During the first thirteen years 4,958 children were received, of which 890 were given away, and 1,061 were restored to their parents. No state or municipal aid has ever been contributed to the support of the home, nor has the Shipman ever asked for any assistance.

SHIPPEN, Albert, author, b. near Natchez, Miss., 30 April, 1813. His father, William Shipp, a native of Virginia, was a merchant of Natchez for thirty years. He was educated at Lexington, Ky., and at Philadelphia, and, after spending his youth and early manhood at Natchez, removed to Louisville, Ky. He published "Pence, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1848), and "The Progress of Freedom, and other Poems" (New York, 1852).

SHIPPEN, Edward, mayor of Philadelphia, b. in Hillium, Cheshire, England, in 1632; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 2 Oct., 1712. He was the son of William Shipp. His brother, Rev. William Shipp, D. D., was rector of Stockport, Cheshire, and his nephew, Robert Shipp, D. D., was principal of Brasenose college, and vice-chancellor of Oxford university. Edward was bred to mercantile pursuits, and emigrated to Boston, Mass., in 1668, where he became a wealthy merchant. In 1671 he became a member of the Ancient and Honorable artillery company of Boston. He married Elizabeth Lybrand, a Quakeress, united with that sect, and shared the "jailings, whippings, and bannings." The persecution involved these, but the Quakers were not inflicted on the Quakers. In 1693 Mr. Shipp was either banished or driven to take refuge in Philadelphia. He did not quit Boston without erecting a memorial on "a green," near to "a pair of gallows, where several of our friends had suffered death for the truth, and were thrown into a hole." He asked leave of the magistrates to erect some monument there, but they refused, and in 1704, he conceived the idea of establishing a home for foundlings; or, as he firmly believed and declared, he founded the home in obedience to the expressed desire of God. With $75,38 on hand he opened it, 30 Jan., 1871, trusting in the Lord to furnish the needed funds as wanted. On 9 May, 1874, possession was taken of a new building that cost $40,837. good."—Joseph's son, Edward, merchant, b. in Boston, Mass., 9 July, 1703; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 23 Sept., 1781, was brought up to mercantile pursuits by James Logan, and was in business with him in 1732, as Logan and Shippen; afterward with Thomas Lawrence, in the fur-trade, as Shippen and Lawrence. In 1744 he was elected mayor of the city. In 1745, and for several years thereafter, he represented the county in the Pennsylvania house of representatives. In May, 1752, he removed to Philadelphia, where he was appointed to the sea-room, and continued such until 1778. He had large transactions as paymaster for supplies for the British and provincial forces when they were commanded by Gen. Forbes, Gen. Stanwix, and Col. Bouquet, and managed them with so much integrity as to receive public thanks in 1760. He was a county judge under both the provincial and state governments. In early life he laid out and founded Shippensburg, Pa. In 1746-8 he was one of the founders of the College of New Jersey, and he was one of its first board of trustees, which post he resigned in 1767. He was also a subscriber to the Philadelphia academy (afterward the University of Pennsylvania), an officer of the Pennsylvania hospital and the American philosophical society. Mr. Shippen's advanced age prevented him from taking an active part, except as a committee-man, during the Revolution, yet his sentiments were warmly expressed in behalf of his country. — William, another son of Joseph, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 1 Oct., 1712; d. in Philadelphia, 12 Nov., 1793, appeared himself early in life to the study of medicine, for which he had a remarkable genius. He speedily obtained a large and lucrative practice, which he maintained throughout his life. He was a member of the Junto, and aid to the Pennsylvania hospital, of which he was the physician from 1733 till 1778, the Public academy, and its successor, the College of Philadelphia (now the University of Pennsylvania), being chosen in 1749 one of the first trustees of the academy. He was a trustee of the college in 1755-79, and a member of the American philosophical society, of which he was vice-president in 1768, and for many years after. He was for nearly sixty years a member of the 3d Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, and a member of the Academy of the American Philosophical society. On 29 Nov., 1778, he was chosen by the assembly of Pennsylvania to the Continental congress, and he was re-elected in 1779. He was for thirty years a trustee of Princeton college. Dr. Shippen was notably liberal toward the poor, and, it is said, not only gave his professional art and medicines without charge, but oftentimes assisted them by donations from his purse. He retained his physical powers very late in life, and it is said that "at the age of ninety he would ride in and out of the city on horseback without an overcoat in the coldest weather." —William's son, William, known as William Shippen the younger, physician, b. in Philadelphia, 21 Oct., 1730; d. in Germantown, Pa., 11 July, 1808, was graduated at Princeton in 1751, and delivered the valedictory for his class. He studied medicine with his father until 1758, when he went to England, and studied under Dr. John and Dr. William Hunter and Dr. McKenzie, and in 1761 was graduated M. D. at Edinburgh. Returning to Philadelphia in 1762, he entered on the practice of his profession, and on 16 Nov., 1762, he was elected a fellow of the college of physicians of Pennsylvania, the earliest admission of a physician that was ever delivered in this country. The first were delivered at the state-house, and the subsequent ones in rooms that were constructed by his father for the purpose in the rear of the latter's residence. After the first lecture he made the following announcement in the "Pennsylvania Gazette": "Dr. Shippen's anatomical lectures will begin to-morrow evening, at six o'clock, at his father's house in Fourth street. Tickets for the course to be had of the doctor at five guineas each; and any gentlemen who incline to see the subject prepared for the lectures, and learn the art of dissecting, may, at the doctor's expense, be permitted to pay five guineas more." Dr. Shippen's school of anatomy was continued until 23 Sept., 1765, when he was chosen professor of anatomy and surgery in the newly established medical school of the College of Philadelphia, of which he was one of the founders. This was the first medical school in this country. Dr. Shippen retained this post till 1780, when he was elected professor of anatomy, surgery, and midwifery in the University of the state of Pennsylvania, and in 1791, on the union of these institutions, under the name of the University of Pennsylvania, he became professor of anatomy in the latter, retaining the place until 1806. On 15 July, 1776, he was appointed chief physician of the Flying Camp of the Continental congress, 1777, he laid before congress a plan for the organization of a hospital department, which, with some modifications, was adopted, and on 11 April, 1777, he was unanimously elected "Director-General of all the Military Hospitals for the Armies of the United States." He was charged with an improper administration of the office, and resigned before a military court, which led to the rewriting of the plan in 1784. The investigation did not develop any matters reflecting on his integrity. In 1778-9, and again from 1791 till 1802, he was one of the physicians of the Pennsylvania hospital. He was for more than forty years a member of the American philosophical society, in which he held the offices of curator and secretary. His skill and eloquence as a teacher, exercised during forty years in the first medical school in the country, made him widely known at home and abroad, and won for him permanent distinction and respect in the medical world. —Edward, son of the second Edward, jurist, b. in Philadelphia, 16 Feb., 1729; d. there, 16 April, 1806, at the age of seventy-seven, began the study of the law with Tench Francis, and, while pursuing his studies, drafted the first common law in Pennsylvania in 1748 he went to London to complete his law studies at the Middle Temple, and, returning to Philadelphia, was admitted to the bar. On 22 Nov., 1752, he was appointed judge of the vice-admiralty, and in 1755 he became one of the commissioners to wait upon the " Paxton Boys," who were engaged in an insurrection, to persuade them to disperse, which mission was successful. He held several local offices until the Revolution. He took a deep interest in the provincial wars, and wrote and recorded every occasion when the provincial troops were successful. In 1762 he was appointed prothonotary of the supreme court, retaining this post till the Revolution. He became a member of the provincial council in 1779, in which office he served for five years. During the war for independence he probably sympatized with the mother country, as he was, by order of the council, placed on his parole to give neither succor nor information to the enemy. He remained in Philadelphia during the British occupancy. In May, 1784, he was appointed president judge of the court of common pleas, and in September of the same year he became associate justice of the supreme court, in which latter office he retained until 1789, when the court was abolished. In 1785 he was chosen a justice for the dock ward of Philadelphia, and in the same year was appointed president of the court of quarter sessions of the peace, and over and terminer. In 1791, at which time he was still at the head of the court of common pleas, he was appointed an associate justice of the supreme court, in which office he served till 1799. Gov. McKean then nominated Judge Shippen to be the chief justice, which office he resigned in 1805. He "was a man of large views," said Chief-Justice TKGHMAN, "everything that fell from that venerable man," said Judge Duncan, "is entitled to great respect." The best extant portrait of him is that by Gillet Stuart, many copies of which were sold for 50 cents. He is represented in the accompanying vignette. To his pen we owe the first law reports in Pennsylvania. In 1780 he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Pennsylvania, of which institution he was a trustee from 1791 till his death. His third daughter, MARGARET, b. in Philadelphia in 1760; d. in London, 24 Aug., 1804, was second wife of Benedict Arnold, Joseph, another son of the second Edward, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, 30 Oct., 1732; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 10 Feb., 1810, was graduated at Princeton in 1753, and shortly afterward entered the provincial army, in which he rose to the rank of colonel, and served in the expedition that captured Fort Du Quene. After the troops were disbanded he went to Europe, partly on a mercantile venture, but chiefly for travel. He returned to Philadelphia in 1761, and in the following year was chosen to succeed the Rev. Richard Peters as secretary of the province, in which post he served till the Revolution, when the provincial council ceased to exist. He subsequently removed to Lancaster, Pa., where in 1789 he became a judge of the county courts. He was fond of the fine arts, and was patron of Benj. West, Rembrandt Peale, and Mr. William Allen, and other friends of art, by whom he aided him with means for pursuing his artistic studies in Italy, for which West was grateful during life. He was for more than forty years a member of the American philosophical society. — Edward, great-grandson of the second Edward, lawyer, b. on his father's estate, "Elm Hill," Lancaster co., Pa., 16 Nov., 1821, was the son of Dr. Joseph Gallaway Shippen. He received an academical education, studied law, and, on 11 April, 1846, was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia, where he has since practiced, gaining reputation in his profession. Mr. Shippen is known for his active interest in education. He was for many years a member of the board of public education in Philadelphia, and from 1864 till 1868 president of the Board. He had been a delegate to several national educational conventions, before some of which he has delivered important addresses. He is one of the founders of the Teachers' institute and of the Teachers' benevolent association of Philadelphia. By an appointment of the mikado, he was for many years in charge of the Japanese paintings that were sent by the government of Japan to the Philadelphia Centennial. During the civil war he was chief of the educational department of the sanitary commission. During the Centennial exposition in 1876 Mr. Shippen was the president of the Chilian commission. For his benevolent interest in the Italian people in Philadelphia he received, on 10 Oct., 1877, from Victor Emmanuel, the order of Cavaliere della Corona d'Italia. He is the president of the art club of Philadelphia. He is consul for the Argentine Republic, Chili, and Ecuador, at Philadelphia. Several of Mr. Shippen's addresses on educational subjects have been published, among them one on the dedication of the Haggling school, 31 Oct., 1867 (Philadelphia, 1867); "Compensation of Teachers" (1872); and "Educational Antiquities" (1874). — Edward, great-grandson of Chief-Justice Edward, Surgeon, b. in New Jersey, 18 June, 1836, is the son of Richard Shippen. He was graduated at Princeton in 1853, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1848, entered the navy as assistant surgeon, 7 Aug., 1849, and was commissioned surgeon, 26 April, 1861. He was on the "Congress" when she was destroyed by the "Merriam" at Newport News, Va., and was injured by a shell, and in 1845-5 was on the ironclad frigate Merrimac, which fired on Fort Fisher and the operations of Bermuda Hundred. He made the Russian cruise under Admiral Farragut, was commissioned medical inspector in 1871, was fleet-surgeon of the European squadron in 1871-3, in charge of the Naval hospital in 1874-7, commissioned medical director in 1876, and was president of the naval medical examining board at Philadelphia in 1890-2. Dr. Shippen has contributed largely to Hamersley's "Naval Encyclopedia," the "United Service Magazine," and to kindred publications.

Shippin, William, soldier, b. about 1745; d. near Princeton, N.J., 3 Jan., 1877. He followed the sea in his youth, was a soldier in the royal army about 1769, and subsequently engaged in the provision business in Philadelphia. In March, 1776, he was commissioned as captain of a privateer, and later in the year he commanded the marines in a schooner cruising in Delaware river, which took several prizes. His force was transferred to an armed boat, and afterward joined Washington's army. He was killed in the battle of Princeton.

Shiras, Alexander Eakin, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Oct., 1832; d. Grandton, D.C., 14 April, 1885. His grandfather emigrated from Petershead, Scotland, about 1765. The son was appointed to the U. S. military academy through his uncle, Maj. Constantine M. Eakin, and was graduated there in 1853. He was assigned to the 4th artillery, and served on frontier and garrison duty till 1859, when he was assistant professor of mathematics at West Point till 1843. He was made commissary of subsistence, 3 March, 1847, with the staff rank of captain, and served in the subsistence bureau in Washington till his death, rising to the head of his department, with the rank of brigadier-general, which he attained on 29 June, 1874. A large share of the credit for the manner in which the National armies were supplied during the civil war is due to him. At the close of the war he was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general, U. S. army.

Shirlaw, Walter, artist, b. in Paisley, Scotland, 6 Aug., 1838. He came to the United States with his parents in 1849, and later followed for some time the occupation of bank-note engraving. He first exhibited at the National academy in 1861, and continued to take part in the exhibitions altogether to art. He was elected an academician of the Chicago academy of design in 1868. In SHIRLEY, John Milton, lawyer, b. in Sunborn'ton, N. H., 16 Nov., 1831; d. in Andover, N. H., 21 May, 1887. He was educated at Sunborn'ton and the Northfield conference school, studied law in 1854, and was admitted to the bar in 1856. He represented Andover in the legislature in 1859-60, and was postmaster of that place from 1856 till 1884. He published "The Early Jurisprudence of New Hampshire": "Complete History of the Dartmouth College Case": "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Judicial Court," Vols. 49-54 (Concord, 1861-1880). He was a director of the Superior Court of Judicature, Vol. 55 (1876).

SHIRLEY, Paul, naval officer, b. in Kentucky, 19 Dec., 1820; d. in Columbus, Ohio, 24 Nov., 1876. He entered the navy in 1839 became master, 3 Dec., 1853; lieutenant, 21 July, 1854; commander, 5 Nov., 1863; and captain, 1 July, 1870. While in command of the sloop "Cane," of the Pacific squadron, he captured the piratical cruiser "J. M. Chapman," in 1858, for which service he was complimented by Rear-Admiral Charles H. Bell. He also, while in command of the "Sawannah," took the piratical steamer "Colon," at Cape St. Lucas, Lower California, and thereby saved two mail-steamers that would have been captured. He was fleet-captain of the North Pacific squadron, and commanded the steam frigate "Cruzen" during the Indian war, and was in charge of the receiving-ship "Independence," at Mare island, Cal., in 1869-70.

SHIRLEY, William, colonial governor of Massachusetts, b. in Preston, Sussex, England, in 1674; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 24 March, 1711. He studied law and came to Boston in 1701, where he practiced his profession. He was a commissioner for the settlement of the boundary between Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and acted as such when he was appointed governor of Massachusetts in 1714. He administered the government of the colony until 1715, and in this year planned the successful expedition against Cape Breton. He was in England from 1714 till 1753, and was one of the commissioners at Paris for settling the limits of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, in 1754. In 1753 he returned as governor of Massachusetts, treated with the eastern Indians in 1754, explored Kennebec river, and erected several forts. He was commander-in-chief of the forces in British North America at the opening of the French war in 1755, planned the expedition of Gen. John Bradbury in the same year against Moncton, and went with it as far as Oswego. In 1759 he was made lieutenant-general, and he afterward became governor of one of the Bahama islands, but returned to Massachusetts in 1759 and built the mansion in Roxbury. His first work of importance was the "Toning of the Bell" (1784), which was followed by "Scheep-scheuring in the Bavarian Highlands" (1856). The latter, which is probably the best of his works, received honorable mention at the Paris exposition in 1878. Other notable works from his pen are "Good Morning," in the Buffalo academy (1878); "Indian Girl" and "VI. Land Tas" (1843); and "Jenky" (1886), owned by the Academy of design, New York. His largest work is the fresco for the dining-room in the house of Darius O. Mills, New York. Mr. Shirley has also earned an excellent reputation as an illustrator. He was one of the founders of the Society of American artists, and was its first president. On his return from Europe he took charge of the Art-students' league, New York, and for several years taught in the composition class. He became an associate of the National academy in 1857, and an academician the following year.

SHIRLEY, John, clergyman, b. in Bethle'm, Pa., 1 Nov., 1786; d. in Salem, S. C., 27 June, 1838. His parents removed when he was young to Bethabara, a Moravian settlement in the south, and gave him a common-school education. He taught for a few years, then learned the trade of a tinsmith, and began business in Salem, S. C., where he has been combined a book-store with his workshop, became a manufacturer, and built the first paper mill, south of the Potomac. While an apprentice he had studied law, was admitted to the bar, and soon acquired an extensive practice among the German settlers. Later he became a large landowner, had numerous slaves, and was frequently elected to the legislature. After his fiftieth year he desired to enter the ministry, but, finding it impossible to take the long theological course that was required by the Moravian church, he induced the village authorities to make a change in their laws, which, being confirmed by the legislature, permitted another denomination within their bounds. He then took a course of reading, and in 1811 was appointed by the Lutheran synod of S. C. as superintendent of the indigent Moravians, and was required to compel him to leave the town, but he proved his right to remain by their own recent enactment, and labored there gratuitously till a few years before his death. He was a founder of the general synod of the Lutheran church, of which he was president in 1823, and one of the committee to prepare a Lutheran hymn-book, and to publish the translation of Luther's catechism. In 1825 he was a director of the theological institution which adopted measures for the formation of the seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., to which he left three thousand acres of land. He translated Stilling's "Scenes in the World of Spirits," and prepared "A Comprehensive Account of the Rise and Progress of the Christian Church by Dr. Martin Luther." He died in Salem, Md., 13 Aug., 1838.

SHOCK, William Henry, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 15 June, 1821. He entered the navy as 3d assistant engineer, 18 Jan., 1845, and served in the Mexican war. He was promoted 3d assistant engineer, 10 July, 1847, became 1st assistant engineer, 31 Oct., 1848, was senior engineer of the coast-survey steamers "Penguin" in 1849, and superintended the construction of the machinery of the steamer "Susquehanna" at Philadelphia in SHOEMAKER, George Washington, inventor, b. near Williamsport, Pa., 14 Dec., 1861. He received his education at Keystone academy, Factoryville, Pa., and then entered his father's woolen-mill. Having mechanical ability, he made various improvements in the plant, and in 1886 invented a ring-machine, by which wool-spinning may be carried on continuously. With the Crompton mule, now in general use, an output of 150 pounds is obtained in ten hours with 250 spindles, while with the new system, with an equal number of spindles, has given during the same time 480 pounds of yarn. It is estimated that, under favorable conditions, from 800 to 1,000 pounds of yarn can be produced in ten hours. The cost of a machine of the Shoemaker type is much less than that of the other.

SHOEMAKER, William Lukens, poet, b. in Georgetown, D. C., 10 July, 1822. He is of Quaker descent. After graduation at Jefferson college in 1841 he entered the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, where he took his degree in 1846, but has never practised. He has written many poems, sonnets, and translations of German ballads and lyrics, but they have never been published in book-form. The best known of them are "The Sweetheart Bird-song," which was set to music by Michael Kalle, "The Sabbath of the Year," and "Twill Soon Be Dark." Some of his verses are included in John J. Piatt's "Union of American Poetry and Art" (Cincinnati, 1886).
SHOUT, Charles, educator, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 28 May, 1811; d. in New York City, 24 Dec., 1886. He was for the revision of the 1836 Testament, and subsequently he was secretary of that body. "Dr. Short," says the Rev. Talbot W. Chambers, "was remarkable as a painstaking scholar, who would have contributed more to classical literature but for his reluctance to let anything pass from his pen till he had exhausted his ability upon it." He was a member of many learned societies, to which he contributed papers of much originality. He was also a member of the Century club, and a vestryman in St. Thomas's church, New York city, where a tablet has been erected to his memory. He received the degree of L.L.D. from Kenyon college in 1886. His works include revisions of Schmitz and Zumpt's "Advanced Latin Exercises" (1860), and Mitchell's new "Latin Lexicon," prefixed to "Herzog's "Real Encyclopaedia"" (1860); the essay "On the Order of Words in Attic-Greek Prosse," prefixed to Yonge's "English-Greek Lexicon," the most extensive treatise that has yet appeared on the subject (1876); and, with Charlton T. Lewis, a new edition of Andrews's Friend's "Latin Lexicon" (1876). He was also a contributor to "Ye glowing Learned Societies of Europe and America.

SHORT, Charles Wilkins, botanist, b. in Woodford county, Ky., 6 Oct., 1794; d. in Louisville, Ky., 7 March, 1863. He was graduated at Transylvania university in 1810, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1815, and in 1825 was called to the chair of materia medica and medical botany in Transylvania university. In 1838 he removed to Louisville, Ky., where he was associated with Dr. Charles Caldwell, Dr. Lunsford P. Vandall, Dr. John Esten Cooke, and Dr. Daniel Drake in founding the medical department of the University of Louisville, and continued to hold a chair in that institution until 1849, when he retired. He then devoted himself to the study of botany, and was associated with Dr. Robert Peter, and Henry A. Griswold, prepared "Plants of Kentucky." Dr. Short was one of the editors of the "Transylvania Journal of Medicine" in 1828-39, and the author of various botanical notices. At his death his vast herbarium, the result of his life-long collections and exchanges, was bequeathed to the Smithsonian Institution. It is now in the possession of the Academy of natural sciences in Philadelphia.

SHORT, William, diplomatist, b. in Spring Garden, Va., 50 Sept., 1759; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Dec., 1839. He was educated at William and Mary college, and at an early age was chosen a member of the executive council of Virginia. When Thomas Jefferson was appointed minister to France in 1785, Short accompanied him as secretary of legation, and after his departure was made chargé d'affaires on 26 Sept., 1789, his commission being the first one that was signed by Gen. Washington as president, but he was not regularly commissioned till 29 April, 1790. He was transferred to the Hague as minister-resident on 16 Jan., 1792. On 19 Dec. of the same year he was appointed chargé d'affaires for Madrid, having been appointed on 18 March minister plenipotentiary with William Car-Indianapolis, and moved to St. Augustine, Fla., early in 1861. He erected a battery at Fernandina under orders of the governor of Florida, was appointed lieutenant in the Confederate army, became major of artillery in October, 1861, and was commanded a division as major, at the battle of Prairie Grove, and was appointed brigadier-general, 12 Sept., 1862, and ordered on duty at Mobile, Ala. Afterward he commanded a Louisiana brigade at Vicksburg, and received the first attack of the National forces. He surrendered at that place, and after his exchange was chief of artillery to Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, and constructed the defensive works on Chattahoochee river. On the succession of Gen. John B. Hood to the command of the army in July, 1864, Gen. Shoup was made chief of staff. He was relieved at his own request, and prepared a pamphlet, which was submitted to the Confederate congress, recommending the enlistment of negro troops. After the close of the war in 1866 he was elected to the chair of appointments to the postgraduate of the Universities of N. Carolina and Mo. He then studied for the ministry, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church, and had been rector of churches in Nashville, Tenn., Jackson, Miss., and New Orleans. He was professor of mathematics in the University of the south, and the author of "Infantry Tactics" (Little Rock, 1862); "Artillery and Division of Field and Marine Engineer- ing" (New York, 1874); and "Mechanism and Personality" (Boston, 1889).

SHREVE, Henry Miller, inventor, b. in Burlington county, N. J., 21 Oct., 1789; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 6 March, 1854. He was educated in western Pennsylvania, and as a boy became interested in the navigation of western rivers. In 1810 he carried freight on the Ohio in a bark. He was taken by an American from Galena river to New Orleans, thus establishing a business that previously had been exclusively in the hands of the British. During the war of 1812 he conveyed supplies to Fort St. Philip past the British batteries by protecting his vessel with cotton-bales. At the battle of New Orleans he had charge of one of the fieldpieces that proved so destructive to that column of the British army that was led by Gen. Sir John Keane. In May, 1815, he ascended the Mississippi to Louisville in the "Enterprise," the first steam vessel that ever performed that voyage, and subsequently he built the "Washington" on a plan of his own invention, with improvements that made it superior to Robert Fulton's boat. By using a cam-outfit the case was hermetically sealed and he saved three fifths of the fuel. In March, 1817, his vessel made its first trip laden with passengers and freight, and demonstrated its superiority. When its success was thoroughly shown, Fulton and his associates, having the exclusive right to navigate all vessels propelled by fire and steam in the rivers of said territory," entered suit against him and secured his boot. In the case was decided in his favor. In 1826 he was appointed superintendent of western river improvements, which place he held until 1841. During that time he had charge of the removal of the great Red river raft, consisting of an accumulation of trees, logs, and drift-wood of every description firmly imbedded in its channel for more than 100 miles, and in consequence the river was opened for a distance of 1,200 miles. He built the snag-boat "Helios" in 1829 for removing snags and "sawyers" from Ohio river, and during the same year invented a steam marine battering-ram for harbor defense.

SHREVE, Thomas H., journalist, b. in Alexandria, Va., in 1808; d. in Louisville, Ky., 23 Dec., 1863. He was educated in the academy at Alexandria, engaged in mercantile pursuits, settled in Cincinnati in 1830, and in 1834 purchased a share in the "Mirror," a weekly literary journal. In 1838 he established the same year in Louisville, and subsequently he became one of the editors of the Louisville "Journal." From the time of his editorial connection with the Cincinнатi "Mirror" he contributed essays and poems to magazines. He published "Drayton, an American Tale" (New York, 1851). Some of his verses are reprinted in William T. Goggs's "Poets and Poetry of the West" (Columbus, 1850).—His cousin, Samuel Henry, engineer, b. in Trenton, N. J., 2 Aug., 1829; d. in New York city, 27 Nov., 1884. He was graduated at Princeton in 1848, and at Harvard law-school in 1859, and afterward studied civil engineering. He had charge of the construction of several railroads, and became in 1875 engineer of the New York rapid transit expansion. The subscriber is indebted to the Metropolitan elevated railroad and engineer-in-chief of the Brooklyn elevated railroad. He was the author of a work on "The Strength of Bridges and Roofs" (New York, 1864), which was translated into French, and at the time of his death had almost complete a treatise on the "Theory of the Arch."
"and "Levant," 24 Feb., 1815, and executive in her subsequent escape from a British fleet. He received a silver medal, and was included in the vote of thanks by Congress to Stewart and his officers, and South Carolina gave him thanks and a sword for his services. He was commissioned master-commandant, 28 March, 1820, and captain, 21 Feb., 1831, commissioned with the West India squadron in 1827-8, and was chief of the bureau of provisions and clothing in 1843-5. On 22 Jan., 1847, he arrived on the coast of California in the "Independence," and assumed command in-chief of the U. S. naval force in the Pacific. He captured the city of Mazatlan, 11 Nov., 1847, and, landing the naval brigade, held it against superior forces. He also took Guaymas, La Paz, and San Blas, which places, together with other ports in Mexico and California, he held until the close of the war. He commanded the "Princeton" in 1853, with a small squadron, to protect the fisheries in dispute with the British, was chief of the bureau of construction in 1853, chairman of the light-house board in 1854-8, and in 1858 was appointed to command a fleet of vessels with 500 guns and 2,500 men, flying the flag of a vice-admiral, to cooperate against Para- guay for firing upon the U. S. steamer "Water-Witch." He reached Asuncion, 21 Jan., 1859, and by display of force obtained apologies and pecuniary indemnity on 10 Feb. The president highly commended his zeal and ability in the conduct of this mission, and the president of the Argentine government presented him with a sword and miniature. With similar zeal, naval enterprises were made to induce him to join the Confederates in behalf of his native state. In December, 1861, he was placed on the retired list, but he continued on duty as chairman of the light-house board from 1860 till 1870.—Another brother, Ed- ward Rutledge, naval officer, b. in South Carolina in 1791; d. at sea, 12 March, 1844. He served during the war of 1812-15 on the "President," in the long cruises of Com. John Rodgers, and became lieutenant, 9 Oct., 1813. He was commissioned commander, 24 April, 1828, had charge of the sloop "Vincennes" in the West Indies in 1839-43, and became captain, 9 Feb., 1857. He took command of the frigate "Columbia," 22 July, 1842, on the Brazil station, and died at sea. Another brother, Irvine, naval officer, b. in South Carolina in 1798; d. in Wilmington, Del., 5 April, 1849, entered the navy as midshipman, 12 May, 1814, served in the "President" under Decatur when that vessel was captured by the British, 15 Jan., 1815, was in the "Guerrico" in the Algerine war in 1816, when Decatur captured the Algerine frigate, and assisted in suppressing piracy in the West Indies while attached to the sloop "Hornet" in 1821-3. He was commissioned lieutenant, 13 Jan., 1825, was executive officer of the "Polomac," on the Pacific station, in 1837-8, and commanded the landing-party from that vessel on 6 Feb., 1832, in the attack on the Malay town of Qualiah Battoo, Sumatra, which he destroyed to avenge the capture and plunder of the American ship "Friendship" the year before. He was highly commended for ability and gallantry in the conduct of this expedition. After being commissioned commander, 8 Sept., 1844, he took charge of the "Sumatra," on the Brazil station, in 1844-7, and was inspector at the Philadelphia navy-yard in 1848-9.—Irvine's son, Thomas Branford, naval officer, b. in Willin- gton, Del., 3 June, 1825; d. in Vera Cruz, Mexico, 25 March, 1847, was off Vera Cruz in the steamer "Mississippi" when he was sent on shore, 29 March, 1847, in charge of one of the guns in the naval battery on the works against that city. He was killed while in the act of pointing this gun during the bombardment of Vera Cruz. A monument, called the Midshipman's Monument (see engraving) was erected at Annapolis in the ground of the naval academy, to commemorate his death and that of Passed Midshipman Henry A. Cruzen, John B. Hynson, and Midshipman Wingate Pillsbury, who were drowned when the brig "Somers" was capsized and lost in a small squall off Vera Cruz in December, 1846.

SHUCK, John Lewis (skook), missionary, b. in Alexandria, Va., 8 Sept., 1812; d. in Barnwell, S. C., 20 Aug., 1883. He was educated at the Virginia Baptist seminary (now Richmond college), and on 22 Sept., 1835, embarked with his bride for China. He began his labors in Macao, where he baptized the first Chinese converts, met with success also at Hong Kong, where he removed in 1842, and thence settled at Shanghai. In 1844 he came to the United States with his Chinese assistant, and visited various parts of the country in the interest of the missions. He returned to China in 1846, and settled at Shanghai, where he preached for years with good results, having completely mastered the Chinese idioms. When the Chinese were attracted in considerable numbers to California after the discovery of gold, the missionary board selected Mr. Shuck for that field, and he labored there for seven years, retiring in 1861 to Barnwell, where he preached to the neighboring churches during the remainder of his life. He published "Portfolio Chiness, or a Collection of Authentic Chinese State Papers" (Macao, 1840).—His wife, Martha Hall, b. in Kilmarnock, Va., 8 Oct., 1817, d. in Hong Kong, 27 Nov., 1844, was the daughter of a Baptist minister. She soon learned Chinese after arriving at the field of her intended labors, and was an earnest teacher of Christianity among the heathen till her death. She was the author of "Scenes in China, or Sketches of the Country, Religion, and Customs of the Chi- nese." (Philadelphia, 1842.)—Another brother, Joseph B. Jeter, published her "Life" (Boston, 1844).—Their son, Lewis Hall, clergyman, b. in Singapore, India, 3 Aug., 1836, was graduated at Wake Forest university, N. C., in 1856, taught for some years, studied theology, and since 1883 has been pastor of a Bap- tist church in Charleston, S. C.
SHURTLEFF. Robert Wilson, naval officer, b. in Red Hook, N. Y., 21 Feb., 1822; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 Nov., 1895. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1838, was attached to the naval school at Philadelphia, and became a passed midshipman in 1845. He was promoted to master, 21 Feb., 1853, and to lieutenant, 30 Oct., 1853, but resigned from the navy, 20 June, 1854, and was connected with the Collins line of Liverpool steamers as chief officer for two years. He then commanded the steamers "Black Warrior" and "Catawba" on the line between New York and Boston, and had charge of the party that surveyed the Isthmus of Tehuantepec for a railroad and interoceanic canal. When the civil war began he was in command of the steamer "Quaker City," of the New York and Havana line of steamers, and was appointed U. S. consul-general at Havana. In April, 1863, he resigned, and was reinstated in the navy with a commission of commander, dated 19 Nov., 1862. He was given the steamer "Conemaugh" on the blockade at Charleston, where he participated in the engagements on Morris island. He commanded the steamer "Bateus," of the Eastern Gulf blockading squadron, in 1864-6. After the war he had the "Hartford," of the East India squadron, in 1865-6, and the "Achubessi," of the Asiatic squadron, in 1866-8. He was commissioned a captain, 31 Dec., 1889, and commanded the monitor "Manitoumish," in 1870, after which he had charge of the Tehuantepec and Nicaragua surveying expeditions of 1870-1. He was chief of the bureau of equipment and recruiting in the navy department in 1873-8, and was commissioned commodore, 21 Sept., 1876. In 1879-80 he sailed in the "Ti- conderoga" on a special mission to the Superior and the East Indies, to ascertain and report on the prospects for the revival of American trade with those countries; while he was on this expedition the sultan of Zanzibar, Said Barzhesh, presented him with a sword. He was promoted to rear-admiral on 7 May, 1883, and was retired, 21 Feb., 1884.

SHULTZ, Theodore, missionary, b. in Germantown, Pennsylvania, 17 Dec., 1770; d. in Salem, N. C., 4 Aug., 1850. He entered the Moravian Church in 1781, attended the flourishing school of the Moravian church in 1790, and was sent to Surinam, South America, where he served seven years. He was then transferred to the United States, and until 1821 labored in the ministry, after which he was appointed administrator of the estates of the southern diocese, retiring in 1844. He revised and improved a "Dictionary" and translated a "Harmony of the Gospels" into the Arrawak language. His son, Henry Augustus, Moravian bishop, b. in Surinam, South America, 7 Feb., 1806; d. in Bethlehem, Pa., 21 Oct., 1883, was a graduate of the Moravian theological seminary, and filled various pastoral offices. In 1848 he was elected a delegate to the general synod that convened at Herrnhut, Saxony, and on 31 July, 1844, he was consecrated to the episcopacy at Bethlehem. He promoted, with great zeal, the cause of home missionary work in the United States, and labored in Canada, New York and other cities. Among the numerous eminent men that sat to him were Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and Prince Napoleon (afterward Napoleon III.), whose portraits he painted in 1838. He was for many years a captain in the New York 7th regiment and a member of the veteran corps.

SHUNK, Francis Rawn, governor of Pennsylvania, b. in Trappe, Montgomery co., Pa., 7 Aug., 1788; d. in Harrisburg, Pa., 30 July, 1848. He obtained an education by his own exertions, taught at the age of fifteen, became a clerk in the office of Andrew Porter, the surveyor-general, at Harrisburg, in 1812, and while thus employed studied law. He was for many years clerk of the state house of representatives, and subsequently secretary of the board of canal commissioners, 1818-85; officer of state, 1842-5, and governor of the state of Pennsylvania. He was elected himself as a lawyer at Pittsburg, and in 1844 he was elected governor. He was re-elected in 1847, and resigned on 9 July, 1848, when sickness prevented the further discharge of his duties. His son, WILLIAM FINDLAY, is the author of "A Practical Treatise on Railway Curves" (Philadelphia, 1854).—His grandson, Francis Rawn, graduated at the head of the class of 1887 at the U. S. military academy.

SHURLEFF, Ernest Warburton, poet, b. in Boston, Mass., 4 April, 1862. He was educated at Boston Latin school and Harvard, was graduated at Andover theological seminary in 1888, and became pastor of a Congregational church at Palmer, Mass. He began to write for newspapers and magazines at the age of fourteen, received a thorough musical education, and has published songs and other compositions and several volumes entitled "Poems" (Boston, 1882); "Easter Gleams" (1884); "Song of Hope" (New York, 1885); "When I was a Child" (Boston, 1886); and "New Year's Peace" (1889).

SHURLEFF, Nathaniel Bradstreet, antiquary, b. in Boston, Mass., 29 June, 1810; d. there, 17 Oct., 1874. He was the son of Dr. Benjamin Shurtleff, whose donations to the college in Alton, Ill., caused that institution to assume his name. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1831, and at the medical department in 1834, but gave his attention to literary and scientific pursuits. His list of works in geology, paleontology and the subject that he traced his descent to eleven of the Pilgrims of the "Mayflower," a number probably exceeding that of any of his contemporaries. For three terms he was mayor of Boston (1868-70), and he proved himself on the fact that he was the first to hold that office who had always belonged to the Democratic party. During his administration he studied and recommended the measures necessary to the rapid growth of South Boston, were effected in that district, and Dorchester became a part of Boston. His books include "Epitome of Phrenology" (Boston, 1855); "Perpetual Calendar for Old and New Style" (1849); "Passengers of the "Mayflower" in 1620" (1849); "Brief Notice of William Shurtleff, of Marshfield" (1849); "Genealogical Memoir of the Shur-
Dr. of Elder Thomas Leavett, of Boston" (1850); "Thunder and Lightning, and Deaths in Marshfield in 1638 and 1666" (1850); "Records of the Governor of and Company of the Massachusetts Bay in New England, 1628-1689" (5 vols. in 6, 1853-54); with David Pulsifer edited "Records of the Colony of New Plymouth in New England" (11 vols., 1853-61); "Decimal System for Librarians" (1856); and "Memoir of the Inauguration of the Statue of Franklin" (1857).

SHURTLEFF, Roswell Morse, artist, b. in Providence, R.I., 14 June, 1838. About 1857 he went to Buffalo, where for two years he studied drawing. In 1859 he entered the Art Institute of Buffalo, and studied at the National Institute, and afterward continued to furnish drawings to various periodicals and to the wood-engravers. About 1870 he began to devote himself entirely to painting. His animal paintings first gained him distinction, and of these the best known are "The Wolf at the Door" and "A Race for Life" (1878). Among his later works in oil, most of which are scenes in the Adirondacks, are "On the Alert" (1879); "Autumn Gold" (1880); "Gleams of Sunshine" (1881); and "A Song of Summer Woods" (1886). His watercolors include "Harvest Time," "Basin Harbor, Lake Champlain," and "The Morning Drought" (1875). Morse has had in the National Gallery of Art. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1880, and is a member of the Water-color society.

SHUTE, Samuel, colonial governor, b. in London, England, in 1662; d. in England, 15 April, 1742. He was brought up as a dissenter in religion, being a grandson of the Puritan divine, Joseph Carvil, and was educated at the University of Leiden, and at the University of Utrecht, in the Eastern Netherlands. Entering the army, he served under the Prince of Orange, and afterward under the Duke of Marlborough in the Netherlands, attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1716 he obtained a commission as royal governor of Massachusetts, paying a bonus of $1,000 to Col. Elisha Burgess, the first appointee by Governor Winthrop, and receiving a salary of $2,400 and a commission as a freeman, but obstinate, and from the beginning was engaged in a struggle with the assembly over the prerogative. The financial depression resulting from Indian wars he attempted to relieve by the emission of treasury bills, condemning a banking scheme that was favored by the legislature. He endeavored to make treaties with the eastern Indians, and win them from the influence of Sebastian Rasle. A controversy with Elisha Cooke with regard to the royal rights to ship timber in the forests of Maine and the conduct of the king's surveyor, led him to annul Cooke's election to the council in 1718. The assembly retorted by charging Cooke their speaker, but the governor refused to recognize the election. He had a dispute with the General Court over the conduct of the governor. When he demanded a fixed salary the representatives reduced the amount voted to him in the form of a present to $500, and, on his insisting on an annual payment of $1,000, gave him that amount in currency, worth but $500. In 1723 he went to England to urge his charges against the general court, and was there in three months detained and imprisoned. The points at issue were settled by an explanatory charter that was signed on 12 Aug., 1725, and adopted by the general court on 15 Jan., 1726, which denied the right of the legislature to adjourn at will for more than two days, and gave the governor a negative over the choice of speaker, but contained no injunction for fixing the salaries of the crown officials. When Shute was about to take ship again for Massachusetts, in June, 1727, the king died, and the new cabinet that came into office appointed another governor.

SHUTE, Samuel Moore, educator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 Jan., 1823. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1844, and studied theology in the seminary of the Reformed church, Philadelphia. He was pastor of a Baptist church in Pemberton, N. J., from 1853 till 1856, and then of one at Alexandria, Va., till 1859, when he became professor of the English language and literature in Columbia university, Washington, D. C. He is the author of a "Manual of Anglo-Saxon" (New York, 1867).

SIBIEL, Alexander, known as FRAY DOMINGO, German antiquary, b. in Salzburg in 1709; d. in Dussel in 1791. He studied at Meclim, became a Jesuit, and was sent to New Spain in 1754. After being for several years a professor in the college of the order in Mexico, he was appointed vicar of a remote parish in the northern part of the country, where he discovered some half-buried monuments of the Aztec architecture covered with hieroglyphs. He devoted several years to their study, buying, meanwhile, Aztec antiquities whenever he could find them, and at last was enabled to read part of the inscriptions. Distinguished men of science, like Ventura and Guadix, his predecessors, endeavored to decipher Aztec inscriptions. Toward 1750 Sibiel returned to Germany and was appointed chaplain at the court of Anhalt. His works include "De arte Hieroglyphica Mexicanorum" (Dussel, 1782); "Reisen in Mexico" (2 vols., 1785); and "Litterae anno Societatis Jesu in provincia Mexicana" (5 vols., 1785).

SIBLEY, George Izard, explorer, b. in Georgia. A graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, and a member of the class of 1839. His father, Col. John Sibley, a surgeon in the Revolutionary army, and a daughter of Samuel Hopkins, of Newport, and was brought up in North Carolina. He went to St. Louis, Mo., during Jefferson's administration as an employe of the Indian bureau, and in 1843 was engaged in the purchase of the Choctaw and Seminole cessions for the government. Escorting a band of Osage warriors, he explored the Grand Saline and Salt mountains, publishing an account of the expedition. After retiring from the Indian department, he was appointed a commissioner to survey a road from Missouri to New Mexico, and made several treaties with Indian tribes. He and his wife, Freda, the founders of Landersville college, St. Charles, Mo., giving the land on which it is built. He was interested in the scheme of African colonization and other philanthropic objects.—His nephew, Henry Hopkins, soldier, b. in Natchez, La., 25 May, 1810; d. in Fredericksburg, Va., 23 Aug., 1889. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1839, and was lieutenant of dragoons, was promoted 1st lieutenant on 8 March, 1840, took part in the expedition against the Seminoles in the Everglades, and served as adjutant of his regiment till 1846. He was engaged in the military occupation of Texas, was made a captain on 16 Feb., 1847, and took part in all the principal operations of the Mexican war, assisting the brevet of major for gallantry in the affair at Medlin, near Vera Cruz. He served for several years on the Texas frontier against the Indians, was stationed in Kansas during the antislavery conflict, took part in the Utah expedition and in the Navajo expedition of 1869, and, while stationed in New Mexico, was promoted major, but resigned on the same day, 13 May, 1861, in order to join the Confederate army. He soon received a commission as brigadier-general, and on 3 July was assigned to the command of the Department of Mexico, and intrusted with the task of driving therewith the National forces. He raised a brigade in northwestern Texas, left Fort Bliss in January, 1862, to effect the conquest of New Mexico, appeared before Fort Craig on 16 Feb., and on 21 Feb. fought with Col. Edward R. S. Canby the engagement at Valverde. It was a hard-fought battle with the withdrawal of the National troops. He occupied Albuquerquè and Santa Fe, but in April was compelled to evacuate the territory. Subsequently he served with his brigade under Gen. Richard Taylor and Gen. E. Kirby Smith. In December, 1862, he entered the service of the khedive of Egypt with the rank of brigadier-general, and was assigned to the duty of constructing seacoast and river defenses. At the termination of his five years' contract he returned, with broken health, to the United States. He was the inventor of a tent for troops modelled after the wigwams of the Sioux and Comanche Indians. He obtained letters-patent, and the U. S. government, while he was in its service, contracted for the use of the tent. At the close of the American war he served for a time in the army, and was finally honorably discharged. After his release from the service he made an extensive tour of the United States, and in the summer of 1865 he retired to his home in New York. In previous years he had conceived the plan of interposing telegraphy between the states of the Union, and a prize of $300,000 was offered him for the accomplishment of the plan. He was also interested in the plan of uniting the scattered plants and conflicting patents in the hands of a single corporation. Lines that had proved un-

SIBLEY, John Langdon, librarian, b. in Union, Me., 29 Dec., 1804; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 9 Dec., 1883. He was graduated at Harvard in 1825, and entered in divinity-school. While he was in college much of his time was spent in working in the library, and he was assistant librarian in the divinity-school in 1825-6. In 1829 he was ordained pastor of the first church in Stow, Mass., where he remained four years. From 1833 till 1841 he was engaged in literary work in Cambridge, and during part of this period he was editor and proprietor of the "American Magazine of Useful and Entertaining Knowledge." When Gore hall, the present library building of Harvard, was opened in 1841, Mr. Sibley was appointed assistant librarian under Dr. Thaddeus William Harris. On the latter's death in 1856, Mr. Sibley was appointed librarian, which post he held for twenty-one years, until 1877, when, owing to his age and the failure of sight, the trustees, hoping to preserve him from further work made librarian emeritus. Owing to his persistent requests for all kinds of printed matter, and his earnest appeals for pecuniary aid, the number of volumes increased from 41,000 in 1841 to 164,000 volumes, and almost as many pamphlets, in 1877, and its permanent fund from $5,000 to $170,000 in the same period. From 1839 till his retirement he was the editor of the triennial and quinquennial catalogues. He first inserted obituary dates in the triennial of 1845, and from 1849 solicited and preserved biographical notes of the graduates. After 1860 he inserted in the triennials his "Appeal to Graduates and Others" for biographical sketches, giving a list of questions for guidance in their preparation. From 1850 till 1859 he also edited the "Compendium," a useful book of reference. He was indefatigable in his quest for biographical information and exact dates, and had the reverence of a Chminan for scraps of paper, utilizing odds and ends, especially the blank insides of envelopes, upon which many of his most valuable memoranda were made. These notes, accumulated during more than half a century, together with his letters and journals, he received during the last forty years, were chronologically arranged and bound, and his very large collection of newspaper-cuttings relating to graduates was carefully indexed and arranged in scrap-books. For thirty-seven years he led the singing of the 7th Psalm at the commencement dinner. Bowdoin conferred upon him the honorary degree of A. M. in 1856. He was a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences, and from 1846 an active member of the Massachusetts historical society, and he was also a member of other historical societies. He received the degree of D. L. L. from the university of Pennsylvania. He was elected a student from the charity fund of Phillips Exeter academy, he began in 1862 a series of gifts to that institution, which amounted at the time of his death to more than $39,000, the income from which is to be used for the support of meritorious and needy students. He was not known as the donor until the dedication of the new academy building in 1872. He published "Index to the Writings of George Washington" (Boston, 1857); "History of the Town of Union, Me." (1851); "Index to the Works of John Adams" (1853); and "Notices of the Triennial and Annual Catalogues of Harvard University, with a Reprint of the Catalogues of 1871, 1882, and 1768" (1865). His last and greatest work, upon which he spent many years, was research and amending labor, in "Biographical Sketches of Graduates of Harvard University," three volumes of which have been published (1873-5). In the prefice to his third volume, written nine months before his death, he says: "I have passed my eightieth birthday, and have expended such working power as remained to this last in the volume now given to the public, and to do no more. But the work will be continued by younger hands, into which will pass a large mass of materials—the accumulated collections of more than half a century." SIBLEY, Mark Hopkins, jurist, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., in 1790; d. in Canandaigua, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1852, received a classical education, removed to Canandaigua in 1814, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and gained a high reputation as an advocate. He was a member of the New York legislature in 1814-5, and was elected as a Whig to congress, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1839. At the close of his term he was elected a state senator, and in 1846 became county judge. He was a member of a charming social circle in Canandaigua, with David Gideon Seaman, and the brothers George and William Wood. His cousin, Hiram, financier, b. in North Adams, Mass., 6 Feb., 1807; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 12 July, 1888, received a common-school education. He practised the shoemaker's trade without preparatory training, and, emigrating to western New York at the age of sixteen, worked as a journeyman in Lima and Yonkers, and plied his trade in various places, and was a partner at the same time in a machine-shop. He established a machine-shop at Mendon, and, in 1843 removed to Rochester, on being elected sheriff of Monroe county. He was instrumental in obtaining from congress an appropriation in aid of the Safety's R. M. Weir's experiments, and interested himself in telegraphy from the beginning. When the invention came into practical use, the business being divided between many companies, Mr. Sibley, who, with other citizens of Rochester, was interested in two of the largest viz., the Atlantic, Lake, and Mississippi Valley and the New York, Albany, and Buffalo—introduced the plan of uniting the scattered plants and conflicting patents in the hands of a single corporation. SIBLEY, Solomon, jurist, b. in Sutton, Mass.,

7 Oct., 1769; d. in Detroit, Mich., 4 April, 1846. He studied law, and began practice in Marietta, Ohio, in 1795, removing in the following year to Cincinnati, and a year later to Detroit, Mich. He was elected to the first legislature of the North-western territory in 1799, and was a delegate to congress from the territory of Michigan in 1829-32. He was appointed a judge of the supreme court of Michigan, and held that office until he was compeld by deafness to resign in 1835. His son, Hon. W. T. Sibley, was born in Mendota, Ill., Feb. 18, 1811; d. at St. Paul, Minn., 18 Feb., 1891. He began the study of law, but abandoned it to engage in mercantile business at Sault Sainte Marie, and soon afterwards entered the employment of the American fur company, became a partner, and on 7 Nov., 1834, during one of his trips, reached the mouth of the Minnesota river, and was so delighted with the spot, that he purchased land at Mendota, the first stone house within the present limits of the state of Minnesota. He devoted much of his time to the sports of the frontier, which he described in graphic style in the "Spirit of the Times," and "Turf, Field, and Farm," over the pen-name of Hal, a Pioneer. When the state of Minnesota was admitted to the Union by a joint resolution of both houses, 15 May, 1849, the western boundary was fixed at St. Croix river, leaving an area of about 23,000 square miles, on the east of Mississippi river, including some organized counties, without a government. The acting governor of the territory issued a proclamation providing for the election of a delegate to represent this district in congress, and Mr. Sibley was chosen in November, 1848. After much delay and discussion, he was admitted to his seat, 15 June, 1849, and secured the passage of an act creating the territory of Minnesota, which embraced the rest of Wisconsin and a vast area west of the Mississippi. He was elected a delegate to congress from Minnesota in 1849, and re-elect ed in 1851, when he declined longer to be a candidate. He was a member of the Democratic branch of the convention that framed in 1857 the state constitution that was adopted by the people in November of the same year. The state was admitted to the Union on 11 May, 1858, and he was inaugurated as governor in the same month. He opposed the loan of state credit to railroad companies, and, when a constitutional amendment was carried authorizing the issue of bonds, he refused to send them out except on security of trust deeds from the companies giving a priority of lien upon all their property. But this ruling was negated by the decision of the supreme court, thus leaving the way open for the issue of an indefinite amount of first mortgage bonds, and resulting in the bankruptcy of the companies and the repudiation of the bonds by the people of Minnesota. When the great Sioux rising occurred on the Iowa and Minnesota frontier in 1862 (see Little Crow) he commanded the white forces composed of volunteer citizens. Notwithstanding the delay in procuring arms and ammunition, only five weeks elapsed before the decisive battle of Wau 图卢, 28 Sept., broke the power of the savages. Their capture followed two days later. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and afterward brevetted major-general. He was appointed a member of the board of Indian commissioners during President Grant's administration, and in 1871 was elected to the legislature, where, during the ensuing session, he made a vigorous and fine speech in favor of the redemption of the state railroad bonds, being thus instrumental in restoring the credit of Minnesota. He received the degree of LL. D. from Princeton in 1888. Gen. Sibley held the offices of president of the Chamber of commerce of St. Paul, where he resided, of the board of regents of the State university, and of the State historical society, to whose "Collections" he made many contributions. He was engaged in the business of coach-making, invented in 1818 a new method of producing artificial light, and became an extensive manufacturer of lamps. Before the war he was connected with various military organizations. He entered the U. S. service on 17 June, 1861, as colonel of the 3d regiment of the Pennsylvania reserve corps, and succeeded Gen. George G. Meade in the command of the brigade. He commanded a brigade in Gen. George Crook's Kanawha valley expedition of 1864, and afterward one in the 5th army corps till the close of the war. He participated in the principal battles of the Army of the Potomac, lost his left elbow-joint, be-

SICKLES, Daniel Edgar, soldier, b. in New York city, Oct. 20, 1835. He was educated at the University of the city of New York, but left to learn the printer's trade, which he followed for several years. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1841, and began practice in New York city. In 1847 he was elected to the legislature, in which body he took rank as a leader of the Democrats. In 1855 he was appointed corporation counsel of New York city, and on 30 July of the same year he was commissioned as secretary of legation at London, and accompanied James Buchanan to England. He returned in 1855, was elected, after an energetic canvass, to the state senate in the autumn, and a year later was chosen a member of congress, taking his seat on 7 Dec., 1857. Discovering a guilty intimacy between his wife, who was the daughter of Antonio Fagoli and Philip Broxson, C. B., of New York, and Miss Ada Evelyn, he shot the latter in the street on 27 Feb., 1859. He was indicted for murder, and after a trial of twenty days was acquitted. He had been elected for a second term in 1858, and served till 3 March, 1861. At the beginning of the civil war he raised the Excelsior brigade of U. S. volunteers in New York city, and was commissioned by the president as colonel of one of the five regiments. On 3 Sept., 1861, the president nominated him brigadier-general of volunteers. The senate rejected his name in March, 1862, but confirmed a second nomination. He commanded a brigade under General Joseph Hooker, and gained distinction at Williamsburg, Fair Oaks, and Malvern Hill. His brigade saw severe service in the seven days' fight before Richmond and in the Maryland campaign, and bore a conspicuous part at Antietam. He succeeded Gen. Hooker in the command of the division, and was engaged at Fredericksburg.

On the reorganization of the Army of the Potomac he was assigned to the command of the 3d army corps, and was appointed major-general on 7 March, 1863, his commission dating from 29 Nov., 1862. At Chancellorsville he displayed gallantry and energy, gaining the first success of the day by cutting off an advance of the enemy, arising in a general panic by retreating artillery, and withdrawing the force of Stonewall Jackson's attack with determination after the line was formed. At Gettysburg his corps was posted between Cemetery hill and Little Round Top. He advanced to an elevation which he thought desirable to hold, and in this position was assailed by Gen. James Longstreet's column, while Gen. John B. Hood endeavored to gain the unoccupied slope of Little Round Top. In the demonstration that followed, the 3d corps effectively aided in preserving that important position from the enemy, but was shattered by the onset of overwhelming numbers. After the line was broken, Gen. Ambrose P. Hill followed the Confederate advantage with an attack on Sickles's right, during which Gen. Sickles lost a leg. He continued in active service till the beginning of the following year, and commanded the 3d corps in the operations of service, occupying field and forest. On 2 March, 1865, he was brevetted major-general for bravery at Fredericksburg, and major-general for gallant and meritorious service at Gettysburg. He commanded the military district of the Carolinas in 1865-7, and carried out the work of reconstruction so energetically that President Johnson relieved him from his command, after first offering him the mission to the Netherlands, which he declined. He was mustered out of the volunteer service on 1 Jan., 1868, and on 11 April, 1869, was placed on the retired list of the U. S. army with the rank of major-general. He was active in promoting the candidacy of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant for the presidency in 1868, and in 1869 was appointed minister to Spain. He relinquished this post on 20 March, 1873, and resumed his residence in New York city. He was president of the New York state board of civil service commissioners, and likewise of the board of commissioners for the erection of New York monuments at Gettysburg.

SICOTÉ. Louis Victor, Canadian jurist, b. in St. Famine, Canada, Nov. 1812; d. 3 Sept., 1859. He was admitted as an advocate in 1838, entered the parliament of Canada in 1851, became a member of the executive council in 1856, and was speaker in 1854-7. He was appointed queen's counsel in 1854, and judge of the supreme court of the province of Quebec in 1863, resigning in 1867.

SIDELL, William Henry, soldier, b. in New York city, 21 Aug., 1839; d. there, 30 June, 1873. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1853, and assigned to the artillery, but resigned in order to follow the profession of civil engineering. He was successively city surveyor of New York, assistant engineer of the Croton aqueduct, and division engineer of railroads in Massachusetts and New York. In the construction of the Richardson canal he acted as chief engineer. He was employed by the U. S. government on surveys of the delta of Mississippi river. In 1839-53 he was chief engineer of the railroad between Quincy and Galena, Ill. He was appointed in 1859 chief engineer of the projected Tehamaee railroad, and had completed the surveys when the political troubles in the United States caused its abandonment of the enterprise. He volunteered at the beginning of the civil war, but before he received an appointment he was restored to the regular army on its enlargement, with the rank of major, 11 May, 1861. He mustered and organized recruits in Louisville, Ky., and Nashville, Tenn., was also disbanding officer, and planned a system by which more than 200,000 soldiers were mustered into the service. He was relieved from the duties of service, disbanded, without errors or delays. From May, 1863, till the close of the war he was acting assistant provost-marshal for Kentucky. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 10th infantry on 6 May, 1864, and received the brevets of colonel and brigadier-general on 30 March, 1865, and on 15 Dec., 1866, was retired from service, in consequence of a paralytic attack.
SIGEL, Franz, soldier, b. in Sinsheim, Baden, 18 Nov. 1824. After completing his studies at the gymnasium of Bruchsal, he entered the military school at Carlshutte, and was graduated in 1843. While a lieutenant, stationed at Mannheim, he assumed the standing army in public writings, and thus became involved in political disputes with his brother officers. Toward the close of 1847, after a duel that terminated fatally for his antagonist, he resigned. When the Baden revolution began, in February, a company of volunteers, organized the lake district at Constance, led a body of more than 4,000 volunteers against Freiburg, and was beaten in two encounters with the royal troops. He escaped across the French border, 28 April, and made his way into Switzerland. The insurrection of May, 1849, recalled him to Baden. He was made commandant of the lake and Upper Rhine district, then placed in charge of the army of the Neckar, met the royal forces at Heidelberg on 30 May, became minister of war, and finally succeeded to the chief command of the troops. He fought in several battles under Gen. Louis Mioberslawski, whom he succeeded, conducted the army of 15,000 men in retreat through three hostile army corps, and crossed the Rhine with the remnant into Switzerland on 11 July. While residing at Lugano he was arrested by the Federal authorities in the spring of 1851, and delivered over to the French police, who conducted him to Haye with the intention of placing him on a ship bound for the United States. He, however, went to England, lived in London and Brighton, and in May, 1852, sailed for New York. After his marriage to a daughter of Rudolf Dolon, he taught in the latter's school, at the same time translating and forwarding to arms into German, and conducting "Die Revue," a military magazine, till 1858, when he was appointed to St. Louis, Mo., as teacher of mathematics and history in the German institute. He was elected a director of the public schools of that city, edited a military journal, and during the secession crisis defended northern principles in newspaper articles.

At the beginning of the civil war he organized a regiment of infantry and a battery, which rendered efficient service at the occupation of the arsenal and the capture of Camp Jackson. In June, 1861, he was sent with his regiment and two batteries to Rolla, where he marched to Neosho, compelled the retreat of Gen. Sterling Price into Arkansas, then turned northward in order to confront Claiborne Jackson, at Carthage sustained a long conflict on the open prairie with a force much greater than his own, and finally retreated in good order, with constant fighting, to Springfield and Mt. Vernon. He took part in the fight at Dug Springs, and after the battle of Wilson's Creek conducted the retreat of the army from Springfield toward Rolla. He was commissioned as brigadier-general, to date from 17 May, 1861. In the autumn campaign of Gen. John C. Fremont he commanded the advance-guard, and in the retreat from Springfield he commanded the rear-guard, consisting of two divisions. He took command of the right wing of the troops assembled under Gen. Samuel R. Curtis at Rolla, and gained the battle of Pea Ridge by a well-timed assault. He thereupon made a major-general, dating from 21 March, 1862, and was ordered to the east and placed in command of the troops at Harper's Ferry. He cooperated in the movement against Gen. Thomas J. Jackson at Winchester, and Gen. John Pope was placed in command of the newly created army of Virginia. Sigel, in command of the 1st corps, took part in the engagements beginning with Cedar Creek and ending with Bull Run, where he commanded the right wing, and won in the first day's fight a decided advantage over Jackson. After the battle he advanced the next day to Generals' Rock, held the advanced position at Fairfax Court-House and Centreville. He commanded the 4th grand reserve division until that organization was abolished, when he assumed command of the 11th corps, took leave of absence on account of failing health, and was superseded by Gen. Oliver O. Howard. In June, 1863, he took command of the reserve army of Pennsylvania, and organized a corps of 10,000 men to aid in repelling Lee's invasion. In February, 1864, President Lincoln appointed him to the command of the Department and the Army of West Virginia. He fitted out an expedition that operated under Gen. George Crook in the Kanawha valley, and led a smaller one of 7,000 men through the Shenandoah valley against Lynchburg and Lexington, and crossed the Potomac at the ford of East Halls Bridge at New Market. He was thereupon relieved, and in June, 1864, put in command of the division guarding Harper's Ferry. He repelled the attack of Gen. Jubal A. Early on Maryland Heights, but was relieved of his command soon afterward, and retired to Bethesda, Pa., to recruit his health. He resigned his commission on 4 May, 1865, and became editor of the Baltimore "Whirl-Worm" paper. On 1 September, 1867, he removed to New York city. In 1859 he was the Republican candidate for secretary of state in New York. He was appointed collector of internal revenue in May, 1857, and in October was elected register of the city of New York. After his three years' term expired he lectured, and edited a weekly paper. Since 1856 he has been an advisor of the Democratic party, and was appointed pension-agent in New York city. He contributed a memoir of his part in the German revolution to Friedrich Recker's "Erhebung des Volkes in Baden für die deutsche Republik" (Bassel, 1848), and while in Switzerland published a republican brochure entitled, "Fürstenstaat und Volkstaat" (St. Gall, 1848); the circulation of which was forbidden in Germany, and the author was sentenced in contumacia to four years' imprisonment.—His brother, Albert, soldier, b. in Sinsheim, Baden, 13 Nov., 1827; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 15 March, 1884, was graduated at the military academy at Carlshutte in 1843, and served as an officer in the grand-ducal army. He was sentenced to a year's confinement in the fortress of Kislar for his sympathy with the revolutionary movement, but was liberated in time to take part in the general uprising of the army and people in 1849 in command of a regiment of volunteers. He emigrated to England, and in 1852 came to the United States. Joining the 21 New Jersey volunteers at the beginning of the civil war, he was elected captain. After taking part in the battle of Bull Run, he assisted in organizing a New York regiment, and afterward organized and commanded a regiment of Missouri cavalry militia, and was stationed a regiment of Missouri cavalry militia, and was stationed in command of a brigade. He was made U. S. land-recorder after the war, and was appointed adjutant-general of Missouri by Gov. Gratz Brown. He was connected with the press as editorial writer and correspondent, and published a volume of German poems (St. Louis, 1863; enlarged ed., 1865). SIGOURNEY, Joseph (1766–1844), an Irish archbishop, b. in Quebec, 8 Nov., 1758; d. there, 3 Oct., 1830. He studied philosophy and theology in the Seminary of Quebec, was ordained priest in Langueil, 28 March, 1782, and was appointed assistant pastor at Chamilly, and subsequently at Langueil. In 1804 he became parish priest of St. Constant, and he was transferred to Sainte-Marie-de-Ransay in 1808. He went as missionary to Lake Champlain in 1809, to take charge of the French Canadians that had settled in its neighborhood, but in 1814 he was appointed pastor of Quebec. He was chosen coadjutor to Bishop Panet in 1826, named bishop of Fusseaux by a bull of Leo XII. the same year, and consecrated under this title on 29 May, 1827. He became administrator of the diocese on 13 Oct., 1832, and on 14 Feb., 1833, succeeded to the bishopric of Quebec. Bishop Sigourney excited hostility among part of his flock by his efforts to prevent the Irish from building a church in Quebec, and, after it was erected, by his refusal to visit it. During the cholera epidemic of 1833 he displayed the utmost zeal and devotion. The same year he selected Pierre Flavien Turgeon as his coadjutor. He was consecrated bishop of Montreal, Kingston, and Toronto were placed under the metropolitan jurisdiction of Quebec, which was created an archbishopric. Although the title of archbishop had been given to his two predecessors, he was the first that was entitled to it officially. Several months after his nomination he received the pallium, which was brought to him from Rome. He showed great activity and disinterestedness during the conflagration that destroyed part of Quebec in 1845, sharing his means with those that were ruined; and during the ship fever of 1847 and 1848 he rallied his priests in personal sacrifices for the victims. In 1849 he found it necessary, from physical weakness, to confide the administration of the archdiocese to his coadjutor. The pastoral and other letters of Archbishop Sigourney are published in the 3d volume of the "Mandements des évêques de Quebec," which also contains a biography.

SIGOURNEY, Lydia Huntley, author, b. in Norwich, Conn., 1 Sept., 1791; d. in Hartford, Conn., 10 June, 1863. She was the daughter of Ezekiel Huntley, a soldier of the Revolution. She lived at the age of three, and at seven wrote a plain verse. After receiving a superior education at Norwich and Hartford, she taught for five years a select class of young ladies in the latter city. In 1815, at the suggestion and under the patronage of Daniel Wadsworth, she published her first volume, "Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse." In 1819 she became the wife of Charles Sigourney, a Hartford merchant, and the parent of five well-beloved children. Without neglecting her domestic duties, she thenceforth devoted her leisure to literature, at first to gratify her own inclinations and subsequently, after her husband had lost the greater part of his fortune, to add to her income. She soon attained a reputation that secured for her books a ready sale. In her posthumous "Letters of Life" (1846) she enumerates forty-six distinct works, wholly or partially from her pen, besides more than 20,000 articles in prose and verse that she had contributed to nearly 50 periodicals. Several of her books also attained a wide circulation in England, and they were also much read on the continent. She received from the queen of the French a handsome diamond bracelet as a token of that sovereign's esteem. Her []). Her poetry is not of the highest order. It portrays in graceful and often felicitous language the emotions and sympathies of the heart, rather than the higher conceptions of the intellect. Her prose is graceful and elegant, and is modeled to a great extent on that of Addison. The last-quarter of the 18th century and the early part of the 19th, who, in her youth, were regarded as the standards of polite literature. All her writings were penned in the interest of a pure morality; and many of them were decidedly religious. Perhaps no American writer has been more frequently called upon for gratuities, occasional poems of all kinds. To these requests she generally acceded, and often greatly to her own inconvenience. But it was not only through her literary labors that Mrs. Sigourney became known. Her whole life was one of active and earnest philanthropy. The poor, the sick, the unfortunate, the blind, the idiot, the slaves, and the convicts were the objects of her constant care and benefaction. Her pensioners were numerous, and not one of them was ever forgotten. During her early married life, she economized in her own wardrobe and personal luxuries that she might be able to relieve the needy, while later in her career she saved all that was not absolutely needed for home comforts and expenses for the same purpose. Her character and worth were highly appreciated in the city that for more than fifty years was her home. She never left it after her marriage, except when in 1840 she visited Europe; a record of which journey she published in "Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands."

S. H. Sigourney.
SIGÜENZA Y GONGORA

SIGÜENZA Y GONGORA, Carlos, Mexican historian, b. in the city of Mexico in 1643: d. there, 20 Dec., 1701. From the age of nine he lived and studied in his native city under the direction of his father, and in 1669 entered the Company of Jesus. In 1662 he published his first poem. He continued his mathematical and scientific studies, and in 1665 left the Jesuit order, being appointed chaplain of the hospital "Amor de Dios." There he became intimate with Juan de Alva Estellwache, who published in the year 1669 a collection of documents of his ancestors, the kings of Texcoco, and in 1668 Sigüenza began the study of Aztec history and the deciphering of the hieroglyphs and symbolic writings of the Toltecs. In 1681 he was appointed by Charles II, royal cosmographer and professor of mathematics in the University of Mexico, and in 1693 he was sent by the vicerey, Gaspar de Sandoval y Cisneros, to accompany Admiral Andres de Pecza in a scientific exploration of the Gulf of Mexico. On his return he entered the Jesuit order again, and, after falling into Exiliotontli's collection of documents, gave the last years of his life in the retirement of the hospital to the completion of his works on ancient Mexican history. Sigüenza was also a poet. His principal works include: "Primavera Indiana" (Mexico, 1692); "Las glorias de Queretaro," a poem (1666); "Libra Astronomic" (1681); "Manifiesto filosofico contra los Cometas" (1681); "Los importunios de Alonso Ramirez," describing the adventures of a man that was captured by pirates in the Philippines, but escaped in a boat and was taken on the coast of China (1690); "Relacion historico de las sucesos de la Armada de Bartolome en la isla de Santo Domingo con la Quinta del Guiana" (1684); "Mercurio Volante o Papel Periodico" (1693); and "Descripción de la bahia de Santa Maria de Galve, alia Panzaca, de la Mobilidad del Rio Mispsil" (1684). Of his many manuscripts, only fragments were preserved after his death, and the rest were burned shortly after his death. He was employed in haste to print them. The most interesting are "Historia del Imperio de los Chichimecas," "Genealogia de los Reyes Mexicanos," "Un fragmento de la Historia antigua de los Indians" (with illustrations), "Calendario de los meses y fiestas de los Mexicanos," "Cievografia Mexicana," "Antiguas cronicas de las vidas de Bernal Diaz de Castillo y P. Torquemada," and "Historia de la Provincia de Tejas."
everything he undertook, he was unusually successful, and a number were released at different times through his influence.

SILL, Edward Rowland, educator, b. in Windsor, Conn., 29 April, 1841; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 27 Feb., 1887. He was graduated at Yale in 1861, and, owing to feeble health, resided on the Pacific coast till July, 1866, when he returned to the east, and, after studying theology at Harvard divinity-school for some time, devoted himself to literary work in New York City. After teaching for three years in the county and city schools at Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, he accepted the office of principal of the high-school at Oakland, Cal., in 1871, and in 1874 was appointed professor of the English language and literature in the University of California, where he remained for eight years. He resigned his chair in 1882 to resume literary work, and returned to Cuyahoga Falls, where he remained until his death, which occurred in a hospital at Cleveland after he had undergone an operation. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps says: "He has left, I think, no volume but the 'Booke,' as he used to call it, privately printed as a farewell to his friends in California. . . . It contains some of the most delicate, most finished, and most musical poetic work that the country has produced. . . . He was personally beloved and respected by everyone who knew him. The volume referred to is the 'Hermitage, and other Poems' (New York, 1862).

SILL, John Mahlon Berry, educator, b. in Black Rock, Erie co., N. Y., 23 Nov., 1811. He was educated at Jonesville, and at the Michigan state normal school, of which he was the first male graduate, concluding his course of study in 1834. He also received the honorary degree of A. M. from the University of Michigan in 1831. From his graduation until 30 June, 1863, he was professor of the English language and literature in the Michigan state normal school. He was then chosen superintendent of the public schools of Detroit, which office he held until 1865. In 1865-75 he was principal of the Detroit female seminary, and from the latter year until his resignation in 1886 he was again superintendent of the public schools. Since that date he had been principal of the Michigan state normal school. He was president of the Michigan state teachers' association in 1861-2, a member for two years of the Detroit board of education, and one of the board of regents of the University of Michigan in 1860-1. He has published "Synthesis of the English Sentence" (New York, 1856), and "Practical Lessons in English" (1889).

ven, where he began the study of law with Simeon Baldwin, and in 1799 was appointed tutor at Yale, which place he held until he was admitted to the bar in 1802. Natural science was at that time beginning to attract the attention of educators, and, at the solicitation of President Dwight, he abandonned the profession of law and devoted himself to science. In September, 1802, he was chosen professor of chemistry and natural history at Yale, with permission to qualify himself for teaching these sciences from a list of books from Prof. John MacLean (q. v.), of Princeton. He proceeded to Philadelphia, where, during two winters, he studied chemistry under Prof. James Woodhouse, then professor of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania. In 1804 he delivered a partial course of lectures on chemistry, and during the following year he gave a complete course. He went abroad in March, 1805, to procure scientific books and apparatus, and spent about a year in study in Edinburgh and London, also visiting the continent and making the acquaintance of distinguished men of science. On his return he devoted himself to the duties of his chair, which included chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, until 1853, when he was made professor emeritus, but, at the special request of his colleagues, continued his lectures on geology until 1855, when he was succeeded by his son-law, James D. Dana. While in Edinburgh he became interested in the discussions, then at their height, between the Wernerians and Huttonians, and at tended lectures on geology; and on his return he began a study of the mineralogy of the vicinity of New Haven. About 1808 he persuaded the corporation of Yale to purchase the cabinet of minerals of Benjamin D. Perkins, and a few years later he secured the loan of the magnificent collection of George Gibbs (q. v.), which in 1825 became the property of the college. His scientific work, which was extensive, began with the examination in 1807 of the meteor that fell near Westford, Conn. He prepared fragments of, which he made a chemical analysis, and he wrote the earliest and best authenticated account of the fall of a meteor in America. In 1811 he began an extended course of experiments with the oxy-hydric or compound blowpipe that was invented by Robert Hare, and he succeeded in melting many of the most refractory minerals, notably those containing alkalies and alkaline earths, the greater part of which had never been reduced before. After Sir Humphry Davy's discovery of the metallic bases of the alkalies, Prof. Silliman repeated the experiments and obtained for the first time in this country the metals sodium and potassium. In 1822, while engaged in a series of observations on the action of a powerful voltaic battery that he had made, similar to Dr. Hare's "delagator," he noticed that the charcoal points of the negative pole increased in size toward the positive pole, and, on further examination, he found that there was a corresponding cavity on the point of the latter. He inferred, therefore, that an actual transfer of the matter of the charcoal points from one to another took place, and, on careful examination, he found that the charcoal had been fused. This fact of the fusion of the carbon in the voltaic arc was long disputed in Europe, but is now universally accepted. In 1830 he explored Wyoming valley and its coal-formations, examining about one hundred mines and localities of mines; in 1832-3 he was engaged under a commission from the secretary of the treasury in a scientific examination on the subject of the culture and manufacture of sugar, and in 1836 he made a tour of investigation among the gold-mines of California. He was chosen professor of science in 1838 in New Haven, where he delivered a course in chemistry. He delivered his first course in Hartford in 1834, and in Lowell, Mass., in the autumn of that year. During the years that followed he lectured in Salem, Boston, New York, Baltimore, Washington, St. Louis, New Orleans, and elsewhere in the United States. In 1842 he opened his institution of lectures on geology, and in the three following years he lectured there on chemistry. This series was without doubt the most brilliant of the kind that was ever delivered in this country, and its influence in developing an interest in the growing science was very great. Many of the present leaders in science trace their first inspiration to these courses. Through his influence in 1830 the historical paintings of Col. John Trumbull, and the building in which they were formerly deposited (now the college treasury), were procured for Yale. He opposed slavery in all its forms. Among the various colonies sent from the eastern states during the Kansas troubles was owned by him, and, at a meeting held prior to its departure in April, 1856, the discovery was made that the party was unprowed with rifles. A subscription was proposed at once, and Prof. Silliman spoke in favor of it. This insignificant action was soon raised abroad, and, owing to the strong feeling between the partisan of slavery and those who opposed it, the subject was discussed in the U. S. Senate. During the civil war he was a firm supporter of President Lincoln, and exerted his influence toward the abolition of slavery. The degree of M. D. was conferred on him by Bowdoin in 1818, and that of LL. D. by Middlebury in 1826. Prof. Silliman was chosen first president in 1849 of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, which has since grown into the American association for the advancement of science, and he was one of the corporate members named by congress in the formation of the National academy of sciences in 1863. Besides his connection with other societies in this country and abroad, he was corresponding member of the Geological societies of Great Britain and France. In 1818 he founded the American Journal of Sci-

science," which he conducted as sole editor until 1838, and as senior editor until 1846, when he transferred the journal to his son and to James D. Dana. This journal is now the oldest scientific publication in the United States. Prof. Silliman edited three editions of William Henry's "Elements of Chemistry" (Boston, 1808, 11, also three editions of Robert Bakewell's "Introduction to Geology" (New Haven, 1829, 1833, and 1839); and was the author of "Journals of Travels in England, Holland, and Scotland" (New York, 1838); "A Short Tour between Hartford and Quebec in the Fall of 1829," a 'History of the Students of Chemistry in the Order of Lectures given in Yale College" (2 vols., New Haven, 1830-1); "Consistency of Discoveries of Modern Geology with the Sacred History of the Creation and Deluge" (London, 1857); and "Narrative of a Visit to Europe in 1851" (2 vols., 1853). He was called by Edward Everett the "Nestor of American Science." Prof. Silliman was married twice. His first wife was Harriet Trumbull, the daughter of the second Gov. Jonathan Trumbull. One of his daughters married Prof. Oliver P. Hubbard, and another Prof. James D. Dana. A bronze statue of Prof. Silliman was erected on the Yale grounds in front of Farnam college in 1854. See "Life of Benjamin Silliman," by George P. Porter, (2 vols., New York, 1860); "Benjamin Silliman, 1787-1866" (New Haven, 1867), 4 Dec., 1866; or, there, 14 Jan., 1867, was graduated at Yale in 1827, and at once became assistant to his father, under whom he had served in a similar capacity during the explorations in the gold region of Virginia in 1836. Some of the lectures in the departments of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology were delivered by him, and he also devoted himself largely to the study of geology and to a special knowledge of chemistry. In 1838 he fitted up at his own expense an apartment in the old laboratory of the college, where he received private pupils, notably John P. Norton and T. Sherry Hunt, and there he likewise conducted his earliest scientific researches. In 1846 he urged upon the corporation of Yale the foundation of a department for the study of applied science, and in consequence the School of applied chemistry was organized, with himself as its professor of chemistry, without salary. The movement was successful, and in 1847 the Yale scientific school was formed on the basis of this beginning, which, since 1830, in recognition of the gifts of Joseph E. Shebib, has borne his name. Prof. Silliman continued a member of the faculty of the scientific school until 1869, except during the years 1849-54, when he held the chair of medical chemistry and toxicology in the medical department of the University of Louisville, Ky. In 1854 he was called to give instruction in the academic and medical departments of Yale, in consequence of the resignations of Drs. Beal and Mooney, and held the general and applied chemistry in the college until 1870, but retained the appointment in the medical department until his death. On the invitation of citizens of New Orleans, he delivered in 1845-6 what is believed to have been the first series of lectures on agricultural chemistry in the United States, and subsequently he gave popular lectures on scientific subjects throughout the country. Prof. Silliman was a member of the common council of New Haven in 1843-9, and one of the trustees of the Peabody museum of natural history. His scientific work included many investigations in mineralogy, at first chiefly from the chemical side, including researches on meteorites as well as studies in geology and physical optics. Later he turned his attention more to applied science, including the examination of mines and the preparation of reports on questions connected with the chemical arts and manufactures; and he frequently appeared as an expert in court cases, and on mining matters. Prof. Silliman became one of the state chemists of Connecticut, and in that capacity was employed as a scientific witness in the courts. The collection of minerals that he accumulated during his expeditions over the country was sold in 1868 to Cornell university, where it bears the name of the Silliman cabinet. The mineralogical collections of Yale are indebted to him for the collections, and to his personal solicitation of funds, the Baron Lederer collection was secured in 1843 for the college. The honorary degree of M. D. was conferred on him by the University of South Carolina in 1849, and that of L L. D. by Jefferson medical college in 1884. Prof. Silliman was a member of many scientific societies, and was secretary of the American association of geologists and naturalists in 1843-4. He was named as one of the original members of the National academy of sciences by act of congress in 1863, and served on several of its most important committees, notably that appointed in 1882 to report on the use of sorghum as a source of sugar. Prof. Silliman had charge of the chemical, mineralogical, and geological departments of the Chemistry of Europe, 1843-53, and returned to the latter year until his death. His scientific papers were nearly one hundred in number, of which over forty were published in the "American Journal of Science," and they cover a wide range of topics. In addition, he published "First Principles of Chemistry" (Philadelphia, 1846; revised ed., 1856), of which more than 50,000 copies were sold; "Principles of Physics" (1848; revised ed., 1850); and "American Contributions to Chemistry." (1875). —The second gold Seleeck's son, Benjamin Douglas, lawyer, b. in Newport, R. I., 14 Sept., 1865, was graduated at Yale in 1874, and then studied law with James Kent and his son, William Kent, until 1889, when he was admitted to the bar. He opened an office in New York during that year, and has since been steadily engaged in the practice of his profession in that city, with his residence in Brooklyn. He has often served as a delegate from Kings county to National and state conventions of the Whig and Republican parties, including the one at Harrisburg in 1859, at which William Henry Harrison was nominated for the presidency. He was elected to the Whig Congress in 1888, and was nominated by the Whigs for congress in 1843, but failed of election, although he led the ticket of his party at the polls. In 1852 he received, but declined, the Whig nomination for the state senate. During the civil war he was an earnest supporter of the government, and in March, 1865, he was appointed by President Lincoln temporary attorney for the eastern district of New York. He held this office until September, 1866, and during that time argued in behalf of the government important questions that grew out of the civil war. In 1872 he was a member of the commission for revising the constitution of the state, and, as a chairman of one committee and a member of others, took an active part in the proceedings of that body. He was nominated in 1878 by the Republican party as their candidate for the office of attorney-general of New York, but failed of election. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Columbia in 1880, and by Yale in 1884. During his career in the state legislature he introduced the charter of Greenwood cemetery, and he is a trustee of that corporation. He has long been connected with the Long Island historical society, of which he is a director, and for more than twenty years he has been president of the Brooklyn club. Mr. Silliman was president of the New England seminary in its beginning, until 1878, when he declined a re-election, and was succeeded by the Yale alumni association of Long Island. He was one of the founders of the New York bar association, one of its vice-presidents, and a trustee of various charitable and benevolent associations.

—Benjamin Douglass's brother, Augustus Ely, financier, b. in Newport, R. l., 11 April, 1857; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 29 May, 1884, early entered commercial life and became connected with the Merchants' bank of New York. He was its president from 1857 until 1868, when failing health compelled his retirement from active business. He took part in the establishment of the Clearing house association in 1853, and was one of the committee that during the first six years of its existence also conducted its business. He was a member of the Long Island historical society, and in 1840-1 president of the New York mercantile library association. He published "A Gallop among American Scenery, or Sketches of American Scenes and Military Adventure" (New York, 1848; enlarged ed., 1848), and translated from the French 'Felton's Conversations with Mexico; or, Truth and Error in Letters on the Immortality of the Soul and the Freedom of the Will' (1869). In honor of the memory of his mother he bequeathed to Yale university nearly $100,000 for the foundation of an annual series of lectures in that university, "the general tendency of which may be such as will illustrate the presence and wisdom of God as manifested in the world through Christ and his church."

SILLIMAN, Justus Mitchell, mining engineer, b. in New Canaan, Conn., 25 Jan., 1842; d. in Easton, Pa., 15 April, 1896. He studied at New Canaan academy, enlisted at the beginning of the civil war, and served for three years, being wounded at Gettysburg. At the close of the war he settled in Troy, N. Y., where he taught in an academy, and was graduated at Rensselear polytechnic institute in 1870 with the degree of M. E. In September of that year he was called to the charge of the department of mining engineering and graphics in Lafayette college, which place he held till 1896. Prof. Silliman invented an instrument for orthographic, ichnographic, and crystallographic projection, also a water manometer and a water barometer, and was a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science and a member of the American institute of mining engineers, and has been president of the Lehigh valley microscopical society. His special work included various investigations, of which his examination of the Bessemer flame with chemical glass and his study of the professional pamphlet's writings were confined to transactions of societies that have been published in the SILLLOWAY. Titres of which he was a member, in Newburyport, Mass., William, architect, b. a good education, esp. 7 Aug., 1829. He received and devoted himself totally in the arts of design, tectural plans for public the preparation of architec buildings, in which business he established himself at Boston, Mass., in 1851. In the course of the next twenty years more than 300 church edifices were built or repaired under his superintendence, besides other public buildings, including the capital at Montpelier, Vt. (1857), the Soldiers' monument at Cambridge, Mass. (1870), and Buchtel college, Akron, Ohio (1872). After the earthquake in Charleston, S. C., in 1886, he was called to that city professionally and restored six of the church edifices that had been partially destroyed. In 1892 he began to preach to Universalist congregations, and in 1892 he was ordained a clergyman of that faith. He has published "The Geography of the Canaan of Evil" (Boston, 1856); "Text-Book of Modern Carpentry" (1863); "Warming and Ventilation" (1869); "Atkinson Memorial," a series of eighteen discourses (1861); "The Conference Melodist" (1863); "Cantica Sacra" (1865); "Oration of the Church of the Redeemer," at Brighton, Mass. (1867); and, with Lee L. Powers, "Cathedral Towns of England, Ireland, and Scotland" (1859). He died, with George M. Harding, an improved edition of Shaw's "Civil Architecture" (1852).

SILSBE, Joshua S., actor, b. in Lithfield, Conn., 4 Jan., 1815; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 22 Dec., 1855. He made his first appearance on the stage at Natchez, Miss., in the winter of 1837, and subsequently appeared in New Orleans, Mobile, and Charleston with the celebrated "Rose" at the Walnut street theatre, Philadelphia, in 1814. He appeared as a star soon afterward in Boston. Going to England in 1851, he was the first comedian to introduce Yankee characters on the stage in that country, opening at the Adelphi, London, in his favorite part of Jonathan Plongboy. During his residence in England, Tom Taylor gave him the only prize he ever won for public service, and for him the play that afterward became famous as "The American Cousin," though it is doubtful whether he ever appeared in it. After his death his widow brought the piece to the United States and sold it to Laura Keene. Soon afterward John Sleeper Clark brought out the play in Philadelphia, and from the dispute over ownership arose a long and bitter conflict between Mr. Leech and Mr. Clark, which was subsequently sold, or gave, her copy to Edward A. Sothern. The Yankee part was thus probably first played not by Silsbee, but by Joseph Jefferson, under Miss Keene's management.

SILSBE, Nathaniel, senator, b. in Essex county, Mass., in 1773; d. in Salem, Mass., 1 July, 1850. His father, Nathaniel, was a shipmaster in Salem. The son engaged in mercantile pursuits, and amassed a fortune. He served frequently in each branch of the Massachusetts legislature, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1821. He then declined a renomination. He was in the state senate in 1825-6, and was elected and re-elected to the 23rd, 26th, 31st, 32nd, and 33rd congresses, till 3 March, 1835. He was a firm supporter of the administration of John Quincy Adams.

SILVA, Francis Augustus, artist, b. in New York city, 4 Oct., 1835; d. there, 31 March, 1886. He worked as a sign-painter until the opening of the civil war, when he entered the National army. At the close of the war he settled in New York and devoted himself to the painting of marine subjects. He was elected a member of the Water-color society in 1872. Among his works are "Gray Day at Cape Ann"; "Sunrise in Boston Harbor"; "New London Light"; "September Day on the Coast" (1879); "Old Town by the Sea" (1880); "Old Connecticut Port" (1892); "Passing Showers" (1886); and "Near Atlantic City" (1888).
SILVA, José Laurencio, Venezuelan soldier, b. in Tucaré, 7 Sept., 1792; d. in Chiriqui, 27 Feb., 1853. When the revolutionary junta of Caracas was installed, 19 April, 1810, Silva offered his services and was appointed sergeant in the forces sent against the royalists of Orosi. He served under the orders of the Marqués del Toro, and on his return was made a colonel and went to take part in the campaign of 1811-12 under Gen. Miranda, a part of the capitulation of the latter. Silva escaped to the plains of Guarico, where he gathered a guerrilla force and continued to oppose the Spaniards till he joined Bolivar on the latter's invasion of Venezuela in 1813. Silva participated in the battles of Tagamáes, Araure, Barabita, and Mosquitia, and in the famous defense of La Victoria, 12 Feb., 1814, where his troop of 190 men was reduced to 20. After his recovery from his wounds he was assigned to another regiment, with which he participated in the defense of San Mateo and the first battle of Carabobo. After the defeat of La Puerta and the capitulation of Valencia, Silva returned to Guarico. He was captured by the Spanish under the command of Guzmán, and was sent to Caracas, but escaped and joined Paz in Apure, under whose orders he served till 1819. On Bolivar's return from Colombia, Silva joined him and participated as lieutenant-colonel in the battle of Carabobo, 24 June, 1821. In 1822 he marched with Bolivar to southern Colombia, participated in the battle of Bombona, 5 April, 1822, and went with the division sent to defend the Guayana and the Peruvian patriots. In the battle of Junín he was at the head of the Hessers de Colombia, and was promoted colonel, and after the battle of Ayacucho he was made a brigadier of Peru and Colombia. On this occasion he was officially styled the hero of Junín. He continued to serve in Peru, accompanying Sucre in his entry into La Paz, after which he returned to Colombia, and in 1828 was sent to quell an insurrection in Guayana. On his return, he was promoted major-general, and after the disintegration of Colombia he demanded a passport to Venezuela with the regiments of grenadiers and hussars of Apure, which refused to continue service in New Granada. As a defender of Bolivar, whose niece he had married in 1827, he was exiled in 1831 and in 1832 he returned to Caracas, where he remained till 1835, but soon submitted to the government. In 1849 he commanded the government troops against Gen. Paz, with whom he signed a convention at Macapo, and, when the same was violated by President Monagas, he resigned and retired to his farm. In 1853 he was promoted lieutenant-general by congress, and was secretary of war; in the next year he was appointed to the government council, but soon resigned and retired to his country-seat.

SILVER, Thomas, inventor, b. in Greenwich, Cumberland co., N. J., 17 June, 1813; d. in New York city, 12 April, 1888. His parents were Quakers. As a boy he displayed unusual mechanical skill, and when he was only nine years old his toy boat, with hidden paddle-wheel and other ingenious devices, was the wonder of the village in which he lived. He was educated in Greenwich and Woodstown, N. J., and in Philadelphia, and became a civil engineer, but continued to devote much time to the perfection of numerous contrivances for lightening human toil and increasing the happiness of mankind. The elements, upward of fifty in number, granted him were those for a grain-dryer, a fuel-saving heat-chamber, a gas-consumer, a tension-regulator, a machine for paying out submarine cables, a machinery-lubricator, a rotary-ice-plant, and clock-work for mechanical lamps. Models of some of these are at the patent-office, Washington, D. C., the South Kensington museum, London, and the Paris conservatoire des arts. The loss of the steamship "San Francisco," bound to California with troops in 1854, suggested his best-known invention. That vessel was wrecked through her engines becoming disabled in a gale. To meet such emergencies, Mr. Silver devised his "marine governor," which was adopted by the French navy in 1855. It is also applied to many stationary engines, notably to those in the press-rooms of the great dailies in large cities. It was adopted by the British admiralty in 1864, and the example has been followed by the navies of all the chief powers, except the United States. Mr. Silver also, in 1819, exhibited a plan of channel transit for the carrying of coal by ear direct from Wales to France, in which Napoleon III. was interested, but it was lost to that country by the surrender at Sedan. Mr. Silver was made a member of the Franklin institute of Philadelphia in 1853. He received the James Watt medal from the Royal polytechnic society of London, and one of the royal plan of his "regulator marine." He published "A Trip to the North Pole, or the Theory of the Origin of Icebergs" (New York, 1887).
the name of the American museum. He was an artist of some ability, and painted numerous portraits, including one of Washington. His head of thirteen notables—Washington, Baron Steuben, Silas Deane, Joseph Reed, Gouverneur Morris, Gen. Horatio Gates, John Jay, William H. Drayton, Henry Laurens, Charles Thomson, Samuel Huntington, John Dickinson, and Benedict Arnold—was engraved by Benjamin Franklin and printed in a quarto volume (London, 1784). He painted also miniatures in water-color, and made some designs for publications. Soon after the Declaration of Independence he was employed by a committee of congress to furnish designs for a seal for the new republic. Subsequently he suggested another design, but neither was accepted. His valuable collection of manuscripts and boundaries, forming material for a history of the Revolution and comprising several volumes, is in the Philadelphia library. Princeton conferred upon him in 1781 the honorary degree of M. A.

SIMKINS, Arthur, legislator, b. on the eastern shore of Virginia about 1597; d. in Edgefield, S. C., in 1838. He emigrated to South Carolina early in life, and settled himself on Log creek, in Edgefield district. Having studied law and been admitted to the bar, he was made county court judge. At the beginning of the Revolutionary war he took sides with the patriots, and his house, known as "Cedar Fields," was burned by the Tories. After the war he was chosen a member of the general assembly, and retained his seat to the twenty-second year. He was also delegate to the convention that adopted the Federal constitution, and he voted against it on the ground that it took too much power from the states.

—His son, Eldred, lawyer, b. in Edgefield district, S. C., 29 Aug., 1779; d. there in 1832, was well educated at home, and subsequently attended the Litchfield, Conn., law-school, where he remained for more than three years. He then made himself thoroughly acquainted with the local laws of South Carolina, and was admitted to the bar, 7 May, 1805, beginning to practice at Edgefield courthouse in 1806, and soon winning a reputation. In 1813 he was elected lieutenant-governor, and five years later he was chosen a member of congress to represent South Carolina to the federal assembly, in which he served until 1819, when he was appointed by President Monroe's cabinet. He was re-elected and served from 8 Feb., 1818, till 3 March, 1821, but declined a second re-election, and retired in favor of his law-partner, George McDuffie. He was repeatedly a member of the legislature, and in 1825 prepared an act, which was passed, giving jurisdiction to certain officers to order the sale or division of the real estate of their slaves. He was employed in many important cases, but was always of sound judgment, and was much in favor of the cause of those who were unable to assist themselves to a considerable degree. SIMMONS, Franklin, sculptor, b. in Webster, Me., 11 Jan., 1812. His boyhood was spent in Bath and Lewiston, and his taste for sculpture was early developed. Having a facility for portraiture, he made his first attempts in that line. During the last two years of the civil war he was in Washington, where the members of the cabinet and officers of the army and navy sat to him for lifesize medallions. They were cast in bronze, and many of them were purchased by the government of Philadelphia by Benjamin Rush and John A. Ryerson, where he has since resided. He visited his native land in 1888. His more important works are the statues of Roger Williams, in Washington and Providence; William King, for the state of Maine; Oliver P. Morton, in Indianapolis; Henry W. Longfellow (1884), in Portland; "Medusa" (1882); "Jochbed with the Infant Moses"; "Grief and History," the group that surmounts the naval monument at Washington; "Galatea" (1848); "Penelope"; "Miriam"; "Washington at Valley Forge"; and "The Seraph Abiel," from "Paradise Lost" (1886). Among his portrait busts are those of H. C. Weld, Judge Salmon T. Sherman, David D. Porter, James G. Blaine, Francis Wayland, and Ulysses S. Grant (1886). The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Bates college and also by Colby university.

SIMMONS, George Frederick, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 24 March, 1814; d. in Concord, Mass., 5 Sept., 1853. He was graduated at Harvard in 1832, and, after being employed as a tutor, prepared for the ministry at Cambridge divinity-school, where he completed his course in 1838. He was ordained the same year as an evangelist of the Unitarian denomination, and at once went to Mobile, Ala., where he began his ministry. Owing to his decided opposition to slavery, he remained there only until 1840, when he was obliged to fly from the pro-slavery forces of the state. In November, 1841, he was ordained pastor of the Unitarian church at Waltham, Mass. Meanwhile he had become deeply interested in certain theological questions which he felt he could not solve while engaged in pastoral work, and so resigned in the spring of 1843 and sailed for Europe, where he remained until October, 1843, spending much time in Holland, Belgium, and France, and being brought much in contact with the German historian, Neander. In February, 1848, he was called to Springfield, Mass., as the successor of Dr. William B. O. Peabody. Here, while he was greatly admired by part of his congregation, others regarded him with less favor, and in 1851 he was compelled to resign, after preaching two sermons on a riotous assault that had been made in the town on George Thompson, the English anti-slavery apostle. In January, 1854, he was installed pastor of a church at Albany, N. Y., but in the summer of 1853 he was attacked by typhus fever, from the effects of which he never rallied. Mr. Simmons was distinguished by an acutely sensitive and poetic mind, with a very vigorous, thoughtful and reverent spirit. "I knew him well," said his classmate, Samuel Osgood, "loved him much, and respected him even more." He was retiring in his habits, and his somewhat unsocial nature was no doubt an obstacle in the way of his exercising a proper influence on his flock. He published "Who was Jesus Christ," a tract (Boston, 1829); "Two Sermons on the Kind Treatment and on the Emancipation of Slaves, preached at Mobile, with a Preparatory Statement" (1840); "A Letter to the So-called 'Boston Churches'" (1846); "The Trinity," a lecture (1849); "Public Spirit and Mobs," two sermons delivered at Springfield on the Sunday after the Thompson riot (1851), and "Faith in Christ the Condition of Salvation" (1854). Six of his sermons were published in one volume soon after his death (Boston, 1855).

SIMMONS, James, law-reporter, b. in Middlebury, Vt., 11 June, 1821. He was graduated at Middlebury college in 1841, removed to Wisconsin, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Waukesha county in 1843. Besides filing several minor cases, he was chosen by the circuit court from 1861 till 1871. Mr. Simmons has published "Simmons's Wisconsin Digest" (Albany, 1868); "Supplements" to the same (1874-9); "Supplement to Wait's Digest, New York Rep.
PORTS” (1875–7 and 1882); and “SIMMONS’s New Wisconsin Digest” (1886). He has also published several local histories, is the author of various articles in Watt’s “Actions and Defenses” (1878–9); and has edited “Digest of English Reports” (2 vols., Chicago, 1878–80), and “Wisconsin Supreme Court Reports” (vol. viii, 1873; vol. ix, 1889).

SIMMONS, James Fowler, senator, b. in Little Compton, Newport co., R. I., 10 Sept., 1755; d. in Johnson, R. L., 10 July, 1864. He received a good English education, and was first a farmer, and subsequently a manufacturer. He was a member of the state house of representatives from 1826 till 1831, when he was chosen to the U. S. senate, and served from 31 May of the latter year till 3 March, 1847. Ten years later he was again elected to the senate as a Whig for the full term from 4 March, 1857, but he resigned in 1862.

SIMMONS, Joseph Edward, banker, b. in Troy, N. Y., 9 Sept., 1841. He was graduated at Williams in 1862, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1863. After practising in Troy until the close of 1866, he abandoned the profession and removed to New York city, where he has since engaged in banking. He became a member of the Stock exchange in 1872, and was elected its president in 1884. He was re-elected in 1885, but declined a renomination in 1886. He was appointed a commissioner of education in 1881, reappointed in 1882, and re-elected in 1883. He was also elected president of the board of education in 1886, and re-elected in 1887–8. In the latter year he was also made president of the Fourth national bank of New York city. Mr. Simmons received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Norwich, Northfield, Vt., in 1883.

SIMMONS, William Hayne, poet, b. in South Carolina, 1820. He studied medicine in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania, where he was graduated in 1846. He never practised his profession, but resided for some time in Charleston, S. C., whence he removed to East Florida. While in Charleston he published, anonymously, an Indian poem entitled “Ona.” He is also the author of “A History of the Seminole Tribe of Indians” (Philadelphia, 1850). He also compiled a dictionary of the Florida language. In South Carolina, studied for a time at Harvard, travelled in Europe, and settled in one of the western states. He published “Blue Beard, a Poem” (Philadelphia, 1831) and “The Greek Girl” (Boston, 1832). A series of metrical tales, “Wood-Notes from the West,” remain in manuscript. Verses by both the brothers may be found in Duyckinck’s “Cyclopedia of American Literature.”

SIMMONS, William Johnson, educator, b. in Charleston, S. C., 20 June, 1849; d. 30 Oct., 1890. He was of African descent. After studying in Madison and Rochester universities, he was graduated at Howard university in 1873, taught in Washington and in Ocala, Fla., and in 1879 entered the ministry of the Baptist church. In that year he was called to a charge in Lexington, Ky., and in 1880 he was elected president of the State university. He became editor of the “American Baptist” in 1882, called together and organized the American Baptist national convention in 1886, and was president of the colored National press convention in the same year. He was appointed district secretary of the American Baptist home mission society for the south in 1887. Wilberforce university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1883. Dr. Simmons published “Men of Mark” (Cleveland, Ohio, 1877), and a pamphlet on “Industrial Education” (1886), and also wrote a “History of the Colored Baptists of Kentucky.”

SIMMONS, Jeptha Root, author, b. in Canterbury, Conn., 31 Dec., 1802; d. in Fort Plain, N. Y., 31 May, 1885. His father was a hat-manufacturer. The son was educated at an academy in a neighboring town. In 1829 he began the retail dry-goods business and succeeded to it on the death of his brother, who was also a dry-goods merchant. After a year or two, in 1832, he removed to Schobarc county, N. Y., and entered into business there in 1832, but failed in 1834. For a few years after 1842 he filled the office of tell-collector for the New York and Erie canal at Fultonville, and for nine years he was ticket-agent for the New York Central railway at Fort Plain. His spare hours were employed in writing historical and odd works, besides which he collected and labelled a large assortment of fossils, many of them rare, and sold them for $5,000 to the state of New York for the Geological museum at Albany. He was a corresponding member of the Onondaga historical society, and rendered it much aid in collecting funds for the erection of the monument on the battlefield of Oriskany. He was a rapid writer and a voluminous contributor to the popular press throughout the state. He published “History of Schobarc county, N. Y.” (Allany, 1845); “The American Spy, Nathan Hale” (1846); “Trappers of New York” (1850); and “The Frontiersmen” (2 vols., 1882–3). He also composed several poems, Fourth-of-July orations, and lectures on different topics, which were published under the names of James C. and Joseph W., and were used by the New York central counties of New York.—His nephew, Joseph, physiognomist, b. in Plainfield Centre, Otsego co., N. Y., 3 Sept., 1833, attended the academy at West Winfield. Herkimer co., N. Y., several terms. During four more he was employed in teaching, and in 1854 he began to lecture on physiognomy and physiology. From childhood the bent of his mind was toward the pursuit of science, and external signs had shown itself in scouting and measuring the features of his companions. He studied medicine at the Universities of New York and Columbia, and was graduated in New York in 1851, then devoted himself to making and publicizing new discoveries in physiognomy. In pursuit of his study he afterward explored the United States and Mexico, and throughout the world. He continued his observations in Europe, Egypt, Nubia, Algiers, Morocco, Syria, Arabia, and Palestine. He has lectured with success in this country and abroad. From 1881 to 1884 he delivered scientific lectures in Melbourne, Sydney, and in the Australasian colonies. In 1854 he gave up lecturing and visited Europe again, collecting new facts and preparing material for works on physiognomy and physiology. He has published a “Physiognomical Chart” for recording and reading character (Glasgow, 1853); “Nature’s Revelations of Character” (London, 1874; several eds. in New York); a “Book of Scientific Lectures on physiology and physiognomy” (London, 1857); “Health and Character” (San Francisco, 1878); and “Practical and Scientific Physiognomy” (1880).

SIMMONS, William Gilmore, author, b. in Charleston, S. C., 17 April, 1806; d. there, 11 June, 1870. He was a precocious child, and his passion for writing, which continued unabated till his death, manifested itself as early as his seventh year. His whole academic education was received in the school of his native city, where he was for a time a clerk in a drug and chemical house. Though his first aspirations were for medicine, he studied law at eighteen, but never practised to any extent. In 1827 he published in Charleston a volume of “Lyrical and Other Poems”—his first attempt in literature. In 1828 he became editor and partial owner of the "Charleston City Gazette," which took the Union side in politics in multification days. In 1829 he brought out another volume of poems, "The Vision of Cortez," and in 1830 "The Tricolor." His paper proved a bad investment, and through his failure, in 1833, he was left in poverty. Thenceforward he determined to devote himself to literature, and he began that long series of volumes which did not end till within three years of his death. Accordingly, he published a poem entitled "Atlantis, a Tale of the Sea" (New York, 1832), the best and longest of all his poetical works. But Mr. Simms is mainly known as a writer of fiction. His pen was never idle. The scene of his novels is almost wholly southern, and marked invariably with local color: many of them are historical, but for the most part they aim to reproduce the various types of southern and southwestern life. He spent half of the year on his plantation, "Woodlands," near Midway, S. C., seen in its picturesque setting, where he had a beautiful home, and the livelier days and the livelier scenes passed pleasantly to his native state. Here he dispensed a wide hospitality, and wrote most of his works. He was for many years a member of the legislature, and in 1846 was defeated for lieutenant-governor by only one vote. Mr. Simms had immense fertility, a vivid imagination, and a true realistic handling of whatever he touched. But he was not a finished scholar, and, although Edgar A. Poe pronounced him the best novelist America had produced after Cooper, his style lacked finished elegance and accuracy. Yet he has done much in preserving the early history and traditions and local coloring of his native state. "The Yemassee" is considered his best novel. A fine bronze bust of Simms by Ward was unveiled at White Point garden, Charleston, 11 June, 1857, but he rests in an unmarked grave in Magnolia cemetery near the same city. Besides the works already mentioned, he published "Martin Faber" (New York, 1833); "The Book of My Lady, a Melange" (Philadelphia, 1836); "Guy Rivers" (2 vols. New York, 1834); "The Yemassee" (2 vols. 1835); "The Partisan" (2 vols. 1835); "Melichampe" (2 vols. 1836); "Richard Hurdis" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1838); "Palayo" (New York, 1838); "Carl Werner, and other Tales" (2 vols., 1838); "Southern Passages and Pictures," poems (1839); "Border Beagles" (2 vols., 1840); "The Kinsman" (Philadelphia, 1841; re-published as "The Scout," New York, 1854); "The Copper Heart, and Other Poems" (2 vols. 1842); "Beauchamp" (2 vols., 1842); "Helen Halsey" (1845); "Castle Dismal" (1845); "Count Julian" (2 vols., 1845); "Grouped Thoughts and Scattered Fancies," poems (Richmond, 1845); "The Wigmam and the Cabin, or Tales of the South" (two series, Charleston, 1845-6); "Aretos, or Songs and Ballads of the South" (1846); "Lays of the Palmetto" (1848); "Katherine Walton" (New York, 1851); "The Golden Christmas" (1852); "Marie de Berniere" (1853); "Father Abbott, or the Home Tourist" (1854); "Poems" (2 vols., 1854); "The Foragers" (1855); "The Maroon, and other Tales" (1856); "Charlemont" (1856); and "The Cassique of Kiawah" (1859). In 1867 he edited "War Poetry of the South." He wrote a "History of South Carolina" (Charleston, 1840) and "South Carolina in the Revolution" (1854), and lives of Francis Marion (New York, 1844), Capt. John Smith (1846), Chevalier Bayard (1848), and Gen. Nathanael Greene (1849). He wrote two dramas, "Navarino," and "Michael Bonhun, or the Fall of the Alamo," which was acted in Charleston. He also wrote a "Geography of South Carolina" (1843). He edited "Seven Dramas ascribed to Shakespeare," with notes and introductions (1848), and contributed many reviews to periodicals, two volumes of which were afterward collected (New York, 1845-6). A collected edition of part of his works has been published (19 vols. New York, 1859). His life has been written by Prof. William P. Trent in the "American Men of Letters" series (Boston, 1892).

SIMON, Etienne, Flemish explorer, b. in Bruges in 1747; d. in Geneva in 1806. He followed the sea for several years, and afterward fixed his residence in Rio Janeiro as a merchant. In 1792 he was granted a tract of land and sent out on an expedition to South America in search of colonists, but failed in the scheme, owing to the war that then raged on the continent, and, returning to Brazil in 1795, began to travel. After spending nine years he returned to Europe in 1804, and, settling in Switzerland, devoted the remainder of his life to arranging his notes. His works include "A Tract upon the Missionary Annals and English Missions in Brazil," "Voyage autour du monde," and "Voyage à travers les provinces de Sao Paulo et d'Espiritu Santo" (1805); "La domination Portugaise au Brésil" (1806); "Belen Para et Rio de Janeiro" (1807); and "Coup d'ceil historique sur les missions établies par les Jésuites dans le Paraguay" (1808).

SIMON, Pedro Antonio, Flemish historian, b. in Cambray about 1599; d. in Colombia, South America, about 1650. He entered the Franciscan order, and was sent, about 1590, as a missionary to New Granada, where he resided successively in Guacheta, Bogota, Serroozuela, Zipaqua, and Mengueta, on Funza river, about fifteen miles north from the present city of Bogota. Father Simon became the historian of the Muscovas or Chiblim Indians, and among whom he lived for many years. His most interesting work contains a summary history of all the tribes that lived in the ancient empire of Cundinamarca, and describes their civilization, their arts, their monuments, and their manners. It contains also an analysis of the Funza dialect, which is altogether unknown today, and of which the only monument left is the "Historia de la Nueva Granada" which had nearly superseded the other dialects at the time of the Spanish conquest. Simon's work is the only one that gives details concerning the early history and condition of the tribes living in Cundinamarca before the conquest, as all other works that relate to that country have been lost, excepting the "Historia de la Nueva Granada," by the missionaries Medrano and Agudo, and the part of the "Elorjes de Varones ilustres de Indias" of Castellanos that is devoted to Cundinamarca. The only one left referring to Cundinamarca is the incomplete relation of Lucas Fernandez de Piedrahita (q. v.). Simon's work relating to Venezuela was published under the title "Noticias historiales de las Conquistas de la Tierra firme" (Madrid, 1825).
The two other parts relating to "Cuminianum" are yet in manuscript, the second in the library of the Royal historical society, and the third in the National library of Madrid, Henri Termaux-Compa, although he says he has procured them, can only have obtained copies, which he used for his "Essai sur l'ancien Cuminianum" (Paris, 1842).

SIMOND, Alfred, South American botanist, b. in the province of São Paulo in 1740; d. in Rome, Italy, in 1801. His father, who was a Frenchman by birth, served in the Portuguese army, and obtained with his discharge a land-grant in the province of São Paulo, where he purchased an Indian slave.

The son was destined for the church, and was about to enter the Jesuit order when it was expelled from Brazil. Returning to his father's farm, he began there the study of agriculture and natural history, which he finished at Paris under the direction of Buffon, who induced him in 1776 to accompany Baron Malouet to Guiana. Here he was employed in draining marshes, and established a model farm for the improvement of agricultural methods. After Malouet's withdrawal in 1789, Simond remained in the colony without government support, and for several years tried vainly to establish a settlement east of Essequibo river. Returning to France at the beginning of the revolution, he was instructed by the Constituent Assembly's committee on foreign affairs to travel in South America and dispute the border-line between the French and Portuguese possessions in South America, and in 1795 he was sent to Guiana to draw a map of the basin of the Oronoco river. Simond's works include "Mémoire sur les limites veritable de la Guiane Française" (Paris, 1791); "Enumeratio plantarum in Guiana crescendorum" (2 vols., 1793); "Conspectus Mineralium in Guiana" (1st ed., Rome, 1797); and "Flora Brasiliensis exhibens characteres generum et specierum plantarum in provincia Sancti Paolo crescendorum" (2 vols., 1799).

SIMOND, William, author, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 30 Oct., 1822; d. in Winchester, Mass., 7 July, 1859. After attending school at Salem and spending some time in learning the jewelry business at Lynn, Mass., he apprenticed himself to a Boston printer in 1837. While thus engaged he wrote his first book, "The Pleasant Way" (1841), which was published by the Massachusetts Sabbath-school society. This was followed in 1845 by "The Sinner's Friend," which was also well received. In December, 1845, he left the printing-office where he had spent nearly nine years, and early in 1846 began the publication of "The Boston Saturday Rambler," of which, after the first six months, he became the sole editor. In November, 1859, "The Rambler" was merged in the "New England Farmer," of which Simonds was general editor until his death. In 1848 he began the publication of a monthly entitled "The Pictorial National Library," but was unable to issue it longer than eighteen months. Mr. Simonds was convinced that he had a mission to perform in writing for the young, and he employed every means in his power to render his tales natural and attractive, and to make them accurate reflections of life. His chief work is "The Airmwell Stories," written under the pen-name of Walter Aimwell. These stories deal chiefly with New England farm-life. The first, "The Boy's Ward," was published in 1853 and completed the series to twelve volumes, but lived only to complete only six. The last one, "Jerry," was left unfinished, and to it is added a memoir of the author. Besides the books already mentioned, he published "Thoughts for the Thoughtless" (Boston, 1851); "The Boy's Own Guide" (1852); and "The Boy's Book of Morals and Manners" (1858).

SIMONX, Louis Laurent (see name), French geologist, b. in Marseilles, 22 Aug., 1839. He studied at the School of mines at Saint Etienne, was graduated as engineer in 1852, and held afterward various positions in connection with mining in Italy and France. He made several voyages to the United States by order of the French government, visited Cuba, the West Indies, Central America, the Isthmus of Panama, and Mexico, and travelled extensively through California and most of the United States. In 1867 he was placed at the head of a French commission charged to study the laying out of the Pacific railroad, and to make preliminary surveys, and in his report greatly praised the work. In 1856 he was made a member of the international jury for the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia, and before returning to France he made a special survey of the mines in Pennsylvania and in the Reading valley. Simomin is an admiral of American institutions. He has been several times a candidate for the chamber of deputies, promising that if he were elected he would support free democratic institutions as they are understood on this side of the Atlantic, and he has been called the American candidate. Since 1860 he has contributed articles to French magazines describing his travels and American scenery. Since 1877 he has been scientific editor of "La France." He has also greatly interested himself in the work of the French commission and contributed to the authorization by the government of a lottery loan in its behalf. His works include "Le grand ouest des Etats-Unis" (Paris, 1869); "L'Homme Americain" (1870); "A travers les Etats-Unis" (1875); "Le monde Americain, souvenirs de mes voyages aux Etats-Unis" (1876); "L'Or et l'argent," a study of gold and silver mines in both America and France; "L'exposition de l'Amérique" (published as conference sur le Canal de Panama) (1884).

SIMONS, Michael Laird, journalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Sept., 1845; d. there, 17 Nov., 1880. He was graduated at the Central high-school of his native city, and entered journalism when quite young in the employ of the Philadelphia "Inquirer," subsequently engaging with the "Evening Telegram," and later with the literary journals. Mr. Simons was identified with the establishment of the Reformed Episcopal church, served as a delegate to its councils, and was secretary of the synod of Philadelphia at the time of his death. He edited "Stoddart's Review," condensed "L'Aubigné's "History of the Reformation" (1870), published "Half-Hours with the Best Preachers" (1871), and continued Duyckinck's "Cyclopedia of American Literature," adding about one hundred new names, down to 1873. His last work, an extensive "History of the World," is still unpublished.

SIMONS, Thomas Young, lawyer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 1 Oct., 1828; d. there, 40 April, 1878. He was graduated at Yale in 1847, and two years later began to practice law in his city. In 1854-60 he was a member of the legislature, and in the latter year a presidential elector. He was also a member of the committee that passed the ordinance of secession in December, 1860, and in the civil war he served as captain of the 25th South Carolina regiment, and later as judge-advocate. He was a member of the Democratic conventions of 1860, 1868, and 1872, and was a member of the executive committee of his party from the latter year till 1876. Besides his other labors, he was editor of the Charleston "Courier" in 1865-73. In the tax-payers' conventions of 1871 and 1874 he was an active member, and his later years were identified with the efforts to pro-eure local self-government and the creation of a Union reform party in South Carolina.

SIMONSON, John Smith, soldier, b. in Uniontown, Pa., 2 Jan., 1796; d. in New Albany, Ind., 5 Dec., 1881. His father, Adam Smith Simonson, was a well-known physician of western Pennsylvania. When but seventeen years old he enlisted in the New York volunteers and served as sergeant through the campaign on the Niagara frontier, receiving an honorable discharge in November, 1814. Three years later he settled in Charleston, Ind. He was a member of the state senate in 1828-30, and in 1841-6 of the lower house, serving as speaker during the last year. In 1846 he was appointed captain of U. S. mounted rifles, and served through the Mexican war under Gen. Scott, engaging in the capture of Vera Cruz and the battles that followed. He was brevetted major in 1847 for gallant service at Chapultepec, where he commanded his regiment after the fall of its colonel, and also took a creditable part in the attack on the Hellen gate. The succeeding years were spent on duty in Texas and New Mexico, commanding expeditions against the Indians and in making explorations. In May, 1851, he went ashore and colonized the mouth of the Yuma river, where he was retired in the following September. At the opening of the civil war he was made superintendent of the volunteer recruiting service at Indianapolis, Ind., and he continued on active military duty till 1869. In 1865, on the recommendation of Gen. Grant, he was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for long and faithful service.

SIMPSON, James William, journalist, b. in Columbia county, N. Y., 30 Jan., 1833; d. in Napa, Cal., 2 Nov., 1882. He went as a lad to New York city, and was educated at the public schools there. At twenty years of age he was engaged as local reporter on the "Courier and Enquirer." Within a year or two he was sent, with Henry J. Raymond, to Washington as congressional correspondent, and he continued as such until 1850, winning, by his ability and conscientiousness, the confidence and esteem of Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Thomas H. Benton, and other statesmen. In the autumn of 1851, when the New York "Times" was founded, he was one of the original proprietors with George Jones, Henry J. Raymond, and several other men engaged in the paper as correspondent, as well as the correspondent of New Orleans, San Francisco, and Detroit journals. His letters, entitled "The History of Legislation," were really a record of the times, and drew wide attention. He became part owner in 1859 of the "Evening Bulletin" in San Francisco, where he lived for years, and subsequently of the "Morning Call," of the same city, retaining his interest throughout his life. Having returned to New York, he was chosen in 1865 general agent of the associated press there, and discharged the duties of the office for fourteen years, when he resigned on account of delicate health. He then retired to his California vineyard, and died there suddenly of heart disease.

SIMPSON, Edmund, theatrical manager, b. in England, 17 July, 1845. He made his theatrical début at the Tavestaner theatre in England in May, 1860, as Baron Steinfort in Kotzebue’s "Stranger." In his country Simpson first appeared at the New York Park theatre on 22 Oct., 1869, as Harry Burnton in "The Road to Ruin." In 1888, when playing the part of York in the play "The Fingal," one of his legs was broken by an accident to the stage-machinery, and he was crippled for life. His last performance was Dazzle in "London Assurance." As a comedian, Simpson was stupendous and pain-taking, and in his delineations intelligent and respectable, but there was ever attached to his representations a hardness of manner that interfered with his popularity. In 1880 he became stage-manager, and remained permanently connected with the one playhouse as actor, stage-manager, and manager for thirty-eight years. It was his privilege to introduce nearly all the noted British players of his day to American audiences. From 1821 until 1840 Simpson was working-manager to Stephen Price, the lessee of the theatre, but on the death of Price he assumed the sole management. During his career he went through several trials of adversity, and finally retired, 6 June, 1848, under discouragement and in reduced circumstances. Under Simpson's direction the old Park theatre, or "The Theatre," as the show-bills named it, was noted for its well-dressed and efficient stock-company. The scenery of this noted resort was made up of flats and drops of the simplest construction, the properties were cheap, warm, and few in number, the costumes flimsy and tinselled, and the auditorium, before the rising of the curtain, usually filled with the stifling leakage of gas. The boxes were painted in white and gold, and the first few tiers divided into a series of screened boxes. A separate stairway led to the third tier and the gallery. This third tier was an assembling-place for the dissolute of both sexes; one half the gallery was patronized by boys, servants, and sailors, and the remainder was devoted to the accommodation of negroes. What is now known as the "flying gallery" was a separate box, fitted with hard wooden benches, and the admission to it was half-price. Here the bachelors, critics, and wits of the day found their places. Drinking-bars, united with apple-, pie-, and peanut-stands, were connected with the pit and the upper tier of boxes. As Mr. Trollope has truly pictured, it was not an uncommon thing to see men rise on the front rows of the dress-circle in their shirt-sleeves, and between the acts turn their backs to the audience, while their better-halfs eat munching apples and peeling oranges. Not seldom the entertainments of an evening comprised a five-act tragedy, a comedy, and an olio diversion, that terminated at twelve or one o'clock. The old Park theatre, represented in the illustration, was a wooden, box-like structure, fronting about eighty feet on Park row, and rising to the height of sixty or seventy feet, painted in imitation of blocks of granite.

SIMPSON, Edward, naval officer, b. in New York city, 3 March, 1824; d. in Washington, D. C., 2 Dec., 1888. He entered the navy as midshipman, 11 Feb., 1840, was in the first class at the naval academy in 1845-6, and was graduated in the latter year. During the Mexican war he was attached to the steamer "Vixen," in which he participated in various engagements, including the bombardment and capture of Vera Cruz. He served on the coast survey, 1838-50, in the brig "Washington" and steamers "Vixen" and "Legare." In 1850-2 he cruised in the frigate "Constitution" on the Brazil station, as acting master, and in 1853-4 he was attached to the naval academy as assistant instructor in naval gunnery and infantry tactics. He was promoted to master, 10 July, 1854, and to lieutenant, 18 April, 1855, and served in the slope "Portsmouth" in the East India squadron, 1856-8, participating in the capture of the Barrier forts near Canton, China. He went to the naval academy upon his return, and was in charge of the department of naval gunnery in 1858-62, and commandant of midshipmen in 1862-3. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and in the monitor "Passaic," off Charleston, in 1863-4, participated in various engagements. He was commissioned commander, 3 March, 1865, and served as fleet-captain of the consolidated Gulf squadron, being present at the fall of Mobile and receiving the surrender of the Confederate fleet on Tompibgee river. He was commissioned captain, 15 Aug., 1870, and went on a special naval mission to Europe in 1870-2. He was in charge of the torpedo station at Newport, R. I., in 1865-9, was commandant of the New London naval station in 1878-80, and of the Philadelphia Navy Yard, in 1880-4. He was promoted to commodore, 26 April, 1878, and to rear-admiral, 9 Feb., 1884, and placed on the retired list, 3 March, 1886.

Admiral Simpson was president of the U. S. naval institute in 1886-8, and was the senior member of the naval academy graduates association. He devoted himself to the scientific development of the navy, especially in the science of gunnery and torpedoes. Besides articles in magazines on naval subjects, he published "Ordnance and Naval Gunnery," which was the text-book at the naval academy until 1888 (New York, 1842); "The Naval Mission to Europe" (2 vols., Washington, 1873); and "Report of the Gun-Foundry Board" (1885). Several of his articles are reprinted in "Modern Ships of War" (New York, 1877).

SIMPSON, Sir George, British traveller, b. in Loch Broom, Ross-shire, Scotland, in 1792; d. in Lachine, near Montreal, 7 Sept., 1860. From 1809 till 1820 he was in the employ of a London firm engaged in the West India trade, of which his uncle was a member. His energy and active business habits attracted the attention of the Earl of Selkirk, then at the head of the Hudson bay company, and Andrew Colville, the company's lawyer, a large stockholder, and in February, 1820, he was selected to superintend the affairs of the company in America. In May he left Montreal for the northwest, and in 1821 he succeeded in terminating the long rivalry that had existed between the Hudson bay company and the Northwest company by their union. He was soon afterward appointed governor of the northern department, and subsequently became governor-in-chief of Rupert's land, and general superintendent of all the Hudson bay company's affairs in North America. In that capacity he planned the successful expedition under his command.

Thomas Simpson (1836-9), and greatly aided other travellers in their expeditions. In 1841-2 he made the overland journey round the world, going from London to Montreal, thence to Vancouver and Sitka, thence by New Archangel and the Aleutian islands to Ochotsk, across Russian Asia to Moscow and St. Petersburg, and home by the Baltic. He claimed to be the first traveller to make the overland journey. For many years preceding his death he resided at Lachine, entered the Prince of Wales during his visit in 1860, and was a director of the Bank of British North America and of the Bank of Montreal. In 1841 he was knighted for his services in connection with the cause of arctic exploration. He published "Narrative of an Overland Journey round the World during the Years 1841-2" (2 vols., London, 1847).—His cousin, Thomas, British explorer, b. in Dingwall, Ross-shire, Scotland, 2 July, 1808; d. near Turtle river, British America, 14 June, 1840, was graduated in 1828 at the University of Aberdeen, where he won the Huttonian prize. In 1829 he entered the service of the Hudson Bay company as secretary to his cousin, Gov. Simpson, and soon afterward accompanied the latter on a tour through the southeastern part of the Hudson bay territory. In 1836 an expedition was arranged by Gov. Simpson to connect the discoveries of Sir John Ross and Sir George Back, and it was placed under the command of Thomas Simpson. After passing the winter at Fort Chipewyan, on Great Slave lake, Simpson and his party reached Mackenzie river in July, 1837, and a few days afterward arrived at Fugger island bay, the farthest point that had been attained by Sir John Franklin. They then traced the arctic coast of North America from the mouth of Mackenzie river to Point Barrow, and from the mouth of Coppermine river to the Gulf of Boothia. The expedition was occupied in this service about three years, and, as it was claimed at the time, resulted in solving the problem of the location of a passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans. While returning with the valuable results of his discoveries, Simpson was either killed or met his death by suicide, as was asserted by some of the members of his party. The weight of evidence is in favor of the former assumption. See "The Life and Travels of Thomas Simpson, the Arctic Discoverer," by his brother, Alexander Simpson (London, 1855).—Thomas's brother, Alexander, author, b. in Ross-shire in 1811, was educated at the University of Aberdeen. He spent several years in the service of the Hudson bay company, and was afterward British consul at the Sandwich islands. He published "The Sandwich Islands" (London, 1843); "Life and Travels of Thomas Simpson, the Arctic Discoverer" (1844); and "Oregon Territory Consid-creed" (1846). Another brother, Emilius, a lieutenant in the U.S. navy, who died in 1871 on the Pacific coast of British North America, was also engaged in the work of exploration, and was superintendent of the Hudson bay company's marine department on the Pacific from 1826 till 1831.

SIMPSON, George Semmes, pioneer, b. in St. Louis, Mo., 7 May, 1818; d. in Trinidad, Col., 4 Sept., 1885. He received a college education and studied medicine under the supervision of his uncle, who had gone out for the west. After various experiences in Wyoming, Colorado, and New Mexico, he built the old fort in 1842 where the city of Pueblo, Col., now stands. In November of that year he married a Spanish beauty, Juana Suso, travelling with her on horseback through a wild country infested by hostile Indians to Taos, N. M., where the services of a priest were secured. Their daughter, Isabella, now Mrs. Jacob Beard, of Trinidad, was the first white child that was born in the Rocky mountain region of Colorado. Indians came in large numbers from the plains and mountains to see the white child. They brought her presents and held a great dance in her honor. Subsequently Mr. Simpson lived in various parts of New Mexico until 1853, when he returned to Colorado by way of the isthmus in 1854. In 1860 he settled in Trinidad, Col., and there spent the last years of his life. He contributed both prose and verse to magazines and journals, and the first information that gold was found in the sands of Cherry creek, Col., was sent to newspapers in the east by him. He left a compilation of the contributions narrating the events of his life, with the request that they be published. He was buried in a tomb cut out of the solid rock on the summit of a mountain known as Simpson's Nest, where he had once found shelter from the Indians. A monument marks the spot.

SIMPSON, Henry, author, b. in 1793; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 March, 1868. He was a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, an appraiser of the port of Philadelphia, and at one time an alderman of the city. He was a member of the Historical society of Pennsylvania and published "The Lives of Eminent Philadelphians" (Philadelphia, 1839).

SIMPSON, James Hervey, soldier, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., 20 Nov., 1813; d. in Baltimore, Md., 3 March, 1874. He was graduated at Princeton in 1833, and in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1836. The following year, being made assistant surgeon, U. S. army, he served through the Florida war, receiving honorable mention by Gen. Zachary Taylor for his services at the battle of Okeechobee. He was also commended by Gen. Winfield Scott and Gen. William J. Worth, under whom he served in the Mexican war at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Churubusco, and Chapultepec. In 1848-55 he was attending surgeon with headquarters at New York, acting also as post-surgeon at Bello's island. He was then promoted surgeon and was medical director of the Department of the Cumberland at Harpers Ferry, Va., in 1862-6, and of the Department of the Tennessee till 1867, when he was transferred to Baltimore.

SIMPSON, Marcus de Lafayette, soldier, b. in Essequime, Schoharie co., N. Y., 28 Aug., 1824. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, and, serving the same year in the war with Mexico, was brevetted 1st lieutenant in 1847 for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, and captain for the battle of Chapultepec. From 1848 till 1861 he was quartermaster at various posts, and assistant in the office of the commissary-general, acting as chief commissary of the Department of the Pacific in 1859-61. During the civil war he served in the commissary-general's office, and he was brevetted brigadier-general on 13 March, 1865. In 1867-73 he was chief commissary of subsistence of the Division of the Pacific, till 1879 of that of the Atlantic, and in 1879 he assumed charge of the same office in the Division of the Missouri, at Chicago.

SIMPSON, Matthias, M. E., bishop, b. in Cadiz, Ohio, 9 Nov., 1811; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 18 June, 1884. He received the best education that the town afforded, and his father dying when the boy was two years old, he was instructed and encouraged by his uncle, Matthew Simpson, after whom he was named. The latter was a thorough scholar, generally informed, was in the state senate ten years, and for seven years a judge of the county court. He was familiar with Greek and Hebrew, and conferred upon his nephew many advantages that boys usually did not have at that early day in the West. When he was about six years of age Matthew left home and became a student in Madison college, Pa., which has since been incorporated with Allegheny college at Meadville. His progress was rapid and he became a tutor before he was nineteen years old. He soon began the study of medicine, and in 1833 entered upon its practice, but was drawn to the ministry and entered the Pittsburg conference of the Methodist Episcopal church on trial in 1834. He was made third preacher of St. Clairsville circuit. Here his success was marked, and the following year he was removed to Pittsburg. In 1857 he was transferred to Williamport, and the same year elected vice-president and professor of natural science in Allegheny college. He was chosen president of Indiana Asbury now (De Pauw) university, Greencastle, Ind., in 1859. This post he filled with great popularity for nine years, and made him in great demand in the pulpit and on the platform. His personal qualities gave him an extraordinary influence over students, and made him efficient in raising money for the endowment of the college. In 1844 he was elected to the general conference, and in 1848 he was re-elected. He appeared in 1852 in the conference as the leader of his delegation, and at this conference was elected bishop. In 1857 he was sent abroad as a delegate to the English and Irish conference of the Wesleyan connection, and was also a delegate to the World's evangelical alliance which met in Berlin. His preaching and addresses upon this tour attracted great attention, particularly his sermon before the alliance, which extended his fame as a pulpit orator throughout the world. After its adjournment he travelled through Turkey, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece. In 1859 he removed from Pittsburg to Evanston, Ill., and became nominally president of Garrett biblical institute. Subsequently he removed to Philadelphia. His powers as an orator were displayed during the civil war in a manner that commanded the admiration and gratitude of the people. President Lincoln regarded him as the greatest orator he ever heard, and at his funeral in Springfield Bishop Simpson officiated. He made many addresses in behalf of the Christian commission, and delivered a series of lectures that had much to do with raising the spirit of the people. His official duties took him abroad in 1870 and in 1873. In 1874 he visited Oregon. At the Ecumenical council of Methodists in London he was selected by the representatives of all branches to deliver the opening sermon. After the news of the death of President Garfield he delivered an address at Exeter hall. He was selected by the faculty of Yale to deliver a series of addresses before the students of the theological department, which were published as "Lectures on Preaching" (New York, 1879). In later years his appearance was patriarchal. His eloquence was simple and natural, but increasing in power from the beginning of his career. It was characterized by a self and equally attractive to the learned and the ignorant. When he was at his best few could resist his pathetic appeals. Though his eloquence is the principal element of his fame, he was a man of unusual soundness of judgment, a parliamentarian of remarkable accuracy and promptitude, and one of the best presiding officers and most of counselors. He was present in the general conference in Philadelphia in 1884. Though broken in health so as not to be able to sit through the sessions, his mind was clear and his farewell address made a profound impression. Bishop Simpson published "Hundred Years of Methodism" (New York, 1876), and "Cyclopedia of Methodism" (Philadelphia, 1878; 2d ed., revised, 1882). After his death a volume of his "Sermons" was edited by Rev. George R. Crooks, D. D. (1885). A window in his memory is to be placed by American admirers in City Road chapel, London, where John Wesley preached.

SIMPSON, Michael, soldier, b. in Tantang, Lancaster co., Pa., 19 May, 1740; d. in York county, Pa., 1 June, 1813. He received a good education, and was a farmer. After the defeat of Braddock he joined in the commonwealth of Pennsylvania volunteers, and in 1755 was in the expeditions of Forbes and Bouquet to the Ohio. At the beginning of the Revolution he was appointed lieutenant in the 1st Pennsylvania battalion, and was attached to the Quebec expedition under Arnold in 1775. He was promoted captain, commanded a company at the battle of Long Island, and also participated in the battles of Trenton, Germantown, and White Plains. He was retired from service on the rearrangement of the Pennsylvania line in January, 1781. After the war he retired to a farm on Susquehanna river, where he owned the ferry on the York county side of the river that was generally known as Simpson's ferry. He was appointed brigadier-general of Pennsylvania troops under letters from Congress in 1784. He was a warm friend of Washington, who terried at his residence over night while returning from the western expedition in 1794.

SIMPSON, Stephen, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 July, 1789; d. there, 17 Aug., 1854. His father, George Simpson (1739-1822), was an assistant comissary-general in the Revolution, one of the colonel officers of the Bank of North America, the first bank in the Union, subsequently easier of the Bank of the United States from its establishment in 1791 till its close in 1811, and then cashier of the Girard bank. These various posts he held during forty years. Through his patriotism and close connection with the finances of the country he was of great service to his government in the war of 1812 by obtaining from moneyed men loans to carry on the contest. The son was a note-clerk in the Bank of the United States, but resigned and soon afterward attacked the bank, its policy and transactions, in a series of able but vitriolic articles, signed "Brutus." He then volunteered in the army, and with his brother George, an officer, fought at the battle of New Orleans. In the convention in which any men were killed. On his return he became editor and proprietor of "The Portico," and in 1822, with John Conrad, established "The Columbian Observer," a democratic paper in the interests of Andrew Jackson, also resuming the letters of "Brutus," whose authorship was thus acknowledged. He contributed to periodicals and to the "Philadelphia Book," and wrote a "Life of Stephen Girard," in 1848.

SIMS, Alexander Drumgoole, congressman, b. in Brunswick county, Va., 11 June, 1803; d. in Kingsport, S. C., 11 Nov., 1848. He was educated at the University of North Carolina, and was graduated at Union in 1823, studied law, and after practising in his native county, removed to Burlington, S. C., where he taught for five years, and afterward practised with success. He was a member of the legislature in 1840-1, and was elected to Congress as a state-rights Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, till his death. He published a controversial paper on slavery and a novel entitled "Bevil Faulcon" (1845). His brother, Edward Drumgoole, educator, b. in Brunswick county, Va., 24 March, 1805; d. in Tuscumbia, Ala., 12 April, 1845, was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1824, became principal of an academy at La Grange, Ala., was afterward professor of mathematics in La Grange college, entered the Tennessee conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1831, and, after serving for two years as an itinerant preacher, became editor of the "American and Australian languages at Randolph-Macon college, in Virginia. In 1836, studied Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic and Syriac for two years at the University of Halle, spent a year in travel, and, on his return to the United States assumed the chair of English literature at Randolph-Macon. From 1842 till his death he taught the same subject in the University of Alabama. He was the first to teach Anglo-Saxon in connection with English literature in the south, and was preparing grammars of English and Anglo-Saxon at the time of his death.

SIMS, Charles X., clergyman, b. in Union county, Ind., 18 May, 1805. He entered the Methodist ministry in 1827 and was graduated at Indiana Asbury (now De Pauw university) in 1830. In 1830 he became president of Valparaiso college, Ind., and in 1832 was appointed a pastoral charge in Richmond, Ind. He was a successor at Wabash, Evansville, and Indianapolis, Ind., Baltimore, Md., Newark, N. J., and Brooklyn, N. Y. Since 17 Nov., 1860, he has been chancellor of Syracuse university. In 1852 and 1853 he was appointed commissioner to the Omnibus bureau, and a delegate to the general conference of his church in 1884 and 1888. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by De Pauw university in 1870, and that of LL. D. in 1882. Dr. Sims has done much literary work for periodicals, and is the author of a "Life of Thomas M. Edly" (New York, 1873).

SIMS, Henry Augustus, architect, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Dec., 1852; d. there, 10 July, 1875. He was educated at the Philadelphia high-school, studied civil engineering, and followed that profession in Canada, Georgia, and Minnesota. Subsequently he studied architecture, and practised that art in Canada from 1869 till 1866, and afterward in Philadelphia till his death. He was long the secretary for foreign correspondence of the American Institute of architects. He designed many city and country residences and, among other public buildings, the Columbia avenue and 24 Presbyterian churches in Philadelphia, the chapel at Meersburg, Pa., the court-house at Hagerstown, Md., and the almshouse of Montgomery county, Pa. His brother, Clifford Stanley, author, b. in June, 1824; d. in Trenton, N. J., 3 March, 1896, was educated at the academy of the Episcopal church in Philadelphia, and was admitted to the bar in 1866, but never practised. He served as acting assistant paymaster in the U. S. army in 1851, and was chosen lieutenant-colonel of the 4th Arkansas infantry in 1864, but was taken prisoner before he could be mustered in. He was judge-advocate-general of Arkansas in 1864-9, a delegate to the Arkansas constitutional convention in 1867-8, a commissioner to digest the statutes of Arkansas in 1868, and a representative in the legislature in 1868-9. For the next three years he was U. S. counsel for the district of Prescott, Canada. Mr. Sims had published "The Origin and Signification of Scottish Surnames, with a Vocabulary of Christian Names" (Albany, 1862); "The Institution of the Society of the Cincinnati in the State of New Jersey" (1866); and an edition of William Noye's "Maxims of the Laws of England," with a memoir of the author (1870).—Another brother, James Peacock, architect, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Nov., 1849; d. there, 20 May, 1882, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1868, and studied architecture with his brother Henry. He designed, besides many private residences, the building of the Royal insurance company, Christ church and Holy Trinity memorial chapels, Philadelphia, and Christ church in Trenton.

SIMS, James Marion, surgeon, b. in Lancaster county, S. C., 25 Jan., 1813; d. in New York city, 13 Nov., 1883. He was graduated at South Carolina college in 1832, began the study of medicine with a physician of his neighborhood, entered Charleston medical school which was opened in November, 1835, and completed his course at Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, in 1835. He began practice in Lancaster, where his parents resided, but became discouraged at the loss of his first patients, and removed to Mount Meigs, Montgomery co., Ala., and there married in marriage in December, 1836, to Macon county. He was successful there, but severe attacks of malarial fever impelled him to change his residence. Near the close of 1840 he settled in Montgomery, where in a short time he gained a good reputation as a surgeon. He was the first practitioner in the south to operate for strabismus or to treat club-foot successfully. In 1845 he published a paper on the cause and the proper mode of treatment of trismus nascentium, in which he attributed the disease to mechanical pressure on the base of the brain, and affirmed that it could be prevented by not placing newborn infants in a constrained posture, and often cured by simply laying them on their side. He explained his hypothesis in the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences" in 1846 and 1848, and subsequently in an "Essay on the Pathology and Treatment of Trismus Nascentium, or Lock-jaw of Infants" (Philadelphia, 1864). His view was generally accepted by the profession, although a few doctors used his method with success, and the doctrine was confirmed more than thirty years.
after its announcement by the investigation of a long series of cases in Washington, D. C. In 1845 Dr. Sims conceived a method of treating vesicovaginal fistula, an affection for which the physicians of various countries had vainly sought a cure. He fitted up a hospital beside his house, into which he collected cases from the neighboring country, maintaining them at his own expense. After experiencing for three years solid failure, he finally devised the silver suture, which has since been employed in many branches of surgery, and with which he effected a perfect cure. He invented various instruments during his experiments, chief of which was the duck-bill speculum, commonly called the Sims speculum. This revealed the seat of other serious complaints, and rendered them amenable to surgical treatment. He had before paid no attention to gynecology, but the possession of this instrument, which has raised that branch from the level of empirical experiment to that of certain knowledge, induced him to devote his attention hencetoward to the study and treatment of diseases of women. Soon after his first successful operations on fistula of the bladder he was seized with a form of enteritis, and, after combating the disease for three months, he died. In the last years of his life, he removed in 1853 to New York city. He demonstrated to prominent surgeons the success of the silver suture in vesicovaginal fistula and lacerated perineum, and his methods came into use in the hospitals; yet their author met with a cold reception, and his proposition to open a hospital for the treatment of women’s diseases was opposed by the other doctors until it was abandoned and presented before the public. The project was welcomed by influential women, and in 1855 a temporary hospital was opened. The necessity for a larger institution was soon recognized. In 1857 the legislature granted a charter for the Woman’s hospital of the state of New York, and in the following year appropriated $50,000 for the purpose, while the common council of the city gave as a site the old Potter’s field between Fourth and Lexington avenues. In 1861 Dr. Sims went to Europe to study hospital architecture, and, having convinced himself of the advantages of the pavilion system, returned in 1862 and persuaded the governors to adopt that plan. While he was in Europe the chief hospitals of London, Paris, Berlin, and Edinburgh invited him to perform the operations in cases of vesico-vaginal fistula in the hospitals. His successes in Paris led to his being invited to Brussels to demonstrate the operation before the faculty. He took his family to Europe in July, 1862, intending to return to New York to earn the means of supporting them there, but, through his professional friends and the fame of his operation, obtained a remunerative practice in Paris, and decided to remain abroad until the civil war came to an end. He removed to London about 1864 for the education of his children. His “Clinical Notes on Uterine Surgery,” which was published simultaneously in English, French, and German (London, Paris, and Berlin, 1865), described novel methods of gynecological and obstetrical surgery. His操作 were performed by ob-

Sims, Winfield Scott, inventor, b. in New York city, 6 April, 1844. He was graduated at the Newark High School in 1861, after serving during the civil war in the 37th New Jersey regiment. Subsequently he turned his attention to the invention of electric apparatus, and devised various improvements in electro-magnets. In 1872 he constructed an electric motor to be used for light work. By means of this motor, weighing forty-five pounds and battery of twenty half-gallon Bunsen cells, he was able to operate on beef steaks of ten inches long, with six persons on board, at the rate of four miles an hour.
ply electricity for the propulsion and guidance of movable torpedoes for harbor and coast defence. His torpedo was a submarine boat, with a cylindrical hull of copper and conical ends, supplied with a screw propeller and rudder. The power is electricity generated by a dynamo-electric machine on shore or on shipboard, and by its means the torpedo is propelled, guided, and exploded. During 1872 he was appointed, by the order of Henry L. Abbot, of the U.S. engineer corps, at Willetts's point, and since that time the U. S. government has purchased ten of these boats, having a speed of ten to eleven and a half miles an hour. These boats carry from 400 to 450 pounds of dynamite. Mr. Sims has now in course of construction a boat, to have a speed of eighteen miles an hour, which is to carry a 275-pound charge of dynamite.

SIMPSON, Sampson, philanthropist, b. in New York city in 1780; d. there, 7 Jan., 1857. He studied law at Columbia, but after a few years' practice retired to his farm in Yonkers, and devoted himself to charitable and benevolent work. He was founder of the Mount Sinai hospital, and benevolent institutions, including $50,000 that, after the death of a nephew, should be paid to any responsible corporation in this city whose permanent fund is established by its charter for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the Jews in Jerusalem, Palestine. By decision of the state supreme court on 29 May, 1888, this amount, with thirty years' interest, was paid to the North American relief society for indigent Jews in Jerusalem.

SINCLAIR, Carrie Bell, poet, b. in Milleville, Ga., 22 May, 1839. Her father, Elijah, a nephew of Robert Fulton, was a Methodist clergyman who at the time of his death conducted a seminary for girls at Georgetown, N. C. The family removed to Augusta, Ga., where she contributed poetry to the "Georgia Gazette." She published a volume of poems (Augusta, 1860), and during the civil war wrote lyrics commemorating incidents of the battle-field and praising the Confederate cause, some of which were set to music, while devoting herself to supplying the wants and alleviating the sufferings of southern soldiers in Savannah. After the war she made Philadelphia her residence, and was for some years a editor of the "North American Review." Her poetical productions were collected in "Heart Whispers, or Echoes of Song" (1872).

SINCLAIR, Peter, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Argylshire, Scotland, in 1825. He was educated in his native place, emigrated to Prince Edward island, engaged in farming, and was elected to the house of assembly in 1867. He was a member of the executive council from 1869 till 1871, and again in 1872, when he acted as government leader, and was a member of the board of works. He was elected to the dominion parliament in September, 1873, and re-elected by acclamation in 1874, but defeated in 1878. He was chosen to the legislature of Prince Edward island in 1882, and again in 1886. He is a Liberal, and in favor of reciprocal trade with the United States.

SINGER, Isaac Merritt, inventor, b. in Oswego, N. Y., 27 Oct., 1811; d. in Torquay, England, 23 July, 1875. He was a machinist, and devoted himself entirely to the study of improving sewing-machines. After years of close application he succeeded in completing a single-thread, chain-stitching machine for which he received a patent. In the early part of his career he was assisted by Edward Clark, a wealthy lawyer, by whose aid he was enabled to establish a factory in New York. The Howe sewing-machine company sued him for infringing on their patents, but the matter was finally compromised. He then had some difficulty with Mr. Clark, in consequence of which, while each retained an equal interest in the machine, its manufacture was placed in the hands of a company. Mr. Singer soon became wealthy, and, leaving this country, resided for some time in Paris, but later returned to England, where he lived in a splendidly constructed house that he built in Torquay.

SINGERLY, William MISKEY, journalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 Dec., 1882; d. in Philadelphia, 27 Feb., 1908. He was educated in the Philadelphiahigh-school, and trained to business. From 1889 till 1881 he was connected with the city railways, and in 1887 he was the publisher of the Philadelphia "Recorder." His newspapers were the instrument for correcting various abuses. In 1884 he effected arrangements by which the people of Philadelphia obtained fuel for one quarter less than they had paid. He built 500 dwellings in a previously unimproved suburb of Philadelphia. Besides his finely appointed printing-office, he conducted a library, a turn-of-the-century hall, and a Sunday-school. He was a devout Episcopalian, and devoted much attention to breeding beef and dairy cattle and trotting-horses on model farms in Pennsylvania and Kentucky.

SINNICKSON, Thomas, patriot, b. in Salem county, N. J.; d. in Salem, N. J., 15 May, 1817. He received a classical education and became a merchant. For many years he was the principal council of New Jersey, and in 1743 he was a delegate to the Provincial congress. He was a correspondent of the committee of safety, and served as a captain during the Revolutionary war, being present at the battles of Trenton and Princeton. After the peace he was a member of the legislature, and on the adoption of the constitution of the United States was elected to congress, serving from 4 March, 1809, till 3 March, 1811. He was elected again in 1815, and served from 15 May, 1815, till 3 March, 1819. He was presiding judge of the court of common pleas for many years.

SISTIAGA, Sebastian (six-telah-zah), Mexican missionary, b. in Teposcolula, about 1690; d. in Puebla in 1756. He became a Jesuit in 1741, and, after finishing his novitiate at San Luis Potosi, joined the missions of Lower California. In 1741 he explored the west coast of the peninsula, and, leaving Loreto, he followed the coast up to latitude 31° N., discovering three good ports, with plenty of spring-water and an abundance of hard woods, and also founding the mission of San Ignacio. After many years of successful missionary labor he returned to Mexico, dying in the college of the order in Puebla. He wrote "Relación de un viaje a la Baja California y de los descubrimientos hechos, con planos de los puertos, remitida al Virrey de Mexico" and "Noticia de la Misión de San Ignacio con sus ocho pueblos," the manuscripts of which were used by H. H. Bancroft, the historian of California.

SITGREAVES, John, b. in New Bern, N. C., about 1749; d. in Halifax, N. C., 4 March, 1802. He studied and practised law in New Bern, was appointed an officer in Richard Caswell's regiment of militia in 1776, and served as his aide-de-camp at the battle of Camden in 1780. In 1784-5 he represented North Carolina in the Continental congress, and in 1786-9 he was a member of the North Carolina legislature, leaving that body on being appointed United States district judge for North Carolina.

SITGREAVES, Samuel, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 March, 1764; d. in Easton, Pa., 4 April, 1824. He received a classical education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia, 3 Sept., 1783. In 1786 he settled at Easton, where he soon gained an extensive practice. He was elected a member of the State constitutional convention of 1788-90, and was elected to congress in 1794, and again in 1795. In 1793 he conducted a campaign in Wyoming. He was one of the commissioners to settle claims under the Jay treaty. In 1799 he was retained by the government to assist in the trial of John Fries for treason. At the end of John Adams's administration he retired from politics, and resumed practice.—His son, Lorenzo, soldier, b. in Pennsylvania about 1811; d. in Washington, D.C., 13 May, 1877. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1832, and was assigned to the artillery. He resigned to engage in civil engineering, but was reappointed in the army as 3d lieutenant of topographic engineers on 18 July, 1830, and was employed in surveys of the Sainte Marie, Port-mouth harbor, and the Florida reefs. During the Mexican war he took part in the march through Chihuhua and in the battle of Buena Vista, where he received the brevet of captain for gallantry. He was in charge in 1851 of the survey of Zuni and Colorado rivers, N. M., of which a report was published (Washington, 1853). He mustered volunteers at Albany, N. Y., in 1861-2, being promoted major on 6 Aug., 1861. He reached the grade of lieutenant-colonel of volunteers, 23 July, 1862, and in 1867 was made colonel of marching. He had charge of harbor improvements on Lake Michigan till 10 July, 1867, when he was retired.

SITJAR, Buenaventura (seit-har), Spanish missionary, b. in the island of Majorca, 9 Dec., 1739; d. in San Antonio, Cal., 3 Sept., 1798. He was a member of the Franciscan order, came as a missionary to America, and founded in 1771 the mission of San Antonio, and in 1773 that of Santa Miguel. With the assistance of Father Miguel Piers, he composed a vocabulary of the Telamé or Sextapay language. This work forms the seventh volume of John G. Sheir's "Library of American Linguistics" (New York, 1864), and was published separately under the title of "Vocabulary of the Language of the San Antonio Missions" (1864).

SKENANDO, Oinceda chief, b. in 1706; d. in 1816. During the war of the Revolution he had command of 250 warriors of the Oneida and Tuscarora tribes of Indians, and rendered important services to the American cause. Skanando was tall and commanding in person, and his face displayed unapparent and underlying strength. He was a mild warrior, and one of the noblest and wisest counselors of the Six Nations. The first mention of his name is by Rev. Samuel Kirkland, who became acquainted with him when he first went into the Indian country in 1764. Skanando formed so strong an attachment for Mr. Kirkland that he expressed a desire to be buried by the side of his friend, which was done. He was known among the Indians as the "white man's friend."

SKENE, Alexander Johnston Chalmers, physician, b. in Fyvie, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 17 June, 1857. He was educated chiefly in the schools of Aberdeen, and studied medicine at King's college, Scotland, at the University of Michigan, and at Long Island college. He graduated in 1883. In July, 1883, he was acting assistant surgeon in the U. S. army. In 1884 he settled in Brooklyn, where he has since been engaged in successful practice. Dr. Skene was adjunct physician in Long Island college hospital in 1884, appointed professor of gynecology there in 1872, and dean of the faculty in 1896. He was professor of gynecology in the post-graduate medical school of New York in 1884, and is president of the American gynecological society. He performed the first successful operation of gastro-cystotomy that is recorded, and also that of craniotomy, using Sim's speculum. He has invented about twelve surgical instruments, has written numerous articles for the medical journals, and is the author of "The Diseases of Women" (New York, 1877), and "Treatise on Diseases of Women, for the Use of Students and Practitioners" (1888).

SKENE, Philip, soldier, b. in London, England, in February, 1755; d. near Stoke Goldington, England, 10 June, 1810. He was heir-made (after 1745) of Sir Andrew Skene, of Hailyards, Fife, and entered the royal regiment in 1775, under the auspices of his uncle, Capt. Andrew Skene, was at the taking of Carthagena and Porto Bello, and at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Culloden. He left the royal regiment in 1750, and was afterward captain in the 27th and 10th foot, and major of brigade. In the same year he married Katherine, heiress of the Heydens, of Mt. Heyden, County Wigtownshire, a minor who was related to Sir William Johnson. In 1756 he came again to this country, and was engaged under Lord Howe at the attack on Ticonderoga, and afterward under Lord Amherst at its capture, with that of Crown Point. Thence he went to the attack on Martinique and Havana under Lord Amherst, and afterward settled in Mexico to oppose the breach at the storming of Monterey. In 1750, by the desire of Lord Amherst and with a view to strengthening the British hold on Canada, he received a large grant of land on Lake Champlain, which he increased by purchases to the extent of about 60,000 successful candidate for Carleton for the Ontario assembly in 1867. He was president of the Ottawa board of trade, of the Ottawa Liberal-Conservative association, of the Liberal Conservative convention that met in Toronto, 25 Sept., 1874, of the Dominion board of trade, and of the Agricultural and arts association of Ontario, and was connected as president or director with various other financial or industrial institutions.

In 1756 he came again to this country, and was engaged under Lord Howe at the attack on Ticonderoga, and afterward under Lord Amherst at its capture, with that of Crown Point. Thence he went to the attack on Martinique and Havana under Lord Amherst, and afterward settled in Mexico to oppose the breach at the storming of Monterey. In 1750, by the desire of Lord Amherst and with a view to strengthening the British hold on Canada, he received a large grant of land on Lake Champlain, which he increased by purchases to the extent of about 60,000 acres, and founded on Wood creek the town of Skene-sborough (now Whitall, N. Y.). He was named governor of Crown Point and Ticonderoga, with the rank of colonel in the army, became colonel of the local militia, judge, and postmaster, established flourishing fashories and saw-mills, constructed and sailed vessels on the lake, and opened roads to Albany. At the Revolution after being exchanged as a prisoner, he served a short time under Sir William Howe at New York, and then volunteered under Gen. Burgoyne, during whose campaign his horse was twice shot under him. He and his son had acted as guides to the army from Canada; the British troops having for some time occupied Skene'sbough, on their moving, Gen. Burgoyne observed with wonder that on meeting him least it should become a danger in the hands of their opponents. Col. Skene thus saw the fruits of an invested fortune and many years' labor perish before his eyes at his countrymen's hands. The night before the capitulation of Saratoga, Col. Skene, as appears from one of his letters, went to Gen. Burgoyne and urged on him that there was no need for capitulating at all; that, on condition that arms and baggage were abandoned, he would undertake to guide the army to Canada. After the recognition of independence, Col. Skene was in London, and intended to return and begin again as an American citizen; but the state of New York attainted him and his son of high treason, and Philip Skene, colonel of the 9th foot, who died in 1788, and also with Lieut. Philip Skene of the 72d foot, who died in 1774.—His only son, Andrew Philip, soldier, b. 25 March, 1753; d. in Durham, England, in January, 1826, entered the 5th regiment of dragoons in 1763. He was graduated at King's (now Columbia) college, New York, in 1772; and transferred afterward to the 6th dragoons; and in 1778, he received leave of absence for two years to return to New York to recover his property, but was unsuccessful, and went back to England. The British government in 1785 granted him a pension of £200 per annum for life, and a sum of £20,000, with which he purchased the estate of Addersey Lodge, Northamptonshire. He has been sometimes confounded with a namesake, Gen. Phillip Skene, colonel of the 5th foot, who died in 1788, and also with Lieut. Philip Skene of the 72d foot, who died in 1774.—His only son, Andrew Philip, soldier, b. about 1790; d. in 1857, became a lieutenant of engineers in the British army, and was for a long time stationed in Canada, where he designed the works of Quebec. He had previously been chosen to attend at Paris the princes of Prussia, afterward King Frederick William IV., and the Emperor William. He wrote many works and labored zealously to propagate the Hamiltonian system of teaching languages, the schemes of Robert Owen, and the co-operative system, which he was one of the first to introduce in London.—Another son, Andrew Motz, d. in Durham, England, 10 July, 1849, entered the royal navy in 1808, was present at Flushing and at actions in the West Indies, and was shipmate of the Emperor Napoleon in the voyage to St. Helena. He afterward went with Sir John Ross on the arctic expedition of 1818, his name being given to the Skene islands in Ballion Bay. Most of the published drawings of the expedition are from his pencil. He also accompanied Sir William E. Parry in 1819, the name of Skene bay, the rank of lieutenant, and a share of the reward of $5,000 being the recompense of that arduous service. Retiring on half-pay, and presently refusing the command of a new arctic expedition, he devoted most of his leisure to divers inventions connected with his profession, the most remarkable of which he patented, a system of feathering paddles, which was not then approved, but after the expiration of the patent was generally adopted, until it was superseded by invention. His only son, Andrew Philip, b. 6 Sept., 1822, succeeded to the Irish and Canadian estates.

SKILTON, Julius Augustus, physician, b. in Troy, 29 June, 1833; d. in Brooklyn, 20 Nov., 1897. He was graduated at Rensselaer polytechnic institute and at Albany medical college, and began practicing in Troy and Washington, D. C. He was a member of the board of education in 1856, and city physician in 1857-8. In 1861 he was made assistant surgeon of the 39th New York regiment, and surgeon of the 8th New York in 1862. He was the son of a prisoner in the summer of that year, and was released in feeble health, but recovered sufficiently to become surgeon of the New York cavalry in 1863, and served in the army in the campaign of 1863-4, and was medical director of cavalry department of the southwest in 1864-5. In 1869 he was appointed U. S. consul at the city of Mexico, and in 1872 he was promoted to be consul-general, holding the office until 1878. He received the degree of A. B. from Wesleyan university in 1853. Besides his many reports in U. S. state and mining districts of Parbuce, Real del Monte, El Chichon and Star Rosa, State of Hidalgo, Republic of Mexico.”

SKINNER, Charles Rufus, member of congress, b. in Union Square, Oswego co., N. Y., 4 Aug., 1844. He was educated at Clinton liberal institute and at the Mexico, N. Y., academy, was school commissioner of Watertown, N. Y., in 1873-'4, member of the house in 1873-74, and a representative in congress in 1881-3, as a Republican. In congress he was the author of the bill providing for the special delivery stamp, and he introduced a bill reducing the postage on letters from three to two cents. He was appointed deputy superintendent of public instruction of the state of New York, 7 April, 1886, and is now (1899) superintendent.

SKINNER, William, soldier, b. in Skene, N. Y., in 1728; d. in Bristol, England, in 1799. He received a good education, became a successful lawyer, and was attorney-general of New Jersey in 1753, in which capacity he evinced great ability and integrity. At the opening of the Revolution he accepted service under the crown and was authorized to raise a corps of loyalists, of which he was allowed to nominate the officers. Three battalions were organized, and called the New Jersey volunteers. Skinner continued in command of the corps, with the rank of brigadier-general, and at the peace went to England, where he received compensation for his losses as a loyalist, and also the half-pay of a brigadier-general during his life. One of his daughters married Sir William Robinson, commissary-general in the British army, and another Sir George Nugent, a field-marshal.—His son, Philip Keeny, soldier, b. in Amboy, N. J.; d. in London, 9 April, 1826, entered the service as an ensign in the New Jersey loyalist volunteers, was made a prisoner in the expedition to Ostend, served in Ireland, the East and West Indies, and Spain, and became a lieutenant-general in 1825.

SKINNER, Ezekiel, clergyman, b. in Glastonbury, Conn., 27 June, 1777; d. in Greenport, L. l., 25 Dec., 1855. He was apprenticed to a blacksmith, but, abandoning his trade in 1795, he studied medicine, was licenced to practise in 1801, and settled at Granville, Mass., as a physician. He was a deist, but, changing his views, he removed to Lebanon, Conn., in 1807, and united with the Baptist church. He served in the war of 1812 as a surgeon, in 1819 was licensed to preach, and in 1822 was ordained pastor of the Baptist church in Ashford, Conn. On the death of his son, Rev. Benjamin Rush Skinner, a missionary in Liberia, the father in 1834 went to reside there, and spent four years in that colony as its governor and as preacher. After his return he resumed his pastoral duties and medical practice. He published a series of essays on the prophecies, in the "Christian Secretary" (1842).

SKINNER, George Ure, botanist, b. in Scotland in 1808; d. in Aspinwall, Panama, 9 Jan., 1894, published an important work on the flora of the Sibun Islands and the islands in the Gulf of Darien. Kkee, Skinner and Co., Guatemala. He pursued his researches into the botany of western Mexico and Guatemala more thoroughly than any preceding botanist, and gave attention to the Orchidaceae. The genus Uroseckinella was named for him, and also the Cattleya Skinneri among the orchids.

SKINNER, James Acheson, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Scotland, 8 Sept., 1826; d. in Woodstock, Canada, 24 Dec., 1894. He was educated in his native place, went to Canada in 1843, and engaged in business in Hamilton. He became a lieutenant-colonel of militia, was at Ridgeway during the Fenian invasion, and in 1871 organized and commanded the first Canadian team to use the rifle in the defence of Hamilton. He served in the Dominion parliament in 1874-8.

SKINNER, John, British soldier, b. in New Jersey about 1750; d. in England, 10 Oct., 1827. He entered the service of the crown as an ensign in the 16th regiment of foot, was in the actions of Beaufort and Stone Ferry and at the sieges of Savannah and Charleston, and commanded a troop in Charlestown's legion in the battles of Blackstocks, Cowpen, and Guilford. In 1785 he reduced the Maroons of Jamaica to submission, and in 1804 he commanded the 16th regiment in the expedition against Surinam. He became a major-general, was successively governor of several of the West India islands, and commanded a brigade at the capture of Guadeloupe in 1816. He was also editor of John Stuart, editor, b. in Maryland, 22 Feb., 1798; d. in Baltimore, 21 March, 1851. At the age of twenty-one he began practice as a counsel and attorney. In 1812 he was a government agent "to receive and forward the ocean mails, to furnish the vessels with necessary supplies, and to see that no transpire prejudicial to the interests of the republic or offensive to enemies thus admitted during the war for several years afterward. When the British forces moved toward Washington, Mr. Skinner rode ninety miles in the night, and first announced their approach. The British retaliated by burning the buildings on his St. Leonard's creek estate, for which loss he never sought remuneration from the government. He was with Francis S. Key on the mission that suggested the latter's song, "The Star-Spangled Banner." From 1816 till 1819 he was postmaster of Baltimore. Having much practical knowledge of agriculture and rural sports, in April, 1819, he established "The American Farmer," the first agricultural journal in this country. This periodical was warmly supported by Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Timothy Pickering, and others of recognized ability. When Gen. Lafayette revisited the United States in 1824 he was the guest of Mr. Skinner during his sojourn in Baltimore, and selected the latter as agent to manage the 20,000-acre grant of land that had been given him by congress. In August, 1829, Mr. Skinner published the first number of the "American Turf Register and Sporting Magazine," a monthly periodical. His devotion to this work induced him to dispense with the "American Farmer" the same year. After conducting the "Turf Register" successfully ten years, he sold the magazine. In 1843, he began his new publication, "Farmer's Library and Monthly Journal of Agriculture," published by Greeley and McElrath. This was succeeded in 1848 by the "Plough, the Loom, and the Anvil," which he conducted until his death. These periodicals gave a new stimulus to agricultural pursuits, and added to the general popularity of outdoor sports. On various times he edited for publication in this country several standard foreign works, including Alexander Petzold's "Lectures on Agricultural Chemistry," Henry Stephens's "Book of the Farm," and Albrecht Daniel Thür's "Principles of Agriculture," in the "Farmer's Library and Monthly Journal of Agriculture" (New York, 1846-8); "Youatt on the Horse" (1844); "Henry M'Convey's "Penman,"" "The Farmer's Guide", "Penman," with an introduction; and he wrote "Christmas Gift to Young Agriculturists" (Washington, 1841); "Letter on Naval Education" (1843); and "The Dog and Sportsman" (1845).—His son, Frederick Gustavus, b. in Annapolis, Md., 17 March, 1814; d. in Charlottesville, Va., 21 Mar., 1894. He went to France with Lafayette, and received his early education there. On returning to this country, he entered West Point. When Gen. Lafayette died, congress passed complimentary resolutions upon his life and services, and Mr. Skinner was selected by President Jackson to convey these resolutions to Lafayette's family. After remaining two years in France, as working attaché of the American legation, he made a tour of the continent and afterward engaged in a wide range of field sports. At the opening of the civil war he was given command of the 1st Virginia infantry, and he was colonel of that regiment until disabled by wounds. After the war he went to Egypt, and, refusing a commission in the Egyptian army, devoted his attention to the field sports of that country. Upon returning to his native land, he joined the staff of the "Turf, Field, and Farm," in New York, and, as field editor of that journal, was instrumental in bringing about the first field-trial, the first bench-show of dogs, and the first international gun-trial that was ever held in the United States. He was at one time chief of the agricultural bureau of the U. S. patent-office, and published "Elements of Agricultural Chemistry," from the French of Frédéric, 1854.

SKINNER, Otis Ainsworth, author, b. in Royalton, Vt., 3 July, 1807; d. in Napierville, Ill., 18 Sept., 1861. He taught for some time, and in 1826 became a Universalist minister. He was settled as pastor in Baltimore in 1831, in Haverhill in 1836, in Boston in 1837, and in New York City in 1846. He returned to his former charge in Boston in 1849, and remained till April, 1857, when he settled in Elgin, Ill. In August of the same year he was chosen president of Lombard university, Galesburg, Ill., and in October, 1858, he became pastor at Joliet, Ill. He edited the "South-SKINNER, Thomas Harvey, author, b. in Harvey's Neck, N. C., 7 March, 1791; d. in New York city, 1 Feb., 1871. He was graduated at Princeton in 1809, and studied law, but, abandoning it for theology, was licensed to preach in 1812. In 1813 he became assistant in a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, and in 1816 he was settled as a pastor in that city. In 1832 he became professor of sacred rhetoric in Andover theological seminary, and in 1853 he was appointed pastor of the Mercer street Presbyterian church, New York. From 1854 till the death he was the only learned, and pastoral, and theological seminary. Williams gave him the degree of D. D., in 1826, and that of L. L. D., in 1855. Dr. Skinner was an eloquent pulpit orator and an able teacher. He published "Religion of the Bible" (New York, 1830), "Aids to Preaching and Hearing," (Philadelphia, 1839); "History of Missouri" (1841); "Vinet's Pastoral Theology" (1854); "Vinet's Homiletics" (1854), two translations; "Discussions in Theology" (New York, 1856); "Thoughts on Evangelizing the World" (1870); and occasional sermons. He also contributed to the religious press.

P. S. Mack, Elijah, educator, b. in Lower Wakefield, Bucks county, Pa., 24 Nov., 1784; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 29 May, 1866. He was graduated at Princeton in 1808, was principal of Trenton academy in 1810-12, and was licensed by the New Brunswick presbytery as a preacher in 1811. In 1812 he was elected vice-president and professor of natural philosophy and chemistry, in Princeton. In 1815 he was elected president of the American Medical Association, and in November of the same year he was elected superintendent of the Literary and scientific institute of that city, and when Cincinnati college was established in 1819 he was appointed its president, and continued till 1828. In 1828 he was president of the Ohio Medical College, and in 1844 he returned to Cincinnati. He then had charge of the medical college, and was at one time professor in Ohio medical college. Princeton gave him the degree of L. L. D., in 1863. His cousin, James Richard, soldier, b. in Bucks county, Pa., 28 Sept., 1818; d. in Chicago, Ill., 28 June, 1861, removed with his father's family to Indiana in 1827, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and became a successful lawyer. In 1840 he was made colonel of the 47th Indiana regiment, and was ordered with his command to Kentucky. He was assigned to Gen. Don Carlos Buell's army, but was subsequently transferred to Missouri and placed under Gen. John Pope. With his command he participated in numerous actions. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 31 Dec., 1864, major-general by brevet, 13 March, 1865, and was mustered out of the service, 15 Jan., 1866. After the war he resumed the practice of law, and at the time of his death, and for many years preceding, was a judge of the 28th judicial circuit of Indiana.

SLADE, Daniel Denison, physician, b. in Boston, 10 May, 1823; d. in Chestnut Hill, Mass., 11 Feb., 1890. He was graduated at Harvard medical school, in 1853, and took charge of the medical department, with the appointment of house surgeon to the Massachusetts hospital. He went abroad for the purpose of higher studies, and on his return in 1858 he settled in practice in Boston, where he continued until 1883. Dr. Slade then gradually relinquished his profession for literary work, and he was later a contributor to the scientific journals, and in 1883 was chosen professor of applied zoology in Harvard, which chair he held for twelve years. In 1884 he was appointed assistant in the Museum of comparative zoology and lecturer on comparative osteology in Harvard. During the civil war he was appointed one of the inspectors of hospitals under SLATER, Samuel, manufacturer, b. in Elyer, Derbyshire, England, 9 June, 1764; d. in Webster, Mass., 21 April, 1855. He was the son of a respectable woman, received a good education, and served an apprenticeship at cotton-spinning with Jedediah Strutt, the partner of Richard Arkwright. He was a favorite with Mr. Strutt, and in making improvements in his mills, and gained a thorough mastery of the theory and practice of the new manufacture. In 1789 congress passed its first act for the encouragement of manufactures, and the legislature of Pennsylvania offered a bounty for the introduction of the Arkwright process. Young Slater became cognizant of these circumstances, and determined to introduce the invention in the United States; but, as the laws of England did not admit of his taking drawings or models with him, he had to trust to his memory to enable him to construct the most complicated machinery. He landed in New York in November, 1789, and, having ascertained that Moses Brown had made some attempts at cotton-spinning in Rhode Island, wrote to him and told him what he could do. Mr. Brown, in replying to him, wrote: "If thou canst do this thing, I invite thee to come to Rhode Island, and have the credit of introducing cotton-manufacture into America." Slater proceeded to Pawtucket, R. I., in January, 1790, and immediately entered into articles of agreement with William Almy and Smith Brown to construct and operate the new cotton-spinning machinery. On 24 Dec., 1790, he started at Pawtucket three 18-inch carding-machines, the necessary drawing-heads with two rolls and four processes, the roving-cases and winders for the same, and throttle-spinning-frames of seventy-four spindles each, and a time was made for putting the yarn into skeins, in which form it was at that time placed upon the market. In doing this Mr. Slater was compelled to prepare all the plans in the several departments of manufacturing, and to construct with his own hands the different kinds of machinery, or else teach others how to do it. The first yarn made on his machinery was equal to the best quality made in England. About 1800 the second cotton-mill went into operation in Rhode Island. In 1806 Mr. Slater was joined by his brother John, from England, and soon afterward a cotton-mill was erected in a locality now known as Slater'sville, R. I. In 1812 Mr. Slater began the erection of mills in Oxford (now Webster), Mass., adding in 1815-16 the manufacture of woolen cloth. He was also interested in iron-manufactures, and acquired great wealth. In 1796 he established a Sunday-school for the improvement of his work-people, which was the first, or among the first, in the United States. See a memoir of him by George S. White (Philadelphia, 1836).—His nephew, John Fox, philanthropist, b. at Slater'sville, R. I., 4 March, 1815; d. in Norwich, Conn., 7 May, 1884, was the son of John Slater. He was early trained for the manufacturing business, and in 1852 became sole owner of the mill property he was then conducting. He made excellent investments, and in a few years acquired great wealth. Mr. Slater was early interested in the cause of education, and gave liberally for the establishment of the Norwich free academy and other objects. In April, 1882, he placed in the hands of trustees $1,000,000, the interest of which is to be used for the education of freemen in the south.—His son, William Albert, in November, 1886, transferred to the Free academy, Norwich, a building costing $150,000, which he erected in memory of his father.

SLAUGHTER, Gabriel, governor of Kentucky, b. in Virginia about 1757; d. in Mercer county, Ohio, Oct. 31, 1835. In early life he conducted a store and a post office, and at an early age, was a skillful and successful farmer, and frequently chosen to the legislature. At the battle of New Orleans he was colonel of a Kentucky regiment, and he received the thanks of the legislature for his gallant services on that occasion. In 1816 he was elected lieutenant-governor of Kentucky, and on the death of the governor, George Madison, soon afterward, he was chosen governor for the four years of Madison's term.

SLAUGHTER, William Banks, lawyer, b. in Culpeper county, Va., 10 April, 1781; d. in Madison, Wis., 21 July, 1879. He was educated at William and Mary, and admitted to the bar, practised first in Barstow, Ky., and then in Beloit, Ind., and for three years was a lawyer and county judge in that latter state. While in that body he introduced a set of resolutions strongly supporting President Andrew Jackson's proclamation to the South Carolina nullifiers. He was appointed register of the land-office at Indianapolis in 1833, and at Green Bay in 1835, and in the latter year was elected a member of the legislative council of Michigan, and in 1836 was appointed territory delegate to the territory to the west of Lake Michigan be organized into a new territory to be named Wisconsin. After residing in Wisconsin and in his native place, he returned in 1861 to Middlesex, Wis, and in 1862 was appointed commissioner of subsistence and quartermaster. He wrote for periodicals and publications, and published a history of the Illinois and Michigan Canal. He was married, 1808, to a daughter of Colonel M. Havens, Gen. of the 1st regiment, U. S. N., b. 25 Oct., 1808; d. 12 June, 1890. He was a son of Capt. Philip Slaughter, of the 11th continental regiment in the army of the Revolution. His education was obtained partly at home and partly in a classical academy at Winchester, Va. He entered the University of Virginia in 1825, and, after studying law, was admitted to the bar in 1828. Five years later, having resolved to enter the ministry, he went to the Episcopal theological seminary, Alexandria, Va. He was ordained deacon in Trinity church, Staunton, 25 May, 1834, by Bishop Meade, and priest in St. Paul's church, Alexandria, in July, 1835, by Bishop Richard C. Moore. His first charge was in Dottinshar parish, Va. In 1836 he accepted a call to Christ church, Georgetown, D.C., in 1840 he assumed charge of Meade and Johns parishes, and in 1843 he became rector of St. Paul's church, Petersburg, Va. Health failing, he spent 1848-9 in Europe. On returning home he established in 1850, and edited. "The Virginia Colonizationist" at Richmond, Va. Six years later he built a church on his farm in Culpeper county, and officiated gratuitously for his neighbors and servants until his church was destroyed by the National army in 1862. He then edited in Petersburg "The Army and Navy Messenger," a religious paper for soldiers, and also preached and visited in camp and hospitals. When peace returned in 1865 he was for a time associate editor of the "Southern Churchman." Then he went back to his old home, where, as the churches were destroyed, he fitted up a recess-chancel in his own house for church services. Emmanuel church in Slaughter parish having been rebuilt, he accepted charge of it, and served there while health and strength sufficed. He received the degree of D. D. from William and Mary in 1874. Of late years he had held the office of historiographer of the diocese of Virginia, which was tendered to him by the convention. Dr. Slaughter had made large contributions to religious and general literature, not only in publishing special sermons, orations, addresses, and periodicals, but also in bringing out various volumes from his pen during the last forty years. Among these are "St. George's Parish History" (Richmond, 1841); "Man and Woman" (1860); "Life of Randolph Fairfax" (1862); "Life of Colonel Joshua Fry, Sometime Professor in William and Mary College, Va., and Washington's Senior in Command of Virginia Forces, in 1774" (New York, 1886); "Historical Churches of Virginia," in Bishop Perry's "Centennial History" (1882); "Life of Hon. William Green, Jurist and Scholar" (Richmond, 1883); "Views from Cedar Mountains, in Fifteenth Year of Ministry and Marriage" (New York, 1884); "The Colonial Church of Virginia" (1886); "Christianity the Key to the History of the People of North Carolina," and before the ladies of Mount Vernon association, in Pohick church (1886); and "Address to the Minute-Men of Culpeper" (1887).

SLEEPER, John Sherburne, author, b. in Tyngsboro, Mass., 21 Sept., 1794; d. in Boston, May 11, 1878. He was during twenty-two years a sailor and a shipmaster in the ports of the eastern United States, and engaged in journalism, was connected with the New Hampshire "News Letter" at Exeter in 1831-2, and the Lowell "Daily Journal" in 1833, and was editor of the Boston "Journal" in 1834-54. He was mayor of Roxbury, Mass., in 1806-8, and published "Tales of the Ocean Pilot," Boston, 1845; "Salt Water Boy," Boston, 1855; "Jack in the Forecastle," 1856; "Mark Rowland," 1857; "At Hawser Martingale," 1857; and various addresses.

SLEMMER, Adam Jacoby, soldier, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., 1821; d. in Fort Lamarie, Kan., 7 Oct., 1868. He was graduated at the United States military academy in July, 1840, and assigned to the 1st artillery. After a short campaign against the Seminole Indians in Florida during which he took a creditable part, he was for four years on frontier service in California, and in 1855-9 was assistant professor of mathematics at the U. S. military academy. He afterward returned to garrison duty at Fort Moultrie, S. C., and in 1860 was transferred to Florida, where in 1861 he commanded a small body of U.S. soldiers in Pensacola harbor, occupying with them Fort Barrancas; but when intelligence of the surrender of Pensacola navy-yard reached him, he transferred his troops on 10 Jan., to Fort Pickens, opposite, which he successfully held until he was relieved by Col. Harver Brown, thus preserving the key to the Gulf of Mexico. He was promoted major of the 10th infantry in May, 1861, was for a short time inspector-general of the Department of the Ohio, returned to active duty in May, 1862, and participated in the siege of Corinth and the subsequent movement to Louisville, Ky., and to the relief of Nashville, Tenn. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, and took part in the battle of Stone River, 31 Dec, 1802, where he was so severely wounded as to be incapacitated for further active service in the field. On 8 Feb., 1804, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 4th infantry, and in March, 1805, he was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general, U. S. army, for his meritorious services. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in August, 1805, and was afterward sent to command Fort Lafayette, where he died of heart disease.

SLEND McCORMICK, Elmina Drake, author, b. in La Grange, N. Y., 23 Dec., 1827. She is a daughter of Thomas Drake, was educated at district schools, and then alternated between teaching and studying at higher schools. She married Isaac Slenker in 1856, and has long resided in Snowville, Va. Mrs. Slenker has contributed to various journals, and was in 1889-1 assistant editor of the New York "Physiologist and Family Physician." The "Children's Corner" in the "Boston Investigator," and "Elmina Column" in "The South Land," have been under her charge for several years, and she has published "Studying the Bible" (Boston, 1870); "John's Way" (New York, 1875); "The Darwin's" (1879); and "Mary Jones" (Nashville, 1887).

SLENDER, Thomas, b. in Annapolis, Md., in 1801; d. in Baltimore, 23 April, 1874. He received a good education, worked for a time as a furniture-painter, studying theology at the same time, and in 1821 was licensed as a preacher of the Methodist Episcopal church. After serving on the Hartford and Redstone circuits, he was transferred in 1824 to the navy-yard at Washington. In 1826 he was appointed presiding elder of the Potomac district, and in 1837 he was elected chaplain of the U. S. senate, being twice re-elected. In 1846 he was stationed at Carlisle, Pa., was again elected chaplain of the U. S. senate, and held the office till 1850. In the following nineteen years he was stationed at Baltimore and Frederick city, was again chaplain of the senate, and a presiding elder for eight years. From 1862 till 1870 he was chaplain of the Senate's chapel at Baltimore, and in 1870 he was again presiding elder of the Baltimore district. He had been a member of seven quadrennial general conferences. He received the degree of D. D. from Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., in 1869. While chaplain of the senate he delivered a sermon against duelling, which proved to be the forerunner of the act making duelling illegal (New York, 1838). His other works are "Appeal on Christian Baptism" (New York, 1835), and "A Further Appeal" (1836).

SLIDELL, John, statesman, b. in New York city about 1793; d. in London, England, 29 July, 1871. He was graduated at Columbia in 1810, and engaged unsuccessfully in commerce. He then studied law, and in 1819 removed to New Orleans, where, making a specialty of commercial law, he soon acquired a large practice. In 1828 he was a defeated Democratic candidate for congress, and actively canvassed the state for Andrew Jackson, who appointed him U. S. district attorney for Louisiana, but after a year in office he resigned. Mr. Slidell was a candidate for the U. S. senate in 1836 and 1840, but as "Charleston tar" was chosen. He disposed of his practice in 1835 and continued as a leader in Louisiana politics until 1842, when he was elected to congress as a state-rights Democrat, and served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 10 Nov., 1845. In November, 1843, he was sent as minister to Mexico by President Polk, to adjust the difficulty caused by the annexation of the Mexican Ceded States, but that government refused to receive him, and he returned in January, 1847, when he resigned. He was again a candidate for the U. S. senate in 1849; but his party were in the minority, and in the canvass of 1852 he was active in behalf of Franklin Pierce. On the inauguration of the latter he refused a diplomatic appointment to Central America, but, on the acceptance by Pierre Soulé of the French mission, he was sent to the U. S. senate and served, with re-election, from 5 Dec., 1857, to 4 Feb., 1861. He rarely spoke, but was a member of an important committee, and exerted great influence. Preferring to remain in the senate, he declined a cabinet appointment from President Buchanan, but continued a confidential friend of the latter throughout his administration. Mr. Slidell was a strenuous supporter of the doctrines of state-rights, and, when Louisiana passed the ordinance of secession, he withdrew from the senate with his colleague, after making a deficient speech. In September, 1861, he was appointed Confederate commissioner to France, and set out with James M. Mason for Southampton from Havana in November. He was seized on the high seas by Capt. Charles Wilkes, and brought to the United States. After imprisonment in Fort Warren he was released and sailed for England on 1 Jan., 1862. From England he went at once to Paris, where, in February, 1862, he paid his first visit to the French minister of foreign affairs. His mission, which had for its object the recognition of the Confederate states by the French government, was a failure, but the well-known sympathy of Napoleon III., who at that time was deeply interested in the project of a Mexican empire under Maximilian, did much to favor the Confederate cause. In order to secure means, he proposed a commercial convention, by which France should enjoy valuable export and import privileges for a long period, and which, if carried into effect speedily, on the basis of breaking the blockade, because of its legal inefficiency, would give France control of southern cotton, and in return furnish the Confederacy with ample supplies, including arms and munitions of war. This was not accepted, on account of the emperor's refusal to recognize the Confederate states unless the British authorities should co-operate. But the sympathy of Napoleon III. proved of great value, for by his secret influence Mr. Slidell was able to begin the negotiation of the $15,000,000 Confederate loan. Early in 1863 the emperor permitted him to make proposals for the construction of four steam corvettes and two iron-clad rams at private ship-yards in Bordeaux and Nantes; but later in the year, information of this fact coming to the knowledge of the U. S. representative in Paris, imperial orders were issued that the vessels should be sold to foreign powers. One of them was transferred to the Confederate navy in January, 1863, after being purchased by the Confederates, though it is asserted on the other side that the purchase was fictitious. This vessel, the "Stonewall," set out for the United States, but did not reach Havans till May, after the surrender of the Confederate armies. Mr. Sidel settled in England at the close of the war, and continued there till his death. A full account of the relations of Mr. Sidel with the French government, in regard to the building of the vessels mentioned above, is contained in "France and the Confederate Navy," by John Bigelow (New York, 1888).—His brother, Thomas (1810-80), was a judge of the Louisiana supreme court in 1845-52, and then chief justice till 1855, when he was assaulted by a ruffian and received injuries from which he never recovered.

With Judith H. Benjamin, he prepared a "Digest of Supreme Court Opinions."

SLOANE, Samuel, architect, b. in Chester county, Pa., 7 March, 1815; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 19 July, 1884. He established himself in Philadelphia, and designed many important buildings, among them the Blockley hospital for the insane in that city, and the state insane asylum at Montgomery, Ala. He conducted the "Architectural Review," beginning in 1858, and published "City and Suburban Architecture" (Philadelphia, 1859); "Constructive Architecture" (1859); "Model Architect" (1869); and "Designs for Rural Buildings" (1861).

SLOANE, Samuel, railroad president, b. in Lisburn, near Belfast, Ireland, 25 Dec., 1817. He came to this country in infancy, was graduated at Columbia college in 1838, served as a clerk and afterwards a merchant. He was supervisor of Kings county in 1850-1, and state senator in 1858-9, and was elected president of the Hudson river railroad, 13 Feb., 1853, which office he retained till 1852. Subsequently for two years he was commissioner of the trunk lines of railroad to the west, as general arbitrator of railroad disputes in that region. He was elected representative of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western railroad company in 1867, which post he now (1898) holds. He is also president of the Oswego and Syracuse, Syracuse, Binghamton, and New York; Utica, Chenango, and Susquehanna Valley; Fort Wayne and Jackson; Green Bay, Wisconsin, and St. Paul, and other roads.

SLOANE, John, b. in Rushsylvania, Ohio, 1817; d. in London, 11 Jan., 1875. He studied medicine in London, in 1858, was elected a fellow of the Royal society, and afterwards spent some time in London and other West India islands, where he collected a great number of plants. He became physician-general to the army in 1710, president of the College of physicians in 1719, and physician to the king in 1725, and about the same time succeeded Sir Isaac Newton as president of the Royal society. His library and natural history collection were purchased by the British government after his death, and formed the beginning of the British museum. Besides numerous contributions to the Philosophical Transactions, he published the "Natural History of Jamaica" (2 vols., London, 1707-25).

SLOANE, James Reuwin Wilson, educator, b. in Topsrah, Orange co., Vt., 29 May, 1823; d. in Alleghany City, Pa., 6 March, 1886. He was educated at Jefferson college, Canonsburg, Pa., in 1847, and studied theology at the Reformed Presbyterian seminary in northwestern Ohio, where he was graduated in 1853. In 1854 he became pastor at Rushsylvania, Ohio, and in 1856-68 he held a charge in New York city. He was president of Richmond college, Ohio, in 1848-50, of Geneva college, in the same state, in 1851-6, and professor of systematic theology and homiletics in Alleghany theological seminary from 1868 till his death. He was also pastor of the 1st Reformed Presbyterian church in Alleghany. He published numerous sermons and literary addresses. See his "Life and Work," edited by his son William (New York, 1888).—His son, William Milligan, educator, b. in Richmond, Ohio, 13 Nov., 1850, was graduated at Columbia in 1878. He was instructor in classics in Newell institute, Pittsburg, in 1867-72, studied at Berlin and Leipsic in 1872-6, and in 1875-3, in addition, was also private secretary of George Bannerott, then minister at Berlin, and worked under his direction on the tenth volume of the "History of the Reformed Church," 1877. He became professor of Latin in Princeton, and professor of history in that institution. In 1897 he accepted the professorship of history in Columbia. He edited the "New Princeton Review" and his father's "Life and Work" (New York, 1888), and has published "French War and the Revolution" (1893) and "Life of Nelson Bonaparte" (4 vols., 1896-7).

SLOANE, John, statesman, b. in York, Pa., in 1779; d. in Wooster, Ohio, 15 May, 1856. He removed to Ohio at an early age, was a member of the state assembly in 1804-6, and served the last two years as speaker. He was U. S. receiver of public monies at Canton in 1808-16, and at Wooster in 1816-19, was elected to congress from Ohio, and served six years there from 1821-19. In 1819, till 3 March, 1829. He was clerk of the court of common pleas for seven years, secretary of state of Ohio three years, and was appointed treasurer of the United States, serving from 27 Nov., 1850, till 1 April, 1853. During the war of 1812 he was a colonel of militia.

SLOANE, Rush Richard, lawyer, b. in Sandusky, Erie co., Ohio, 19 Sept., 1828. He was educated at Wesleyan academy, Norwich, Ohio, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was city clerk of Sandusky, Ohio, in 1855-7, was elected judge of the probate court for Erie county in 1857, and re-elected in 1859, was appointed by President Lincoln to the general agency of the post-office department, serving from 1861 till 1866, and was mayor of Sandusky in 1870, 1880, and 1881. Mr. Sloane was an ardent anti-slavery man, and was instrumental in the escape of seven slaves in Sandusky, on 20 Oct., 1859, where they had been arrested by their masters. He was prosecuted, and paid over $4,000 damages and costs, being the first victim of the fugitive slave law of 1850.

SLOANE, Thomas Coote, b. in New York city, 24 Nov., 1851. He is a nephew of Charles O'Connor. After graduation at St. Francis Xavier's college in 1870, and at the School of Mines of Columbia in 1872, with the degree of B. E., he received the degree of Ph. D. in 1876 from the latter institution. His scientific work has included a method for the determination of sulphur in illuminating gas, and processes for estimation of constituents in gas analysis. Dr. Sloane has invented the thermopile, which is the only apparatus ever devised for registering automatically and mechanically the illuminating power of gas. He has lectured extensively in schools and before public audiences, and since 1883 has been professor in the- City College and Ball college. His services have been frequently called for as an expert in patent suits, and he is regularly retained by law firms in New York city. In 1878-80 he was one of the department editors of the "Sanitary Engineer," and since 1886 has been one of the editors of the "Scientific American." He has contributed largely to technical journals in this country and abroad, and is a member of scientific societies. From 1882
SLOCUM, Henry Warner, soldier, b. in Delphos, Wy., Nov. 28, 1827; d. in Brooklyn, 14 April, 1864. He entered the United States military academy, appointed 21st lieutenant in the artillery, and ordered to Florida the same year. He was promoted 1st lieutenant in 1855, but resigned in October, 1856; and, returning to New York, engaged in the practice of law at Syracuse, and was a member of the legislature in 1859. At the opening of the civil war he resigned his services, and on 21 May, 1861, was appointed colonel of the 27th New York volunteers. He commanded this regiment at the battle of Bull Run on 21 July, where he was severely wounded; 9 Aug. was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and was assigned to the command of a brigade in Gen. William B. Franklin's division of the Army of the Potomac. In the Virginia peninsula campaign of 1862 he was engaged in the siege of Yorktown and the action at West Point, Va., and succeeded to the command of the division on 15 May, on Franklin's assignment to the 6th corps. At the battle of Gaines's Mills, 27 June, he was sent with his division to re-enforce Gen. Fitz-John Porter, who was then severely pressed by the enemy, and rendered important service, as he did also at the battles of Glendale and Malvern Hill, his division occupying the right of the main line at both engagements; he was promoted to the rank of major-general of volunteers, 4 July, 1862, engaged in the second battle of Bull Run, at South Mountain, and at Antietam, and in October was assigned to the command of the 12th army corps. In the battles of Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg he took an active part. At Gettysburg he commanded the right wing of the army, and contributed largely to occupy Atlanta, Ga., on 2 Sept. In Sherman's march to the sea and invasion of the Carolinas, he held command of the left wing of the army, and participated in all its engagements from the departure from Atlanta till the surrender of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston at Durham station, N. C. In September, 1863, Gen. Slocum resigned from the army and resumed the practice of law in SLOCUM, Frances, captive among the Indians, b. in Wyoming valley, Pa., in 1752; d. near Locusts, Ind., in 1851. She was taken captive by Delaware Indians on 2 Nov, 1778, and no intelligence was received regarding her till the summer of 1837, when the surviving members of her family heard that she was residing near Locusts, Ind. Her brother, Joseph Slocum, and her sister proceeded thither, and, obtaining an interview with their long-lost sister, had no difficulty in establishing her identity. She had entirely forgotten her native language and all knowledge of Christianity, and was regarded as a savage existence, and when grown to womanhood married a young chief of the nation, and removed with him to Ohio. She was so happy in her domestic relations that she dreaded being discovered and compelled to reside among the whites. After the death of her first husband she married one of the Miami tribe, and at the time of her discovery had been many years a widow, and had children and grandchildren around her. She was known among the Indians as Macouqua (young bear), was regarded by them as a queen, and was happy and in comfortable circumstances. When the Miami were removed from Indiana, John Quincy Adams pleaded the cause of Macouqua so eloquently in congress that she and her Indian relatives were exempted. Congress gave her a tract of land a mile square, to be held in perpetuity by her descendants.

Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1866 he declined the appointment of colonel of infantry in the regular army. In 1865 he was the unsuccessful candidate of the Democrats for secretary of state of New York, in 1868 he was chosen a presidential elector, and he was elected to congress the same year, and re-elected in 1870. In 1876 he was elected president of the board of city works, Brooklyn, which post he afterward resigned, and in 1884 he was again elected to congress. He was one of the commissioners of the Brooklyn bridge, and was in favor of making the city a seaport.

SLOCUMB, Ezekiel, soldier, b. in Craven county, N. C., about 1750; d. near Dudley, N. C., 4 July, 1840. His father, Joseph, was at one time a merchant in Atlanta, Ga. The son entered the Revolutionary army at an early date, and served through the war. As a lieutenant he fought at the battle of Moore's Creek, N. C., 27 Feb., 1776, and he attained the rank of colonel before the close of the war. After the battle of Guilford, in 1781, his farm was ravaged by the British troops while on their march from Wilmington to Virginia, and, aided by Maj. Williams, he raised a troop of about 200 men, and, following the royal army, succeeded in cutting off their foraging parties and harassed them greatly until they crossed the river. He joined the Pennsylvania Line with his troop, and was at Yorktown on 19 Oct., 1781. After the war he returned to his home on a plantation near Dudley, N. C., held many offices of honor and trust, and was a member of the North Carolina house of commons from 1812 till 1818.—His wife, Mary Hooks, at the battle of Moore's Creek, fearing for her husband's safety, visited the scene of the battle alone, and having been assured that he was unhurt, dressed the wounds of the injured and returned to her home forty hours after she had left it, having ridden 25 miles on horseback.—Their son Jesse, b. in Dudley, N. C., 20 Aug., 1780; d. in Washington, D. C., 20 Dec., 1829, was elected to congress from North Carolina for two successive terms, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till his death.

SLOUGH, John P. (so), soldier, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1829; d. in Santa Fe, N. M., 16 Dec., 1867. He became a lawyer in his native city, and in 1850 was elected to the legislature of Ohio, from which he was expelled for striking a member. In 1852 he became a secretary of the central Democrat committee in his state, and afterward in 1860 to 1861 went to Texas and in 1860 to Denver, Colo. At the opening of the civil war he raised a company of volunteers, assumed command of Fort Garland, and afterward became colonel of the 1st Colorado regiment, forming part of Gen. Edward R. S. Can- by's expedition to New Mexico. He fought there, in opposition to orders, the battle of Pigeon's River, and afterward, in the cruel affair at Sabine Pass, and in 1864 to 1865 to New Orleans, and in 1864 to 1865. After the war he entered the civil service of Canada in 1865, and became chief clerk of emigration and quarantine in 1865. Mr. Small has contributed extensively to the British, American, and Canadian press and to magazines, and among other works has published "Animals of North America, Mammals" (Montreal, 1865); "Fresh-Water Fish" (1866); "Chro- nology of Canadian History,"(1860); "Lakes of the Great Valley" (Ottawa, 1872); "Mineral Resources of Canada" (1888); and "Canadian Forests" (Montreal, 1885).

SLATER, George Ludewig, clergyman, b. in Rodenberg, Hesse-Cassel, Germany, 5 May, 1857, in 1847 he settled with his parents in St. Louis, Mo. He was graduated at Westminster college, Fulton, Mo., in 1860, in 1863 at Princeton theological seminary, and was licensed as a preacher by the presbytery of New Brunswick the same year. He has been settled as pastor in Rens- schaur, and St. Louis, Mo., Duluth, Minn., and Shelbyville, Ind., and since 1881 at Arlington, N. J. From 1866 till 1870 he was secretary of home missions of the synod of Missouri. He was assistant editor of the "Missouri Presbyterian" in 1870; 20 years of the "Christian Advocate," the book correspondent of the Cincinnati "Herald and Presby- terian." He has published "Life and Character of Joseph Hamilton" (Shelbyville, Ind., 1872); "Memo- rial of Mrs. Jane Major" (1874); "History of our Beloved Church" (1876); "Historical and Critical Investigations of the Acts Pilati" (Indiana, 1876); "Illustrated Historical Atlas of Shelby County, Indiana" (Chicago, 1880); "The Religion of Politics" (Shelbyville, 1880); "Life of the Emperor Tiberius" (New York, 1881); and minor works. SMALL, Alvin Edmond, physician, b. in Maine, 4 March, 1811; d. in Chicago, Ill., 29 Dec., 1866. He began the study of medicine at Bath in 1831, and sub- sequently continued it in the University of Pennsyl- vania. He settled in Delaware county, Pa., but in 1848 he returned to Philadelphia, where he practiced in his profession. While he here became converted to the homoeopathic school of medicine. In 1849 Dr. Small was appointed professor of physiology and pathology in the Homoeopathic medical college of Pennsylvania, where he remained for seven years, during which time he wrote several medical works and was editor of the "Philadelphia Journal." In 1856 he returned to Chicago and entered at once into an extensive practice, which he continued till his death. Soon after his arrival in that city he was called to the chair of theory and practice in Bahmann college, which he held for life.

SMALL, Henry Beaumont, Canadian natural- istic, b. in Market Bosworth, Leicestershire, England, 21 Oct., 1831. He was educated at King's college, London, and Lincoln college, Oxford, where he was graduated in 1853, afterward emigrated to Canada, and in 1858 removed to the state of New York, where he was a teacher of classics in a military school at Sing Sing in 1859-2. He afterward taught for a time in New York city, served in the U. S. sanitary commission in Virginia during part of the civil war. He entered the civil service of Canada in 1868, and became chief clerk of emigration and quarantine in 1885. Mr. Small has contributed extensively to the British, American, and Canadian press and to magazines, and among other works has published "Animals of North America, Mammals" (Mon- treal, 1865); "Fresh-Water Fish" (1866); "Chro- nology of Canadian History,"(1860); "Lakes of the Great Valley" (Ottawa, 1872); "Mineral Resources of Canada" (1888); and "Canadian Forests" (Montreal, 1885).

SMALL, John, British soldier, b. in Strathardle, Athole, Scotland, in 1726; d. in the island of Guernsey, 17 March, 1796. After serving in the Scotch brigade in the Dutch war, he was commissioned an ensign by 29 Aug., 1747, and was appointed a lieutenant on the eve of the departure of that regiment for this country, to join the force under London. He served under Abercrombie in the attack on Ticon- deroga in 1758, accompanied Sir Jeffrey Amherst the following year in his expedition, went to Mon- treal in 1759, was on service in the West Indies in 1763, and the same year was made captain. On 14
SMALL, Michael Peter, soldier, b. in Harrisburg, Pa., 9 Aug., 1831; d. on Governor's island, N. Y., 1 Aug., 1856. He was graduated at the military academy, assigned to the artillery, served against the Seminole Indians, and was promoted 1st lieutenant, 27 April, 1861. He served as chief commissary and quartermaster at Rolla, Mo., from 4 Sept., 1861, till 31 Jan., 1863; as chief commissary of the 13th army corps, and of the army during the field, in the Tiche campaign in the Department of the Gulf from 15 Sept. till 9 Nov., 1863; and was supervising commissary of the states of Illinois and Indiana from December, 1863, till February, 1864. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel on the staff, 15 Sept., 1863, became chief commissary of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina at Fortress Monroe, supplied the armies operating against Richmond, and acted in a similar capacity to 1864. He served in the Federal departments till the close of the war. He became brevet colonel of U. S. volunteers, 1 Jan., 1865, and brevet brigadier-general, 9 April, 1865, for meritorious services in the subsistence department during the war. At the time of his death Gen. Small was assistant commissary general.

SMALLEY, Eugene Virgil, journalist, b. in Ravenna, Ohio, 20 July, 1841; d. in St. Paul, 29 Dec., 1899. He was educated in the public schools, and passed a year in New York central college at McMurray. He enlisted at the beginning of the civil war in the 7th Ohio infantry, and frequently sent letters about different engagements to the newspapers, for which descriptions he had shot himself. He was killed at the battle ofGettysburg. He served until nearly the close of the struggle, when he was discharged on account of wounds, and as soon as he was able went to Washington, D. C., where, in 1865, he was appointed clerk of the military committee of the house of representatives. He retained the post until 1874, at the same time corresponding at intervals for different journals. He then formed a connection with a New York journal, continuing to be its correspondent and editorial writer for nine years. During his residence in Washington he had formed an intimate acquaintance with public men and measures, which aided him greatly as a journalist. In 1882 he entered the employment of the Northern Pacific railroad, and in 1884 established the "Northwest," an illustrated magazine, in St. Paul, Minn., of which he continued to be the editor and publisher. He is a frequent contributor to periodicals, mainly on subjects relating to the resources and development of the region in which he has made his home. He has published "History of the Northern Pacific Railroad" (New York, 1883), and "History of the Region drained by the Minn. River." (1890).

SMALLS, George Washburn, journalist, b. in Franklin, Norfolk co., Mass., 2 June, 1833. He was graduated at Yale in 1853, read law with George F. Hour at Worcester in 1853-4, and in Harvard law-school in 1851-5, and in 1856 was admitted to the Boston bar. He practised law in Boston until the opening of the civil war, when, in the service of the New York "Tribune," he accompanied the National troops to Port Royal, afterward going with Gen. John C. Fremont into Virginia. Remaining with the Army of the Potomac, he witnessed the battle of Antietam. Immediately upon its close, Smalley rode thirty miles, found a train, and, going direct to New York, wrote his narrative of the engagement on the cars. This vivid description, with the energy that had been shown in its transmission and publication, gave him rank among the best-known war correspondents. In 1865 he was a member of the editorial staff of the "Tribune." At the close of the war, between Prussia and Austria in 1866 Mr. Smalley was sent on a day's notice to Europe. At the close of the war he returned for a few months to New York, but was sent to England in May, 1867, by the "Tribune," with instructions to organize a London bureau for that journal. This he did, and the success that has attended the European department of the "Tribune" is largely due to his efforts. In 1870, at the opening of the Franco-German war, the "Tribune" devised a new system of news-gathering. Mr. Smalley, as the agent of this policy, showed an energy and foresight which gave him an eminent rank in journalism. The English writer Kingslake, in his "History of the Crimean War," says: "The success of that partnership for the purpose of war was such as to cause a rival system of our London newspapers and the New York "Tribune," was an era in the journalism of Europe." Mr. Smalley in 1897 became New York correspondent of the London "Times." He has written "London Letters and Some Others" (New York, 1891) and "Studies of Men" (1893).

SMALLEY, John, clergyman, b. in Baltimore (now Camden), Co. of York, Conn., 1734; d. in New Britain, Conn., 1 June, 1829. After his graduation at Yale in 1756 he studied theology under Rev. Joseph Bellamy, and on 19 April, 1758, was ordained and installed pastor over a newly organized church at New Britain, Conn., sustaining the relation, with slight interruption, a little more than fifty years. In 1809 he received the degree of D. D. from Princeton. In his later years, he was given a colleague, preaching afterward occasionally and devoting himself to the preparation of a second volume of discourses for publication. Dr. Smalley's sermons, which he always read in the pulpit, have seldom been surpassed in logical accuracy, clearness, and strength. The Rev. Royal Robbins says in 1806: "Dr. Smalley, in conforming to his tracts on "Natural and Moral Liberty," seemed to think that no one previously had drawn the proper distinctions on this subject—not even Edwards had made the matter clear. Admitting the correctness of this opinion, he is to be regarded as the father of New England theology in that branch of it." He published two sermons on 'Natural and Moral Liberty' (1763; popularized in "London; two meditations upon Universal Salvation" (1785-6); one on 'The Perfection of Divine Law' (1787); and an 'Election Sermon' (1806). Two volumes of his sermons were issued in 1863-74.

SMALLS, Robert, member of congress, b. in Beaufort, S. C., 5 April, 1839. Being a slave, he was debarred from attending school, and was altogether self-taught. He was, in 1831, hired to the riggers trade, afterward led a seafaring life, and in 1861 was employed as a pilot on "The Planter," a steamer that plied in Charleston harbor as a transport. In May, 1862, he took this vessel over Charleston bar, and delivered her to the commander of the U. S. blockading squadron. After serving for some time as pilot in the U. S. navy, he was promoted captain for gallant and meritorious conduct, 1 Dec., 1863, and placed in command of “The Planter,” serving until she was put out of commission in 1866. He returned to Beaufort after the war, was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1868, was elected a member of the state house of representatives the same year, and of the state senate in 1870, and was re-elected in 1872. He was elected to the 44th congress from South Carolina, has been re-elected to every succeeding congress except the 40th, for which he was defeated, and served, with this exception, from 5 Dec., 1866, to 3 Mar., 1868. He has been major-general of state troops.

SMALLWOOD, Charles, Canadian meteorologist, b. in Birmingham, England, in 1812; d. in Montreal, 22 Dec., 1873. He became a physician, and, emigrating to Canada in 1853, settled at St. Martin’s, Isle Jesus, Canada East, and acquired a large practice. He soon afterward established his meteorological and electrical observatory, a description of which was given in the “Smithsonian Reports.” He discovered the effects of atmospheric electricity on the formation of snow crystals, and investigated the action of ozone in connection with light, and that of electricity in the germination of seeds. In 1858 Dr. Smallwood received the honorary degree of LL. D. from McGill College, Montreal, and was appointed professor of meteorology in that institution, to which was subsequently added the chair of astronomy. In 1860 the Canadian government made him a grant for the purchase of magnetic instruments, and in August, 1861, he began making observations. When the U. S. signal-service system was established, Dr. Smallwood arranged for stations in connection with that system in other Canadian cities. He was one of the governors of the College of physicians and surgeons of Lower Canada, and was a member of many scientific and literary societies in America and Europe. He was the author of numerous articles in scientific periodicals and the “Smithsonian Reports,” and of contributions to Canadian meteorology furnished to various magazines for more than twenty years.

SMALLWOOD, William, soldier, b. in Kent county, Md., in 1792; d. in Prince George county, Md., 14 Feb., 1792. On 2 Jan., 1776, he was elected colonel of the Maryland battalion, and on 10 July, with nine companies, he joined Washington’s army in New York. On 20 Aug., his troops took an active part in the battle of Brooklyn Heights, being hotly engaged from sunrise to sunset. The line gun was fired, and lost nearly half their number. At White Plains, on 18 Oct., the Maryland line again bore the brunt of the fire, and Smallwood was wounded. For his gallantry on this occasion congress appointed him a brigadier-general, 23 Oct., 1776. In the battle of Fort Washington, 16 Nov., 1776, his command again suffered severely, and at Germantown, 4 Oct., 1777, the Maryland line retrieved the day and captured part of the enemy’s camp. In the winter of 1777-8, he was stationed at Wilmington, and captured a British brig in the Delaware laden with stores and provisions. He won new barrels in the battle of Camden, and received the thanks of congress for his gallant conduct. In September, 1780, he was appointed major-general, but after the removal of Gates he refused to serve under Baron Steuben, who was his senior officer, declaring his intention to leave the army unless congress should antedate his commission two years. This claim was not allowed, being regarded as absurd, but Gen. Smallwood remained in the army until 15 Nov., 1783. In 1787 he was elected to the legislature of South Carolina, and in the same year he was chosen governor of Maryland, which was the last public post that he held.

SMARUS, Cornelius Francis, clergyman, b. in Telburg, North Brabant, Holland, 3 March, 1823; d. in Detroit, Mich., 2 March, 1870. After completing his studies at the University of North Brabant, he came to the United States and joined the Society of Jesus at Florissant, Mo., 13 Nov., 1841. In 1843 he went to Cincinnati, where he pursued theological studies, and was assistant professor of poetry and rhetoric in a school there until 1848. During this period he published anonymously many poems of much beauty. He was ordained priest in 1849, afterward studied in Fordham, N. Y., and was chaplain of the boarding school of St. Francis Xavier in St. Louis in 1859-60. Here he displayed such powers as a pulpit orator that he became very popular. In 1861 he was detailed for missionary work, with a large field of operations, and in 1865 he visited Europe for his health. He was vice-president of the University of St. Louis in 1860-2, and again in 1857-9. He published “Princes of the Word” in N. York, 1869.

SMITH, Wesley, philanthropist, b. in Westchester county, N. Y., 23 Dec., 1800; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 6 Jan., 1871. He first was a newsboy, then became a printer, afterward studied medicine, and was graduated at the Ohio medical college, Cincinnati. He practised in that city, and was president of the Citizens’ bank there from 1843 till 1857. He became possessed of great wealth, founded in 1850 the Widows’ home in Cincinnati, to which he gave $37,000, and gave liberally to every public charity that came to his notice. Besides essays on banking, he published “Guide to Wealth, or Pathway to Health, Peace, and Competence” (Cincinnati, 1856).

SMITH, Susan Dabney, daughter, b. in Raymond, Miss., 1840. She is the daughter of Thomas S. Dabney, a rich planter, and was educated at home, at New Orleans, and at Jackson, Miss. When twenty years of age she married Lyell Smedes, but was left a widow about three months afterward. With her sisters she originated and supported the Bishop Green training-school at Deatsburg, Ala. In 1880, she became teacher in the Government Indian school in Rosebud agency, Dakota territory. She has published “Memorials of a Southern Planter,” which conveys a graphic picture of southern plantation life at its best, and of slavery in its least repulsive aspect (Baltimore, 1887).

SMILIE, John, member of congress, b. in Ireland, Dec. 10, 1804; d. in Washington, D. C., 30 Dec., 1812. He came to Pennsylvania in 1790, settled in Lancaster county, and served during the war of the Revolution in both military and civil capacities. He was a member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, served in congress, as a Democrat, in 1793-5 and in 1797-1813, and was chairman of the committee on foreign relations. He was a presidential elector in 1796.
SMILLIE, James (smillie), engraver, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 23 Nov., 1801; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 4 Dec., 1863. He was at first apprenticed to James Johnston, a silver-engraver, after whose death, ten months later, he worked for a time with an engraver of pictures, Edward Mitchell. In 1821 he came with his family to Canada, settling in Quebec, where his father and eldest brother established a successful business. Smillie worked with them for some time as a general engraver, until Lord Dalhousie, struck with his evident talent, gave him free passage to London and letters of introduction in 1827. This did not prove of much assistance to the young artist, as the London engravers, regarding him as the governor's protégé, asked most exorbitant premiums. Smillie thereupon went to Edinburgh, where he worked for about five months, after which he returned to Quebec. He went in 1829 to New York, where he settled permanently in the following year. His engraving after Robert W. Weir's "Convent Gate" first brought him into notice, and during 1832–6 he engraved a series of plates, mostly after paintings by Weir, for the New York "Union," issued 1835–54. He was an associate of the National academy, and he became an academician in 1851. From the first his name became connected with the art of bank-note engraving, and he has been called the pioneer in this line. From 1861 till his death his time was devoted to that branch of engraving. He is best known, however, as a landscape-engraver, in which branch of art he probably had no equal in this country. Among his more important plates, all executed in the line manner, are "Dream of Arcadia," after Cole, and "Dover Plains," after Asher B. Durand (1850), and "Mount Washington," after John F. Kensett, and "American Harvesting," after Jasper F. Cropsey (1850)—all engraved for the American art union; the series "The Voyage of Life," after Thomas Cole (1855–4), and "The Rocky Mountains" after Albert Bierstadt (1855–6). His brother, William Cumming, engraver, b. in Edinburgh, 23 Sept., 1813, emigrated with his parents to Canada in 1821. He first worked at silver-engraving, but, after coming to New York in 1830, soon turned his attention to bank-note engraving. He was connected as partner with many of the most prominent of the early engravers. James and William Jones and Smillie, was eventually absorbed by the American bank-note company. In 1866 he established a bank-note engraving company at Ottawa, Canada, having secured a contract to furnish the Canadian government with all its paper currency, bonds, etc. In 1874 he retired from this business, but eight years later he again established a company in Canada. In this business he is still (1888) engaged.—James's son, JAMES DAVID, artist, b. in New York city, 16 Jan., 1833, was educated by his father as an engraver on steel. He produced some excellent work, notably the illustrations for Cooper's novels after Felix O. C. Darley's designs, but his principal work was on bank-note vignettes. In 1864, after his first visit to Europe, he turned his attention to painting, which does not show a master. The same year he first exhibited at the Academy of design, New York, and was elected an associate of the academy in 1865, and an academician in 1876. His work in oil includes "The Lifting of the Clouds, White Mountains" (1868); "Dark against Day's Golden Death, Catskills" (1870); "Evening upon the Sierra Nevada, Yosemite," "Adirondacks," and "Up the Hill" (1879); and "The Cliffs of Normandy" (1885). He was one of the original members of the Water-color society, and was its treasurer from 1866 till 1873, and president from 1873 till 1878. Among his water-colors are "The Track of the Torrent, Adirondacks" (1869); "A Scrub Race, California" (1857); "Old Cedars, Coast of Maine" (1860); "Stray Lambs, near Montrose, Pa." (1864); "Etretat, Coast of France" (1867); and "The Passing herd" (1868). Mr. Smillie is also well known as an etcher, and was a member of the firm of the New York etching club. His pencil has been frequently employed in book illustration, and he is the author as well as illustrator of the "Yosemite" article in "Picturesque America."—Another son, WILLIAM MAIN, b. in New York, 23 Nov., 1855; d. there, 21 Jan., 1888, was known as an expert letter engraver. He was in the employ of a firm until merged, with seven other companies, into the old American bank-note company in 1877. He remained with the company until it was combined with two others, of the present company, after which he was general manager until his death.—Another son, GEORGE HENRY, artist, b. in New York, 29 Dec., 1840, studied under his father and James M. Hart in 1861–3. In 1871 he visited the Yosemite, and in 1886 he went abroad as an artist of the National academy in 1864, and an academician in 1882, and is also a member of the Water-color society. Among his works in oil are "A Lake in the Woods" (1872); "A Florida Lagoon" (1875); "A Goat Pasture" (1879); "Merrimack River" (1882); "On the Massachusetts Coast" (1883); "Summer Morning on Long Island" (1884); "Lisbon and the Bay of All Saints," which formed the Union league club, Philadelphia. His water-colors include "Under the Pines of the Yosemite" (1872); "Near Portland, Maine" (1881); "Swamp Willows at Newburyport" (1883); and "September on the New England Coast" (1885), which gained a prize at the American art association's water-color exhibition in 1885.—George Henry's wife, Nellie Sheldon Jacobs, artist, b. in New York, 14 Sept., 1884, studied under Joseph O. Eaton and James D. Smillie. Her works include "Grandmother's Old Love Letters" (1881), and "When the Dew is on the Grass" (1884), in oil; and "Priscilla" (1880); "Forgotten Strain" (1881); and "Family Choir" (1882), in water-color. She is a member of the Water-color society.

SMITH, Sir Albert James, Canadian statesman, b. in Westmoreland county, New Brunswick, in 1824. He was educated in his native county, studied law, was called to the bar of New Brunswick in 1847, and was afterward appointed queen's counsel. He was a member of the New Brunswick legislature from 1832 till the union of the province with Canada in 1867, when he was elected to the Dominion parliament. He was re-elected by acclamation in 1872, on his appointment to office, and again at the general election in 1878. He was a member of the executive council of New Brunswick from 1856 till 1863 and for a short period in 1866, attorney-general from 1862 till 1863, when he retired from the government and held the same office in his own administration in 1865. He was a delegate to London in 1858 on the subject of the intercolonial railway, and on public business in 1865, and to Washington with Mr. Galt (now Sir Alexander T. Galt) and others on the subject of reciprocal trade, in January, 1866. He declined the chief justiceship of New Brunswick in 1866, the lieutenant-governorship of the same province in 1873, and the presidency of the council, 1874. He became a member of the privy council, and was appointed minister of marine and fisheries, 7 Nov., 1873. He represented the Dominion government before the fisheries commission at Halifax.
in 1877, and was created a knight commander of the order of St. Michael and St. George in 1878.

SMITH, Alfred Baker, soldier, b. in Massena, St. Lawrence co., N. Y., 17 Nov., 1825; d. in Pongh-keepse, 28 Jan., 1896. He was graduated at Union college, was admitted to the bar in 1853, and practised in Pongh-keepse, N. Y. He entered the National army in October, 1862, as major of the 15th New York volunteers, and was ordered to the regiment in every march and action from Gettysburg till the close of the war, succeeding to the command as senior officer at Atlanta. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel and colonel, and was made brigadier-general of volunteers by brevet for meritorious services in the campaign of Georgia and the Carolinas. Gen. Smith was a member of the Local Legion and of the Pongh-keepse board of education, of which he was president for several years, and in 1867-75 was postmaster of that city.

SMITH, Andrew Jackson, soldier, b. in Bucks county, Pa., 28 April, 1815; d. in St. Louis, 30 Jan., 1897. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, became 1st lieutenant in 1846 and captain in 1847, and was engaged on the Black-}

May, 1869, when he resigned. On 3 April of that year he became postmaster of St. Louis.

SMITH, Archibald Cary, naval architect, b. in New York city, 4 Sept., 1857. He was educated at the University grammar-school, New York city, learned the trade of boat-building, and in 1860 built the "Coney," a sail-boat that defeated all rivals for several races. He studied painting under Mavor Maurice F. H. de Beque, and subsequently painted pictures of many noted yachts. He designed for Robert Centre, of New York city, in 1871, the cutter "Vinex," which was the first iron yacht that was built in Chester, Pa., and attracted much attention as a departure from the usual type. His success in this business induced him to abandon painting and he has devoted himself to designing and altering yachts of all kinds, among which are the schooners "Intrepid," "Fortuna," "Norma," "Harbinger," "Car- lotta," "Tropsnois," "Oriole." "Dream." "Whim," the sloops "Mischief," "Rover," "Kestrel," "Priscilla," "Cinderella," "Banshee," "Katrina," and "Meteor." The "Mischief" defended the "American" cup in its expedition in 1893-4, and the sloop "Atlantic." He delivered a course of lectures on naval architecture before the Seawanhaka yacht club, New York city, in 1878, and for many years was measurer of the New York yacht club.

SMITH, Asa Dodge, clergyman, b. in Amherst, N. H., 21 Sept., 1801; d. in Hanover, N. H., 16 Aug., 1875. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1829, and studied theology in Seminary in 1834, serving in 1830-1 as principal of Limerick academy, Me. He was pastor of the 14th street Presbyterian church in New York city from 1834 till 1863, lectured on pastoral theology in Union theological seminary in 1843-4, and president of Dartmouth from 1863 until his death. Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1849, and the University of New York city that of LL. D. in 1864. He published a large number of addresses and sermons, and "Letters to a Young Student" (Boston, 1832); "Memoir of Mrs. Louisa Adams Leavitt" (New York, 1843); "Discourse on the Life and Character of Rev. Charles Hall" (1854); "The Puritan Character," an address (1857); "Home Missions and Slavery," a pamphlet (1857); "Christian Art," a Del bye Steward, "Inauguration Ad- dress" (Hanover, N. H., 1863).

SMITH, Ashbel, diplomatist, b. in Hartford, Conn., 13 Aug., 1805; d. in Harris county, Tex., 21 Jan., 1886. He was graduated at Yale in 1824, and at the medical department in 1828, after studying law in the interval. He also attended the Paris hospitals in 1831-2, was practised in North Caroli-} theatres, and in 1893-4, he was a member of the legislature from Harris county for several years, and served throughout the Mexican war. In the early part of the civil war he raised the 2d Texas volunteers for the Confederate service, leading that regiment in several campaigns east of Missouri river. He retired to his plantation on Galveston bay in 1865, and while taking an active part in state politics as a Democrat was also occupied in the preparation of papers on scientific and agri-SMITH, Augustus William, educator, b. in Newport, Berkshire co., N. Y., 12 May, 1802; d. in Annapolis, Md., 26 March, 1866. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1825, became a teacher in Oneida conference seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., was professor of mathematics and astronomy in Wesleyan in 1834-54, and at the latter date became his president. From 1859 until his death he was professor of natural philosophy in the U. S. naval academy. Hamilton gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1859. In 1860 he was one of the corps of astronomers that were sent by the U. S. government to Labrador to observe the annular eclipse of the solar eclipse of the solstices, and the author of several text-books, including an "Elementary Treatise on Mechanism." (New York, 1846).

SMITH, Azariah, missionary, b. in Manlius, N. Y., 16 Feb., 1817; d. in Aintab, Asia Minor, 5 June, 1851. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, studied medicine and theology, and in 1842 embarked for western Asia as a missionary. He arrived in Smyrna in January, 1843, made numerous journeys into the interior, and was the travelling companion of Sir Austin Henry Layard. Subsequently, when Asiatic cholera raged there, he successfully practised among the sufferers. He settled at Aintab in 1848, and taught and preached there until his death. He wrote several valuable papers on meteorology and Syrian antiquities for the "American Journal of Science."

SMITH, Benjamin, governor of North Carolina, b. in Brunswick county, N. C., in 1759; d. in Smithville, N. C., 10 Feb., 1829. He became aide-de-camp to Gen. Washington in 1776, was with him in the retreat from Long Island, participated in the defence of Fort Monticello, and served during the British invasion of South Carolina. He went to Georgia, bought land to the University of North Carolina, whose trustees named a hall in that institution in his honor. He was fifteen years a member of the state senate from Brunswick county, served as major-general of militia in 1794-1810, and, when with war in France was threatened in 1796, raised a regiment of North Carolina volunteers in his county. He was governor of the state in 1810-12. A town and an island of North Carolina are named in his honor.

SMITH, Benjamin Bosworth, P. E. bishop, b. in Bristol, R. I., 13 June, 1794; d. in New York city, 31 May, 1884. He entered Brown university, Providence, R. L., and was graduated in 1819. Although of Congregational parentage, he studied for the ministry in the Episcopal church, was ordained deacon in St. Michael's church, Bristol, 23 April, 1817, by Bishop Griswold, and priest in St. Michael's church, Marblehead, Mass., 21 June, 1818, by the same bishop. His earliest work in the ministry was in Marblehead for two years, after which he became rector of St. George's church, Ac- comack county, Va., and two years later rector of Zion church, Charleston, with charge of the church in Shepherdstown. In 1823 he removed to Ver- mont and became rector of St. Stephen's church, Middlebury, in 1828 he assumed charge of Grace church mission, Philadelphia, and in 1830 he ac- cepted the rectorship of Christ church, Lexington, Ky. This last post he held until 1857. While in Vermont he was editor of "The Episcopal Register," and subsequently in Philadelphia he conducted "The Episco- pal Recorder." He received the degree of S. T. D. from Geneva(now Hobart) college in 1852, and that of LL.D. from Griswold college, Iowa, in 1850, and from Brown university in 1872. He was elected first bishop of Kentucky, and was consecrated in St. Paul's chapel, New York city, 31 Oct., 1882.

On the death of Bishop Hopkins in 1868 he became the presiding bishop. From 1872 onward, owing to advanced age and accompanying infirmities, he was allowed to reside out of the limits of his diocease, and he was furnished with an assistant in January, 1875. In addition to his contributions as editor to church journals, Bishop Bosworth Smith published "A Commentary on the "Gospels," (1877); "A Commentary on the Psalms and Proverbs," (Glasgow, 1859); "Knoxville, Tenn., 1883, and "Questions on the Gospels" (Richmond, Va., 1889).

SMITH, Buckingham, antiquarian, b. on Cumberland island, Ga., 31 Oct., 1810; d. in New York city, 5 Jan., 1871. He was graduated at Harvard law-school in 1836, and practised his profession in Maine, but soon returned to his family estate in Florida, where he was a member of the territorial legislature. He was U. S. secretary of legation in Mexico in 1850-2, acting as chargé d'affaires in 1851. During his residence there he made a thorough study of Mexican history and antiquities and Indian philology, and collected many books and manuscripts. He was secretary of legation at Madrid in 1855-6, made important researches in the Spanish libraries and archives respecting the colonial history of Florida and Louisiana, and rendered valuable services to George Bancroft, Jared Sparks, and Francis Parkman. He settled in Florida in 1859, became a judge, and served several terms in the state senate. A part of his library was bought by the New York historical society after his death. He edited translations of the "Narrative of Alvar Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca" (Washington, D.C. 1851); improved ed. New York, 1853); "The Letter of Hernando de Soto" and "Memoir of Hernando de Escalante Fontaneda," of each of which 100 copies were printed (Washington, 1854); collected and published in Spanish under the title of "Colección de Varia Documentos para la Historia de la Florida y Zonas Adyacentes," Madrid, 1857); "A Grammatical Sketch of the Heve Language" (New York, 1861); a "Grammar of the Pima or Nòvome: a Language of Somora, from a Manuscript of the 17th Century" (St. Augustine, 1862); a "Written in Lengua Nòvome, 6 see la Nòvome" (1862); "Rudo Ensayo, tentativo de una Preventional Descripción Geografica de la Provincia de Sonora" (1863); "An Inquiry into the Authenticity of Documents concerning a Discovery of North America claimed to have been made by Vernazano" (1864); and a volume of translations of "Narratives of the Career of Hernando de Soto in the Conquest of Florida" (1866). He also wrote for the magazines concerning the early history and writers of Florida.

SMITH, Caleb Blood, secretary of the interior, b. in Boston, Mass., 16 April, 1808; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 7 Jan., 1864. He emigrated with his parents to Ohio in 1814, was educated at Cincinnati and Miami colleges, studied law in Cincinnati and in 1836 was admitted to the bar in 1828. He began practice at the latter place, established and edited the "Sentinel" in 1832, served several terms in the Indiana legislature, and was in congress in 1843-9, having been elected as a Whig. During his congressional career he was one of the Mexican claims commissioners. He returned to the practice of law in 1850, and was a candidate for Congress in 1853 in the Indiana legislature. He was influential in securing the nomination of Abraham Lincoln for the presidency at the Chicago Republican convention in 1860, and was appointed by him secretary of the interior in 1861, which post he resigned in December, 1862, to become U. S. circuit judge for Indiana.

SMITH, Charles Blood, bookseller, b. in New York city 26 Aug., 1808; d. there in 1868. He was a bookseller in New York city, translated plays for the stage from the German of Kotzebue and Schiller, and edited the "Monthly Military Repository" in 1796-7, the Revolutionary descriptions in which were said to have been supplied by Baron Steuben and Gen. Horatio Gates. He also published a "Political Pocket Almanac" (New York, 1817).

SMITH, Charles Adam, clergyman, b. in New York city, 25 June, 1809; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Feb., 1879. His parents were German. Charles was educated at Hartwick seminary, ordained to the ministry of the Lutheran church in 1830, and was pastor successively in Palatine, N. Y., and in Baltimore, Md., where he was also an editor of the "Lutheran Observer." He was called to the Wartemberg church in Rheineck, N. Y., in 1842, and remained there till 1852, when he became pastor in Easton, Pa. He afterward had charge of a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia, and then of a parish in East Orange, N. J., after which he devoted himself to literary pursuits. He originated, and published in 1853 a monthly church journal entitled "The Evangelical Magazine," which, after adopting several names, is now published as the "Lutheran and Missionary." He translated many works from the German, including "Krummacher's Parables" (New York, 1853); and is the author of "The Catechumen's Guide" (Albany, 1837); "Popular Exposition of the Gospels," with Rev. John G. Morris (Baltimore, 1840); "Illustrations of Faith" (Albany, 1850); "Men of the Olden Time" (Philadelphia, 1858); "Before the Flood and After." (1859); "Among the Lilies" (1872); "Inlets and Outlets" (1873); and "Stonebridge," a series of pastoral sketches (1877).

SMITH, Charles Emory, journalist, b. in Mansfield, Conn., 18 Feb., 1812. He was graduated at Union college in 1846, became editor of the Albany "Express" in 1855, and of the "Albany Journal" in 1870, and after 1880 conducted the Philadelphia "Press" in 1855, and in 1888, when he entered McKinley's cabinet. He was president of the New York state legislature, and delivered the Pennsylvania address at its meeting. Mr. Smith was a regent of the University of the state of New York, and a delegate to the National Republican conventions in 1876 and in 1888. President Harrison appointed him ambassador to Russia.

SMITH, Charles Henry, humorist, b. in Lawrenceville, Ga., 15 June, 1826. He was graduated at Franklin college, Atlanta, Ga., and in 1848 became a lawyer in Rome, Ga. He served in the Confederate army, and after the war settled as a planter near Cartersville, Ga., was state senator in 1866, and mayor of Rome, Ga., in 1868-9. He began his literary career in 1861 in a series of newspaper letters under the signature of "Bill Arp." Two years later he published his first novel for juvenile humor and shrewd philosophy. A southern writer says of his widely read and quoted letter to Artemus Ward in July, 1863, that "it was the first chip of any bird after the surrender, and gave relief and hope to thousands of drooping hearts." He is also a successful lecturer. His publications include "Bill Arp's Letters" (New York, 1863); "Horace Ward's Letters" (New York, 1864); "Dixie and the C.S.A." (New York, 1865); "The American Peace" (New York, 1866); and many humorous and philosophical sketches that he has contributed to the press.

SMITH, Charles Henry, soldier, b. in Bolles, York co., Me., 1 Nov., 1827. He was graduated at Colby university in 1846, entered the National army in 1861 as captain in the 1st Maine cavalry, was attached with his regiment to the Army of the Potomac for service in the campaigns, participating in numerous battles. He became major of volunteers in 1862, lieutenant-colonel in March, 1863, and colonel of the 1st Maine cavalry, commanding that regiment at Upperville, Gettysburg, Shepards-town, and through the movements southward to the Rapidan. In the Mine run campaign, in November, he conducted the rear-guard of the left column of the army from Mine run to and across the Rapidan. During Gen. Philip H. Sheridan's cavalry campaign in May and June, 1864, he fought at Todd's Tavern and South Anna, at Trevillian Station, and on 1 Aug., 1864, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for gallant and meritorious conduct at St. Mary's church, when he and his horses were killed and he was shot through the thigh. He commanded a cavalry brigade and was wounded at Reams's Station, and the 3d brigade of Gen. David M. Gregg's division from October, 1864, till the operations that ended in the surrender of Lee's army. During the Appomattox campaign he was wounded, and a horse was killed under him at Dinwiddie Court-House, and he participated in the battle of Sailor's Creek, Brier Creek, and Farmville. In May and July, 1865, he was in command of a sub-district of the Appomattox, comprising five counties. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, for gallant and meritorious service during the civil war, and in March, 1867, brigadier-general, U. S. army, for Sailor's Creek, and major general for gallant service during the civil war. He became colonel of the 28th infantry on the reorganization of the U. S. army in 1866, was transferred in 1869 to the 19th infantry, and was retired in 1891. He received the medal of honor.

SMITH, Charles Ferrin, genealogist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 5, 1819; d. in Trenton, N. J., 27 Jan., 1883. On attaining his majority he became proprietor and editor of "The National Standard" in Salem, N. J., and conducted it for eleven years. He served in the legislature of 1852, and was clerk of the supreme court of New Jersey in 1857-72. He was early identified with the old Whig party, and during the Harrison campaign travelled extensively through the west and northwest, publishing a graphic account of his journey in a series of letters. During the civil war he was a secret agent of the state of New Jersey. Mr. Smith was a corresponding member of the Philadelphia numismatic and antiquarian society. He was the author of "Lineage of the Lloyd and Carpenter Families" (printed privately, Camden, N. J., 1843), and of "The Site of Mathraval Castle, with a Genealogical Chart of the Descent of Thomas Lloyd" (1875). See a memoir of him by Charles Hart in the "Necrology of the Philadelphia Numismatic and Antiquarian Society for 1883."

SMITH, Charles Shaler, engineer, b. in Pittsburgh, Pa., 16 Jan., 1826; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 19 Dec., 1893. He attended a private school in Pittsburgh, but at the age of sixteen entered on the study of his profession by securing an appointment as rodman on the Mine Hill and Schenckville Haven railroad. After various services he became in 1856 engineer in charge of the Tennessee division of the Louisville and Nashville railroad. Subsequently he became chief engineer of bridges and buildings of the Wilmington, Charlotte, and Richmond railroad in North Carolina, where he remained until the beginning of the civil war. He then entered the Confederate army as captain of engineers, and continued so until 1865, during which time, as chief engineer of government works in the Augusta district, he constructed the Confederate states powder-works, with a daily capacity of 1,000 pounds, and one of the largest that had then been built. Mr. Smith continued in the south as engineer of bridges, and constructed the Catawba and Congaree bridges on the Charlotte and South Carolina railroad. In 1866, with Benjamin H. Latrobe, he organized the engineering firm of Smith, Latrobe & Co., which in 1869 became the Baltimore bridge company, with Mr. Smith as president and chief engineer. This company continued in business until 1877, and did a large amount of work. He removed to St. Charles, Mo., in 1868, to take charge of the railroad bridge then just begun across Missouri river, and in 1871 he went to St. Louis, where he remained until the end of his life, mainly occupied as a consulting engineer. His name will ever be connected with great bridges that were built under his supervision. They are hundreds in number and include four over the Mississippi, one over the Missouri, and one over the St. Lawrence. His most important work was the practical demonstration of the uses and value of the cantilever, beginning in 1890 with the 500-foot draw-span over Saluda dam, in South Carolina. He also designed the Ellicott Street railroad, and including the Kentucky river bridge on the Cincinnati Southern railroad, that over the Mississippi near St. Paul, and finally his last great bridge across the St. Lawrence river a short distance above the Lachine rapids. Mr. Smith was elected a member of the American society of civil engineers in 1873, and was a director of that organization in 1877-8. His publications are confined to a few professional papers, notably "A Comparative Analysis of the Fink, Murphy, Bolli- man, and Triangular Trusses" (1865); "Proprietary of Eyebars, Heads, and Pins as determined by Experiment" (1877); and "Wind-Pressure upon Bridges" (1880).

SMITH, Cotton Mather, clergyman, b. in Suffield, Conn., 26 Oct., 1731; d. in Sharon, Conn., 27 Nov., 1806. He was descended from Rev. Henry Smith, who came to this country in 1636, and was first pastor at Wethersfield, Conn. His mother was the granddaughter of Increase Mather. Cotton was graduated at Yale in 1751, taught the Stockbridge Indians while studying theology, and in 1753 was licensed to preach. From 1755 until his death he was pastor of the Congregational church in Sharon. During the Revolution he served as chaplain under Gen. Philip Schuyler in 1775-6. During his ministry he delivered more than 4,000 sermons. He published three sermons (Hartford, 1770, 1771, 1783). He was distinguished for force of character, tact, tenderness of heart, fine scholarship, and grace of manner. His views were of advanced liberality, and he was an effective and persuasive preacher, whose influence long survived.

—His son John Cotton, statesman, b. in Sharon, Conn., 12 Feb., 1765; d. there, 7 Dec., 1843, was graduated at Yale in 1783, admitted to the bar in 1786, and served several terms in the legislature, of which he was clerk in 1799 and speaker in 1800. He was elected to congress as a Federalist in the latter year, served till 1806, was chairman of the committee on claims in 1802-6, and in the once celebrated discussion on the judiciary in 1801 presented the committee of the whole. He resumed an extensive legal practice when he returned from his congressional career, was again in the legislature in 1808-9, and was chosen a judge of the Connecticut supreme court the next year. He was lieutenant-governor in 1810 and governor in 1813-18, after which he retired and did not again accept office, devoting himself to literary pursuits and the care of a large estate. He was president of the Litchfield county foreign missionary society, and of the County temperance society, first president of the Connecticut Bible society, of the American Bible society in 1831-45, and of the American board of foreign missions in 1826-41. Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1814. He was a member of the Northern society of antiquaries in Copenhagen, Denmark, and of the Connecticut historical society, and an occasional contributor to scientific reviews. He combined strength of character with an amiability in a remarkable degree. His fine personal appearance and graceful, commanding manners added a charm to the eloquence for which his speeches were noted. True to his convictions and his friends, enduring no thought of compromise on any moral question, he was yet a man of broad views and enlightened statesmanship. Though belonging to a defeated party, he was ever held in high respect by his opponents as an able, unassuming, and generous foe. See his "Correspondence and Miscellanies," edited with a eulogy by Rev. William W. Andrews (New York, 1847).

John Cotton, clergymen, b. in Tivoli, N. Y., in 1810; d. in Sharon, Conn., 21 Nov., 1879, was graduated at Yale in 1830, elected to the legislature at twenty-one years of age, and served for many terms. He was an active member of the Democratic party, and in 1856–60 was U. S. minister to Bolivia. He was an eloquent speaker and possessed of wide information on Indian matters.—Cotton Mather's grandson. Thomas Mather, clergymen, b. in Stamford, Conn., 7 March, 1797; d. in Portland, Me., 6 Sept., 1861, was the son of Cotton Mather's daughter, who married Rev. Daniel Smith, pastor of the church at Stamford from 1736 until his death in 1781. Thomas was graduated at Yale in 1816, and at Andover theological seminary in 1820. He was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church in 1822, was successively pastor in Portland, Me., Fall River, Catskill, N. Y., and New Bedford, Mass., in 1826–42, and in 1844, having changed his theological views, was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal church. He was professor of theology in the Gambier (Ohio) seminary. He was second and last editor of Sir John's 1850-4. Bowdoin gave him the degree of D.D. in 1850.—Thomas Mather's son. John Cotton, clergymen, b. in Andover, Mass., 4 Aug., 1826; d. in New York city, 10 Jan., 1882, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1847, studied theology at the Gambier (Ohio) seminary, was ordained deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1849, and priest in 1852. He was the first president of Kenyon college, Gambier, Ohio., assistant on the Green foundation at Trinity church, Boston, and from 1860 until his death was rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York city. During his pastorate there he was active in mission work, the church contributing under him $1,000,000 to charity. He organized the first successful attempt to establish infant baptism. In 1849 he was successful in erecting two blocks of such homes that are under the care of an association in Ascension church. He built the Mission chapel on the corner of Jane and Greenwich streets, and that on West 43d street, which number 3,000 pupils, and was also active in foreign mission work. He was a member of the American Bible society, and one of its committee of three to revise the received Greek text. Columbia gave him the degree of D. D. in 1862. Dr. Smith was a strong and effective preacher, a profound scholar, and of wide and Catholic views. For several years he edited the "Church and State," a paper established as the representative of the liberal branch of the church. He discussed scientific, literary, and social subjects in it and in his pulpit, and aided largely in the gathering of the church congress in New York in 1874. Dr. Smith published an "Artillery Election Sermon" (Boston, 1858), and numerous other occasional sermons and tractates; "Limits of Legislation as to Doctrine and Ritual" (New York, 1874); "Miscellanies Old and New" (1876); "Brier Hill Lectures; Certain Aspects of the Church" (1880); "The Church's Mission of Reconciliation" (1881); and "The Liturgy as a Basis of Union" (1881).

SMITH, Daniel, senator, b. in Fauquier county, Va., about 1740; d. in Summer county, Tenn., 16 June, 1818. He emigrated to Tennessee at an early age, being one of the first settlers of that state, and filled many public offices. He was a major-general of militia, was appointed by Gen. Washington secretary of the territory south of Ohio river in 1790, sat in the convention that formed the constitution of Tennessee, and was U. S. senator from that state in 1798–9; in place of Andrew Jackson, who had resigned, and again from 1805 till his own resignation in 1809. He published the first map of Tennessee and a geography of the state (Philadelphia, 1790).

SMITH, Daniel, clergyman, b. in Salisbury, Conn., 16 Sept., 1806; d. in Kingston, N. Y., 29 June, 1870. He was graduated at Williams college, New York, in 1825, under Rev. William Fisk, ordained to the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1831, and was a pastor in Connecticut and New York for the subsequent twenty-one years. He was active in Sunday-school and temperance work, lectured extensively in the latter cause, and wrote more than fifty religious books for the young. Throughout his ministry he gave all his salary to benevolent objects. His publications include "Aneodes for the Young" (New York, 1840); "Teacher's Assistant" (1847); "Lady's Book of Aneodes" (1851); "Proverbs" (1851); and "Lectures to Young Men" (1859).

SMITH, Daniel B., educator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 July, 1792; d. in Germantown, Pa., 29 March, 1881. He was educated in his own family, and used the public schools and his own library for studies. On leaving school, he was apprenticed to the drug business, and on completing his term was admitted to partnership. In 1819 he opened a drug-store, and continued thereafter in active mercantile pursuits until within a few years of his death. He was one of the founders of the Apprentices' library in 1820, and instrumental in bringing about the establishment of the College of pharmacy in 1822. In 1821 he became secretary of the preliminary organization, which office he then held until his election as vice-president in 1828, and from 1829 till 1854 he was its president, also serving as chairman of the committee on publication that in 1826 issued the first number of the "American Journal of Pharmacy," of which he became professor of moral philosophy, English literature, and chemistry in Haverford school (now college), and continued in that place until 1846. He was influential in organizing the House of refuge in 1828, and the American pharmaceutical association in 1852, and presided over its first meeting in Philadelphia. Prof. Smith was a member of the Franklin institute from its inception in 1824, of the Historical society from its organization in 1823, and was its first corresponding secretary. He was also a member of the American philosophical society and of the Philadelphia academy of natural sciences. He published "The Principles of Chemistry" (Philadelphia, 1842).

SMITH, David M., inventor, b. Hartford, Va., in 1838; d. at Springfield, Vt., 10 Nov., 1881. He began to learn the carpenter's trade in Gilsom, N. H., when he was twelve years old, and seven years later taught in a school. Subsequently he began the manufacture of "awl's on the half," for which he obtained a patent in 1832. The awl-half as manufactured by him was similar if not identical with the one shown as the Aiken awl. In 1840–7 he represented the town of Gilsom in the New Hampshire legislature, after which he removed to Springfield, Vt. He patented a combination-lock in 1849, of which an English expert named Hobbs, who had opened all the locks that were brought to him in London, said: "It cannot be picked." This lock he also patented in England, and about this time he invented an improvement on the first iron lathe dog that is now in common use. He also devised a paper-saving machine, and two sewing-machines, after which he produced a patent-issuing newspaper. In 1839 he began the manufacture of a spring hook and eye, for which he also devised the machinery. Mr. Smith showed great ingenuity in inventing the machinery by which his original articles were made. In addition to perfecting the ideas of other people that secured patents, he took out for himself nearly sixty, among which was that for the machinery that is now in use for manufacturing newspapers.

SMITH, Sir David William, bart., Canadian statesman, b. in England, 4 Sept., 1764; d. in Albwick, Northumberland, England, 9 May, 1857. His father, who was lieutenant-colonel of the 5th foot, died while commandant of Fort Niagara, Canada West, in 1763. At an early age the son was appointed an ensign in his father's regiment, in which he subsequently attained the rank of captain. He afterward studied law and was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada, was appointed surveyor-general of lands, one of the trustees for the Six Nations, a member of the executive council, and of the committee for administering the government during the governor's absence. He was a member of the three first Canadian parliaments, and a speaker of the House of Assembly. On two occasions he settled in England for many years preceding his death, and administered the affairs of the Duke of Northumberland. For his public services he was created a baronet by patent, 30 Aug., 1821.

SMITH, Delazon, senator, b. in Berlin, N. Y., in 1816; d. in Portland, Oregon, 3 Nov., 1880. He was graduated at Oberlin collegiate institute in 1836, but was not destined to adopt the study of law, but adopted journalism as his profession, and became editor of the "True Jeffersonian," in Rochester, N. Y., and subsequently of the "Western Empire" at Dayton, Ohio. He was appointed by President Tyler special commissioner to Quito, Ecuador, in 1842, removed to Iowa in 1846, and was licensed to preach in the Methodist Episcopal church in 1849. He was superin tendent of the territorial legislature in 1854-5, a delegate to the convention that framed the state constitution in 1857, and served in the U. S. senate from 4 Feb., 1859, to 3 March of the same year, having been chosen as a Democrat. From 1859 until his death he edited the "Oregon Democrat." SMITH, Sir Donald Alexander, Canadian legislator, b. in Morarshire, Scotland, in 1821. After completing his course of education he came to Canada, and early in life entered the service of the Hudson bay company, of which he became a director, and later resident governor and chief commissioner. He was appointed in 1850 a member of the executive council of the Northwest territories, and in 1854 was elected to the session of the Manitoba assembly from 1881 till January, 1874, when he resigned, and was elected to the Dominion parliament for Selkirk, Manitoba, in 1871, being re-elected in 1872, 1874, and 1878, but upon petition the last election was declared void. He was an unsuccessful candidate in 1880, but was elected for Montreal, west, in February, 1887. In 1880 he became a director of the Canadian Pacific railway company, was largely instrumental in securing the successful completion of the road, and in 1886 was knighted for his services in connection with this undertaking. He is a governor of McGill university, and gave $200,000 to constitute a special course or college for women in connection with that institution. With Sir George Stephen, bart., he founded in 1885 the Montreal scholarship of the Royal college of music, London, for residents of Montreal and its neighborhood. Sir Donald has one of the finest private residences in the Dominion at Montreal, a seat at Petit Port, Nova Scotia, and another at Silver Heights, near Winnipeg. In 1897, he created Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal.

SMITH, Edward Delafield, lawyer, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 8 May, 1826; d. in Shrewsbury, N. J., 13 April, 1878. He was graduated at the University of the city of New York in 1846, was admitted to the bar in 1848, and practised in New York city. He was U. S. district attorney for the southern district of New York in 1864-'5, returned to practice in the latter year, and from 1874 till 1875 was corporation counsel of New York city. He was an active member of the Republican party, and a member of the law committee of the University of the city of New York. Among his many cases of importance was that of the People against the Government, which resulted in the removal of the Tweed ring, from which he brought to the scaffold in 1872, and that against John Andrews, a leader of the draft riots in New York city in 1863. At the time of his death he was attorney of record in the Eliza B. Jumel estate case. Mr. Smith also attained success in private practice, and was widely known for his legal ability. He published "Avicenna," a poem (New York, 1856), "Delazon," a poem (1846); "Reports of Cases in the New York Court of Common Pleas" (4 vols., 1850-'9); and "Addresses to Juries in Slave-Trade Trials" (1861).

SMITH, Edward Parmelee, clergyman, b. in South Britain, Conn., 3 June, 1827; d. in Accra, West Africa, 15 June, 1876. He was graduated at Yale in 1849, and at Andover theological seminary in 1853. He was ordained as a minister of the Congregational church in Peperell, Mass. He was superintendent of the western department of the Christian commission in 1865-'7, field secretary in 1866-'7, and at the same time general field agent of the American missionary association. He became U. S. commissioner of Indian affairs in 1873, and president of Howard university, Washington, D. C., in 1874. Mr. Smith died on a visit to the coast of Africa in the interests of the American missionary association. He published "Incidents of the United States Christian Commission" (Philadelphia, Pa., 1869).

SMITH, Eli, missionarv, b. in Northford, Conn., 13 Sept., 1801; d. in Beirut, Syria, 11 Jan., 1857. He was graduated at Yale in 1821, and at Andover theological seminary in 1826, ordained the same year, and went to Malta as superintendent of a missionary printing establishment. He was subsequently transferred to the Syrian mission, travelled through Greece in 1829, and with Dr. Harrison G. O., Dwight in Armenia, Georgia, and Persia in 1830-'1, which journey resulted in the establishment of a missionary corporation, and the American board. He settled in Beirut in 1838, and in 1838 and again in 1842 was the companion and coadjutor of Prof. Edward Robinson in his extensive exploration of Palestine. His intimate knowledge of Arabic enabled him to render important service in the production of a new and improved form and font of Arabic type, which was cast under his supervision at Leipzig in 1829. He published with Harrison G. O. Dwight "Missionary Researches in Armenia" (2 vols., Boston, 1833), and from 1841 until his death was engaged in translating the Bible into the Arabic, which work was subsequently completed by Dr. Cornelius V. Wyck (New York, 1846–7).—His wife, Sarah Luman, missionary, b. in Norwich, Conn., 18 June, 1802; d. in Boonjeh, near Smyrna, Asia, 30 Sept., 1836, was the daughter of Jabez Huntington. She married Dr. Smith in 1833, accompanied him to Beirut, and, having learned Arabic, assisted him in his translations into that language, and taught his children and others in a native school, which was conducted in a publication entitled "The Clergyman's Looking-Glass" (Woburn, 1803); "The History of Anti-Christ" (1803); "Twenty-two Sermons on the Prophecies" (1809); "New Testament Dictionary" (Philadelphia, 1812); "The Fall of Angels and Men" (1813); "Life, Conversion, Preaching, Travels, and Sufferings of Elias Smith" (Portsmouth, N. H., 1815).—His daughter was Cornelia, b. 17 Nov., 1803; she was the mother of Dr. Cornelius V. Wyck.

SMITH, Elihu Hubbard, physician, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 4 Sept., 1871; d. at New York city, 19 Sept., 1858. He was graduated at Yale in 1876, subsequently followed a classical course under Dr. Timothy Dwight, and studied medicine in Philadelphia. He then settled in Wethersfield, Conn., where he wrote as well as practised, and, removing to New York city in 1879, soon established a reputation both in literature and in his profession. His house was the headquarters of the Friendly club, and a centre of the literary society of that city. He became a physician to the New York hospital in 1876, and the same year was a founder and editor of the "Medical Repository." During the yellow-fever epidemic in 1878 he was unremitting in his care of the sick, but finally contracted the disease, which proved fatal. He contributed to the "Medical Repository" papers on pestilential fevers; edited "American Poems, Selected and Original" (Litchfield, 1873); was the author of "Letters to William Buel on the Fever which prevailed in New York in 1873" (1874); "Edwin and Angelina," an opera in three acts (1875); and prefixed to the American edition of Darwin's works an "Epistle to the Author of the Botanic Garden" (1876). He is also the author of "A Synonymous Vaseet tragedy entitled "Andiv" (1878).

SMITH, Erasmus Darwin, jurist, b. in De Ruiter, Madison co., N. Y., 10 Oct., 1806; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 11 Nov., 1885. He was educated at Hamilton college, admitted to the bar, became a master in chancery in 1832, serving three successive terms, was made injunction-master for the 8th district of New York in 1840, and clerk of that court in 1841, and was a justice of the supreme court of New York from 1853 till 1876, when he was retired on account of age. He served on the court of appeals in 1862 and 1870, and was general term justice in 1872–7. Chief-Justice Chase said of his decision in the legal-tender case of Hoovers, secretary of the Treasury, and others, which determined the law of the Federal government to issue paper money as a war measure, that "its influence on the credit of the government was equal to a victory in the field." Rochester gave him the degree of LL. D., in 1888.

SMITH, Erasmus Peshine, jurist, b. in New York city, 2 March, 1814; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 21 Oct., 1892. While he was a young man his parents removed to New York city, where his early education was received there. He was graduated at Columbia in 1832, and at the Harvard law-school in 1833, and entered upon the practice of law at Rochester soon afterward. During the early years of his practice he was an editorial writer on the Rochester "Democrat," and later he was editor of the Buffalo "Commercial Advertiser," and of the Commercial Advertiser at Washington. He was called to the chair of mathematics in the University of Rochester in 1856, holding office two years, when he became state superintendent of public instruction at Albany. In 1857 he was appointed reporter of the court of appeals of the state of New York, and in this post he instituted the custom of numbering the reporter's decisions successively through the entire volume and only secondarily by the name of reporter, a custom that has since been generally followed. He was appointed commissioner of immigration at Washington in 1864, which post he relinquished soon afterward to become examiner of claims in the department of state, where he exercised much influence in shaping the policy of the department under William H. Seward and Henry W. Fish, where his great knowledge of international law was of value to the government. In 1871, Sec. Fish being asked by the Japanese government to name an American to undertake the duties of ad- viser to the mikado in international law (a post analogous to that of the secretary of state in the United States), Mr. Smith was the first American that was chosen to assist the Japanese government in an official capacity, and remained in Japan five years, making treaties and establishing a system of foreign relations. While thus engaged he rendered an important service to the world, as well as to the government by which he was employed, in breaking up the cable trade. The Peruvian ship "Maria Luz," having a cargoes of coolies, was wrecked off the coast of Japan, and, under Mr. Smith's advice, the 229 wrecked Chinsamen were detained by the Japanese government. The case was submitted to the arbitration of the emperor of Russia, and, under his decision, Mr. Smith representing the Japanese government, the cargoes were sent back to China, with the result of breaking up the trade. Mr. Smith published "A Manual of Political Economy" (New York, 1855), in refutation of the theories of Ricardo and Malthus. It is an attempt to construct a skeleton of political economy on the basis of purely physical laws, and thus to obtain for its conclusions that absolute certainty that belongs to the truths of politics. The work is wholly original, and has largely affected the work of later economists. It has been translated into French. Mr. Smith contributed a word to the English language in suggesting through the Alabama "Evening Journal," the use of "telegraphic English" in place of cumbersome phrases, such as "telegraphic message" and "telegraphic despatch." He returned from Japan in 1856.

SMITH, Erminnie Adelle, scientist, b. in Marcellus, N. Y., 26 April, 1836; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 9 June, 1886. Her maiden name was Platt. She was educated at Mrs. Willard's seminary in Troy, N. Y., and in 1855 married Simon H. Smith, of Jersey City, N. J. She early devoted herself to geology, and made one of the largest contributions to the science in Europe by her studies on the geology of the Iroquois country. She spent four years in Europe with her sons, studying science and language, during which period she was graduated at the School of mines, Freiberg, Saxony, and after her return gave frequent courses of lectures. She organized and became president of the Iroquois Society of Jersey City, whose monthly receptions from 1879 to 1883 were widely known. In 1882 she took an educational tour under the auspices of the Smithsonian institution, and obtained and classified over 15,000 words of the Iroquois dialects. To facilitate her work in this direction, she spent two summers with the remnant of the Tuscaroras in Canada. She published numerous papers on scientific subjects, and was a member of the Historical Society of New York, the New York Academy of sciences, and the first lady fellow of the New York academy of sciences. At the meeting of the American association for the advancement of science in 1883 she was secretary of the section on geology and geography. Her Iroquois-English dictionary was in course of printing at the time of her death. A volume of essays and poems by the Iroquois Society, written and delivered under her direction, was issued in 1883. In 1888 a geological prize was founded at Vassar college in her honor.

SMITH, Ethan, clergyman, b. in Belchertown, Mass., 19 Dec., 1762; d. in Pompey, N. Y., 29 Aug., 1849. He was apprenticed to the leather trade in his boyhood, was a private in the Continental army in 1780-1, graduated at Dartmouth in 1790, and the same year licensed to preach. From 1791 till 1802 he was pastor of Congregational churches in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and Vermont, and he served as city missionary in Boston from the latter date until his death. He was a founder of the New Hampshire missionary society, its secretary for sixteen years, and the author of numerous sermons, addresses on the Prophecies " (Concord, N. H., 11, 1809); " Key to the Figurative Language of the Prophecies" (1814): " A View of the Trinity" (1824): " A View of the Hebrews," designed to prove that the aborigines of America are descended from the twelve tribes of Israel (Poultney, Vt., 1825); " A Key to the Revelations (New York, 1833); and a "Prophetic Catechism" (1829).

SMITH, Enzene Allen, geologist, b. in Alabama, 27 Oct., 1841. He was graduated at the University of Alabama in 1862, where he was assistant in mathematics and Latin in 1863-5, and then spent three years at the universities of Berlin, Goettingen, and Heidelberg, receiving in 1868 the degree of Ph. D. from the last-named institution. In 1868 he became assistant state geologist of Mississippi, and he held that office until 1871, and in 1873 he was made state geologist of Alabama, which appointment he has since filled. Dr. Smith was called to the chair of mineralogy and geology in the University of Alabama in 1874, and in 1874 the title of his chair was changed to that of chemistry, geology, and natural history, which he still fills. He was honorary commissioner to the World's fair in Paris in 1878, and during 1880-2 was special census agent engaged in the preparation of reports on cotton-production in Alabama and Florida. In 1883-6 he was commissioner for selecting lands that had been given to the University of Alabama. Dr. Smith is a member of various scientific societies, has been secretary of the section on geology and geography of the American association for the advancement of science, and is a member of the American committee of the International geological congress. His geological memoirs include annual "Geological Reports of the Alabama State Survey" (Montgomery, 1874 et seq.), also special reports to the U. S. geological survey, the U. S. entomological commission, and the U. S. census bureau.

SMITH, Ezekiel Ezra, educator, b. in Duplin county, N. C., 23 May, 1852. He is of African descent and was born a slave, but enjoyed early educational advantages, studied in the public schools, and became a teacher in 1870. In 1873-4 he was one of the Jubilee singers that raised $20,000 for Shaw university, at which he was graduated in 1878, and in the next year he was licensed to preach. He was principal of the graded school at Goldsboro, N. C., from 1879 till 1889, when he became principal of the State colored normal school at Fayetteville, N. C. He was secretary of the State colored Baptist convention in 1876-83, commissioner major of the 4th battalion of the North Carolina guards in 1889, and in 1888 was appointed U. S. minister and consul-general to Liberia, Africa. He was a founder of the North Carolina industrial association, and established and edited the "Carolina Enterprise."

SMITH, Francis, British soldier, b. in England about 1720; d. there, 15 Nov., 1791. He became captain of the 10th foot in 1747, major in 1758, lieutenant-colonel in 1762, colonel and aide-de-camp to the king in 1775, and the same year commanded the troops that were sent to destroy the American stores at Concord, Mass. He was wounded in the fight at Lexington, became brigadier-general in 1776, and commanded a brigade in the battles on Long Island in August of that year, and at Quaker Hill in 1777. He was promoted to the grade of major-general in 1779, and lieutenant-general in 1787.

SMITH, Francis Henry, soldier, b. in Norfolk, Va., 18 Oct., 1842; d. in Lexington, Va., 21 March, 1890. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1863, and was assistant professor there; also professor of mathematics at Hampden Sydney in 1857-9, and, on the organization of the Virginia military institute in the latter year, became its su-
SMITH, Francis Hopkinson, artist, b. in Baltimore, Md., 23 Oct., 1838. He is by profession an engineer, and has built a large number of public works, many of them under contract with the U. S. government. He has also designed the Rock Island bridge connecting New London harbor, Long Island sound (1871-7); Block Island breakwater (1879). He is well known as an artist, and has produced some very effective work in water-colors and charcoal. Among his water-colors are "In the Darkling Wood" (1876); "Peggoty on the Harlem" (1881); "Under the Towers, Brooklyn Bridge" (1883). In the latter, he filled, in the New York daily Tribune, an extensive space. He has been occupied also in book and magazine illustration, and is known as an author by his books "Well-worn Roads" (Boston, 1886); "Old Lines in New Black and White" (1886); and "A Book of the Tile Club" (1886), partly illustrated by himself. His latest work is "Gondola Days," published in London (1895).

SMITH, Francis Osmond Jon, congressman, b. in Brentwood, N. H., 23 Nov., 1801; d. in Deerfield, Me., 14 Oct., 1876. He was educated at Phillips Exeter academy, admitted to the bar, and practised in Portland. He was a member of the legislature in 1832, president of the state senate in 1833, and sat in congress from December of the latter year till 1839, having been chosen as a Whig. During his later life he was connected with many local and national improvements, was instrumental in establishing the Portland gas company, the York and Cumberland and Portland and Oxford Central railroads, the latter having been mainly built by him. But his greatest public service was the introduction of the Morse electric telegraph, which owes much of its success to his efforts. He was also connected with the "Reports of Decisions in the Circuit Courts-Martial of Maine" (Portland, 1831); "Laws of the State of Maine" (2 vols., 1834); and "Secret Corresponding Vocabulary; Adopted for Use to Morse's Electromagnetic Telegraph" (1845).

SMITH, Frank, Canadian senator, b. in Rich Hill, Armagh, Ireland, in 1826. He assume his father to Canada in 1832, and settled near Toronto. He was engaged in business in London, Ont., from 1839 till 1857, when he removed to Toronto, and there continued the business of a wholesale grocer. He was mayor of the city of London in 1866, and is president or director of several financial or industrial institutions. Mr. Smith became a member of the Canadian senate in February, 1871, and of the Dominion cabinet, without a portfolio, from 1882 to 1896, when he resigned. He was knighted in 1895.

SMITH, Frank Hill, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 Oct., 1842. He studied architecture in his native city with Hammatt Billings, later became a pupil at the Atelier Suisse, Paris, and studied painting also under Leon Bonnec. His work in oil includes portraits, figure-pieces, and landscapes. Some of his Venetian pictures belong to the Somerset club, Boston. In the course of his studies in Europe he gave much attention to interior decoration, making many sketches of famous interiors. In later years he has devoted himself especially to this branch of art. He has decorated the Windsor hotel and the opera-house at Holyoke, Mass., and numerous public and private buildings in Boston and Cambridge and other cities. Mr. Smith has been a director of the school of the Boston museum of fine arts.

SMITH, George, historian, b. in Delaware county, Pa., 12 Feb., 1894; d. in Upper Darby, Delaware co., Pa., 10 March, 1882. His father, Benjamin, was a member of the Pennsylvania legislature in 1801-2, and held several minor offices of trust in his county. George was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1829, but retired from practice after five years. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1832. He was an associate judge of the court of common pleas of Delaware county from the latter date till 1857, and was re-elected in 1861 for a term of five years. He was chosen the first superintendent of the Delaware county common schools in 1854, and for the subsequent twenty-five years was president of the school board of Upper Darby school district. He was also director of the county agricultural society, and judge of the county butts, suits, especially to geometry. Dr. Smith was a founder of the Delaware county institute of science, and its president from 1833 until his death, presenting it with his valuable herbarium about 1855. He was also an honorary member of the Pennsylvania historical society, and a contributor on historical and scientific subjects to the press. He published "A History of Delaware County, Pa., from the Discovery of the Territory included within its Limits to the Present Time" (Philadelphia, 1862).—His son, Clement Lawrence, educator, b. in Delaware county, Pa., 13 April, 1844, was graduated at Haverford college, Pa., in 1869, and at Harvard in 1883. He was assistant professor of classics and mathematics at Haverford in 1883-7, student of classical philology at Göttingen for one year in 1866-7, traveled a year (1866-7) in England and on the continent, about half of the time being spent in study and travel in Italy and Greece; then, after two years study at home, assisted in the organization of Swarthmore college in 1889-90, filling the chair of Greek and Latin, and his pupils have become tutor in Latin at Harvard in 1879, in 1873 assistant professor, and in 1883 professor of the same, and since 1892 he has been dean of the college faculty. where the city of Milwaukee now stands, but sold his real estate in 1836 for one quarter in cash and the balance in notes, and returned to Scotland. The financial depression of 1837 made it necessary for him to return to Chicago, and take back the land he had sold.
In 1837 he obtained a charter for the Wisconsin marine and fire insurance company, which enabled him to receive deposits and premiums in excess of $1,500,000. Alexander Mitchell was made seccretary of the company, with headquarters at Milwaukee. The insurance company's certificates circulated freely, and were for many years the most popular currency in the northwest. In 1839 Mr. Smith, under the firm-name of George Smith and Co., launched the first banking-house in the city of Chicago. When, in 1854, the Wisconsin legislature suppressed the circulation of the Wisconsin maine and fire insurance company's certificates, Mr. Smith sold the insurance company, of which he had become sole owner, to Alexander Mitchell, and bought the charters of two banks in Georgia, which together had the right to issue notes to the extent of $2,000,000. These notes were duly issued in Georgia, sent to Chicago, and there circulated by George Smith and Co. Mr. Smith began to close up his business affairs in 1857, and in 1858 he returned to Great Britain, residing chiefly in London.

SMITH, George William, clergyman, b. in Catskill, N. Y., Dec. 21, 1836. He was graduated at Hobart in 1857, was principal of Bladens-bury academy, Md., in 1858-9, and served as a clerk in the U. S. navy department in 1861-4, at the same time studying theology. He was ordained deacon in 1864, and priest in 1865, in the Protestant Episcopal church, and was an assistant at various churches in Washington, D. C. He was acting secretary of mathematics in the U. S. naval academy at Annapolis in 1864-5, chaplain at the Amherst academy in 1865-8, and chaplain on the U. S. steamship "Franklin" in 1868-71. He was rector of Grace church, Jamaica, L. I., in 1872-81, of the Church of the Redeemer, Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1880-3, and since the latter date has been president of Trinity college, a position of which he is shown in the accompanying illustration. He received the degree of D. D. from Hobart in 1889, and from Columbia in 1887. Trinity gave him the degree of LL. D. in the latter year. He has published occasional sermons, and is the author of a

SMITH, Goldwin, English author, b. in Reading, Berkshire, England, 13 Aug., 1823. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, where he was graduated in 1843. In 1847 he was elected a fellow of University college, London, where he acted for some time as a tutor, and in the same year he was admitted to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, but he has never practised. In 1850 he was appointed assistant secretary of the royal commission that was charged with the duty of making an inquiry into the condition of Oxford university, and he was secretary to the second Oxford commission, which affected many salutary changes in the constitution and government of that institution. He was appointed a member of the Popular education commisson in 1858, and the same year made a regius professor of modern history at Oxford, which chair he held till 1868. He was an active champion of the U. S. government during the civil war, when he wrote "Does the Bible Sanction American Slavery?" (London, 1863). "On the Morality of the Emancipation Proclamation" (1863), and other pamphlets that influenced public opinion on this subject. In 1864 he visited this country and gave a series of lectures, receiving an enthusiastic welcome and the degree of L. L. D.
from Brown university. He returned to the United States in 1868, was appointed professor of English and constitution al history in Cornell university, and resided at Ithaca till 1871, when he exchanged his chair for that of a professor, residing thereas a resident professor, and removed to Toronto, where he has resided ever since.
Prof. Smith was appointed a member of the senate of Toronto university, was elected first president of the council of public instruction, and was for two years president of the Provincial teachers' association. He edited the "Canadian Monthly" in 1872-4, founded the "Nation" in 1874, the "Rystander" in 1880, and the Toronto "Weekly," the principal literary and political journal in Canada, in 1884. In his writings and lectures he has advocated annexation of that country to the United States, which he regards as the manifest destiny of the Dominion, and he has also favored the project of commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity with this country, which was adopted as a plank in the political platform of the Canadian Liberals in 1888. He has written much for the English reviews, and, among other works, has published "Irish History and Irish Character" (London, 1861); "Lectures on Modern History" (1861); "The Empire" (1863): "Three English Statesmen,"(1867); "Cowper" (1888); "A Trip to England" (1888); "Jane Austen" and "Bay Leaves,"translations from Latin poets of 1890; "Canada and the Canadian Question" (1893),
"The United States view of Political History" and "Essays on Questions of the Day" (1895); "Specimens of Greek Tragedy,"(1894); "Oxford and Her Colleges" (1895): "Guesses at the Riddle of Existence" (1897); "The United Kingdom," a political history of England, and "Shakespeare: the Man" (1899).
SMITH, Gustavus Woodson, soldier, b. in Scott county, Ky., 1 Jan., 1822; d. in New York city, 23 June, 1896. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy, appointed to the engineer corps, and was engaged in constructing fortifications in New London harbor, Conn. He was assistant professor of engineering in the U.S. military academy in 1844-5, commanded the sappers, miners, and pontoniers during the siege of Vera Cruz and the subsequent operations of the war with Mexico, and in 1847 was brevetted 1st lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Cerro Gordo, and captain, for Contraband of War operations; he was recalled to the U.S. military academy as principal assistant professor of engineering in 1849, became 1st lieutenant in 1853, and resigned from the army the next year. He was subsequently employed in the construction of various government buildings, and in the iron-works of Cooper and Hewitt, Trenton, N. J. He was street commissioner of New York city in 1856-61, and a member of the board to revise the programme of instruction at the U.S. military academy in 1860. He returned to Kentucky at the beginning of the civil war, entered the Confederate service, and in September, 1861, was appointed major-general. He succeeded Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in temporary command of the Army of Northern Virginia on 31 May, 1862, and subsequently commanded at Vicksburg; was in charge of the state forces of Georgia in 1864-5, and was taken prisoner at Macon on 20 April of the latter year. He was superintendent in charge of the Southwest iron-works at Chattanooga, Tenn., in 1866-9, was insurance commissioner of the state of Kentucky in 1870-6, and since that time has resided in New York city.

SMITH, Hamilton Langschlager, educator, b. in New London, Conn., 5 Nov., 1819. He was graduated at Yale in 1839, and, while a student there, constructed what was then the largest telescope in this country, and, in connection with Ehrenze P. Mason, made an extended series of observations on various nebulae, the results of which were published in the proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences in 1841. He was professor of natural philosophy and astronomy at Kenyon college, Gambier, Ohio, in 1839-48, and since the latter date has held the same chair at Hohart. Trinity gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1871. He is president of the American society of microscopists and a member of several foreign and domestic learned societies. His publications include "Natural Philosophy" (Cleveland, Ohio, 1847); "First Lessons in Astronomy and Geology" (1848); "Species Typica Diatomaeorum" (550 specimens in thirty cases (1855-7); and addresses before the American society of microscopists.

SMITH, Sir Henry, Canadian statesman, b. in London, England, 24 April, 1812; d. in Kingston, Ont., 18 Sept., 1882. His parents were faithful Presbyterians, and he accompanied his parents to Canada. He was educated at Montreal and Kingston, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1836, and in 1846 became queen's counsel. Soon after the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1841 he was elected a member of the Canadian parliament for Frontenac, and he represented it till 1861, when he became minister of the MacNab-Morin administration as solicitor-general, west, in 1854, and held this portfolio in successive administrations till 1878, when he was appointed speaker. In this capacity he went to London in 1859 and invited the queen, in behalf of the Canadian parliament, to visit Canada and open the Victoria bridge. During the visit of the Prince of Wales to Canada in 1860 he was knighted, and soon afterward left the Conservative party and was defeated as a candidate for parliament.

SMITH, Henry, police commissioner, b. in Amsterdam, Montgomery Co., N. Y., 20 Oct., 1820; d. in New York city, 23 Feb., 1874. Early in life he engaged in trade in New York city, and for twenty-five years he was one of the most active politicians in the Whig and Republican parties. He was a member of the New York board of aldermen in 1854-7, supervisor in 1862-8, and president of the board of police in 1868-71.

SMITH, Henry Boynton, clergyman, b. in Portland, Me., 21 Nov., 1815; d. in New York city, 7 Feb., 1876. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1834, was tutor there for several years, and studied at Andover and Bangor theological seminaries, and subsequently at Halle and Berlin. He was pastor of the West Amosbury, Mass., Congregational church in 1842-7, professor of mental and moral philosophy at Amherst in 1847-50, of church history in Union theological seminary, New York, 1851-4, for the subsequent five years, and of systematic theology there from 1855 till his resignation in 1855. He was moderator of the assembly of the new-school Presbyterian church in 1863, and at the general assembly of the next year delivered a discourse, which was published under the title of the "Reunion of the Presbyterian Churches" (New York, 1864). He was subsequently a member of the general assembly's committee on reunion with the old-school branch of the church, and presented a report on a doctrinal basis of reunion (1867). He read a "Report on the State of Religion in the United States" before the Evangelical alliance which met in Amsterdam in 1867, to which body he was a delegate. He founded the American Theological Review," and was its editor from 1859 to 1862, when it was consolidated with the "Presbyterian Review," which he edited till 1871. The University of Vermont gave him the degree of LL.D. in 1859, and Princeton that of D.D. in 1869. His principal works are "The Relations of Faith and Philosophy" (New York, 1849); "The Nature and Worth of the Science of Church History" (1851); "Problems of the Philosophy of History" (1853); "The Idea of Christian Theology as a System" (1857); "An Argument for Christian Churches" (1857); "History of the Church of Christ in Chronological Tables" (1859); a new edition of the Edinburgh translation of Gessner's "Church History," volumes iv. and v. of which he chiefly translated (1859); a revised and enlarged translation of Hugenbach's "History of Christian Doctrine" (2 vols., 1861-2); a new edition of Stier's "Words of the Lord Jesus," with James Strong (1864 et seq.); and, with Roswell D. Hitchcock, "The Life, Writings, and Character of Edward Robinson" (1864).
Pennsylvania in 1837, and at the medical department in 1839, spent a year in study abroad, and on his return settled in practice in Philadelphia. He became a surgeon to St. Joseph's hospital in 1849, surgeon to the Episcopal hospital some years afterward, and one of the surgeons to Bleecker Hospital in 1854, and was professor of surgery in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania from 1855 till 1871, when he became professor emeritus. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed to organize the hospital department of Pennsylvania, and at the same time made surgeon-general of Pennsylvania. In the civil service he contributed much to the efficiency of the medical services of the Pennsylvania reserves and other state regiments. At the first battle at Winchester, Va., he originated the plan of removing the wounded from the battle-field to large hospitals in Reading, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, and other cities, and established the custom of embalming the dead on the battle-ground. He organized and directed a corps of surgeons, with steamers as floating hospitals, at the siege of Yorktown, and served the wounded after the battles of Williamsburg, West Point, Fair Oaks, and Cold Harbor. After thoroughly organizing the department of which he was in charge, he resigned his commission in 1863, and continued actively engaged in the practice of his profession with the rank of professor of medical art. His publications include "An Anatomical Atlas," to illustrate William E. Horner's "Special Anatomy" (Philadelphia, 1843); "Minor Surgery" (1846); "System of Operative Surgery," with a biographical index to the writings and operations of American surgeons for 25 years (2 vols., 1852); "A Treatise on Evidence of Fraud in the Department of the Treasury" (1855); "Professional Visit to London and Paris" (1855); "Practice of Surgery" 2 vols., 1857-58; and numerous surgical articles in medical journals; and he translated from the French Civiale's "Treatise on the Medical and Prophylactic Treatment of Stone and Gravel" (Philadelphia, 1841), and edited the "United States Dissector" (1844), and "Spinal Nerves of the Human Body" (1845).---His cousin, Francis Gurney, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 March, 1818; d. there, 6 April, 1878, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1837, and at its medical department in 1840, and became a resident physician to the Pennsylvania hospital for the insane in 1841, lecturer on physiology in the Philadelphia medical association in 1842, and in 1850 professor of the same branch in the Pennsylvania medical college. He was professor of the institutes of medicine in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania from 1863 till 1877, was one of the first medical staff of the Episcopal hospital, and for six years an attending physician and clinical lecturer in the Pennsylvania hospital. During the Civil War he was physician in charge of a military hospital. He founded and established the first laboratory in which physiology was taught experimentally and by demonstration in the University of Pennsylvania, was the first president of the Philadelphia obstetrical society, and vice-president of the American medical association in 1870. For nine years he was editor of the surgical staff of the Philadelphia Medical Journal. He contributed frequently to medical literature, translated and edited Barth and Roger's "Manual of Auscultation and Percussion" (Philadelphia, 1849); edited Daniel Drake's "Systematic Treatise," with H. Hanbury Smith, on the "Diseases of the Interior Valley of North Carolina" (1854); William B. Carpenter's "Principles of Human Physiology" (1856); his "Microscope and its Revelations and Uses" (1856); and William S. Kirke and James Pagel's "Physiology" (1856); and was one of the first to "Domestic Medicine; Surgery, and Midwifery" (1852), and, with John Neill, "An Analytical Compendium of Medicine" (1857).

SMITH, Hezekiah, clergyman, b. on Long Island, N. Y., 21 April, 1757; d. in Haverhill, Mass., 22 Jan., 1865. He was graduated at Princeton in 1782, and soon afterward was ordained to the ministry at Charleston, S. C. In 1784 he visited New England, and spent the winter in Haverhill, Mass. In 1785 a Baptist church was organized in this place, and Mr. Smith became its pastor. He maintained this relation to the end of his life, a period of forty years. Under his ministry the church grew into commanding strength and influence. Meanwhile he performed extensive missionary tours through destitute regions of New Hampshire and Maine. In 1776-80 he filled the office of chaplain in the American army. In this service he became acquainted with Washington, besides possessing the confidence and esteem of the whole army. In encouraging the soldiers and ministering to the wounded, he repeatedly exposed his life in battle. He was an ardent friend of education, and was especially active in establishing and supporting schools of which the best of fellows he was long a member. From this university he received in 1797 the degree of D. D. See his life, entitled "Chaplain Smith and the Baptists," by Rebun A. Guild (Philadelphia, 1885).

SMITH, Hezekiah Bradley, inventor, b. in Bridgewater, Vt., 24 July, 1816; d. in Smithville, Burlington co., N. J., 3 Nov., 1877. He learned the art of building and manufacturing of wooden machinery. He settled in Woodbury, Mass., about 1860, engaged in the manufacture of window-blinds, and invented a machine that cut and cleansed forty mortises a minute, for which the Massachusetts mechanical association presented him with a gold medal. He subsequently took out more than forty patents for various mechanical inventions. He established a wood-manufacturing factory in Smithville, N. J., in 1871, which settlement was named in his honor, and spent large sums in building model houses, halls, and places of amusement for his workmen. He was elected for Congress as a Democrat in 1878, served one term, and in 1882 was elected state senator, declining renomination.

SMITH, Hezekiah Wright, engraver, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1828. He came to New York with his family in 1833, and entered the establishment of an engraver, where he remained until his majority. He then passed two years with Thomas Doney, a mezzotint engraver, and in 1850 went to Boston and began to practise his profession, engraving a large number of plates for the publication of Tucknor and Farmer, and for R. C. Brown and Co. His most important plates are a full-length of Daniel Webster, after Chester Harding; a three-quarter length Edward Everett, after Moses Wright; and Washington, after Gilbert Stuart's Athenæum head, this last being the best rendering of the picture that has yet been produced by the engraver. It was a labor of love for Mr. Smith, and to its completion he devoted all the leisure he could secure from his regular work during several years. His plates are executed in the dotted style, improperly called stipple, and most of his smaller portraits have considerable roulette work, giving them a mezzotint appearance. In 1870 he returned to New York, and in 1877 he removed to Philadelphia, where he remained until the beginning of April, 1789. He then suddenly expressed a determination to give up engraving, disposed of all his effects, left the city, and nothing has since been heard of him. During the last year of his residence in Philadelphia he essayed etching in the style of Henry R. Hall, and produced ten plates in this manner, his last being a portrait of James L. Claghorn, president of the Pennsylvania academy of the fine arts.

SMITH, Isaac, patriot, b. in Trenton, N. J., in 1766; d. there, 29 Aug., 1807. He was graduated at Princeton in 1785, was a tutor there, studied law, and subsequently practised that profession, and early espoused the patriot cause, commanding a regiment in 1776. He was judge of the supreme court of New Jersey from 1783 till 1801, served in congress in 1785-7, and in the latter year was appointed by President Washington to treat with the Seneca Indians. At the time of his death he was president of the Bank of Trenton.

SMITH, Isaac Townsend, consul-general, b. in Boston, Mass., 12 March, 1813. He was educated at the Latin and the English high-schools in Boston, and at Capt. Alden Partridge's military academy at Middletown, Conn. He entered commercial life, and as supercargo made several voyages to the East Indies, China, Mamin, Singapore, Java, and Batavia. He removed from New York, where as a merchant and ship-owner he conducted business for several years. He was an incorporator and for many years president of the Metropolitan savings-bank, and was a commissioner of emigration for the state of New York for several years. Mr. Smith was a presidential elector at the election of Abraham Lincoln in 1864, and is Simeon con- sidered himself to be a contributor to the "Magazine of American History" and other periodicals.

SMITH, Israel, senator, b. in Suffield, Conn., 4 April, 1759; d. in Rutland, Vt., 2 Dec., 1810. He was graduated at Yale in 1781, and settled as a lawyer in Rapport, Vt., but removed afterward to Rutland. He was a boundary commissioner in 1789, and took an active part in the measures of Vermont into the Union. He was a delegate to the convention that adopted the Federal constitution in 1791, a member of congress from that year till 1795, having been chosen as a Democrat, and was U. S. senator from 1803 till 1807, when he resigned to become governor of Vermont. In 1809 he was a successful elector for General Jefferson.

SMITH, James, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Ireland about 1720; d. in York, Pa., 11 July, 1806. The date of his birth is uncertain, for he never told it. His father emigrated with his family to this country in 1729, and engaged in farming on Susquehanna river. James was educated at the College of Philadelphia, studied law at Sisson's, Settlesburg, was a lawyer and surveyor, and afterward in York, Pa., where many years he was the sole practitioner at the bar. During this period of his life he was as widely known for his humorous stories, his wit, and vivacity as for his learning and success in practice; his drollery being heightened by an awkwardness of gesture, a ludicrous cast of countenance, and a drawing utterance. He also successfully engaged in extensive iron-manufactures on Codorus creek, and at the beginning of the Revolution possessed considerable property. In 1774 he raised the first volunteer company in the state for the purpose of resisting Great Britain, and was a member of the convention to consider the expediency of obtaining from importing any goods from England, and also of assembling a general congress. At this meeting he was one of a committee of three to prepare instructions for the representatives, and these instructions, together with Smith's essay "On the Constitutional Power of Great Britain over the Colonies in America," gave the first strong impulse to the patriot cause in that region. He was a member of the Pennsylvania convention in January, 1776, and of the provincial conference that assembled on 18 June of the same year to form a new government for Pennsylvania, and seconded the resolution that was offered by Dr. Benjamin Rush in favor of a declaration of independence. This, having been unanimously adopted, was signed by the members, and presented to congress a few days before the Declaration. On the day of the adoption of the resolution Smith was appointed, with Col. John Bayard and others, to organize a volunteer camp of Pennsylvania militia for the protection of Philadelphia. He was a member of the convention of 13 July, 1776, that assembled in Philadelphia for the purpose of forming a new constitution for the state, and on the 20th of the same month was elected to congress, remaining in that body till 1788. He was re-elected in the general assembly of Pennsylvania. In 1780 he was commissioned judge of the high court of appeals. In 1782 he was appointed brigadier-general of Pennsylvania militia. He was appointed a counsel on the part of Pennsylvania in the controversy between that state and Connecticut in 1784, and in the following year was chosen to congress in the place of Matthew Clark, and was a member of the convention of 1790 which denied the right to Congress to declare war; his advanced age compelled him to decline a re-election. After the peace, having lost his fortune during the war, he resumed the practice of his profession, in which he continued till 1801. He was the personal and political friend of Washington and an ardent Federalist.

SMITH, James, pioneer, b. in Franklin county, Pa., in 1772; d. in Washington county, Ky., in 1812. He was captured by the Indians when he was eighteen years of age, and adopted into one of their tribes, but escaped in 1799, was a leader of the "black boys" in 1763-5, and a lieutenant in Gen. Henry Bouquet's expedition against the Ohio Indians in 1764. He was one of an exploring party into Kentucky in 1766, settled in Westmoreland county in 1768, and during Lord Dunmore's war was captain of a ranger company, and in 1755 major of the Associated battalion of Westmoreland county. He served in the Pennsylvania convention in 1776, and in the assembly in 1776-7. In the latter year he commanded a scouting party in the Jerseys, and in 1777 was commissioned colonel in command on the frontiers, doing good service in frustrating the movements of the Indians. He settled in Cane Ridge, near Paris, Ky, in 1788, was a member of the Danville convention, and represented Bourbon county for many years in the legislature. He published two tracts entitled "Shakerism Developed" and "Shakerism Detected," "Remarkable Adventures in the Life and Travels of Col. James Smith" (Lexington, 1799; edited by Will-
SMITH, James, Canadian jurist, b. in Montreal in 1808; d. there in 1890. He was educated in his native city and in Scotland, was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada in 1830, and in 1841 was elected a fellow of Trinity college, University of Missquoss. He held office as attorney-general, east, in the Viger-Drapier administration till 22 April, 1847, when he resigned, and was appointed a judge of the court of queen's bench of Lower Canada. He afterward became one of the judges of the superior court.

SMITH, James Millet, governor of Georgia, b. Troup county, 24 Oct., 1823; d. 25 Nov., 1890. He was educated at Culloden academy, Ga., became a lawyer, entered the Confederate army in 1861 as major in the 13th Georgia regiment, became colonel in 1862, and was a member of the Confederate congress from that year until the close of the civil war. He served in the legislature in 1871-'2, was speaker, and in 1872 was chosen governor to fill the unexpired term of Rufus B. Bullock, which office he held by re-election till 1874.

SMITH, James Wheelon, clergyman, b. in Providence, R. I., 26 June, 1823. He was graduated at Brown in 1848, and at Newton theological seminary in 1854. In 1853 he became pastor of the Spruce street Baptist church in Philadelphia, Pa., and he continued in that relation until 1870, when he went out from it with a colony which established the Beth Eden church. He held the pastoral charge of this body until 1880. Impeached by holding him to resign, he was thereupon elected pastor emeritus. He is the author of a "Life of John P. Cremer" (Philadelphia, 1888). In 1892 he received from Lewisburg (Bucknell) university the degree of D.D.

SMITH, James Youngs, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Groton, Conn., 15 Sept., 1809; d. in Providence, R. I., 26 March, 1876. He removed to Providence in 1826, engaged in the lumber business, and in 1838 in the manufacture of cotton goods in Willimantic, Conn., and Woonsocket, R. I., acquiring a fortune. He served several terms in the Rhode island legislature, was mayor of Providence in 1855-'6, and governor of Rhode Island in 1863-'5. During his service he efficiently supported the national cause, and largely contributed to it with his private fortune. He controlled extensive manufacturing enterprises, and occupied many posts of trust in banking and other corporations. He was a Republican from the organization of that party, SMITH, Jeremiah, b. in Peterborough, N. H., 26 Nov., 1759; d. in Dover, N. H., 21 Sept., 1842. He enlisted in the patriot army about 1775, and was wounded at the battle of Bennington, Vt. He then renewed his studies, was graduated at Rutgers in 1780, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Dover, N. H., early attaining to eminence as a lawyer and a scholar. He served in congress in 1791-'7, was long chosen as a Federalist, and ably supported the measures of Washington. He was U. S. district attorney in 1789-1800, a judge of the U. S. circuit court of New Hampshire in 1801-'2, and then became chief justice, but resigned in 1809 to become governor, in which office he served one term. He then returned to practice, and was again chief justice in 1813-'16, but afterward occupied no public office. He was president of the Exeter bank for thirty-nine years, trustee and treasurer of Phillips Academy, and a member of the State historical society. His extraordinary mental endowments were unimpaired by age, and were retained until his death. For many years he was the patron and close friend of Daniel Webster. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1867. He published a sketch of Judge Caleb Ellis (Haverhill, 1816). See his Life, by John Holmes (Boston, 1873). SMITH, Jerome van Crowshields, physician, b. in Conway, N. H., 20 July, 1800; d. in New York city, 21 Aug., 1879. He was graduated at the medical department of Brown in 1818, and at Berkshire medical school in 1823, becoming its first professor of anatomy and physiology. He settled in Boston in 1825, edited the "Worthington News-Letter" for two years, was a surgeon in 1826-'30, and mayor of Boston in 1834. He subsequently occupied the chair of anatomy and physiology, and afterward of anatomy alone, in New York medical college. He established in 1823, and edited for many years, the "Boston Medical Intelligencer," conducted the "Boston Medical and Surgical Journal" in 1828-'36, and the "Medical World" in 1857-'9. His publications include "The Classical Dictionary of Anatomy" (Boston, 1830); "Life of Andrew Jackson" (1832); "Natural History of the Fishes of Massachusetts" (1833); "Pilgrimage to Palestine" (1851); "Pilgrimage to Egypt" (1852); "Turkey and the Turks," (1854); and a "Prize Essay on the Physical Indications of Longevity." (New York, 1860). He also edited "Scientific Tracts," 4 vols., 1833-'34, and "The American Medical Almanac" (3 vols., 1839-'41).

SMITH, Jesse C., soldier, b. in Butternuts, Otsego co., N. Y., 18 July, 1808; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 11 July, 1888. He was graduated at Union in 1832, and studied law in New York city, under Alva Clark. He took much interest in military affairs, became adjutant, and subsequently major, of the 57th regiment of New York militia, and afterward colonel of the 14th regiment. While commanding the latter, he suppressed the "Angel Gabriel" riots, which were caused by the preaching of a fanatic who gave himself that appellation. Gen. Smith was surrogate of Kings county in 1850-'5, and state senator in 1862. At the beginning of the civil war he was instrumental in the reorganization of the national guard, and in the arming and equipping of many of the volunteer regiments. He commanded the 11th brigade of the national guard at the battle of Gettysburg. After the war he practised law in Brooklyn.

SMITH, Job Lewis, physician, b. in Spafford, N. Y., 15 Oct., 1827; d. in New York city, 11 June, 1897. He was graduated at Yale in 1849 and at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1853, after which he settled in New York city, and was a successful practitioner there, making a specialty of the diseases of children. He was clinical professor of that branch in Bellevue medical college and physician to the New York charity hospital and the New York foundling and infant asylums. His publications include a "Treatise on Diseases of Children" (Philadelphia, 1876; 8th ed., 1896). SMITH, John, b. in Willoughby, Lincolnshire, England, in January, 1580; d. in London, 21 June, 1631. Biographies of Smith are generally based on Smith's own accounts of his life and services, which are not trustworthy. He was the eldest son of George and Alice Smith, poor tenants of Peregrine Bertie, Lord Willoughby, and was baptized the rectory church at Willoughby, 6 June, 1529, O. S. At the age of fifteen he was apprenticed to a trade, but ran away from his master and served under Lord Willoughby in the Netherlands and other countries. Smith represents himself as one of the train of Peregrine Bertie, a young son of Lord Willoughby, but, on a list recently discovered of the members of that company, Smith’s name appears as a servant. He went abroad again to fight against the Turks under Baron Knoll, became a captain, and, he says, distinguished himself by daring exploits in Hungary and Transylvania, receiving from Sigismund Bathori, prince of Transylvania, a patent of nobility and a pension, but after engaging in many bloody battles he was left for dead on the field in a fight three leagues from Rothenthurm, and, having fallen into the enemy’s hands, was sent as a slave to Constantinople.

Transylvania, he says, that he was authorized to wear three Turks’ hats in his arms, in token of three Turks killed by him in a series of remarkable exploits. He returned to England this time, and that “Sigismundus Bathori, Duke of Transylvania, etc., afterward, in December, 1605, gave him a patent to that effect; but the Turks were Sigismund’s allies in 1599-1602, and he was not duke of Transylvania in December, 1603; neither was he king of Hungary, as is writ in the table” over Smith’s tomb. Other accounts of these wars do not mention Smith, and the accounts furnished by himself are evidently untrustworthy.

After travelling throughout Europe and attempting to take part in a war in Barbary, Smith returned to England, probably about 1605, and was persuaded by Capt. Bartholomew Gosnold, who had already visited the coasts of America, to engage in the founding of a colony in Virginia. The expedition, which set sail, 12 Dec., 1606, consisted of 3 vessels and 105 men. The ships were commanded by Capt. Christopher Newport in the “Susan Constant,” Capt. Gosnold in the “Godspeed,” and Capt. John Ratcliffe in the “Discovery.” Smith is described in the list of passengers as a planter. By the charter no local councillors were named for the colony, hence, some six months later, they were delivered to Newport, Gosnold, and Ratcliffe, which were to be opened within twenty-four hours of their arrival in Virginia, wherein would be found the names of the persons who had been designated for the council. On the voyage dissensions sprang up among the colonists. Smith says that he was accused of intending to usurp the government, murder the council, and make himself king. When they reached the Caroories he was kept a prisoner for the rest of the voyage. But no mention of this quarrel is made by any contemporary writers, and Smith omits it in his “True Relation,” although he describes it in his “General Historie.” It is probable that his vanity, his presumption, his previous adventurous career, and the fact that he had the interest of the colony at heart and was a born leader of men, excited the suspicion of his fellow-adventurers that he had designs against the expedition. The box of sealed instructions with which the party were supplied the night of their arrival at Old Point Comfort, Va., 26 April, 1607, Smith was named a councillor, but, as he was under arrest, he was not sworn in. On 22 May, with Newport and 22 others, he set out to discover the source of James river, and made a league of friendship with Powhatan and other great Indian chiefs. On their return they found the settlers embroiled in difficulties with the Indians, and Smith was with them a vigilant defender and obtaining a proper supply of food so far obtained recognition that on 10 June he was admitted into the council. His enemies had urged that he return to England with Capt. Newport, who was going home, but Smith demanded to be tried by the colony, and was acquitted. Scanty food began to reduce their numbers, President Wingfield was accused of embezzling the stores and disposed, and Ratclife became his successor, but Smith, by his energy and fertile resources, became the real head.

He at once set about procuring food by trading with the neighboring Indians, and built up and fortified Jamestown against their depredations. He explored the Chickahominy in November, discovered and visited many villages, and procured supplies of provision. While on the James, he was taken prisoner by Powhatan, who, after a six-weeks’ captivity, sent him back to Jamestown. Smith makes no allusion to the legend of his rescue by the chief’s daughter Pocahontas (q. v.) till 1610 when, about the time of Pocahontas’s arrival in England as the wife of John Rolfe, he wrote an account of it in letters addressed to John Smith. This Indian princess by that time had become a person of some importance, and her substantial friendship to the colony had been acknowledged by Smith in his “True Relation,” in which he referred to her as the “Nonpareil of Virginia. In this letter he says of the heroic act: “At the minute of my execution she hazarded the beating out of her own brains for my sake, and not only that, but so prevailed upon her father that I was safely conveyed to Jamestown.” This is all that was said of it, except a brief reference in his “New England Trials” (London, 1629), till the appearance of his “General Historie” (London, 1624). It may be that, while the story as given by Smith is false as to detail, Pocahontas, who was at that time only thirteen years of age, was touched with compassion for the captive and induced her father to treat him kindly. When Smith returned to Jamestown he found the colony reduced to forty men, many of whom had determined to return to England, but his entreaties and the arrival of Capt. Nelson with 141 emigrants revived their spirits. In June, he was elected president of the Chesapeake as far as the mouth of the Patapsco, and on 24 July set out on another expedition, and explored the head of the Chesapeake, returning to Jamestown on 7 Sept. On these two voyages Capt. Smith sailed, by his own computation about 5,000 miles, and from his surveys constructed a map of the bay. He wrote a remarkable account of this exploration and showed himself as skilful as he was vigorous and adventurous. In his encounters with the savages he lost not a man, traded equally with them, kept his promises, and punished them when they deserved it. In consequence, they feared and respected him.

On 10 Sept., 1608, by the election of the council and the request of the company, Smith became Smith was a product of his adventurous and boastful age. His low origin may have hindered his advancement, but it doubtless embittered his spirit toward those better born. He had, no doubt, courage, immense energy, and a great deal of tact. His reputation rests almost wholly upon his own writings, and he is the most entertaining of the travel-writers of his day. He had a better comprehension of colonization than most of his Virginia associates, and the "sticking" of the settlement for two and a half years was largely due to his courage and good sense. But he has doubtless appropriated credit to himself in Virginia that was due to others. Smith's romantic appearance in history is chiefly due to his facility as a writer of romance. He was never known to be a profane, but it has been said that he was. His arms were not granted for services in America. William Segar, "the King of Arms of England," in August, 1625 (nearly a generation after the services are said to have been rendered), certified that he had seen Sigismund's patent, and had had a copy thereof recorded in the records. All this is mere hearsay; but Segar must have been imposed upon (in the patent itself), as he was when he granted "the royal arms of Arragon, with a canton of Brabant, to George Brandon, the common hangman of London." Smith owes his exalted position in our history to the Oxford Tract of 1612, and to his own "Generall Historie," a work which is thus perfectly described in an epitaph in a letter to the Earl of Northumberland: "This gentleman is not spared to appropriate many deserts to himself which he never performed, and has stuffed his relations with many falsities and malicious detractions." He was buried in St. Sepulchre's church, London. His works are: "A True Relation," the first tract ever published relating to the colony at Jamestown; "Generall Historie," with introduction and notes, by Charles Deane, London, 1672; "A Briefe View of Virginia" (1612); "A Description of New England" (1616; reprinted in 1792, 1836, and 1865, also a German version, 1626); "New England's Trials" (1620; 2d ed., 1622; reprints, 1667 and 1873); "The Generall Historie of Virginia, New England, and the Summer Isles" (1624), and was reprinted with Smith's "True Travels" (Rich-MONOND, Va., 1819: "An Accomplishment for Young Seamen" (1626); "The True Travels" (1620); and "Advertisements for the Inexperienced Planters of New England" (1631); new ed., Boston, 1865.

His life has been written by Mrs. Edward Robinson (London, 1845); William Gilmore Simms (New York, 1846); Charles Deane, in his "Notes on John Goddard's Travels in Virginia" (Boston, 1850); George Channing Hill (1858); George S. Hilliard, in Jared Sparks's "American Biography"; Charles Dudley Warner in the series "American Worthies" (New York, 1881); and Charles Kittredge True (1882).

SMITH, John, senator, b. in Hamilton county, Ohio, in 1776, d. there, 12 Aug., 1816. He was a member of the first territorial legislature in 1789, and in 1809-'16 was a U. S. senator from Ohio, having been chosen as a Jeffersonian Democrat. During the early part of his service he enjoyed the close friendship of President Jefferson, who in 1804 sent him on a confidential mission to Louisiana and Florida to discover the attitude toward the United States of the Spanish officers that were stationed in these states, that he might endeavor far there to bring about a relationship with us to be depended on in the event of a war between this country and France. Smith's intimacy with Jefferson was interrupted by the charge of his implication in the Aaron Burr treason. Smith and Burr were personal friends, and appearances were so much against him that a motion was made in the U. S. senate to expel him, but it failed by one vote, which Mr. Calhoun opposed with so much vehemence that he was believed to be innocent by his constituents. See "Notes on the Northwestern Territory," by Jacob Burnet (New York, 1847).

SMITH, John, senator, b. in Mastic, near Brookhaven, N. Y., 12 Feb., 1752; d. there, 12 Aug., 1816. He was carefully educated, served in the legislature in 1791, and in 1809 was elected to the U. S. Senate in place of De Witt Clinton, who had resigned, holding office till 1813. He had been chosen as a Democrat. After the close of his term he became U. S. marshal for the district of New York, and he was also a major-general of militia for many years.

SMITH, John, clergyman, b. in Newbury, Mass., 21 Dec., 1752; d. in Hanover, N. H., 30 April, 1809. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1773, and served as tutor there from 1774 till 1778, when he became professor of languages in the college, holding that office and that of college pastor until his death. Brown gave him the degree of D. D. in 1803. He was college librarian for thirty years, delivered lectures on systematic theology for two years, and published "Hebrew Grammar" (Hanover, 1778); "Latin Grammar" (1802); "Hebrew Grammar" (1806); an edition of "Cicero de Oratore, with Notes and a Brief Memoir of Cicero in English" (1804); a "Greek Grammar" (1809); and several sermons.—His wife, Susan Mason, b. in Boston in 1757; d. in 1815, was the daughter of Col. David Mason. In her eightieth year she wrote a "Memoir" of her husband (Boston, 1843).

SMITH, John, congressman, b. in Barre, Mass., 14 Aug., 1799; d. in St. Albans, Vt., 26 Nov., 1858. He removed to St. Albans in boyhood, was admitted to the bar in 1819, and established a practice. He was state's attorney for Franklin county in 1826-'32, a member of congress in 1830-'31, resumed practice at the latter date, became chancellor of Vermont, and was subsequently interested in railroad enterprises.—His son, John Gregory, governor of Vermont, b. in St. Albans, Vt., 22 July, 1818, was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1838, and at the law department of Yale in 1841. He began practice with his father, whom he succeeded as chancellor in 1858, became active in railroad interests in Vermont, was a member of the state senate in 1858-'9, and of the house of representatives in 1861-2, becoming speaker in the latter year. He was governor of Vermont in 1863-'5, and actively supported the National cause during the civil war. He became president of the Northern Pacific railroad in 1866, and subsequently was president of the Central Vermont railroad. The University of Vermont gave Gov. Smith the degree of LL. D. in 1871.

SMITH, John Eugene, soldier, b. in the canton of Berne, Switzerland, 5 Aug., 1816; d. in Chicago, 29 Jan., 1897. His father was an officer under Napoleon, and after the emperor's downfall emigrated to Philadelphia, where the son received an academic education and became a jeweler. He entered the National army in 1861 as colonel of the 15th Illinois infantry, engaged in the capture of Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, and in the battle of Shiloh and siege of Corinth, became brigadier general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, commanded the 8th division of the 16th army corps in December, 1863, engaged in the Vicksburg campaign, leading the 9th division of the 17th corps in June, 1863, and was transferred to the 15th corps in September, taking part in the capture of Mission Ridge, and in the Atlanta and Carolina campaigns in 1864-5. In December, 1870, he was assigned to the 14th U. S. infantry. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in April, 1866, and became colonel of the 27th U. S. infantry in July of that year. He received the brevet of major-general of volunteers on 12 Jan., 1865, for faithful services and gallantry in action, and the brevets of brigadier and major-general, U. S. army, on 2 March, 1867, for his conduct at the siege of Vicksburg and in action at Savannah. In May, 1881, he was retired, and afterward resided in Chicago.—His son, Alfred T., b. in Missouri in 1858, and a graduate of the U. S. military academy, which he entered in 1878, served through the civil war, and since March, 1894, has been colonel of the 13th infantry. He commanded the regiment in Cuba during the war with Spain, taking part in the battles around Santiago.
1848, was pastor of Baptist churches in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Cleveland, Ohio, Buffalo, N. Y., Philadelphia, and Brooklyn, N. Y., during his occupation of the last charge his advocacy of open communion caused the exclusion of Mr. Smith and his congregation from the Long Island Baptist association. He was elected to congress in 1880, as an independent, receiving 22,083 votes, against 29,626 votes for Simon B. Chittenden, a Republican. He was the only candidate in his district in congress, but resigned his seat in September, 1881, and on the expiration of his congressional term became pastor of the East Congregational church, Brooklyn, N. Y. His publications included "Glice" (New York, 1866), and "The Open Door" (1870).

SMITH, John Lawrence, chemist, b. near Charleston, S. C., 17 Dec., 1818; d. in Louisville, Ky., 12 Oct., 1883. He entered the University of Virginia in 1836, and devoted two years to the study of chemistry, natural philosophy, and civil engineering, after which he was an assistant engineer in the construction of a railroad line between Charleston and Cincinnati. Abandoning civil engineering, he studied medicine, and was graduated at the Medical college of the state of South Carolina in 1840. After studying in Paris, he determined in 1841 to devote himself to chemistry, and thereafter he spent his summers in Giesen with Baron Justus von Liebig and his winters in Paris with Théophile J. Pelouze. He returned to Charleston in 1844, began the practice of medicine, delivered a course of lectures on toxicology at the Medical college, and in 1846 established the "Medical and Surgical Journal of South Carolina." Meanwhile he had published in the "American Journal of Science," several papers, including one "On the Means of detecting Arsenic in the Animal Body and of countering its Effects" (1841), in which certain of the conclusions of Orfila were shown to be erroneous, and one on "The Composition and Products of Distillation of Spermaceti" (1842), which was the most elaborate investigation on organic chemistry published by an American up to that time. Dr. Smith's soundness for chemistry led to his appointment by the state of South Carolina to assay the bullion that came into commerce from the gold-fields of Georgia and the Carolinas. About this time his attention was directed to the marbles in the vicinity of Charleston, and his investigations of the value of these deposits for agricultural purposes were among the earliest scientific contributions on this subject. He also investigated the meteorological conditions, soils, and modes of culture that affect the growth of cotton, and made a report on these subjects. In 1846 he was invited by the sultan of Turkey, on the recommendation of James Buchanan, to teach Turkish agriculturists the proper method of cotton-culture on Asia Minor. On reaching the East, he found the proposed scheme to be impracticable, and was then appointed by the Turkish government to explore its mineral resources. For four years he devoted himself to the work, and the Turkish government still derives part of its income from his discoveries. Besides the chemical and coal that he made known, his discovery of the copper-deposits of Asia Minor was of great value, for the island of Naxos was at that time the only source of supply, and, in consequence of the opening of new deposits, the price of the substance was extended. The subsequent discovery and application of coal in this country is due to his publications on the subject.

In 1850 he severed his relations with the Turkish authorities, spent some time in Paris, and projected there the invention microscopic telescope, which he completed after his return to the United States in October. Dr. Smith then made New Orleans his home, and was elected to a chair in the scientific department of the university of that city, but in 1852 he succeeded Robert E. Rogers in the professorship of chemistry in the University of Virginia. While filling this chair, with his assistant George J. Brush, he undertook the "Re-examination of American Minerals," which at the time of its completion was the most important contribution to mineral chemistry by any American chemist. He resigned this appointment in 1854, and settled in Louisville, Ky., where he married Sarah Julia Guthrie, daughter of James Guthrie, secretary of the treasury in 1853-7. Dr. Smith filled the chair of chemistry in the medical department of the University of Louisville till 1886, and was superintendent of the gas-works in that city, of which he also acted as president for several years. He established a laboratory for production of chemical reagents and of the rarer pharmaceutical preparations, in which he associated himself with Dr. Edward R. Saphil. From the time of his settlement in Louisville he devoted attention to meteorites, and his collection, begun by the purchase of that of Dr. Gerard Troost, became the finest in the United States. It is inferior only to those of London and Paris, and is now owned by Harvard. His interest in this subject led to the study of similar minerals with the separation of their constituents, and while investigating smarskite, a mineral rich in the rare earths, he announced his discovery of what he considered a new element, to which he gave the name of mosandrum. Dr. Smith was exceeding ingenuous in devising this name, which he pronounced "mos-er-um.") He was a chevalier of the Legion of honor, and received the order of Nichan Itbar and that of the Medjidieh from the Turkish government, and that of St. Stanislas from Russia. In 1871 he was president of the American association for the advancement of science, and he was president of the American chemical society in 1875. In addition to membership in many foreign and American scientific bodies, he was one of the original members of the National academy of sciences, and in 1879 was elected corresponding member of the Academy of sciences of the institute of France, to succeed Sir Charles Lyell. The Baptist orphan home of Louisville was founded and largely endowed by him. In 1867 he was one of the commissioners to the World's fair in Paris, and in 1873, in the "Transactions of the Royal society of London," he reports an able contribution on "The Progress and Condition of Several Departments of Industrial Chemistry," and he represented the United States at Vienna in 1873, where his report on "Chemicals and Chemical Industries" supplements his excellent work at the earlier exhibition. At the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia in 1876 he was one of the judges in the department relating to chemical arts, and contributed a valuable paper on “Petroleum” to the official reports. His published papers were about 150 in number. The more important of them were collected and published by him under the title of “Mineralogy and Chemistry, Original Researches” (Louisville, 1853; enlarged, with biographical sketches, 1884). Mrs. Smith contributed to the National academy of sciences $8,000, the sum that was paid by Harvard university for discover of a meteorite of interest of which is to be expended in a Lawrence Smith medal valued at $200 and presented not oftener than once in two years to any person that shall make satisfactory original investigations of meteoric bodies. The first presentation of this medal was on 18 April, 1888, to Prof. Hubert A. Newton (q. q.).

SMITH, John Speed, congressman, b. in Jessamine county, Ky., 21 July, 1792; d. in Madison county, Ky., 6 June, 1854. He received a public-school education, became a skilled Indian fighter, served under Gen. William H. Harrison at the battle of Tippecanoe, and was in the battle of the Thames, 5 Oct., 1813. He was frequently in the legislature, his speaker in 1827, and a member of congress in 1821-5, having been elected as a Democrat. He was a delegate at the convention of 1849 at Quincy Adams; he was secretary of the delegation that was sent by the United States to the South American congress which met at Tacubaya. In 1828-31 he was U. S. district attorney for Kentucky. In 1839 he was appointed, with James T. Morehead, a commissioner to Ohio to obtain the passage of a law for protecting slave property in Kentucky. In 1851 he was one of the United States commissioners under whose direction he was state superintendent of public works, and in 1846-58 he was a member of the Kentucky senate.—His son, Green Clay, soldier, b. in Richmond, Ky., 2 July, 1832; d. in Washington, D. C., 29 June, 1895, was named for his grandfather, Gen. Green Clay. After serving a year in the Mexican war, he entered Transylvania university, where he graduated in 1856, and at Lexington law school in 1856, and practised in partnership with his father. In 1856 he removed to Covington. In 1853-5 he served as school commissioner. In 1860 he was a member of the Kentucky legislature, where he earnestly upheld the National government, and in 1861 he entered the army as a private. He was elected to the college of laws of the University of Virginia, 1859, and in February, 1862, served under Gen.Elmner Dumas, and was wounded at Lebanon, Tenn. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 11 June, 1862, but, having been chosen a member of congress, resigned his commission on 1 Dec., 1863, after taking part in numerous engagements. He served till 1866, when he resigned on being appointed by President Johnson governor of Montana, where he remained till 1869. He was a delegate to the Baltimore Republican convention in 1864, and on 13 March, 1865, was given the brevet of major-general of volunteers. On his retirement from the governorship of Montana he entered the Christian ministry, was ordained in 1869, and became in the same year pastor of the Baptist church in Franklin, Ky. Much of his later ministry had been employed in evangelistic service. Gen. Smith had also taken an active part in furthering the temperance reform, and in 1876 was the candidate of the Prohibition party for the presidency of the United States, receiving a popular vote of 9,522.

SMITH, John Talbot, clergyman and author, b. in Newington, Conn., 22 Sept., 1795. He was educated at the Christian Brothers’ schools, Albany, and at St. Michael’s college, Toronto, Canada, was ordained a priest in 1851, and appointed curate of Watertown, N. Y. He was made pastor of Rouse’s Point in 1883, and subsequently appointed promoter of the diocese of Ogdensburg. He is a regular contributor to the “Catholic World” and other magazines and journals, and makes a speciality of questions connected with labor. He has written “Woman of Culture,” a novel (New York, 1882); “History of Ogdensburg Diocese” (1885); “Solitary Island,” a novel (1888); and “Community Life,” a novel (1889).

SMITH, Jonathan Bayard, member of the Continental congress, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 Feb., 1742; d. there, 16 June, 1812. His father, Samuel, a native of Portsmouth, N. H., settled in Philadelphia, where he became a well-known merchant. The son was graduated at Princeton in 1760, and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was among the earliest of those who espoused the cause of independence, and he was active in the Revolutionary struggle. In 1775 he was chosen secretary of the committee of safety, and in February, 1777, he was elected by the assembly a delegate to the Continental congress. He was a second time chosen to this post, serving in the congresses of 1777-8. From 4 April, 1777, till 19 Dec., 1778, he was president of the congress. On 1 Dec., 1777, he presided at the public meeting, in Philadelphia, of “Real Whigs,” by whom it was resolved “That it be recommended to the council of safety that in this great emergency . . . every person between the age of sixteen and fifty years be ordered out under arms.” During this year he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of a battalion of “Associates,” under Col. John Bayard, and was Col. Smith’s brother-in-law, and the latter subsequently commanded a battalion. In 1778 he was appointed a justice of the court of common pleas, quarter sessions, and orphans’ court, which post he held many years. He was appointed in 1781 one of the auditors of the accounts of Pennsylvania troops in the service of the United States. In 1782, and subsequently, he was chosen an alderman of the city, which was an office of great dignity in his day, and in 1794 he was elected auditor-general of Pennsylvania. He became in 1779 one of the founders and a member of the first board of trustees of the University of the state of Pennsylvania, and when in 1791 this institution united with the University of Pennsylvania, he was chosen a trustee, which place he held until his death, and was also from 1779 till 1808 a trustee of Princeton. He was a vice-president of the Sons of Washington, and grand-master of Masons in Philadelphia, and for forty years was a member of the American Philosophical society.—His son, Samuel Harrison, editor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1742; d. in Washington, D. C., 1 Nov., 1845, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1767, edited the “New World” in 1796-1800, and on the removal of the seat of government to Washington, D. C., on 31 Oct., of the latter year, founded the “National Intelligencer,” which he edited till 1818. He was commissioner of revenue from 1813 till 1817, the office was abolished. He published “Remarks on Education” (Philadelphia, 1798); “Trial of Samuel Chase, Impeached before the U. S. Senate,” with Thomas Lloyd (2 vols., Washington, 1805); and an “Oration” (1813).—His wife, Margaret Bayard, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1743; d. in Washington, D. C., in 1844, was the daughter of Col. John Bayard, of Philadelphia. She was educated at the Moravian seminary, Bethlehem, Pa., married Mr. Smith in 1800, and removed with him to Washington, D. C., where she was for many years a popular leader of society, her house being the resort of 1837. During two years, until December 1839, he commanded the Mediterranean squadron, with the frigate "Cumberland" as flagship. Upon his return home he was appointed chief of the bureau of yards and docks, which post he filled until the spring of 1869. He was then president of the examining board for promotion of officers until September, 1871. He had been retired, 21 Dec., 1881, and promoted to rear-admiral, 10 July, 1882. He resided at Washington after his service with the examining board until his death, at which time he was the senior officer in the navy on the retired list. He was highly esteemed by Capt. Isaac Hull, whose flagship "Ohio" he commanded in 1839. His son was killed on board the "Congress" when she was attacked by the "Merrimac" 8 March, 1862. When the admiral heard the news that the flag-ship had surrendered, he exclaimed: "Then Joe is dead."

SMITH, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Westmoreland county, Pa., 15 July, 1790; d. in Greensburg, Pa., 4 Dec. 1868. He was graduated at Jefferson college in 1815. Studied at Princeton theological seminary, was licensed to preach in 1819, and became a missionary in Culpeper, Madison, and Orange counties, Va. He was principal of the Staunton, Va., for several years, removed to Frederick city, Md., about 1822, and was pastor of the Presbyterian church there and principal of an academy. He was pastor of a church in Clairsville, Ohio, in 1840, and became president of Franklin college, New Athens, Ohio, in 1844, but resigned on account of his conservative views regarding slavery, returned his former charge to Frederick city, Md., and was president of the newly organized college there. He became general agent of the synods of the Presbyterian church for the territory embracing western Pennsylvania, northwestern Virginia, and eastern Ohio. He subsequently held charges in Round Hill and Greensburg, Pa. He received the degree of D.D. from Jefferson college. His publications include "Old Redstone, or Historical Sketches of Western Presbyterianism" (Philadelphia, 1854), and "History of Jefferson College and Church."
to Hinun, Ohio, with Sidney Rigdon, he was tarred and feathered. (See Rigdon, Sidney, for the subsequent events of this period.) Meanwhile the building of the first "temple" in Kirtland was decided upon, and each Mormon was compelled to give one seventh of his time in labor for its completion in addition to the tithes that were paid into the treasury. It was 50 feet long, 50 feet wide, and 50 feet high, and was dedicated on 27 March, 1836. At a conference of the elders, held 3 May, 1834, the name of "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints" was adopted, and on 14 Feb., 1835, a quorum of the twelve apostles was organized, seven of whom assembled in the church, owing to the financial difficulties of the time, and many of the members left it. Smith was charged with having recommended two of his followers to take the life of Grandison Newell, an opponent of Mormonism, but, although he was brought before the courts, he was discharged, owing to the lack of evidence. The failure of the bank, charges of fraud, and other difficulties occurred, and on 13 Jan., 1839, he made his escape to Illinois, ultimately reaching Far West, Mo. Toward the close of the year the conflict between the Mormons and Missourians, who had previously insisted that the former should leave their territory, assumed the proportions of civil war. The Mormons armed themselves and, assembling in large bodies, fortified their villages and took possession of the militia of the state, which was called out by the governor. Smith and many of his associates were lodged in jail, having been indicted for "murder, treason, burglary, arson, and larceny," but on 16 April, 1839, during their removal to Boone county, made their escape to Illinois, whether their families had fled. After this the leaders of the church were frequently under the arrest of the authorities, being in custody nearly fifty years. Most of the refugees met in Hancock county, III., and on the site of the town of Commerce the city of the saints, Nauvoo, was founded and a charter obtained, signed by the governor, 16 Dec., 1840. The municipal election was held on 1 Feb., 1841. Smith was elected mayor and "prophet of God and savior of his people," comptroller, sheriff, city purchasing agent, and superintendent of the Mormon church, with unlimited powers. The charter of the city granted the right to form a military organization, called the Nauvoo legion, which at one time contained about 1,500 men, and on 4 Feb., 1841, Smith was elected lieutenant-general. The erection of a new temple was begun, missionaries were sent to England, through whom large accessions were made to the church, and in 1842 Smith was at the height of his prosperity. Not only was his fame known from one end of the land to the other, but his favor was sought eagerly by the leaders of the two great political parties, who flattered and praised him that they might win his support. Jealousies soon arose among the leaders, some of whom were driven from the church in war upon rebellion. In 1843, authorizing him to take spiritual wives, he antagonized certain of his followers, among whom were Dr. Robert D. Foster and William Law, whose wives he had solicited to enter into the married state with him. In 1844, with other apostates Mormons, Foster and Law decided upon the establishment of a newspaper in "the Prophet," for the purpose of uniting the leaders of Mormonism. This was the "Nauvoo Expositor," the first and only number of which contained what purported to be affidavits from sixteen women who insisted that Smith and Sidney Rigdon were guilty of moral imparity and were in favor of the "spiritual-wife" system, which they openly denounced. These accusations greatly incensed the "prophet," and the city council declared the paper a nuisance, and ordered that it should be abated. Under cover of this ordinance the followers of Smith attacked the building, destroyed the presses, and made a bonfire of the paper and furniture. Foster and Law fled to Carthage, and a warrant was issued for the arrest of Joseph Smith, the mayor of Nauvoo, and seventeen of his adherents. He refused to acknowledge the validity of the warrant, and the constable who served it was marched out of Nauvoo by the city marshal. The militia was called out, and the Mormons gave up their public arms. Joseph and Hyrum Smith were arrested on a charge of treason and taken to Carthage jail. The governor visited the Smiths in jail, made a promise of protection to them, and had a guard placed over the building. On the evening of 27 June, 1844, a band of more than 100 men, with blackened faces, rushed into the jail and fired upon the brothers, killing Hyrum first, while Joseph was pierced with four bullets and fell dead. See "Mormonism and the Mormons," by Daniel P. Kidder (New York, 1842); "The Mormons; or Latter-Day Saints, with Memoirs of Joseph Smith" (London, 1851); and "The Early Days of Mormonism," by H. H. Kennedy (New York, 1888).—His son, Joseph, b. in Kirtland, Ohio, 6 Nov., 1818, after the death of his father, remained at Nauvoo, as he who would not acknowledge the authority of Brigham Young. For years she kept a hotel, in which her son assisted her. He also was clerk in a store, worked on a farm, was sub-contractor on a railroad, and studied law. After standing aloud from the Mormon church till he was about twenty-four years of age, he resolved to take the "h双脚early reorganized" branch of it, which he did in 1850. In 1860 he left Nauvoo and took up his abode as editor and manager of "The Saints Herald" at Pocatello, III. He then went abroad and preached frequently for about fifteen years, and then removed to Laramie, Iowa, continuing to reside there as the acknowledged head of the reorganized church of the Latter-day Saints, and lectured against the doctrine and practices of the polygamists of Utah.

SMITH, Joseph Lee, jurist, b. in New Britain, Conn., 28 May, 1776; d. in St. Augustine, Fla., 27 May, 1846. His father, Ethanath, was an officer in the old French war, and a major in the comissary department in the Revolution. Joseph was educated at Yale, studied law in Hartford, and practised in his native county until the second war with Great Britain, when he was appointed major in the 25th infantry, participating in the invasion of Canada. In the battle of Stony Creek, 6 June, 1813, in which Gen. William H. Winder was taken prisoner, he saved his regiment by a judicious movement. In 1830 he was appointed brevet colonel, U.S. army, for that action, and became colonel of the 3d U.S. infantry in 1818. He resigned from the army in that year, removed to Florida in 1821, and was U.S. judge of the superior court in 1823-37. Of the 1,000 cases that he decided previous to 1836, not one was reversed. Judge Smith was remarkable for his great physical strength and imposing appearance. He married Frances Maryn, daughter of Ephraim Kirby.—His son, Ephraim Kirby, soldier, b. in Litchfield, Conn., in 1807; d. near the city of Mexico, 11 Sept., 1847, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1826, served on frontier duty in 1828-9, and was dismissed from the army in October, 1830, for inflicting corporal punishment.
on mutinous soldiers, but was reinstated in 1832. He became 1st lieutenant in 1833, captain in 1838, and during the war with Mexico was engaged in numerous battles, including Molino del Rey, where he was mortally wounded in leading the light infantry battalion under his command in an assault on one of the enemy's batteries.—Another son

Edmund Kirby, soldier, b. in St. Augustine, Fla., 16 May, 1824; d. in Sewanee, Tenn., 28 March, 1893, was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and entered the infantry. In the war with Mexico he was twice brevetted, for gallantry at Cerro Gordo and Contreras. He was professor of mathematics at West Point in 1862–63, and became captain in 1855, served on the frontier, and was wounded, 13 May, 1859, in an engagement with Comanche Indians near old Fort Atkinson, Tex. In 1861 he was elected by the Texas legislature for his services against the Indians. He was promoted major in January, 1861, but resigned on 6 April, on the accession to power in Florida, and was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the corps of cavalry of the Confederate army. He became brigadier-general, 17 June, 1861, major-general, 11 Oct., 1861, lieutenant-general, 9 Oct., 1862, and general, 19 Feb., 1864. At the battle of Bull Run, 21 July, 1861, he was severely wounded in the beginning of the engagement. In 1862 he was placed in command of the Department of East Tennessee, Kentucky, North Georgia, and Western North Carolina. He led the advance of Gen. Braxton Bragg's army in the Kentucky campaign, and defeated the National forces under Gen. William Nelson at Richmond, Ky., 30 Aug., 1862. In February, 1863, he was assigned to the command of the Trans-Mississippi department, including Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Indian territory, and was ordered to organize a government, which he did. He made his communications with Richmond by running the blockade at Galveston, Tex., and Wilmington, N. C., sent large quantities of cotton to Confederate agents abroad, and, introducing machinery from Europe, established factories and furnaces, opened mines, made powder and castings, and had made the district self-supporting when the war closed, at which time his forces were the best to surrender. In 1863 he opposed and defeated Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks in his Red river campaign. Gen. Smith was president of the Atlantic and Pacific telegraph company in 1866–8, and chancellor of the University of Nashville in 1870–5, and was professor of mathematics in the University of the South, Sewanee, for eighteen years.

Ephraim Kirby's son, Joseph Lee Kirby, soldier, b. in New Rochelle, Westchester co., N. Y., 14 March, 1798; d. in New York city, 22 April, 1866. His father, Dr. Matson Smith, was a well-known physician in Westchester county, N. Y., and his mother was a descendant of the Mather family of Massachusetts. Joseph was educated in the academy of his native town, attended medical lectures at Columbia in 1817–18, was licensed in 1819, and in 1825 was graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons. He then settled in practice in that city, and about that time was a founder of the Medical-physiological society, and edited the first volume of its transactions, to which he contributed a paper entitled the "Efficacy of Emetics in Spasmodic Diseases" (1817), which won him reputation. He was physician to the New York state prison in 1820–3, became in 1821 a fellow of the New York college of physicians and surgeons, in which he was appointed professor of the theory and practice of physic in 1826, held office for more than thirty years, and in 1855 was transferred to the chair of materia medica, which he held until his death. He became an editor of the New York Medical and Physical Journal of the United States, and of the New York Medical Journal, and was a visiting physician to the New York hospital in 1829, president of the Academy of medicine in 1834, vice-president of the National quarantine and sanitary convention in 1859, and president of the Citizens' association of New York on the organization of the council of hygiene in 1846. During the cholera epidemic of 1849 he was one of the medical council of the sanitary committee of New York city, and performed arduous and excessive labors throughout the pestilence. He contributed largely to professional literature. His publications include "Elements of the Etiology and Philosophy of Epidemics," of which an eminent English authority said: "It is fifty years in advance of the medical literature of the day on that subject" (New York, 1824); "Discussion on Cholera Mortis" (N.Y.); "Public Duties of Medical Men" (1846); "Influence of Diseases on Intellectual and Moral Powers" (1848); "Report on Public Hygiene" (1850); "Illustrations of Medical Phenomena in Military Life" (1850); "Puerperal Fever" (1851); "Therapeutics of Albuminuria" (1821); and several addresses that were specially printed and published, and include that on the "Epidemic Cholera in the British Army and Europe" (1851), and an admirable "Report on the Medical Topography and Epidemics of the State of New York," delivered before the American medical association. In the meteorological portions of this work he introduced several new and appropriate scientific terms, which have since been adopted by scientific writers, and he illustrated the climate of the state in an original and ingenious manner by maps, plates, and tables (1869).

SMITH, Joseph Rowe, soldier, b. in Stillwater, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1802; d. in Monroe, Mich., 3 Sept., 1896. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1823, became 1st lieutenant in 1832 and captain in 1838, and served in the Florida war in 1847-48. The Mexican war he was brevetted major for gallantry at Cerro Gordo, and lieutenant-colonel for Contreras and Churubusco, receiving in the latter engagement a wound that ever afterward disabled his left arm. He became major of the 7th infantry in 1851, and in 1861 was retired on account of his wounds, but in the following year was appointed mustering and disbursing officer for Michigan, with headquarters on the lakes. He became chief mustering officer of Michigan in 1862, military commissary of musters in 1863, and in 1865 was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, for "long and honorable service."

SMITH, Joshua Toulin, British author, b. in Birmingham, Eng., 29 May, 1816; d. in Lansing, Sussex, Eng., 28 April, 1869. He was educated in an English school, and became an eminent publicist, constitutional lawyer, and scholar, being especially learned in the Scandinavian languages and literature. He resided in this country in 1857-58, and while here published his "Discovery of America by the Northmen in the 10th Century" (Boston, 1859). This work is accompanied by maps and plates, and has ever since been regarded as the standard authority on that subject. The most eminent American historians have quoted it, and it was the ground of his election as a corresponding member of the Society of northern antiquaries, Copenhagen, Denmark. On his return to Europe he devoted himself to constitutional and old Saxon law, was admitted to the bar in 1849, for eight years edited the "Parliamentary Remembrancer," and gave much time and study to antiquarian researches, physical science, geology, and mineralogy. His publications include "Popular View of the Progress of Philosophy among the Ancients" (London, 1836); "Parallels between the Constitution and the Constitutional History of England and Hungary" (1840); "The Parish, its Peculiar Constitution and Functions" (London, 1854); "The Laws of Navats and Severage Work" (1855); "The Right Holding of the Coroner's Court" (1856); and "History of the English Guilds" (1870).

SMITH, Josiah, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1704; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in October, 1781. His grandfather, Thomas, was a landgrave and governor of the province of South Carolina. Josiah was graduated at Harvard in 1725, being the first native of South Carolina to receive a college degree. He was ordained in 1726, returned to Charleston, and was successively pastor of Presbyterian churches in Bermuda, Cainhoy, and Charleston, S. C. He maintained a learned dispute with Hugh Fisher in 1739 on the subject of the right of private judgment, and in 1740 espoused the cause of George Whitefield, whom he invited to occupy his pulpit. He was an earnest friend of American independence, and on the surrender of Charleston became a prisoner of war, was taken to Philadelphia, and died there while in confinement. He published numerous discourses, and a volume of sermons (Charleston, 1752).

SMITH, Joseph Torrey, clergyman, b. in Williamsport, Mass., 4 Aug., 1815; d. in Royalston, Mass., 17 May, 1888. He was graduated at Williams and was pastor successively of Baptist churches in Lanesborough, Sandisfield, and Hinsdale, Mass., Bristol, Conn., Amherst, Mass., Woodstock, Conn., and Warwick, R. I. Dr. Brown gave him the degree of M. A. in 1829, and the University of Iowa that of D. D. in 1860. His publications include many magazine articles, miscellaneous contributions to the religious press, and "Examination of 'Sprinkling as the Only Mode of Baptism,' etc., by Absalom Peters, D. D." (Boston, 1849); and "The Scriptural and Historical Argument for Infant Baptism Examined" (Philadelphia, 1850).

SMITH, Judson, educator, b. in Middlefield, Hampden co., Mass., 28 June, 1837. He was educated at Amherst in 1859, and at Oberlin theological seminary in 1863, was tutor in Latin and Greek in Oberlin in 1862-4, instructor in mathematics and metaphysics in Williston academy, Easthampton, Mass., for the subsequent two years, professor of Latin at Oberlin in 1866-70, occupied the chair of ecclesiastical history and positive institutions in Oberlin theological seminary in 1870-84, lecturer on modern history in Oberlin in 1875-84, and lecturer on history in Lake Erie female seminary in 1879-84. In 1896 he was ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church. He edited "The Week of History" (Boston, 1876), and has been one of its associate editors, was president of the Oberlin board of education in 1871-84, and since that date has been foreign secretary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. Amherst gave him the degree of D. D. in 1877. His publications include, besides many magazine articles, a series of "Lectures on Church History and the History of Literature from the Fall of the Christian Era till 1844" (Oberlin, 1881). He is also the author of "Lectures on Modern History" (printed privately, 1881).

SMITH, Julia Evalina, reformer, b. in Glastonbury, Conn., 27 May, 1792; d. in Hartford, Conn., 9 March, 1866. Her father was a preacher and physician, an early Abolitionist, and both parents were Quakers. She became known throughout the country as one of the five "Glastonbury sisters," who resisted the payment of taxes because they were denied suffrage, and submitted to the sale of their property by the town authorities rather than obey the law. With her sister, Abigail H. (1786-1878), she was an early and active leader among women (see also History of Abolitionism, 1837). She is an interesting and conspicuous figure at their conventions. In 1876 they addressed a petition to the legislature of Connecticut, in which they set forth their grievances. Julia kept a weather-report from 1832 till 1889. In 1879 she married Ames G. Parker, a lawyer of New Hampshire, aged eighty-six years. The Glastonbury sisters were well versed in modern and ancient languages, and for many years were engaged on a translation of the Holy Scriptures literally from the original tongues, which was published (Hartford, 1876).

SMITH, Junius, pioneer of ocean steam navigation, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 2 Oct., 1789; d. in Astoria, N. Y., 29 Jan., 1838. His father, Gen. David Smith, was an officer of militia. Junius was graduated at Yale in 1802, studied at the Litchfield law-school, and in 1803 delivered the annual oration before the Society of the Cincinnati of Connecticut. He practised at the New Haven bar till 1805, when he was appointed to prosecute a claim against the British government for the capture of an American merchant ship. He pleaded the case in the admiralty court in London, succeeded in obtaining large damages, and on his return to this country engaged extensively in commerce, and con-duted a prosperous business for many years. He began the project of navigating the Atlantic ocean with steam-hips in 1832, published a prospectus of the enterprise in 1835, in 1836 established the British and American steam navigation company, and in the spring of 1838 proved the feasibility of the scheme by the crossing of the steamer "Siris." Capt. Moses Rogers had crossed in the "Savannah," using both sails and steam, in 1819. Mr. Smith's anticipation of the pecuniary advantages of the project were not realized, and he abandoned it, engaging in the introduction of the tea-plant into South Carolina, and the establishment of a tea-plan tion near Greenville, and was endeavoring to prosecute the industry at the time of his death. Yale gave him the degree of L.L.D. in 1840.

SMITH, Justin Almericn, clergyman, b. in Ticonderoga, N.Y., 29 Dec., 1819; d. in Chicago, 4 Feb., 1866. He was graduated at Union college, and was principal of Union academy, East Bennington, Vt. Having been ordained to the ministry, he was pastor of a Baptist church at North Bennington, Vt., from 1845 till 1849, and at Rochester, N.Y., from 1849 till 1853. In the last-named year he became editor of "The Christian Times," now "The Standard," in Chicago, Ill., and he had continued in that relation ever since. "The Standard" is a weekly journal of the Baptist church and its prosperity is largely due to the ability and tact that have marked its editorial management. From 1861 to 1866 he united with his journalistic labors the pastoral care of the Indiana avenue Baptist church, Chicago. Shurtleff college, Ill., gave him the degree of D.D. in 1858. Dr. Smith was a member of the board of trustees of the University of Chicago, and of that of Mount Wachusett theological seminary. His publications include "The Martyr of Vilvorde," a sketch of William Tendale, for children (New York, 1856); "Sinclair Thompson, the Shetland Apostle" (Chicago, 1867); "The Spirit in the Word" (1868); "Memoir of Nathaniel Colver" (Boston, 1871); "Uncle John upon his Travels," a book for children (1851); "Pathmos, or the Kingdom of John Bates" (Toronto, 1877); "Commentary on the Revelation" (Philadelphia, 1884); and "Modern Church History" (New Haven, 1887).

SMITH, Lucas Edwin, educator, b. in Williamstown, Mass., 29 Jan., 1822. He was graduated at Williams college in 1843, studied law in Williamsburg, Va., and was admitted to the bar in 1845. He served during 1847-8 as associate editor of the Hartford "Comant," and in 1849 as associate editor, with Henry Wilson, of the "Boston Republican." From 1849 till 1854 he was assistant corresponding secretary of the American Baptist missionary union, Boston. The next three years he spent in Newton theological seminary, where he was graduated and became in 1858 pastor of the Baptist church in Grotto, Mass., where he was called in 1865 to the professorship of rhetoric, homiletics, and pastoral theology in Bucknell university, at Lewisburg, Pa. From 1868 till 1875 he was literary editor of the New York "Examiner." In 1857 he became editor of the "Watchman," Boston, of which journal since 1881 he has remained associate editor. While he was professor at Bucknell university he edited the "Baptist Quarterly." He received from Williams the degree of D.D. in 1869. Besides contributing numerous articles to periodicals, Prof. Smith has edited "Heroes and Martyrs of the Modern Missionary Enterprise" (Hartford, Conn., 1832).

SMITH, Luella Dowd, author, b. in Sheffield, Berkshire co., Mass., 16 June, 1847. She was graduated at the State normal school in Westfield, Mass., in 1866, and at Temple Grove seminary, Saratoga, N.Y., in 1868. Since the latter date she has been a principal of public schools in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York. She married J. Had ey Smith in 1853. Mrs. Smith has written numerous newspaper articles and published "Wayside Leaves" under the pen-name of "J. Lanella Dowd" (Boston, 1870), and "Wind-Flowers" (1887).

SMITH, Martin Luther, soldier, b. in New York city in 1839; d. in Rome, Ga., 29 July, 1866. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1843, served in the Union service in both topographical engineers, became 1st lieutenant in 1863 and captain in 1865, and resigned 1 April, 1864. He then entered the Confederate service, became a brigadier-general, commanded a brigade in defence of New Orleans, was at the head of the engineer corps of the army, and planned and constructed the defences of Vicksburg, where he was taken prisoner. He subsequently attained the rank of major-general. After the war he became chief engineer of the Selma, Rome, and Dayton railroad.

SMITH, Mary Louise Riley, author, b. in Brighton, Monroe co., N.Y., 27 May, 1842. Her maiden name was Riley. She was educated at Brockport (N.Y.) collegiate institute, and in 1869 married J. A. Butler Smith, of Springfield, Ill., with whom she afterward removed to New York. She has published "A Gift of Gentians, and other Verses" (New York, 1882), and "The Inn of Rest" (1888). Some of her short poems, notably "Tired Mothers," have been widely popular, and several of them, including "His Name" and "Sometime," have been published separately as booklets, and had a large circulation.

SMITH, Mary Prudence Wells, author, b. in Attica, N.Y., 30 July, 1849. She was graduated at the Green ville, Mass., high-school in 1857, and at Hartford female seminary in 1859, taught in Green ville in 1859-61, and in 1864-72 was a clerk in Franklin savings institution, being the first woman employed in a bank in Massachusetts. She served as secretary of the Greeneville freshmen's aid society in 1865-6, and school mistress in 1874. She married Judge Fayette Smith, of Cincinnati, in the latter year, and since 1881 has been president of the Cincinnati branch of the Woman's auxiliary conference of the Unitarian church. She has published many magazine articles under the pen-name of "P. Thorne," and "Jolly Good Times," and "Child Life on a Farm" (Boston, 1875); "Jolly Good Times at School" (1875); "The Browns" (1884); and "Miss Ellis's Mission" (1886).

SMITH, Melancton, Continental congressman, b. in Jamaica, L. I., 1724; d. in New York city, 29 July, 1788. He was educated at home, settled in business in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1744, became sheriff of Dutchess county in 1777, and, says Chancellor Cushing, "possessed for his love of reading, tenacious memory, powerful wit and, for the metaphysical and logical discussions of which he was a master." He was a member of the first Provincial congress that met in New York city, 23 May, 1775, and a commissioner in 1777 for detecting and defeating all conspiracies formed in the state, served in the Continental congress in 1783-5, and in 1785-8, and in law court opposed Dutch county in the convention that met at Poughkeepsie to consider the ratification of the Federal constitution of 1787. In the deliberations of that body he exhibited talents of a high order, and ably sup-sported Gov. George Clinton and the State-rights party. He removed to New York city about 1786 and largely engaged in mercantile pursuits, at the same time taking a conspicuous part as an anti-Federalist leader. He was in the legislature in 1794, in which year a commission—consisting of Gov. Clinton, State Secretary Lewis L. Scott, Attorney-General Aaron Burr, State Treasurer Gerard Banecker, and Auditor Peter Y. Cortensius—sold 5,500,000 acres of land belonging to New York state, at the sum of eighteen cents per acre, to Alexander McComb, James Calhoun, John Nicholas Roosevelt, and others. When the transaction became public, resolutions of censure were moved in the legislature; but Jabez D. Hammond, the historian of New York, says: "After a long and acrimonious discussion of the resolutions of censure, they were finally rejected, and Melancton Smith, as pure a man as ever lived, introduced a resolution approving of the conduct of the commissioners, which was adopted in the assembly by a vote of thirty-five to twenty." He canvassed the state for the re-election of Gov. Clinton in 1792, and was subsequently circuit judge. He died of yellow fever, his being the first fatal case in the epidemic of 1798. — His son Melancton, soldier, b. in New York city in 1799; d. in Plattsburg, N.Y., 28 Aug., 1818, received a military appointment at the beginning of the second war with Great Britain, joined the U. S. army, became major of the 29th infantry, 29 Feb., 1813, and colonel of that regiment the next month, which office he held until the end of the war, serving throughout the frontier campaign of that year, and commanding the principal fort at the battle of Plattsburg in September, 1814. — The second Melancton, his son, Melancton, naval officer, b. in New York city, 24 May, 1810; d. in Green Bay, Wis., 19 July, 1893, entered the navy, attended the naval school in New York, and became a passed midshipman, 28 April, 1822. He was commissioned lieutenant, 8 March, 1827, served in the steamer "Pointed" until 1840, and in 1839, on this cruise, he commanded a fort during engagements with the Seminoles in Florida. He had made a full cruise in the frigate "Constitution" on the Mediterranean station in 1848-51, and, after being in waiting orders for several years, was commissioned commander, 11 Sept., 1855, after which he was light-house inspector. On 9 July, 1856, while in command of the "Massachusetts" off Ship island, he had an engagement with a Confederate fort and three Confederate steamers, and on 10 Dec., 1861, the fort at Biloxi, La., surrendered, cutting off all regular communication between North Carolina and Mobile, and getting possession of the sound. When in command of the "Mississippi" he passed Forts Jackson and St. Philip with Farrugut, and destroyed the Confederate ram "Manassas," for which he was highly commended by the admiral. He participated in the attack on Port Hudson. In an attempt to run the batteries the "Mississippi," grounded, and he set his ship on fire to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy. This course was approved by the navy department. He was promoted to captain, 16 July, 1862 (under orders to return north), but was assigned to the temporary command of the "Morganza," on which vessel the admiral hoisted his flag on his passage from New Orleans to Port Hudson. In 1864 he had command of the monitor "Onondaga," and appointed divisional officer on James river, and subsequently he had charge of the squadron in Albemarle sound, N. C., and recaptured the monitors "Cairo" and "Kearsarge." He participated in the attacks on Fort Fisher in the same frigate "War- basin." He was commissioned commodore, 25 July, 1866, and served as chief of the bureau of equipment and recruiting in the navy department until 1870. He was commissioned rear-admiral, 1 July, 1870, had charge of the New York navy-yard in 1870-72 and was retired, 24 May, 1871. After he was retired, he was appointed governor of the Naval asylum at Philadelphia.

SMITH, Meriwether, statesman, b. at the family seat, Bathurst, Essex co., Va., in 1760; d. 23 Jan., 1790. He was a signer of the articles of the Westmoreland (county) association in opposition to the stamp act, 27 Feb., 1766, and also of the resolutions of the Williamsburg association, a member of the committee of correspondence of the county of Alexandria in 1770, and of the Virginia conventions of 1775 and 1776, in which he was active. He was a member of the Continental congress in 1778-82, and of the Virginia convention of 1788, which ratified the constitution of the United States. The belief is held by his descendants that he was the author of the Virginia bill of rights. He was a member of the select committee to which the draft of George Mason was submitted, and appears to have submitted a draft for the state constitution. He was twice married: first, about 1760, to Alice, daughter of Philip Lee, and secondly, 29 Sept., 1783, to Elizabeth, daughter of Col. William Daingerfield. Of his issue by the first marriage was George William, lawyer and governor of Virginia, who perished, with fifty-nine others, in the burning of the Richmond theatre, 26 Dec., 1811.

SMITH, Morgan Lewis, soldier, b. in Oswego county, N. Y., 8 March, 1822; d. in Jersey City, N. J., 29 Dec., 1874. He settled in New Albany, Ind., about 1843, and enlisted as a private in the U. S. army in 1846, rising to the rank of orderly sergeant, and having been assigned to the garrison of Memphis, Tenn., as a member of the expeditionary force, he became a participant in the civil war which was engaged in the steamboat business. He then re-entered the service, having raised the 8th Missouri infantry, a regiment whose members were bound by an oath never to surrender. He was chosen its colonel in July, 1861, took part in the advance of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant's army to Fort Henry, commanded the 4th brigade of the 3d division of the Army of the Tennessee at Fort Donelson, and successfully stormed a strong position of the enemy. He led the 1st brigade of the same army at Shiloh, was engaged at Corinth and Russell House, accompanied Gen. William T. Sherman to Moscow, Tenn., and was subsequently in charge of an expedition to Holly Springs, Miss., Memphis, Tenn., He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers in July, 1863, and made expeditions and reconnaissances into Mississippi till November of that year, when he was placed in command of the 21 division of Gen. William T. Sherman's army, and was severely wounded at Vicksburg, 28 Dec., 1862. He assumed his command on his recovery in October, 1863, and was engaged at Missionary Ridge in the movements for the relief of Knoxville and in the Atlanta campaign. He was then placed in charge of Vicksburg, and, by his stern adherence to military law, brought that city into peace and order. He was subse-
SMITH, Nathan, surgeon, b. in Rehoboth, Mass., 13 Sept., 1792; d. in New Haven, Conn., 26 July, 1888. He enlisted in the Vermont militia during the last eighteen months of the Revolutionary war, and, having accompanied his father to an unsettled part of Vermont, subsequently led the life of a pioneer and hunter, having no education and no advantages. He decided to become a physician when he was twenty-four years of age, studied under Dr. Josiah Goodhue, and practised for several years in Cornish, N. H., when he entered the medical department of Harvard and received the degree of M. B. in 1790, being the only graduate of that year and the third of the department. At that time the practice of medicine was low, and the students were poorly educated and unskilful. To gain further advantages for them, he established the medical department of Dartmouth in 1798, was appointed its professor of medicine, and for many years taught all, or nearly all, the branches of the profession unaided. He held the chair of anatomy and surgery till 1810, and that of the theory and practice of physiology and surgery in the medical department of Yale in 1813, and held the chair from that date until his death, also delivering courses of lectures on medicine and surgery at the University of Vermont in 1825-5, and at Bowdoin on the theory and practice of medicine in 1829-5. His practice extended over four states and while he was conservative in his methods, he was more than ordinarily successful as an operator. He has been asserted that he was the first in this country to perform the operation of extirpating an ovarian tumor, and that of staphyloraphy. He devised and introduced a mode of amputating the thigh which, although resembling in some respects the methods that had been previously employed, is sufficiently original to be bearing. He also developed important scientific principles in relation to the pathology of necrosis, on which he founded a new and successful mode of practice. He invented an apparatus for the treatment of fractures, and a mode of reducing dislocations of the hip. He published "Practical Essays on Typhus Fever" (New York, 1824), and "Medical and Surgical Memoirs," edited, with addenda, by his son, Nathan Ryno Smith (Baltimore, Md., 1841). His son, Nathan Ryno, surgeon, b. in Concord, N. H., 21 May, 1797; d. in Baltimore, Md., 3 July, 1877, was graduated at Yale in 1817, and studied medicine under his father there, receiving his degree in 1829. In 1824 he began the practice of surgery in Baltimore, Md., and, in 1829, was appointed professor of surgery and anatomy in the University of Vermont. In 1827 he was called to the chair of surgery in the medical department of the University of Maryland, but he resigned in 1828 and became professor of the practice of medicine in Transylvania university, Lexington, Ky. In 1840 he resumed his chair in the University of Maryland, which he held until 1867. He invented an instrument for the removal of deciduous teeth. He was the first to perform the operation of lithotomy, and also Smith's anterior splint for treatment of fractures of the thigh. In addition to articles in the "American Journal of Medicine," Dr. Smith published "Physiological Essay on Digestion" (New York, 1825); "Address to Medical Graduates of the University of Maryland" (Baltimore, Md., 1827); "Diseases of the Internal Ear," from the French of Dr. Saissy, with a supplement (1829); "Surgical Anatomy of the Arteries" (1832-5); "Treatment of Fractures of the Lower Extremities by the Use of the Anterior Suspensory Apparatus" (1867); and a small volume entitled "Legends of the South," under the pen-name Victor. His son, Alen Penneman, physician, b. in Baltimore, Md., 3 Feb., 1814; d. there, 18 July, 1858. He received his instruction from private tutors, and was graduated in 1861 at the school of medicine of the University of Maryland. In 1856 he was elected adjutant professor of surgery in that university, and in 1875 professor of surgery. He was connected with nearly all the hospitals of Baltimore as consulting physician and surgeon. He performed the operation of lithotomy more than 100 times successively in every instance. He was one of the original trustees of Johns Hopkins university, and was a member of many foreign and American medical societies.

SMITH, Nathaniel, jurist, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 6 Jan., 1782; d. there, 9 March, 1832. He studied law under Judge Tapping Reeve at Litchfield, Conn., and was admitted to the New York bar in 1788. He was a member of the legislature, in whose deliberations he took an energetic part in abolishing slavery, founding the public-school system, and settling the public lands belonging to Connecticut. From 1795 till 1799 he was a member of congress, and assisted in ratifying the Jay treaty with Great Britain, which closed the treaty. Mr. Smith declined a re-election to congress in 1790, and, after six years in the state senate, was raised to the supreme bench of Connecticut, where, from 1806 till 1819, he formulated decisions, many of which are still quoted. He was one of the leaders of the famous Hartford convention in 1814, to which his own great character helped to give weight. And the pure patriotism of whose purpose he sternly defended in company with William Prescott, Stephen Longfellow, Chaucer Goodrich, James Hillhouse, and Roger Minot Sherman. "Judge Smith," says Goodrich (Peter Parley), in his "Recollections of a Lifetime," "was regarded by Connecticut as one of the intellectual giants of his time. Gideon H. Hollister, in his "History of the Senate" says of him as "one whom the God of nations chartered to be great by the divine prerogative of genius."—His brother Nathan, senator, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 8 June, 1769; d. in Washington, D. C., 6 Dec., 1855, also studied law with Judge Reeves, of Litchfield, and, moving to New Haven, became one of the most distinguished advocates in New England. He was a member of the legislature for many years, and took an active part in dissolving the connection between church and state in Connecticut, and in moulding the new state constitution that was adopted in 1818. As an earnest member and councillor of the Episcopal church, he advocated successfully her claims to an equal recognition with all other religious bodies, and was one of the founders and incorporators of Washington (now Triniti) college. He was for several years U. S. district attorney, and in 1835 the opponent of Oliver Wolcott, Jr., in the U. S. Senate, his opponent determined to ship, but was defeated. In May, 1832, he was elected senator to succeed Samuel A. Foot. He at once took an active part in the debates of the senate, and at his death, which took place suddenly, was even more conspicuous for his private virtues than for his public services. It was said that at his funeral in the senate chamber every prominent public man of the day, including President Jackson and his cabinet, was present.—Truman, senator, a nephew of Nathaniel and Nathan Smith, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 27 Nov., 1793; d. in Stanford, Conn., 5 May, 1864, was graduated at Yale in 1813, studied law, and was a member of the legislature in 1831-4, of congress in 1839-40, and U. S. senator from Connecticut in 1849-54, when he suddenly resigned from weariness of public life. He was remarkable for his wide, though silent, influence in national politics, having taken a decisive part in the nomination of Gen. Zachary Taylor for president in 1848. He conducted that presidential campaign as chairman of the Whig national committee, and was offered a post in President Taylor's cabinet, which he declined. He was, in conjunction with Daniel Webster, the foremost opponent of the "spoils system" in congress. He strenuously combated the views of Stephen A. Douglas in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. After resigning from the senate, Mr. Smith practised law in New York until he was appointed by President Lincoln in 1862 judge of the court of arbitration, and afterward of the court of claims. He was also legal adviser to the government in many questions arising out of the civil war. He wrote one book, "An Examination of the Question of Anaesthetics" (Boston, 1859), published 582 "An Examination of Modern Anaesthetics" (Hartford, 1867), and published many separate speeches. Mr. Smith was a man of giant frame and lived to be nearly ninety-three years old.—Perry, senator, of the same ancestry, b. in Woodbury, Conn., 12 May, 1783; d. in New Milford, Conn., 8 June, 1852, studied law, and made his residence in New Milford, where he lived during the greater part of his life. Well known in his profession, he was chosen a member of the legislature in 1822-4, and again in 1835-6, and in the mean time was judge of the probate court. In 1837 he was elected U. S. senator from Connecticut, serving till 1843. He resigned the practice of his profession on going to Washington, and never resumed it. He published a "Speech on Bank Depositories" (1848).—Of Nathan's grandsons, the Rev. Cornelius Bishop Smith, D. D., had been rector of St. James church, New York city, since 1869, and his younger brother, the Rev. Alexander Mackay-Smith (q. v.), was first archdeacon of the diocese of New York.

SMITH, Persifor Frazer, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in November, 1788; d. in Fort Leavenworth, Kan., 17 May, 1858. His grandfather, Col. Robert Smith, was an officer in the Revolution, and his maternal grandfather, Persifor Frazer, was a lieutenant-colonel in the same army. Persifor was graduated at Princeton in 1815, studied law under Charles Champney, and settled in New Orleans, La. At the beginning of the Florida war, being adjutant-general of the state, he volunteered under Gen. Edmund P. Gaines as colonel of Louisiana volunteers in the campaigns of 1836 and 1838.

He was appointed colonel of a rifle regiment in May, 1846, commanded a brigade of infantry from September of that year till the close of the war with Mexico, and received the brevet of brigadier-general. U. S. army, for his service at Monterey, and major-general in the same for Churubusco and Contreras, 20 Aug., 1847. The official report of the latter battle recorded that he "closely directed the whole attack in front with his habitual coolness and ability." He also fought at Chapultepec and at the Belden gate, and in the latter battle is described by Gen. Winfield Scott as "cool, unembarrassed, and ready." He was commissioner of armistice with Mexico in October, 1847, afterward commanded the 34th division of the U. S. army in the campaigns of 1849. He volunteered for Vera Cruz in May, 1848, and subsequently had charge of the departments of California and Texas. He was brevetted major-general. U. S. army, in 1849, appointed to the full rank of brigadier-general, 30 Dec., 1856, and ordered to Kansas. Just before his death he was placed in command of the Utah expedition.—His cousin, Persifor Frazer, lawyer, in Pennsylvania, Pa., in 1808, removed to Chester, Pa., 17 May, 1822, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1823, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1829, became clerk of the orphan's court of Chester county, Pa., in 1835, prosecuting attorney for Delaware county in 1839, served in the Pennsylvania legislature in 1842-3, and became state superintendent in 1843. He published "Poor Boys in Philadelphia," "Poor Boys in Virginia," and "Reports of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania." (32 vols., 1853-82).

SMITH, Peter, merchant, b. in Greenbush, Rockland co., N. Y., 15 Nov., 1764; d. in Schenectady, N. Y., 13 April, 1837. His ancestors came from Holland. At the age of sixteen he became a clerk in an importing-house in New York city, and afterward he was a partner with John Jacob Astor in the fur business. They bought the furs of Indians in the northern part of the state, and Smith, who spoke the Indian language, established a trading-post on what is known as the Bleeker property at Utica. When the partnership was dissolved, and Mr. Astor bought real estate in New York city, Mr. Smith purchased large tracts in Oneida, Chenango, Madison, and other counties. In some cases these included whole townships, and the total amount was nearly a million acres. His first wife, whom he married in 1792, was Elizabeth, daughter of Col. James Livingston. His manuscript journals, still in existence, contain interesting descriptions of his journeys among the Indians. In his latter years he was deepiy interested in religion, and spent considerable sums for the distribution of tracts.—His son, Gerrit, philanthropist, b. in Utica, N. Y., 6 March, 1797; d. in New York city, 28 Dec., 1874, was graduated at Hamilton college in 1818, and devoted himself to the care of his father's estate, a large part of which was given to him when he attained his majority. At the age of fifty-six he studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was elected to Congress as an independent candidate in 1852, but resigned after serving through one session. During his boyhood slavery still existed in the state of New York, and his father was a slave-holder. One of the earliest forms of the philanthropy that marked his long life appeared in his opposition to the institution of slavery, and his friendship for the oppressed race. He acted for ten years with the American colonization society, contributing largely to its funds, until he became convinced that it was merely a scheme of the slave-holder for getting the freed colored people out of the country. Thereafter he gave his support to the Anti-slavery society, not only writing for the cause and contributing money, but taking part in conventions, and personally assisting fugitives. He was temperate in all the discussion, holding that the north was a partner in the guilt, and in the event of emancipation without slave labor be a portion of the expense; but the attempt to force slavery upon Kansas convinced him that the day for peaceful emancipation was past, and he then advocated whatever measure of force might be necessary. He gave large sums of money to send free-soil settlers to Kansas, and was a personal friend of John Brown, to whom he had given a farm in Essex county, N. Y., that he might insert a colony of colored people, to whom Mr. Smith had given farms in the same neighborhood. He was supposed to be implicated in the Harper's Ferry affair, but it was shown that he had only given pecuniary aid to Brown as he had to scores of other men, and so far as he knew Brown's plans had tried to dissuade him from them. Mr. Smith was deeply interested in the cause of temperance, and organized an anti-license company in February, 1842. In the village of Peterboro, Madison co., where he had his home, he built a good hotel, and gave it rent-free to a tenant who agreed that no liquor should be sold there. This is believed to have been the first temperance hotel ever established. But it was not pecuniarily successful. He had been nominated for president by an industrial congress at Philadelphia in 1848, and by the land-reformers in 1856, but declined. In 1849, and again in 1858, he was nominated for governor of New York. The last nomination, on a platform of abolition and prohibition, he accepted, and canvassed the state. In the election he received 5,446 votes. Among the other reforms in which he was interested were those relating to the property-rights of married women and female suffrage and abstinence from tobacco. In religion he was originally a Presbyterian, but became very liberal in his views, and built a non-sectarian church in Peterboro, in which he often occupied the pulpit himself. He could not conceive of religion as anything apart from the affairs of daily life, and in one of his published letters he wrote: "No man's religion is better than his politics; his religion is pure whose politics are pure; whilst his religion is rascally whose politics are rascally." He disbelieved in the right of men to monopolize land, and gave away thousands of acres of that which he had inherited, some of it to colleges and charitable institutions, and some in the form of small farms to men who would settle upon them. He also gave away by far the greater part of his income, for charitable purposes, to institutions and individuals. In the financial crisis of 1857 he borrowed of John Jacob Astor twenty thousand dollars, and gave his verbal agreement to give Mr. Astor mortgages to that amount on real estate. The mortgages were executed as soon as Mr. Smith reached his home, but through the carelessness of a clerk they were not delivered, and Mr. Astor waited six months before inquiring for them. Mr. Smith had for many years anticipated that the system of slavery would be brought to an end only through violence, and when the civil war began he hastened to the support of the government with his money and his influence. At a war-meeting in April, 1861, he made a speech in which he said: "The end of American slavery is at hand. The first gun fired at Fort Sumter announced the fact that the last fugitive slave had been returned. ... The armed forces of the government are now being brought in anger. The sad necessity should be their only excuse for going. They must still love the south; we must all still love her. As her children shall, one after another, fall into our hands, let us be restrained from dealing reignfully, but demand tenderly with them, by our remembrance of the large share which the north has had in blinding them to the true value of the right. After years of war, he united with Horace Greeley and Cornelius Vanderbilt in signing the half-bond of Jefferson Davis. At the outset he offered to equip a regiment of colored men, if the government would accept them. Mr. Smith left an estate of about $1,000,000, leaving, given away eight times that amount during his lifetime as a great fund of pamphlets and broadsides, printed on his own press in Peterborough. His publications in book-form were "Speeches in Congress" (1855); "Sermons and Speeches" (1861); "The Religion of Reason" (1864); "Speeches and Letters" (1865); "The Theologes" (3d ed., 1866); "Nature the Base of a Free Theology" (1867); and "Correspondence with Albert Barnes" (1868). His authorized biography has been written by Octavius B. Frothingham (New York, 1878). SMITH, Preston, soldier, b. in Giles county, Tenn., 25 Dec., 1823; d. in Georgia, 20 Sept., 1863. He received his early education at a country school, and at Jackson college, Columbia, Tenn. He studied law in Columbia and practised there for several years removed to Warworsboro, Tenn., and subsequently to Memphis. He became colonel of the 15th Tennessee regiment of militia, which was afterward mustered into the service of the Confederacy, and he was promoted to brigadier-general, 27 Oct., 1862. He was severely wounded at the battle of Shiloh, and commanded his brigade under Gen. E. Kirby Smith at Richmond, Ky. He was killed, with nearly all his staff, by a sudden volley during a night attack at Chickamauga, Ga. SMITH, Richard, journalist, b. in the south of Ireland, 30 Jan., 1823. His father, a farmer of Scottish ancestry, died when Richard was seventeen years old, and the widow and her son emigrated to this country and settled in 1844 in Cincinnati, Ohio. Richard apprenticed himself to a carpenter and builder until he could secure a better opening. On reaching his majority, he gained employment on the "Price Current," of which he soon became proprietor, and greatly improved it, making it virtually a new publication. He accepted also the agency of the newly organized Associated press, and was the first man in Ohio to transmit a presidential message over the wires. About 1854 he purchased an interest in the Cincinnati "Gazette," the oldest daily in the city, which was then in a languishing condition from lack of proper management. Soon after he became responsible for the "Price Current," he concentrated all his energy on the "Gazette," which became prosperous under his direction, especially during the civil war. But in 1880 its interests and those of the Cincinnati "Commercial" indicated the financial and political wisdom of their union, and accordingly the first of the following year they were consolidated under the name of the "Commercial Gazette." Richard Smith is the vice-president of the new company. He exercises much influence, journalistic and political, throughout Ohio. Though he is often pugnaciously referred to as "Beacon," he is only a lay member of the Presbyterian church. SMITH, Richard Somers, educator, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 Oct., 1813; d. in Aumapais, Pa., 25 Nov., 1877. He graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1834, but resigned from the army in 1836, was assistant engineer of the Philadelphia and Columbia railroad company in 1836-7, of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal in 1830-40, and projected several other important railroads. He was reappointed in the U. S. army in the latter year with the rank of lieutenant, but was soon reassigned. He was engaged in teaching at the U. S. military academy in 1846-32, and was then transferred to the 4th artillery, becoming quartermaster and treasurer, but in 1856 he again resigned. He was professor of mathematics, engineering, and drawing in Brooklyn collegiate and polytechnic institute in 1855-9, director of Cooper institute, New York city, for two years, professor of the 12th U. S. infantry in 1861, and served as mustering and disbursing officer in Maryland and Wisconsin in 1861-2. He then took part in the Rappahannock campaign with the Army of the Potomac, participating in the battle of Chancellorsville, Va., 2-4 May, 1863. He resigned in the same month to become president of Girard college, Pa., which post he held till 1868. For the next two years he was professor of engineering in the Polytechnic college of Pennsylvania, and from 1870 till his death he was at the head of the department of drawing at the U. S. naval academy. Columbia gave him the degree of A. M. in 1857. He published a "Manual of Topographical Drawing" (Philadelphia, 1862), a work on "Linear Perspective Drawing" (1857). SMITH, Robert, clergyman, b. in Londonderry, Ireland, in 1723; d. in Rockville, Pa., 15 April, 1793. His father emigrated to this country when the son was seven years of age, settling in Chester county, Pa. Robert received a classical education from Rev. Samuel Blair at Pegg's Manor school, Chester county, Pa., was licensed to preach in 1749, and from 1751 till his death was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Pequea, Pa., a part of the time supplying the church at Leacock. Shortly after his settlement in Pequea he founded a classical and theological seminary, which enjoyed a high reputation, and was one of the most popular schools in Pennsylvania and Maryland. He received the degree of D.D. from Princeton in 1779, was an overseer of that college from 1779 till his death, and in 1791 was second moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States. In 1779 he married Elizabeth, sister of Rev. Samuel Blair.—Their son, Samuel Stanhope, clergyman, b. in Pequea, Pa., 16 March, 1759; d. in Princeton, N. J., Aug. 18, 1819, was graduated at Princeton in 1790, became an assistant in his father's school, was tutor at Princeton in 1790-3, while studying theology there, and in 1794 was ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church. He labored as a missionary in western Virginia for the next year, became first president of Hampden-Sydney college in 1795, and held office till 1798, when he accepted the chair of moral philosophy at Princeton.

At that date the college was in a deplorable condition from the ravages of the Revolution; the students were dispersed and the buildings were burned. Dr. Smith made great exertions and many pecuniary sacrifices to restore it to prosperity. He accepted in 1788 the additional chair of theology, and in 1788 the office of vice-president of the college. He was a member of the committee to draw up a system of government for the Presbyterian church in 1786, and in 1795 succeeded Dr. John Witherspoon (one of whose daughters he had married) as president of the college, holding office till 1812. Yale gave him the degree of D.D. in 1783, and Harvard that of L.L.D. in 1810. As a preacher, Dr. Smith was popular and eloquent. He published "Essay on the Causes of the Variety of Complexion and Figure of the Human Species" (Philadelphia, 1787); "Sermons" (Newark, 1799); "Lectures on the Evidences of Christian Religion" (Philadelphia, 1809); "Lectures on Moral and Political Philosophy" (2 vols., Trenton, N. J., 1812); and "Comprehensive View of Natural and Revealed Religion" (New Brunswick, N. J., 1815). After his death appeared six of his sermons with a brief memoir (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1821).—Another son of Robert, John Blair, clergyman, b. in Pequea, Pa., 12 June, 1756; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Aug., 1799, was graduated at Princeton in 1773, studied theology under his brother, Samuel S., at Hampden-Sydney, Va., and in 1779 succeeded him as president of that college. He soon became celebrated for his pulpit oratory. Dr. Addison Alexander says of him: "In person he was about the middle size, his hair was uncommonly black, divided at the top and fell on each side of his face. His large blue eye, of open expression, was so piercing that it was common to say, 'Dr. Smith looked you through.' He was elected to the 3d Presbyterian church of Philadelphia in 1791, and thence to the presidency of Union college upon its foundation in 1795, but in 1799 returned to his former charge in Philadelphia, where he died of the epidemic that was then raging. He published "The Enlargement of Christ's Kingdom," a sermon (Albany, N.Y., 1797).—John Blair's grandson, Charles Ferguson, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 April, 1807; d. in Savannah, Tenn., 25 April, 1862, was the son of Dr. Samuel Blair Smith, assistant surgeon, U.S. army. His maternal grandfather, Ebenezer Ferguson, of Pennsylvania, was a colonel in the Continental army. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1825, became 2d lieutenant in the 24 artillery, and was promoted 1st lieutenant, 30 May, 1832, and captain, 7 July, 1838, in the same regiment. He served at the military academy from 1829 till 1842, as assistant instructor of infantry tactics in 1829-31, adjutant in 1841, and as commandant of cadets and instructor of infantry tactics till 1 Sept., 1842. He was with the army of Gen. Zachary Taylor in the military occupation of Texas in 1845-6, and was placed in command of four companies of artillery, acting as infantry, which throughout the war that followed was famous as "Smith's light battalion." When in March, 1846, Gen. Taylor crossed the Rio Grande near the passage of which it was believed, would be disputed by the Mexicans, this battalion formed the advance. He was present at the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and for "gallant and distinguished conduct" in these two affairs he received the brevet of major. At the battle of Monterey, Maj. Smith was in command of the storming party on the Federal hill, which, in the words of Gen. Worth, was "most gallantly carried." For his conduct in the several conflicts at Monterey he received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel. He was present at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, San Antonio, and Churubusco, and in these operations he commanded and directed his light battalion with characteristic gallantry and ability. For his conduct in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco he received the brevet of colonel, 20 Aug., 1847. He was present at the storming of Chapultepec and the assault and capture of the city of Mexico, and was again honorably mentioned in despatches. In 1849-51 he was a member of a board of officers to devise a complete system of instruction for siege, garrison, sea-coast, and mountain artillery, which was adopted, 10 May, 1851, for the service of the United States. He was promoted major of the 1st artillery, 25 Nov., 1854, and in 1855, on the organization of the new 10th regiment of infantry, he was made its first lieutenant-colonel. He commanded the Red river expedition in 1856, engaged in the Utah expedition in 1857-61, and for a time was in command of the Department of Utah. At the beginning of the disturbances that preceded the civil war he was placed in charge of the city and department of Washington, D. C. On 1 Aug., 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and ordered to Kentucky. The next month he became colonel of the 34th U. S. infantry, and was placed in command of the National forces then at Paducah. He acquired reputation as an able tactician and skillful commander in the operations about Fort Henry and Fort Donelson. In the severe fight for the possession of Fort Donelson he commanded the division that held the left of the National investing lines, and, leading it in person, he stormed and captured all the high ground on the Confederate right that commanded the fort. He was then ordered to conduct the new movement up Tennessee river, arrived at Savannah, about 13 March, with a large fleet, took command of the Georgia coast, and became the commander-in-chief of the Savannah. On 22 March, 1862, he was promoted major-general of volunteers, but the exposure to which he had been already subjected aggravated a chronic disease, which ended his life soon after his arrival in Savannah. Gen. William T. Sherman says of him in his "Memoirs": "He was adjutant of the military academy during the early part of my career there, and afterward commandant of cadets. He was a very handsome and soldierly man, of great experience, and at the battle of Donelson he acted with so much personal bravery that to him many attributed the success of the assault."

SMITH, Robert, P. E., bishop, b. in the county of Norfolk, England, 25 June, 1792; d. in Charleston, South Carolina, 20 March, 1858. He entered Cambridge, Mass., and was elected a fellow of the university. He was ordained deacon, 7 March, 1816, by the bishop of Eliz., and priest, 21 Dec., 1816, by the same bishop. He came to this country in 1820, was assistant minister of St. Philip's church, Charleston, for two years, and became rector in 1822. Though he afterwards went to Philadelphia, he continued to be an ardent patriot, and at one time joined the ranks of the Continental army as a private. On the capture of Charleston by the British in 1780, Mr. Smith was banished to Philadelphia. For a brief period he had charge of St. Paul's parish, Queen Anne county, Md., but he returned to Charleston in 1783 and opened an academy, which was conducted by him until 1809, as Superintendent. Of this institution he was president until 1786. He received the degree of D.D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1789. He was unanimously elected in 1705 to be the first bishop of the Protestant Episcopal church in South Carolina, and was consecrated in Christ church, Philadelphia, 14 Sept., 1785. Bishop Smith, though an excellent scholar and very acceptable preacher, made no contributions in print to church literature or otherwise. He was one of the earliest members of the Society of the Cincinnati.

SMITH, Roswell, publisher, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 30 March, 1829; d. in New York city, 19 April, 1892. He was educated at Brown, in 1854, married Miss Ellsworth, granddaughter of Chief-Justice Oliver Ellsworth, and for nearly twenty years practised in Lafayette, Ind. Mr. Smith came in 1870 to New York city, where, in connection with Dr. Josiah G. Holland and Charles Scribner, he established "Scribner's Monthly" (now the "Century Magazine"). In 1873 he began the publication of "A. N. G." as a magazine of literature. The first organization was under the firm-name of Scribner and Co., which subsequently became the Century company, with Mr. Smith as president. Under his direction these magazines enjoyed an extensive circulation on both sides of the Atlantic. The Century company engaged in the publication of miscellaneous books, and the "Century Dictionary," edited by Prof. William C. Whitney, was completed before his death, in six quarto volumes of about 6,000 pages.

SMITH, Russell, artist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 26 April, 1812; d. in Glenclay, Pa., 7 Nov., 1890. His name was William T. Russell, but for many years has used only the latter. In 1819 he came to the United States with his parents, and later he studied painting with James R. Lambdin. He began to devote himself to scene-painting, and went in 1834 to Philadelphia, where he worked at the Walnut and the old Chestnut street theatres for six years. After his marriage he abandoned scene-painting, meeting with great success as a scenic designer, and became a extremely popular draughtsman, being employed in that capacity by Sir Charles Lyell and others, and also in the geological surveys of Pennsylvania and Virginia. In 1850 he went abroad, and after his return to Philadelphia he painted many landscapes until 1856. At that time the Academy of music was building, and Smith was employed to paint its scenery. The handsome landscape curtain that he produced brought him many commissions for similar work. One of his latest productions of this kind was the curtain for the Grand opera-house, Philadelphia. Among Mr. Smith's numerous landscapes are "Chocora Peak" and "Cave at Chelton Hills," which was at the Philadelphia exhibition of 1876. The Academy of Music was a corporation for the benefit of the society and the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts, where he had contributed regularly to the exhibitions for the past fifty years. His wife, Mary P., and his daughter, Mary, were artists of some ability. His son, Nathaniel, b. in Philadelphia, 26 Feb., 1839, is known as a marine and landscape painter. He served during the civil war under General Grant, and after the war he painted many of the naval engagements of the war.

SMITH, Samuel, historian, b. in Burlington, N. J., in 1721; d. there in 1776. He was educated at home, early took part in local politics, was a member of the council and the assembly, and in 1708 was commissioned, with his brother John and Charles Read, to take charge of the correspondence with the governor of Franklin in England, and affix his name to official documents. He was subsequently treasurer of West Jersey. Mr. Smith's valuable manuscripts were used by Robert Proud in his "History of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1793), and he published a "History of New Jersey from its Settlement to 1721" (1758). His brother, John, provincial councillor, b. in Burlington, N. J., 20 March, 1722; d. there, 26 March, 1771, engaged in the West Indian trade in Philadelphia, and was so successful in business that he occupied one of the finest houses in the city, and entertained the most eminent persons of the time. He was a Quaker in religion, but did much to ameliorate the severities of the sect by founding one of the first social clubs that was formed for young men of that denomination. He organized the Philadelphia Contributionship, which was one of the first fire insurance companies in this country, and was a founder of the Philadelphia hospital. He served in the Pennsylvania assembly in 1759-60, was active in the Friends' councils, and occupied many offices, including that of President Penn, daughter of Chief-Justice James Logan. He returned to Burlington, N. J., about this time, was a subscriber in 1757 to the New Jersey association for helping the Indians, the next year was chosen a member of the governor's council, and, with his brother Samuel and Charles Read, was a keeper of the seals in 1768. In 1761 he was a commissioner to try pirates. Many anecdotes are told of him. On one occasion, his health being impaired, he was disturbed in his morning toilet by a bellman going about the streets singing that Gov. William Franklin's park and a hundred deer were to be sold that day. Mr. Smith put his head out of the window and said to the bellman: "Put up your bell and go home; I will buy the property at the owner's price." He then closed the window and resumed his interrupted sleep.—Another brother, Richard, moved to Baltimore, and was the first importer of plants, seeds, and books. On 17 March, 1733; d. near Natchez, Miss., in 1803, was carefully educated, and devoted much time to literary pursuits. Part of his correspondence with Dr. Tobias Smollett at the beginning of the Revolution was published in the "Atlantic Monthly." He was chosen to the Continental congress in 1774, and served till 1776, when he resigned on account of the failure of his health, and to take further part against Great Britain. He died while on a journey through the southern states.

—John's grandson, John Jay, librarian, b. in Burlington county, N. J., 16 June, 1798; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Sept., 1868, was educated at home, and from 1829 till 1851 was librarian of the Philadelphia and Logansburg Library. "Eden's Universal Bulletin" in 1830-2, the "Daily Express" in 1832, "Littell's Museum" for one year, Walsh's "National Gazette," and Andrew J. Downings's "Horticulturist" in 1855-60. He superintended more than 100 volumes that do not bear his name, edited Walter Scott's "Life of Napoleon" (1827); "Celebrated Trails" (1853); "Animal Magnetism: Report of Dr. Franklin with Additions" (1837); "Guide to Workers in Metals and Stones," with Thomas U. Walter (1849); "Designs for Monuments and Mural Tablets" (New York, 1846); "Letters of Dr. Richard Hill" (1854); and "North American Sylva" (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1855); and was the author of "Notes for a History of the Library Company of Philadelphia" (1851); "A Summer's Jaunt Across the Water" (1842); and, with John F. Watson, "Historical and Literary Curiosities" (1846).—John Jay's son, Lloyd Pearsall, librarian, b. in Philadelphia, 6 Feb., 1822; d. in Germantown, Pa., 2 July, 1886, was graduated at Haverford college. Pa., in 1836, became hereditary assistant and treasurer in the Philadelphia and Loganian library, and in 1851 succeeded his father as librarian. He edited "Scott's Magazine" in 1862-70, compiled vol. iii. of the catalogue of books belonging to the Library company of Philadelphia, including the index to the first three volumes, and, besides numerous magazine articles and pamphlets, was the author of "Report to the Contributors of the Pennsylvania Relief Association for East Tennessee of a Commission of the Executive Committee sent by them for the purpose of collecting documents and information," "Remarks on the Existing Materials for forming a Just Estimate of Napoleon I." (New York, 1863); "Remarks on the Apology for Imperial Usurpation contained in Napoleon's "Life of Caesar"" (1863); "Address delivered at Haverford College before the Alumni" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Symbols and Science" (1885); and was the bibliographer of the library company of Philadelphia's grandson, Samuel Joseph, poet, b. in Moorestown, N. J., in 1771; d. near Burlington, N. J., 14 Nov., 1853, was liberally educated, and, having inherited large wealth, lived on his estate, dividing his time between his farm, literature, and public benefactions. Two of his lyrics are in "Lyra Sacra Americana," and his "Miscellanies" with a memoir, were published (Philadelphia, 1893).
Lee's queries, "political and military," which reflected on Gen. Washington, and for which the editor "repented." By the collapse of Francis Col. Smith declined the challenge. In 1783 he was appointed one of the port-wardens of Baltimore, and from 1790 to 1792 was a member of the house of delegates. In consequence of the threatened war with France and England in 1793, he was appointed brigadier-general of the militia of Baltimore, with the rank of major-general, and commanded the Maryland volunteers suppressing the whiskey insurrection in Pennsylvania. In 1793 he was elected a representative in Congress, holding the place until 1803, and again from 1816 till 1822. He was a member of the U. S. Senate from 1803 to 1815, and from 1822 to 1833. Under President Jefferson he served without compensation a short time in 1801, as secretary of the navy, though declining the appointment.

He was a brigadier-general of militia, and served as major-general of the state troops in the defence of Baltimore in the war of 1812. He was one of the originators of the Bank of Maryland in 1790, and one of the incorporators of the Library company of Baltimore in 1797, and of the Reisterstown Library Company. He was a projector of the Washington monument, and the Battey monument at Baltimore. In August, 1835, when he was in his eighty-third year, a committee of his fellow-citizens having called on him to put down a mob that had possession of the city, he at once consented to make the attempt, was successful, and elected mayor of the city, serving until 1836. His son, Joseph Spear, b. at Baltimore, Md., about 1790; d. there, 17 Nov. 1860, acted as volunteer aide-de-camp to his father in the defence of Baltimore in 1812-14. While a young man he prepared, under government auspices, some volumes of valuable research on the commercial relations of the United States. He was appointed secretary of the U. S. Legation at London, and in 1811 was left in charge as charge d'affaires by William Pinckney. He was a member of the Internal improvement convention of Maryland in 1823, and upon the formation of the Maryland historical society in 1844 was made its first president, which post he held until his death. He was at one time judge of the orphans' court, and in 1833 was a presidential elector. Robert, statesman, brother of Gen. Samuel, was born in Baltimore, 26 Nov., 1812, graduated at Princeton in 1831, and was present at the battle of Brandywine as a volunteer. He then studied law and practised in Baltimore. In 1789 he was one of the presidential electors, and he was the last survivor of that electoral college. In 1793 he was state senator, from 1796 till 1800, served as a member of the house of delegates, and from 1798 till 1801 sat in the first branch of the city council of Baltimore. He was secretary of the navy from 26 Jan., 1802, to 1805, U. S. attorney-general from March till December, 1803, and secretary of state from 6 March, 1809, to 25 Nov., 1811. On 23 Jan., 1806, he was appointed chancellor of Maryland, and chief judge of the district of Baltimore; but he declined. He resigned the office of secretary of state, 1 April, 1811, and was offered the embassy to Russia, which he declined. He was president of an auxiliary of the American Bible society in 1813, president of the Maryland agricultural society in 1818, and in 1813 succeeded Archbishop John Carroll as provost of the University of Maryland. He was the author of "Pardons in the United States."—His son, Samuel William b. in Baltimore, 14 Aug., 1806; d. there, 16 Dec., 1887, served in the city council of Baltimore, was president of the Baltimore club and the Maryland club, a director in the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and a trustee of the Peabody institute and of Washington university.

SMITH, Samuel Emerson, jurist, b. in Hollis, N. H., 12 March, 1786; d. in Wiscasset, Me., 4 March, 1860. His father, Manasseh, was a chaplain in the Revolution, and subsequently a lawyer in Wiscasset. Samuel was graduated at Harvard in 1808, and from the Union bar, settled in Wiscasset in 1812, and was in the legislature in 1819-20. He was chief justice of the court of common pleas of Maine in 1821, a justice of the state court of common pleas in 1822-30; governor in 1831-4; again a judge of common pleas in 1835-7; and a commissioner to revise the statutes of Maine in the latter year.

SMITH, Samuel Francis, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 21 Oct., 1808; d. there, 16 Nov., 1863. He attended the Boston Latin-school, and was graduated at Harvard and Andover theological seminary. He was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist church at Waterville, Me., in 1834, occupied pastorate at Waterville in 1834-42, and at Newton, Mass., 1842-54, and was professor of modern languages at Waterville college (now Colby university) while residing in that city. He was editor of "The Christian Review" in Boston in 1842-8, and editor of the various publications of the Baptist missionary union in 1854-60. In 1857-6 and 1889-2 he visited the chief missionary stations in Europe and Asia. He received the degree of D. D. from Wesleyan college in 1854. Dr. Smith had done a large amount of literary work, mainly in the line of hynology, his most noted composition being the national hymn, "My Country. 'Tis of Thee," which was written while he was a theological student and first sung at a children's celebration in the Park street church, Boston, 4 July, 1862. The missionary hymn, "The Morning Light is Breaking," was written at the same place and time. He translated from the German most of the pieces in the "Juvenile Lyre" (Boston, 1852), and from the "Conversations-Lexicon" nearly enough articles to fill an entire volume of the "Encyclopaedia Americana" (1829-32). His collections of original hymns and poetry and poetical translations have been published in "The Psalmist" (Boston, 1850); "The Psalmist, a noted Baptist hymn-book" (1843); and "Rock of Ages" (1866; new ed., 1877). He had also published a "Life of Rev. Joseph Garnett" (1848); "Missionary Sketches" (1850; 2d ed., 1853); "History of Newton, Mass." (1850); "Romances in Mission-Fields" (1884); and contributions to numerous periodicals. His classmate, Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his reunion poem entitled "The Boys," thus refers to him:

"And there's a nice youngster of excellent pith:

Pate tried to conceal him by naming him Smith!

But he chantedit a song for the brave and the free—"

Just read on his medal: 'My country, of thee—'

SMITH, Sarah Louisa Hickman, poet, b. in Detroit, Mich., 30 June, 1811; d. in New York city, 12 Feb., 1882. She wrote verses at an early age, was liberally educated at her home in Newton, Mass., and in 1829 married Samuel Jenks, Smith, of Providence, R. I. They removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, in the same year, where she was a contributor to the "Gazette." Her poems evince a grand fancy and poetic feeling, and her stanzas on "White Roses" are included in many collections. She published "Poems" (Providence, R. L. 1899).
SMITH, Sydney Irving, biologist, b. in Norway, Me., 18 Feb., 1843. He was graduated at the Sheffield scientific school of the University of Chicago, and from that time till 1876, when he was chosen professor of comparative anatomy. He had charge of the deep-water dredging that was carried on in Lake Superior by the U. S. lake survey in 1871, and by the U. S. coast survey in the region of St. George's banks in 1872. Prof. Smith has also been associated in the geological work of the U. S. geological survey on the New England coast since 1871. He is a member of various scientific societies, and in 1884 was elected to the National academy of sciences. His papers have been published in the "Reports of the U. S. Fish Commission," "Reports of Progress of the Geological Survey of Canada," and other government reports, and he has also contributed papers or analyses of scientific societies of which he is a member, and to technical journals.

SMITH, Solomon Franklin, actor, b. in Norwich, Chamcoo co., N. Y., 20 April, 1801; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 20 April, 1869. After spending three years as a clerk in Albany, N. Y., he was appointed to a printing establishment in Louisville, Ky. He joined Alexander Drake's dramatic company in 1828, withdrew at the end of the season, studied law in Cincinnati, Ohio, and in 1822 became the editor of the "Independent Press," a Jacksonian-Democratic organ, and at the same time a manager of the Globe theatre. The latter enterprise proved unsuccessful; but he traveled with his company the next year and gained wide reputation as a low comedian, his principal roles being Mawworm in "The Hypocrite," Sheepface in "The Village Lawyer," and Billy Lackaday in "Sweethearts and Wives." He abandoned theatrical management and the stage in 1853, settled as a lawyer in St. Louis, and was a member of the Missouri state convention in 1861. He was an unconditional Union man, and bore an active part in forming a provincial government for the state. He published "Theological Apprenticeship" (Philadelphia, Pa., 1845); "Theatrical Journey Work" (1854); and an "Autobiography" (New York, 1868).—His son, Marcus, actor, b. in New Orleans, La., 7 Jan., 1829; d. in Paris, France, 11 Aug., 1874, made his debut in New Orleans in 1849 as Diggory in "Family Jars." He then connected himself with Wallack's theatre, New York city, where he became with special favor, subsequently playing successful star engagements in the principal cities in this country. He visited England in 1869, where he was favorably received. When Edwin Booth opened his theatre in New York city in February, 1868, Smith became his manager and was a member of his company for several years. His last public appearance was in London, where he was considerable success. He appeared in St. James's theatre.

SMITH, Stephen, physician, b. in Onondaga county, N. Y., 19 Feb., 1823. He was educated in the public schools and at Cortland academy, Homer, N. Y., and, after attending lectures at Geneva and Buffalo, N. Y., medical college, was graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1850. He became a resident physician at Bellevue hospital, and afterward settled in New York city. He became an attending surgeon to Bellevue in 1854, was professor of surgery there in 1863, and unsuccessfully contested Victoria for the house of assembly. In 1866 he was appointed inspector of registry offices for Upper Canada, which post he still holds.
SMITH, Theodore Washington, jurist, b. in New York city, 28 Sept., 1874; d. in Chicago, Ill., 6 May, 1846. After serving in the U. S. navy, he was admitted to the bar in his native city, 11 Dec., 1805, having been a law-student in the office of Aaron Burr, and a fellow-student with Washington Irving. He was appointed judge of the vacancy in the court of common pleas in the county of New York, by Gov. Morgan Lewis. In 1816 he visited the west in the interest of his father-in-law, who had a large estate in Ohio, and proceeding as far as Edwardsville, Ill., settled there. In 1823 he was elected state senator, introduced and supported the original bill for the construction of the Illinois and Michigan canal, and was appointed one of the commissioners. In 1825 he was elected judge of the supreme court of the state. In 1838 he removed to Chicago, and in April, 1841, he was assigned the judgeship in the 7th circuit of the state in addition to his duties as judge of the supreme court. Failing health compelled him to resign his office, 20 Dec., 1842.

SMITH, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 March, 1814; d. in Portland, Me., 25 May, 1875. He was the son of Thomas Smith, a well-known merchant of Boston, and was graduated at Harvard in 1839. After leaving college he at once entered upon theological studies, and began to preach on 19 April, 1842. In June, 1825, he came for the first time to Falmouth (now Portland), and the exertions of his soul inMary, and preached for several months to the great satisfaction of the people, who extended to him a call to become their pastor, 26 April, 1826. This he did not accept until 23 Jan., 1827, and he was publicly ordained on 8 March of the same year. "His salary was $700 money the first year besides his board." He continued pastor of the 1st church in Portland more than sixty-eight years, and officiated in part of the services till within two years of his death. He kept an historical and personal diary from 1729 till 1878, a greater length of time probably than that during which any similar record has been kept within the limits of the state. It was edited by Rev. Samuel Freeman (Portland, 1821), and a new edition, with notes and a memoir by William Willis, former president of the Maine historical society, was issued in 1849.

SMITH, Thomas Church Haskell, soldier, b. in Acushnet, Mass., 22 March, 1819; d. in Northfield, Cal., 8 April, 1857. He was graduated at Harvard, was admitted to the bar, engaged in the establishment of a newspaper in the west and south, and was president of the New Orleans and Ohio telegraph company. At the beginning of the civil war he became lieutenant-colonel of the 1st Ohio cavalry, served under Gen. John Pope in Virginia, and became brigadier-general of volunteers in September, 1862. He was placed in command of the district of Wisconsin in 1863 to quell the draft riots, became inspector-general of the Department of the Missouri in 1864, and while commanding that district dealt with the disturbances that arose from the return of 1,800 Confederate soldiers to their homes after the surrender. He carried out Gen. Pope's policy of withdrawing government troops from Missouri, and restored the state with years, but removed from civil control. He was mustered out of the volunteer service in 1866, and in 1878 entered the regular army as major and paymaster. In 1883 he was retired, and removed to California.

SMITH, Thomas Kirby, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Sept., 1820; d. in New York city, 14 Dec., 1867. His father, George, was a captain in the East India Company's service, born in Ohio about 1798, and settled on a farm in Hamilton county. Thomas was graduated at Cincinnati college in 1837, read law with Salmon P. Chase, was admitted to the bar in 1845, and practised till 1858, when he became bureau and special agent in the post-office department in Washington, D. C. He was admitted to the bar in Ohio in 1855-6, and subsequently deputy clerk of Hamilton county, Ohio. He became lieutenant-colonel in the 54th Ohio infantry in September, 1861, was promoted its colonel in October, and commanded the regiment at Pittsburg Landing, the advance on Corinth, and the Vicksburg campaign. He was assigned to the 2d brigade, 2d division of the 15th army corps, in January, 1863, was on a court of inquiry, and on staff duty with Gen. Ulysses S. Grant from May till September, 1864, and was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers in August of that year. He commanded brigades in the 15th army corps, led a division of artillery, cavalry, and infantry in the Red river expedition. His special duty being to protect the gun-boats from the main body of the army of Sabin's cross roads, endeavoring to reach Shreveport, fell back. Gen. Smith was left with 2,500 men to protect the fleet in its withdrawal down the river. He accomplished the task in the face of opposing armies on both banks of the stream. Subsequently he commanded the 5d division department of the Army of the Tennessee, and then had charge of the district of southern Alabama and Florida and the district and port of Mobile. He was compelled to resign field duty in July, 1864, on account of the failure of his health, was brevetted major-general of volunteers, 5 March, 1865, and in 1866 became U. S. consul at Panama.
He removed to Torrdesa, Pa., in 1806, and resided there until his death. In the spring of 1837 he became a lawyer in the city, and judge of the "Star," New York city. He was an active member of the Loyal Legion. See "Life and Letters," edited by his son Walter G. Smith (New York, 1898).

SMITH, Thomas Lochlan

artist, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 2 Dec., 1853; d. in New York, 5 Nov., 1894. He came to the United States at an early age, and was for a time the pupil of George H. Boughton, at New York, N. Y., where he opened a studio in 1859. Three years later he removed to New York, and in 1869 was elected an associate of the National academy. He devoted himself chiefly to painting winter scenes. His "Deserted House" and "Eve of St. Agnes" were at the Centennial exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876.

SMITH, William

jurist, b. in Newport-Flagonet, Buckinghamshire, England, 8 Oct., 1817; d. in New York city, 22 Nov., 1769. His father, Thomas, a tallow-chandler, came to this country on account of his religious opinions in 1715, accompanied by his three sons. William was brought up as a Calvinist and a republican, was graduated at Yale in 1739, served as tutor there for five years, and in 1741 returned to New York city and was appointed to the regiment as a volunteer officer. His eloquence and address soon brought him into notice, but in 1733 he was disbarred on account of his participation as counsel in a lawsuit against Gov. William Cosby, where the principle that was involved was the right of the provincial council to provide a salary for one of their number as acting governor during the interval between the death of one royal appointee and the appointment of another. He was restored in 1736, and his son, William Smith, the historian, recites as an instance of his eloquence that by his consummate art in telling the story of the crucifixion he succeeded in inducing the New York assembly to reject all the votes of the Jewish members, and so to establish the disputed election of his client. He also practised extensively in Connecticut, and in 1743-4 was counsel for that colony in their case against the Mohican Indians. He was appointed attorney-general and advocate-general by Gov. George Clinton in 1751, succeeding Richard Bradley, and served one year, but was not confirmed by the royal authorities. He became a member of the governor's council in 1753, and held that office until 1767, when he was succeeded by his son, William. In that capacity he attended the congress of the colonies that was held in Albany, N. Y., in June, 1754, and was the member from New York of the committee to draft the plan of union, which he earnestly favored. In the same month he was a commissioner to fix the boundary lines between New York and Massachusetts. He declined the office of attorney-general in New York in 1760, became the associate justice of the supreme court in 1763, and held office until his death. The "New York Gazette" of the next week described him as "a gentleman of great erudition, the most eloquent speaker in the province, and a zealous and indefatigable friend to the cause of religion and liberty."--His son, William, historian, b. in New York city, 3 Dec., 1782; d. in Quebec, Canada, 3 Nov., 1873, was graduated at Yale in 1754, studied law, was admitted to the bar of New York city, and soon acquired an extensive practice. He was an eloquent speaker, and many of his law opinions were collected and recorded by George Chalmers in his "Opinions on Interesting Subjects arising from American Independence." (1784). He became chief justice of the province of New York in 1763, succeeded his father as a member of the council in 1767, and held office nominally till 1782. During the Revolution he seems to have been at a loss as to what course he should pursue. Gov. Tryon wrote to Lord Germaine, 24. Sept., 1776, that "Smith has withdrawn to his plantation up the North river, and has not been heard from for five months."

It is probable he really joined the Whigs, although the same story went on in his apostasy, and called him the weather-cock. The royalists welcomed him with honors, although his motives were strongly suspected. He went to England in 1783 with the British troops, became chief justice of Canada in 1786, and held office until his death. He was an upright and just judge, and, among the minor changes that he instituted in the courts, established the office of constable whose duties before his administration had devolved upon the soldiers. He was intimate with many eminent English statesmen. He published, with William Livingston, "Revised Laws of New York, 1790-1752" (New York, 1782), and "History of the Province of New York from its Discovery in 1732," of which Chancellor James Kent says: "It is as dry as ordinary annals," and which John Neal calls "a dull, heavy, and circumstantial affair." (London, 1793; re-published, with additions by William Smith, the third, 1814.)--The second William's son, William, historian, b. in New York, 7 Feb., 1769; d. in Quebec, Canada, 17 Dec., 1847, accompanied his father to England in 1783, and returned with him to Canada in 1786, meanwhile attending a grammar-school near his father's residence. He became successively clerk of the provincial parliament, master of chancery, and in 1814 secretary of state for the colonies and a member of the executive council. He published a "History of Canada from its Discovery" (2 vols., Quebec, 1815.)--Another son of the first William, Joshua Hett, lawyer, b. in New York city in 1763; d. there in 1818, was educated for the law, but preferred literature and success. During the Revolution he was a Tory in politics, and in Benedict Arnold's treason in 1780 figured as his tool or accomplice. When André went up the Hudson river to meet Arnold, the two conspirators passed the night of 22 Sept., at Smith's house. When the plot was complete André was ready to return, but, for some reason that Smith never explained, the latter accused him of treason, and boarded the "Vellum," but accompanied him by land to a place of supposed safety, exchanging coats before they parted, for the better protection of André. Smith was subsequently tried by a military court for his connection with the affair, and was acquitted, but taken into custody by the civil authorities and committed to jail. After several months' imprisonment he escaped in woman's dress and made his way to New York, where he was protected by the loyal population. He went to England at the close of the war, but subsequently returned to the United States. He published "An Authentic Narrative of the Causes that led to the Death of Major Andre," of which Jared Sparks says: "The volume is worthy of the least credit except when the statements are corroborated by other authorities" (London, 1808; New York, 1809).

SMITH, William, clergyman, b. near Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1747; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 May, 1808. He entered the college in his native city, and was graduated in 1771. After spending several years in teaching he embarked for this country, and in 1754 was invited to take charge of the seminary in Philadelphia, which subsequently became the University of Pennsylvania. He went to England in 1758, received orders in the Church of England, and on his return the next year entered upon educational work. He revisited England in 1759, received the degree of D. D. from the University of Oxford, and was honored subsequently with the same degree from the Aberdeen college, and from Trinity college, Dublin. In addition to his work as an instructor, Dr. Smith engaged actively in missionary duty as one of the Propagation society's workers in Pennsylvania from 1766 till the opening of the Revolution. He favored the American view of the differences with England, and delivered a sermon in June, 1755, by request of the officers of Col. Craigwinder's regiment, which produced a sensation both here and in the mother country. Subsequently he lost popularity in this respect, and was looked on as giving doubtful support to patriotic measures, the charge of disloyalty being partially owing to his marriage to Rebecca, daughter of Gov. William Moore. The charter of the College of Philadelphia was taken away by the legislature of Pennsylvania in 1779, whereupon Dr. Smith removed to Chestertown, Md., and became rector of Chester parish. He established a classical seminary, which was chartered as a college by the general assembly of Maryland in June, 1782. It was named Washington college, and Dr. Smith became its president. In May, 1784, a convention of the clergy of Maryland was held for the organization of the American Protestant Episcopal church in that state, and Dr. Smith was chosen president. At a convention in June of the same year he was elected bishop of Maryland, but, as the election was not approved by many, and the general convention of 1786 refused to recommend him for consecration, he was not elevated to the episcopate. He was several times clerical delegate for the general convention, and was uniformly chosen president of that body. He was appointed in 1785 on the committee to propose alterations in the liturgy, which resulted in what is known in ecclesiastical literature as the "Proposed Book." In the preparation of this he had the chief part, and the book was published in 1786; but the alterations were never sanctioned by any action of the church. In 1789 the charter was restored by the legislature to the college in Philadelphia, and Dr. Smith, on being invited to return, resumed his office as provost. He spent the last 7 years of his life at his residence at Falls of Schuylkill, near Philadelphia, and engaged largely in secular pursuits, especially land speculations. He was much given to scientific research, was a man of more than ordinary ability and broad culture, and was regarded as an eloquent and effective preacher. Besides separate sermons and various addresses and orations, he published a collection of "Discourses," London, 1759; a series of eight essays, entitled "The Hermit," in the "American Magazine," at Philadelphia (1757-8); an account of "An Expedition against the Western Indians" (1759); new ed., with preface by Francis Parkman, Cincinnati, 1885; and an edition of the poems of Nathaniel Evans, with a memoir (1759). Shortly before his death he made a collection of his printed sermons, addresses, etc., for publication. Bishop White furnished a preface, and added other sermons from manuscripts of Dr. Smith's, which were published in two vols. (Philadelphia, 1806). See "Life and Correspondence of Rev. William Smith," by his great-grandson, Weyss Smith (2 vols., 1799). Dr. Smith's vignette is from the portrait painted in 1800 by Gilbert Stuart. His daughter, Mrs. Bledget, was also painted by the same artist.—His son, William Moore, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 June, 1759; d. at Falls of Schuylkill, Pa., 12 March, 1821, was graduated at the College of Philadelphia in 1779, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He was appointed an agent for the settlement of claims that were provided for in the 6th article of John Jay's treaty, and visited England in 1803 to close his commission, after which he returned to Pennsylvania and devoted the remainder of his life to scholarly pursuits. His publications include several poems and a memoir of his father.

He was appointed an agent for the settlement of claims that were provided for in the 6th article of John Jay's treaty, and visited England in 1803 to close his commission, after which he returned to Pennsylvania and devoted the remainder of his life to scholarly pursuits. His publications include several poems and a memoir of his father.*
was clerk of the territorial council in 1846. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of that year, took an active part in its proceedings, and was chairman of the committee on militia. Mr. Smith was chief clerk of the state senate in 1849-50, and attorney-general in 1856-8. For many years he was president of Malvern Wesleyan theological society. He published "Observations on Wisconsin Territory" (Philadelphia, 1828); "Discourse before the State Historical Society" (Madison, Wis., 1856); and "History of Wisconsin," compiled by direction of the legislature (1st and 2d vols., 1854; 3d and 4th vols., 1866).—Another son of William Moore, Richard Penn, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 March, 1799; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 May, 1854; was noted for a fondness for literary pursuits at an early age, and contributed to the "Union" a series of essays entitled "The Plagiary." He studied law under William Rawle, the elder, was admitted to the bar in 1821, succeeded William Duane as editor and proprietor of the "Aurora" in 1822, and published it for five years, during which it was one of the chief journals engaged in political practice in 1827, but subsequently devoted much time to literary pursuits, and was the author of several poems and many plays, fifteen of which were produced on the Philadelphia stage, and in London, England, in most instances with decided success. Of these the best known are the tragedy of "Cainus Martinus," written for Edwin Forrest, and the farces and comedies "Quite Correct," "The Disowned," "The Deformed," "A Wife at a Venture," "The Sentinels," "William Penn," "The Water-Witch," "Is She a Brigand?" "My Uncle's Wedding," "The Daughter," "The Actress of Padua," and a five-act drama entitled the "Vénusiens." He possessed brilliant social qualities and a trenchant wit. Besides his plays he wrote "The Forsaken," a novel (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1831); "Life of David Crockett" (1836); "Life of Martin Van Buren" (1836); and many tales. A selection of his miscellanies, with his memoir by Morton McMichael, was collected and published by his son, Horace Wemyss Smith (1836), and his "Complete Works," enriched in his Life and Correspondence, was also published by his family, 1888. His son, Horace Wemyss, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Aug., 1835; d. there, 9 Dec., 1891, was educated in his native city, and studied dentistry, but never practised, being early inclined to literary pursuits. He entered the National army in 1861, but soon returned to journalism, in which he had previously engaged, and has since devoted himself to literature. He collected the "Miscellanies" of his father that are referred to above, and is the author of "Nuts for Future Historians to Crack" (Philadelphia, 1856); "Yorktown Orderly-Book" (1856); "Life of Rev. William Smith" (2 vols., 1890); and "History of the German-town Academy" (1838).—Another son of Richard Penn, Richard Penn, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Mar., 1851; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Mar., 1857; was educated at West Chester college, Pa. Immediately after leaving college he settled in Kansas, and successfully engaged in business there, but returned to Philadelphia in 1860, became lieutenant in the 71st Pennsylvania volunteers, and rose to the rank of colonel. He was engaged in the battles of Yorktown, Fair Oaks, White Oak Swamp, and Malvern Hill, and earned the retreat at second Bull Run, was wounded at Antietam, and at Gettysburg did good service by bringing guns into use against Gen. George E. Pickett's charge. He was mustered out of service in 1864, and engaged in business in New York city. On 2 July, 1887, he delivered an address at Gettysburg on the unveiling of the monument erected in honor of Lieut. Alonzo H. Cushing and the 4th U.S. artillery by the 71st Pennsylvania volunteers.—Another son of William, Charles, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 March, 1835; there, 18 March, 1856, was graduated at Washington college, Md., in 1873, studied law with his brother, William Moore Smith, and was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1876. He practised in Sunbury, Pa., for several years, was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1875, settled in Lancaster, Pa., and attained eminence as a land lawyer. In 1888 he became judge of the newly formed district of Lancaster county, and in 1889 of the newly formed district court of Lancaster city and county. His later life was spent in Philadelphia. He was a member of the American philosophical society, and in 1819 received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He was appointed by the legislature in 1890 to revise the laws of the state, and to frame a compilation of them, which he published with a "Treatise on the Land Laws of Pennsylvania" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1890-91).—William's half-brother, Thomas, member of the Continental congress, b. near Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1745; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 13 June, 1809. He emigrated to this country at an early age, and became pastor by force of his qualities in the district of Pennsylvania, and, establishing himself in Bedford county, became prothonotary clerk, clerk of the sessions, and recorder. He early joined the patriot cause, was a colonel of militia during the Revolution, and a member of the State constitutional convention in 1776, served several terms in the legislature, and was in congress in 1789-90. He became judge of the courts of the counties of Cumberland, Huntingdon, Bedford, and Franklin, in 1791, and from 1794 until his death was a judge of the supreme court of Pennsylvania. He was a devoted adherent of the Federal party.—Thomas's son, George Washington, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 Aug., 1800; d. there, 22 April, 1876, was graduated at Princeton in 1821, studied law under Henry Black, and was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia in 1823, but did not practise, and spent several years in Europe and Asia exploring the antiquities of those countries. He was a founder of the Pennsylvania historical society, for many years one of its councilors, and at his death senior vice-president. Mr. Smith possessed a large estate, of which he gave liberally to benevolent objects. He was a member of the vestry of Christ church, Philadelphia, for more than thirty years, and annually deposited $3,000 in its oﬀerery for the beneﬁt of the Episcopal hospital. He was a member of the American philosophical society in 1840-76. He published "Facts and Arguments in Favor of adopting Railroads in Preference to Canals" (Philadelphia, 1824); "Defense of the Pennsylvania System in Favor of Solitary Conﬁnement of Prisoners" (1829); and several pamphlets on similar subjects, and edited Nicholas Wood's treatise on "Railroads" (1832).—William's nephew, William, clergyman, b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1754; d. in New York city, 6 April, 1821, was educated at one of the Scotch universities (probably Aberdeen). He studied for the ministry, and was admitted to orders in the Church of England about 1790. He came to the United States in 1795, was minister of St. Paul's parish, Md., for two years, then became rector of St. Paul's church, Narragansett, R. I., for a year and a half, after which he accepted the rectorship of Trinity church, Newport, in 1780. This post he held for seven years. He aided in organizing the Episcopal church in Rhode Island, and delivered the sermon at its first convention in November, 1790. He next was rector of St. Paul’s church, Norwalk, Conn., in 1797-1800, then removed to New York city, opened a grammar-school, and acquired high reputation as a teacher. In 1802 he accepted the principship of the Episcopal academy, Cheshire, Conn., and gave instruction to candidates for orders in connection with his other duties. In 1806 he returned to New York city, where he resumed teaching the classics, mostly to private scholars. He performed clerical duty to some extent, but was never again settled in any one place as a clergyman. He was a man of superior mark in scholarship and excellent scholarship and culture, possessing a ready command of language, but he lacked good judgment and skill in managing youth and guiding affairs. His ability was clearly displayed in the preparation of the “Office of Induction of Ministers into Parishes.” He was requested by the convention in Connecticut to prepare such an office, which was presented to the Presbytery, and set forth with slight changes by the general convention of 1804. It was issued again, with some alterations, in 1808; the title was changed to “An Office of Induction of Ministers into Parishes or Churches,” and its use was made permissible. Dr. Smith was the author of “The Reasonableness of Setting forth the Praises of God, according to the Psalms of David” (New York, 1814); “Essays on the Christian Ministry” (a controversial work in defence of episcopacy); “Chants for Public Worship”; and several occasional sermons and articles in magazines.

SMITH, William, member of the Continental congress, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1730; d. there, 27 March, 1814. He was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1777–8, served in the 1st congress in 1780–91, having been chosen as a Federalist, was appointed by Gen. Washington auditor of the treasury in July of the latter year, served three months, and was a presidential elector in 1792, casting his vote for George Washington.

SMITH, William, statesman, b. in North Carolina in 1762; d. in Huntsville, Ala., 10 June, 1849. Nothing is known of his ancestry. He emigrated to South Carolina when he was very young and poor, but obtained means to procure an education, and in 1780 graduated at Mount Zion college, Winnsborough, S. C. He was admitted to the bar of Charleston, S. C., in 1784, served in the legislature for several years and in the state senate in 1806–8, at the latter date, while president of the senate, becoming circuit judge. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1796, served one term, returned to the bench, and occupied it till 1816, when he was elected to the U. S. senate to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of John Taylor, served in 1819–23. He was a Unionist candidate for re-election in 1822, but was defeated by Robert Y. Hayne. He was then chosen to the state house of representatives, and in 1825 led the party that reversed John C. Calhoun’s previous policy in South Carolina. In December, 1826, he was returned to the U. S. senate to fill the unexpired term of John Gaillard. He was defeated in the next canvass, but during his senatorial service was twice president pro tem. and declined the appointment of judge of the supreme court of the United States. In 1829 he received the seven electoral votes of Georgia for the vice-presidency. In 1831 he signed the appeal to the Union party of South Carolina, served a third term in the state senate, but, differing in politics from John C. Calhoun, removed to Alabama, that he might not reside where the latter’s policy prevailed. He served several sessions in the legislature of that state, and declined in 1836 the appointment of justice of the U. S. supreme court, which was offered him by President Jackson.

SMITH, William, governor of Virginia, b. in King George county, Va., 6 Sept., 1706; d. in Warrenton, Va., 18 May, 1887. He was educated at classical schools in Virginia and Connecticut, began to practise law in Culpeper county, Va., in 1783, and engaged in politics. After serving the Democratic party in a dozen canvasses as a political speaker, he was elected to congress in 1790 and served five years, and in 1804 was elected to congress, but was defeated in the next canvass, his district having become strongly Whig. He then removed to Fauquier county, where in December, 1813, he was one day addressed as Governor Smith. He then heard for the first time that, without conning the acts of Congress, he had fought in Congress as a Whig. He was then chosen to the Senate of the Virginian infantry, and he was chosen soon afterward to the Confederate congress, but he resigned in 1862 for active duty in the field. He was a devoted soldier, was never a politician, and he was a marvellously adroit politician, and few members of the Democratic party were furnished with so large a number of ingenious plans. As a soldier he was noted, on the contrary, for valor rather than tactical skill. Throughout his long career he was a familiar figure in many legislative bodies, and his eccentricities of habit and his humor endeared him to his constituents. In early manhood he established a line of post-coaches through Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, on which he contracted to carry the U. S. mail. His sobriquet of “Extra Billy,” which clung to him throughout his life, grew out of his demands for extra compensation for that service. His cousin, William Waugh, educator, b. in Warrenton, Fauquier co., Va., 12 March, 1845, was educated at the University of Virginia and at Randolph Macon college, entered the Confederate service at seventeen years of age, fought through the war in the ranks, twice refusing commissions, and was wounded at the battles of Fair Oaks and Gettysburg. He was principal of Bethel academy in 1871–8, when he became professor of languages in Randolph Macon, held office till 1886, and since that time has been president of that college. He has published “Outlines of Psychology” (New York, 1889), and “Chart of Comparative Syntax of Latin, Greek, French, German, and English” (1889).
SMITH, William, naval officer, b. in Washington, Ky., 9 Jan., 1803; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 1 May, 1873. He entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman in 1823, was attached to the “Sea-gull,” and served in Com. David Porter’s squadron against the West Indian pirates. He became lieutenant in 1831, co-operated in the “Vandalia” with the army in several expeditions against the Seminole Indians, and during the Mexican war assisted at the capture of Tuspan and Tobasco. He became commander in 1854, was in charge of the “Levant,” of the East Indian squadron, and participated in the capture of the barrier forts at Canton, China, in 1856. During the civil war he was in the frigate “Congress” when she was sunk by the “Merrimac,” became commodore, 16 July, 1862, commanded the “Wachuset,” and gun-boats co-operating with Gen. George B. McClellan’s army in that year, and was subsequently in command of the Pensacola naval station till 9 Jan., 1865, when he was retired.

SMITH, William Andrew, clergyman, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., 29 Nov., 1802; d. in Richmond, Va., 1 March, 1878. He was admitted to the Methodist Episcopal church in 1825, became agent of Randolph Macon college in 1833, and was subsequently pastor of Methodist churches in Petersburg, Richmond, Norfolk, and Lynchburg, Va. He was a member of every Methodist general conference from 1832 till 1844, of the Louisville, Ky., convention, at which the Methodist Episcopal church, south, was organized in the latter year, and of every general conference of that body till his death. In 1846-51 he was president of Randolph Macon college, and during his occupation of that office he also filled the chair of moral science there, and lectured in Virginia and North Carolina. He was transferred to the St. Louis conference in 1860, and was appointed by the general conference one of the commissioners on the part of the southern church to settle the property question with the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1869 he became president of Central university, Mo. He edited the “Christian Advocate” at Richmond, Va., for several years; and published “Lectures on the Philosophy of Slavery,” a defence of that institution as it existed in the southern states (Richmond, Va., 1860), and “The American Boundary,” in The Literary Gazette, Scotland, 18 June, 1854; d. in Milwaukee, 13 Feb., 1883. He came to this country, and spent his youth in New York and Michigan, and finally settled at Fox Lake, Wis., where he engaged in business. He was elected a member of the Legislature in 1851 and re-elected in 1857, when he was made speaker of the house. Besides holding many other offices, he was elected governor of Wisconsin, in 1877 and 1879, on the latter occasion receiving the largest majority that was ever given to a governor in that state. He was earnestly engaged in all philanthropic and Christian enterprises, especially those connected with the Baptist denomination.

SMITH, William Ernest, assistant secretary of the treasury, b. in Residion, Ill., 8 June, 1822; d. in Pittsburg, N. Y., 30 March, 1888. He was graduated at Lafayette in 1872 with the degree of mining engineer, admitted to the bar of Pittsburg, N. Y., in 1875, and was its mayor in 1877-8. He was in the legislature in 1884, and became a leader of the supporters of Samuel J. Tilden. During his service he inserted in the supply bill what is known as the “Freedom of worship clause,” by which an appropriation of $1,500 is paid to Roman Catholic priests for their services to prisoners in the three parishes where the New York state prisons are situated. He was chairman of the New York state central Democratic committee in 1884, and in 1885 was appointed by President Cleveland assistant secretary of the treasury, which post he held till 1886, when he resigned to become general solicitor to the St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Manitoba railroad. His death was the result of overwork in that office.

SMITH, William Farrar, soldier, b. in St. Albans, Vt., 17 Feb., 1824. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1845, appointed to the corps of topographical engineers, and, after a year’s service on lake survey duty, was assistant professor of mathematics at West Point in 1846-8. He was then engaged in surveys in Texas for the Mexican boundary commission, and in Florida till 1855, when he returned to his former duty at the military academy. In 1855 he became 1st lieutenant of topographical engineers. He was placed on light-house construction service in 1856, became captain of topographical engineers, 1 July, 1859, and was engineer secretary of the light-house board from that year till April, 1861. After serving on mustering duty in New York for one month, he was on the staff of Gen. Benjamin F. Butler in June and July, 1861, at Fort Monroe, Va., became colonel of the 3d Vermont volunteers in the latter month, and was engaged in the defences of Washington, D. C. He became brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 Aug., participated in the Virginia peninsula campaign, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, for gallant and meritorious service at the battle of White Oak Swamp, 30 June, 1862. He became major-general of volunteers 4 July, 1862, and led his division at South Mountain and Antietam, receiving the brevet of colonel, U. S. army, 17 Sept., 1862, for the latter battle. He was assigned to the command of the 6th corps, and engaged at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., in December, was transferred to the 9th corps in February, 1863, and became major in the corps of engineers 3 March. The next day his appointment of major-general of volunteers, not having been confirmed by the senate, expired by constitutional limitation, and he resumed his rank of brigadier-general in the volunteer service. He was in command of a division of the Department of the Susquehanna in June and July, 1863, became chief engineer of the Department of the Cumberland in October, and of the military division of the Mississippi in November, 1863. He was engaged in operations about Chattanooga, Tenn., participating in the battle of Missionary Ridge. He rendered important services in carrying out the Brown’s ferry movement, which made it possible not only to maintain the Army of the Cumberland at Chattanooga, but to bring Sherman and Hooker to its assistance. In his report to the joint committee of congress on the conduct of the war, Gen. George H. Thomas said: “To Brig.-Gen. W. F.
SMITH, William Henry, journalist, b. in Austria, X. Y., 1 Dec., 1833; d. in Lake Forest, Ill., 27 July, 1896. In 1856 his parents emigrated to Ohio, where he received an English education. He was editor in a western college, and then assistant editor of a weekly paper in Cincinnati, of which, at the age of twenty-two, he became editor, doing also editorial work on the "Literary Review." At the opening of the civil war he was on the editorial staff of the Cincinnati "Gazette," and during the war he took an active part in raising troops and forwarding supplies and in political work for strengthening the government. He was largely instrumental in bringing Gen. John Brough to the front as the candidate of the United Republicans and War Democrats; and at Brough's election, in 1863, he became the latter's private secretary. The next year he was elected secretary of state of Ohio, and he was re-elected in 1866. He retired from public life in 1868, and a "drawing-room" journal was launched at Cincinnati, but, his health giving way, he was forced to withdraw from all active work. In 1870 he took charge of the affairs of the Western associated press, with headquarters at Chicago. In 1877 he was appointed by President Hayes collector of the port at that city, and was instrumental in bringing about important reforms in customs methods in harmony with the civil-service policy of the administration. In January, 1883, he effected the union of the New York associated press with the Western associated press, and became general manager of the consolidated association. Mr. Smith was a student of historical subjects. He was author of "The St. Clair Papers" (3 vols., Cincinnati, 1892), a biography of Clarke H. Cockrell, and many contributions to American periodicals. He was also the author of a "Political History of the United States." By his investigations in the British museum he brought to light many unpublished letters of Washington to Col. Henry Bouquet, and had shown that those that were published by Jared Sparks were not given correctly.

SMITH, William Loughlin, diplomat, b. in Charleston, S. C., in 1788; d. there in 1832. He was educated in England, and in Geneva, Switzerland, studied law in the Middle Temple, and returned to Charleston in 1832, after an absence of thirteen years. He was twice chosen to the legislature, and was one of the governor's council. In 1788 he was elected to the first congress, and his was the first contested election case before that body, his opponent being Dr. David Ramsay, the historian. Mr. Smith was sustained with only one negative vote. He was an able and frequent debater, advocating, among other measures, a commercial treaty with England instead of France. When Jay's treaty was before the senate, he was burnt in effigy in Charleston, in the outburst of public feeling against it. He became charge d'affaires to Portugal in 1796. In 1800 he was transferred to the Spanish mission, which he held till 1801. He supported the administrations of Washington and Adams, but was a vehement opponent of Jefferson, against whose pretensions to the presidency he published pamphlets. His campaigns included "Speeches in the House of Representatives of the United States" (London, 1794); "Address to his Constituents" (1794); "Fourth-of-July Oration" (1796); "Comparative View of the Constitution of the States" (Philadelphia, 1796); and several essays, published under the signature of "An American for British Rights." (London, 1806).

SMITH, William Nathan Harrell, jurist, b. in Murfreesborough, N. C., 24 Sept., 1812; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 14 Nov., 1889. He was graduated at Yale in 1834, studied at the law department there, was admitted to practice in his native state in 1840, and took high rank at the bar. He served in the legislature in 1841, and in the state senate in 1848, in which year he was chosen solicitor for the 1st judicial circuit, and held office for two terms of eight years. He was defeated as a Whig candidate for congress in 1856, returned to the legislature, was chosen to congress in 1858, and served one term. He declared himself for secession at the beginning of the civil war, was a member of the Confederate congress in 1863-5, and of the North Carolina legislature in the latter year. During the administration of President Johnson he aided in the reconstruction of the state according to the policy that he suggested. He practised his profession in Norfolk, Va., in 1870-2, returned to North Carolina in the latter year, and settled in Raleigh. He was appointed by President Grant a judge of the circuit court, succeeding Richmond W. Pearson in 1878, and continued to serve by re-election after that date.

SMITH, William Russell, congressman, b. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., 8 Aug., 1813; d. 26 Feb., 1886. He was educated at the University of Alabama, but was not graduated, and began the practice of law in Greensborough, Ala. He served in the Creek war in 1836 as a captain of volunteer infantry, removed to Tuscaloosa in 1838, founded the "Monitor" in that city, and was mayor in 1839. He was a circuit judge and major-general of state militia in 1850-1, and in the former year was chosen to congress as a Whig, serving by re-election till 1857. During his last term in that office he delivered a notable speech and denounced the policy of Louis Kossuth. He was a member of the Alabama convention in 1861, opposed secession, but after the opening of hostilities sat in the Confederate congress till 1865. He was president of the University of Alabama for several years after the war, but resigned to devote himself to his profession and to literary pursuits. He had published "The Alabama Duster" (New York, 1844). "The Uses of Saltwater," a poem (Albany, N. Y., 1809); "As it Is," a novel (Tuscaloosa, 1860); "Condensed Alabama Reports" (1862); and several poems and legal pamphlets.

SMITH, William Sooy, civil engineer, b. in Tarlington, Ohio, 22 July, 1850. He was graduated... at Ohio university in 1849, and at the U. S. military academy in 1853. He resigned in 1854 and became assistant to Lieut.-Col. James D. Graham, of the U. S. topographical engineers, then in charge of the government improvements in the great lakes. In 1855 he settled in Buffalo, N. Y., and was principal of a high-school, in that city, and he conducted the first surveys for the international bridge across Niagara river, and was employed by the city of Buffalo as an expert to examine the bridge plans that were submitted. He was then elected engineer and secretary of the Trenton locomotive-works, N. J., which was at that time the chief iron-bridge manufacturing concern in the country; and he continued so until 1861. While serving in this capacity he was sent to Cuba by the company, and he also constructed an iron bridge across Savannah river, where he introduced improvements in sinking cylinders pneumatically. The beginning of the civil war stopped this work, and he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of Ohio volunteers and assigned to duty as assistant adjutant-general at Camp Denison. On 26 June, 1861, he was commissioned colonel of the 13th Ohio regiment and participated in the West Virginia campaigns, after which he joined the Army of the Ohio, and was present at Shiloh and Perryville. He was promoted brigadier-general of volunteers on 15 April, 1862, and commanded successively the 3d and 24th divisions of the Army of the Cumberland. In 1864, returning to his profession, he built the Wabash bridge at the western entrance of the Straits of Mackinaw, where in 1867 he sunk the first pneumatic caisson. He aided in opening the harbor of Green Bay, Wis., and has been largely engaged in building bridges. He built the first great all-steel bridge in the world, across Missouri river at Giddings, Ohio, of wrought-iron construction of the Omaha and the Leavenworth bridges, as well as many others, including that over Missouri river at Plattsburgh, N. Y. Gen. Smith has served on numerous engineering commissions, both for the government and for private corporations. He is a member of the American society of civil engineers, and was president of the Civil engineers' club of the northwest in 1880. His writings have been confined to reports and professional papers.

SMITH, William Stephens, soldier, b. in New York city in 1755; d. in Lebanon, N. Y., 10 June, 1816. He was graduated at Princeton in 1774, studied law, but entered the Revolutionary army as aide to Gen. John Sullivan, was lieutenant-colonel of the 13th Massachusetts regiment from November 1778 till March, 1779, and received several wounds while holding this command. He subsequently served for a short time on Gen. Lafayette's staff, and was aide-de-camp to Gen. Washington from 1781 till the close of the war. He married the only daughter of John Adams, and in 1783 accompanied him on his mission to England as secretary. He was appointed by Gen. Washington marshal of the district of New York in 1789, and afterward surveyor of the port of New York, for three years was a member of the assembly, and sat in congress in 1813-15. He became secretary of the New York state society of the Cincinnati in 1790, and its president in 1795.

SMITH, Worthington, educator, b. in Hadley, Mass., in 1757; d. in St. Albans, Vt., 13 Feb., 1856. He was graduated at Williams in 1816, studied at Andover theological seminary, and was licensed to preach in 1819. He was pastor of a Congregational church in St. Albans, Vt., from 1829 till 1849, and from 1849 until his death president of the University of Vermont, which gave him the degree of D. D., in 1845. He published "Sermon on Popular Instruction" (St. Albans, Vt., 1846), and "Inaugural Discourse" (1849). His "Select Sermons" were edited, with a memoir, by the Rev. Joseph Torrey (Andover, 1863).

SMITH, Zachariah Frederick, author, b. in Henry county, Ky., 7 Jan., 1827. He was partially educated at Bacon college, Ky., engaged in farming, and during the civil war was president of Henry college, Newcastle, Ky. He served four years as superintendent of public instruction for Kentucky, was the originator and for four years president of the Cumberland and Ohio railroad company, became interested in the construction of railroads in Texas, and was four years manager for a department of the publishing-house of D. Appleton and Co., of New York. He was a founder, and for twelve years president, of the Kentucky Christian education society. He has published a "History of Kentucky" (Louisville, Ky., 1886).

SMITH IRISARRI, Antonio, South American artist. In Santiago, Chile, in 1822; d. there, 24 May, 1877. He was educated in the National institute, and in 1849 entered the academy of painting in the University of Chili. He served as a conscript in 1853-7, but returned afterward to his art, and in 1858 was employed as a caricaturist on the "Correo Literario." In 1859 he went to Europe and studied in Florence under Charles Jacque. On his return to Chili in 1866 he opened a studio, devoted himself to landscape-painting, and soon acquired fame as an artist, obtaining the grand premium in the national exposition of 1872. His principal pictures are "The Valley of Santiago," "A Moonlight Night," "A Waterfall," "Wood Scenery in the Mountains," "A Sunset in the Andes," "Surrounding of a Mountain Lake," and "The Tarragona," among the most celebrated are "The Fisherman," "Rome," "Habana," "The Jockey," "The Courtesan," "The Hemming," "The Cattle," "The Pigeon," and "Napoleon." His artistic name was "Smith Irisari," and he had the distinction of being the first American artist to obtain a premium at the Paris exposition, in 1859.

SMITHSON, James, philanthropist, b. in France about 1765; d. in Genoa, Italy, 27 June, 1829. He was a natural son of Sir Hugh Smithson, the first Duke of Northumberland, and Mrs. Elizabeth Mache, heiress of the Hungerford's, of Stately, and niece to Charles, Duke of Somerset. For some time he bore the name James Lewis (or Louis) Macie, but after 1791 he changed it to James Smithson. He was graduated at Oxford in 1786, and had the reputation of being an excellent all-round scholar. As resident member of the university in the knowledge of chemistry. In 1787, as "a gentleman well versed in various branches of natural philosophy and particularly in chemistry and mineralogy," he was recommended for election to the Royal society, of which body in later years he was a vice-president. His first paper, presented to the society in 1791, was "An Account of some Chemical Experiments on Tantalum," and was followed from that time until 1817 with eight other memoirs treating for the most part of chemical analyses of various substances, principally minerals. He lived chiefly abroad, engaged in extensive tours in various parts of Europe, making minute observations wherever he went on the climate, physical features, and geological structure of the locality visited, the characteristics of its minerals, the methods employed in mining or smelting ores, and in all kinds of manufactures. Desirous of bringing to the practical test of actual experiment everything that came to his notice, he fitted up and carried with him a portable laboratory. He collected also a cabinet of minerals, composed of thousands of minute specimens, including all the rarest gems, so that immediate comparison could be made of a novel or undetermined specimen with an accurately arranged and labelled collection. Among the minerals that he examined was a carbonate of zinc that he discovered among some ores from Somerschester and Derbyshire, England, that was named Smithsonite in his honor by the great French mineralogist Beudant. From 1810 till his death his scientific memoirs were contributed to Thomson's "Annals of Philosophy." Besides his connection with the Royal society, he was long a member of the French institute. He died in Genoa, where he had been residing temporarily, and a monument was erected to his memory in the Protestant cemetery. His illegitimate birth seems to have induced a strong desire for posthumous fame, although his scientific reputation was of the best, and at one time he writes: "The best blood of England flows in my veins; on my father's side I am a Northumberland, on my mother's I am related to kings: but it avails me not. My name shall live in the memory of man when the titles of congress, but in August, 1846, the Smithsonian Institution was founded, and an act of congress was passed directing the formation of a library, a museum (for which it granted the collections belonging to the United States), and a gallery of art, while it left to the regents the power of adopting such other parts of an organization as they may deem best suited to promote the objects of the bequest. Joseph Henry was chosen its executive officer, and under his wise management the institution has developed until it has grown to be one of the most important institutions of its kind in the world. A portion of the institution, of which the corner-stone was laid 1 May, 1847, is seen in the accompanying illustration. On 24 Jan., 1863, a part of it was destroyed by fire. See "The Scientific Writings of James Smithson" (Washington, 1879); "The Smithsonian Institution: Documents relative to its Origin and History," by William J. Rhea (1879); and "Smithson and his Bequest," by William J. Rhea (1889).

SMOCK, John Conover, geologist, b. in Holmdel, N. J., 21 Sept., 1842. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1862, and was tutor in chemistry at that institution in 1865-'7. In 1867 he became professor-elect of mining and metallurgy, and he held the chair of that subject at the State University till 1875, when he went to Germany, where he studied at the Berg-Akademie and at the University of Berlin in 1869-'70, and he was assistant on the geological survey of New Jersey in 1864-'85, except during 1869-'70. Prof. Smock was appointed assistant-in-charge of the New York state museum in 1885, which place he held five years. The degree of D. Sc. was conferred on him by Lafayette in 1882. He was a manager of the American institute of mining engineers in 1875-'7. Prof. Smock is the author of numerous papers that have been contributed to the transactions of societies of which he is a member, and was associated with Prof. George H. Cook in the preparation of the annual reports of the geological survey of New Jersey for the years 1871-'84, and also in the separate volumes on the "Geology of New Jersey" (Newark, 1868) and the "Report on Clay Deposits" (1878). He has recently issued, from the New York state museum of natural history, Bulletin No. 3, "On Building-Stones in New York" (Albany, 1888).

SMIBERT, or SMIBERT, John, artist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, about 1684; d. in Boston, Mass., in 1761. He had worked for some time with a portrait painter in Edinburgh, and subsequently studied in Sir James Thornhill's academy in London. Then followed a three years' sojourn in Italy, where he was commissioned by the grand-duke of Tuscany to paint the portraits of some Siberian Tartars. After his return to London, Bishop Berkeley engaged him as professor of the fine arts in his projected college in Bermuda, and he accompanied Berkeley to this country, arriving at Newport in 1729. The Bermuda project proving a failure, Smybert went to Boston, where he established himself as a portrait-painter, and married in 1730, Gulian C. Verplanck said of him: "Smybert was not an artist of the first rank, for the arts were then at a very low ebb in England, but the best portraits which we have of the eminent magistrates and divines of New England and New York who lived between 1729 and 1751 are from his pencil." His most important work is the painting of Bishop Berkeley and his family, executed in 1731, and presented to Yale college in 1885. Other portraits from his hand, including those of Jonathan Edwards, Judge Edmund Quincy, Gov. John Endecott, and Peter Faneuil, are in the possession of the Boston museum of fine arts, the Massachu... sette historical society, the New England historic-genealogical society, and Bowdoin college, and in various private collections. The Berkeley group is said to have been sketched at sea during the voyage from England, although the child in the arms of its mother must have been added later, as it was born in America. This was the first painting of more than a single figure that was brought to the United States. In his "Anecdotes of Painting" (Strawberry Hill, 1762-71), Smibert says: "a silent and modest man, who abhorred the fumes of some of his profession, and was enchanted with a plan that he thought promised him tranquility and an honest subsistence in a healthful elysian climate." Walpole and George-Vertue spelled the names of Irish physiocrats are said to have had much influence on Copely, Trumbull, and Allston. The last has spoken of the instruction he gained from a copy after Vandyke, by Smibert.—His son, Nathaniel, b. in Boston, 20 Jan., 1734; d. there, 8 Nov., 1756, showed great talent for portraiture. Judge Cranch, of Quincy, Mass., wrote of him: "Had his life been spared, he would probably have become the greatest portrait painter in the country ever since been—the honor of America in imitative art." His portrait of John Lovell is owned by Harvard.

SMYTH, Alexander, lawyer, b. on the island of Rathlin, Ireland, in 1765; d. in Washington, D. C., 26 April, 1830. He came to this country in 1775, settled in Botetourt county, Va., and, after receiving an academic education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1785, and began to practise in Abington, but removed to Wythe county in 1786. For many years he was a member of the Virginia house of representatives, and he was appointed by President Jefferson, on 8 July, 1808, colonel of a U. S. rifle regiment, which he commanded in the southwest until 1814, when he was ordered to Washington to prepare a system of discipline for the army. On 6 July, 1812, he was appointed inspector-general, and ordered to the Canadian frontier, where he failed in an invasion of Canada, was removed from the army, and resumed his profession. He was made a member of the Virginia board of public works, served in the house of representatives, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 Sept., 1821. He was elected a coadjutor bishop of the Diocese of Tennessee on 16 April, 1830. Gen. Smyth was the author of "Regulations for the Infantry" (Philadelphia, 1814) and "An Explanation of the Apocalypse, or Revelation of St. John" (Washington, 1825).

SMYTH, Andrew Woods, physician, b. near Londonderry, Ireland, 15 Feb., 1863. He settled in New Orleans in 1848, was graduated at the medical department of the University of Louisiana in 1858, and was house-surgeon of the Charity hospital in New Orleans from 1858 till 1878. Here he performed, on 15 May, 1864, the first and only recorded operation of tying successfully the arteria immonitae for subclavian aneurism. All previous attempts had failed, and his success was attributed to ligating, where secondary hemorrhage had occurred, the small feeding vessel occasioned by the re-gurgitant hemorrhage. Dr. Valentine Mott, who was the first to perform this operation in New York, in 1818, and who never doubted its ultimate success, said that Dr. Smyth's operation had afforded him more consolation than all others of a similar nature. He also made the first successful reduction of calcification of the foetal part presented re-gurgitant hemorrhage. companion Maj. Thomas Lewis to the Kanawha, participating in the action against the Indians in which Maj. Lewis was killed. On his return he found Maryland agitated by the beginning of the Revolution. He supported the British government so earnestly that his house was surrounded by armed troops, which threatened his capture. Escaping twice, he fled to Virginia, hiding in the Dismal Swamp, passed the guards at Suffolk, and enlisted in the Queen's royal regiment in Norfolk. The officers were seized by a company of riflemen at Hagerstown and taken to Frederick, Md. Smyth escaped and travelled across the Alleghenies, but was recaptured and imprisoned in Philadelphia, and after several months of suffering and danger, escaped with difficulty a British ship off Cape May, N. J., and visited New York and New England. Subsequently he published "A Tour in the United States of America" (2 vols., London and Dublin, 1814; in French, Paris, 1791). John Randolph of Roanoke said: "This book, although replete with falsehood and calumny, contains the truest picture of the state of society and manners in Virginia (such as it was half a century ago) extant."

SMYTH, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Belfast, Ireland, 14 July, 1804; d. in Charleston, S. C., 29 Aug., 1873. He was educated in Belfast and London, and in 1830 came with his parents to New York. He entered Princeton theological seminary in the same year, was ordained in 1831, and from 1832 till his death he pastored the Presbyterian church of Charleston, S. C. Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. in 1843. He collected a valuable theological library of about 12,000 volumes, and was the author of a large number of books, among which are "Lectures on the Prelatic Doctrine of Apostolic Succession" (Boston, 1857); "Ecclesiastical History of the Presbyterian Church" (1843); "Prelatism and the Presbyterian and Primitive Polity" (1843; Glasgow, 1844); "History, etc., of the Westminster Assembly" (New York, 1844); "Calvin and his Enemies" (Philadelphia, 1844); "Prelatic Rite of Confirmation Examined" (New York, 1845); "The Name, Nature, and Functions of Ruling Elders and the Church Clerk" (Edinburgh, 1846); "The Unity of the Human Races proved to be the Doctrine of Scripture, Reason, and Science" (New York, 1850; Edinburgh, 1851); "Nature and Claims of Young Men's Christian Associations" (Philadelphia, 1857); "Faith the Principle of Missions" (1857); "Why Do I Live?" (1857); "Well in the Valley" (1857); and "Obedience, the Life of Missions" (1860).

SMYTH, Thomas Alfred, soldier, b. in Ireland; d. in Petersburg, Va., 9 April, 1865. In his youth he emigrated to this country, settling in Wilming- ton, Del., where he engaged in coach-making. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a company in Wilmington and joined a three months' regiment in Philadelphia, serving in the Shenandoah Valley. On his return he was made major of a Delaware regiment, rose to the ranks of lieutenant-colonel and colonel, and commanded a brigade, winning a high reputation for bravery and skill. For gallant conduct at Cold Harbor, Va., he was appointed brigadier-general, U. S. volunteers, on 1 Oct., 1864. He was mortally wounded by a sharp-shot while near Gettysburg, Va., 6 April, 1865.

SMYTH, William, educator, b. in Pittston, Kennebec co., Me., in 1797; d. in Brunswick, Me., 3 April, 1868. He received a common-school education, afterward taught a school at Wiscasset, and at the same time prepared himself for college. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1822, studied theol-ogy at Andover, and in 1825 was made adjunct professor of mathematics at Bowdoin, being appointed in 1828 to the full chair, which he held until his death. In 1845 he became adjunct professor of natural philosophy. He was the author of numerous valuable text-books, which had an extensive sale. These include "Elements of Algebra" (Brunswick, Me., 1833); "Elementary Algebra for Schools" (1850); "Treatise on Algebra" (1852); "Trigonometry, Surveying, and Navigation" (1855); "Elements of Analytical Geometry" (1855); "Elements of the Differential and Integral Calculus" (1856; 2d ed., 1859); and "Lectures on Modern History," edited by Jared Sparks (Boston, 1849). He was a brigadier-general in Brunswick, Me., 21 Aug., 1829, was commissioned a brigadier at Bowdoin in 1848 and at Bangor theological seminary in 1853. He was professor of rhetoric at Bowdoin in 1854-6, and of natural and revealed religion from 1856 till 1863, since which time he has been professor of ecclesiastical history at Andover theological seminary. Since 1878 he has been also president of the faculty. Bowdoin gave him the degree of D. D. in 1866, and Harvard the same in 1866. He has edited the "Andover Review" since its foundation in 1884, and, in addition to pamphlet sermons and a lecture on the "Value of the Study of Church History in Ministerial Education" (1874), has published, with Prof. William L. Ropes, a translation of Gerhard Uihlhorn's "Conflict of Christianity with State and Society" (New York, 1885). Another son, Samuel Phillips Newman, clergyman, b. in Brunswick, Me., 25 June, 1843, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1863, and began to study theology at Bangor. He then taught in the naval academy at Newport, R. I., entered the military service as 1st lieutenant of a Maine regiment, became acting quartermaster, and commanded his company in the advance on the New Orleans, La., and in Va. At the close of the war he resumed his theological studies, and after graduation at Andover in 1867 was pastor of a mission chapel in Providence, R. I. He was pastor of the 1st Congregational church in Bangor, Me., in 1870-5, and of the 1st Presbyterian church in Quincy, Ill., in 1875-9. He has been pastor of the 1st Congregational church in New Haven, Conn. The University of the city of New York gave him the degree of D. D. in 1881, and elected him professor of intellectual and moral philosophy, which chair he declined. He is the author of "The Religions Feeling: a Study for Faith" (New York, 1875); "Old Faiths in New Light" (1879); "The Orthodox Theology of To-Day" (1881); and a volume of sermons entitled "The Reality of Faith" (1884).

SMYTH, Sir James Carmichael, bart., British soldier, b. in London, 22 Feb., 1779; d. in Georgetown, Demerara, 4 March, 1838. His father, James Carmichael Smyth, was physician extraordinary to George III. The son entered the British army, served in Canada in 1825-26, and became a major-general in 1839. He was made a baronet in 1824, and was governor of British Guiana from June, 1833, till his death. He prepared for the private use of the Duke of Wellington a "A Précis of the Wars in Canada from 1755 till the Treaty of Ghent in 1814" (London, 1826; 3d ed., 1829). SNEAD, Thomas Lowndes, soldier, b. in Hor- rico county, Va., 13 May, 1822; d. in New York city, 17 Oct., 1890. He was graduated at Richmond and at the University of Virginia, was admitted to the bar, and removed to St. Louis, where he was editor and proprietor of the "Bulletin" in 1860-7. He was aide-de-camp of Gov. Claiborne F. Jackson, and adjutant-general of the Missouri state guard in 1861, and as such was in the battles of Booneville, Carthage, Wilson's Creek, and Lexington. He was commissioned from Missouri to negotiate a truce in 1862 with the Confederate states. In October, 1861, he became assistant adjutant-general in the Confederate army, served with Price in Arkansas, Missouri, and Mississippi, and was elected to the Confederate congress by Missouri soldiers in May, 1864. He removed to New York in 1865, was managing editor of the "Daily News" in 1865-6, and was admitted to the bar of New York in 1869. He published the first volume of a projected history of the war in the trans-Mississippi department, entitled "The Fight for Missouri" (New York, 1886).

SNEED, John Louis Taylor, jurist, b. in Raleigh, N. C., 12 May, 1820. He was educated at Oxford male academy, N. C., removed to Tennessee, became a member of the legislature in 1855, and was captain of a Tennessee company in the Mexican war in 1846-7. He was attorney-general of the Memphis judicial district in 1851, attorney-general of the state of Tennessee in 1854-9, and in 1861 was commissioned brigadier-general of the provisional army of the state of Tennessee. He was judge of the state supreme court in 1870-8, and of the court of arbitration in 1879, presidential election, and was adjutant-general of the state of the court of referees in 1883-4. In 1888 he was chosen president of the Memphis school of law. He is the author of "Reports of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, 1854-9" (Nashville).

SNELL, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Cumming ton, Mass., 21 Nov., 1774; d. in North Brookfield, Mass., 4 May, 1862. After graduation at Parrish in 1793 he taught in Haverhill for a year, was licensed to preach by the Tolland association on 3 Oct., 1795, and was ordained pastor of the 23 Congregational church, North Brookfield, Mass., on 27 June, 1798, holding this charge until his death. Amherst gave him the degree of D.D. in 1829. Twenty-four of his discourses were published, among which were "Sermons on the Complete of the 40th Year of His Ministry," with a brief history of the town (Brookfield, 1839); "Sermon on the Completion of the 50th Year of his Ordination" (1848); "Discourse, containing an Historical Sketch of North Brookfield" (1850); and "Historical Sketch of the 1st Congregational Church, North Brookfield" (1893).

SNEILING, Josiah, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1822; d. in Washington, D. C., 20 Aug., 1829. He joined a rifle company at the first call for troops for the war with Tecumseh, was appointed lieutenant in the 4th infantry in 1806, became a captain in June, 1809, served with credit at Tippecanoe, 7 Nov., 1811, and was brevetted major for services at Brownstown, 9 Aug., 1812. He became assistant inspector-general on 25 April, 1814, inspector-general on 17 July, 1814, inspector-general with the rank of colonel, 12 April, 1814, lieutenant-colonel of the 6th infantry in 1815, and colonel of the 4th infantry on 1 June, 1819. He participated in the battles of Lundy's Lane, Chippewa, and Fort Erie, and on his march to Detroit was captured by a force of British and Indians that was superior to his own. He escaped with the lives of three or four men, to Fort Shelby, Detroit, where he became betrothed to Abigail, daughter of Col. Thomas Hunt. On the night that had been appointed for his marriage he was sent by Gen. William Hull with an inadequate detachment to check the landing of the British at Spring Well. On leaving the fort, he said to Gen. Hull: "If I die the Rattlesnake back, may I return and be married?" Gen. Hull gave his consent, and the wedding took place on the same evening. At the surrender of Detroit he refused to demobilize with the Confederate states, was taken as a prisoner to Montreal, and while being marched through the streets was ordered by British soldiers to take off his hat to Nelson's monument. This he refused to do in spite of the efforts of the soldiers to remove it, and finally Gen. Isaac Brock ordered them to "respect the serpents of a brave man." He was appointed colonel of the 5th infantry on 1 June, 1819, was ordered to Council Bluffs, Mo., and thence to the confluence of the Missouri and the Minnesota rivers, where the location of the fort was removed to the present site of Fort Snelling, which he completed in 1824, after succeeding to the command. He gave it the name of Fort St. Anthony, which was changed by Gen. Winfield Scott in honor of its builder and commander. Maj. Snelling always carried the sword of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, which had been presented to him. He was a witness against Gen. William Hull at the latter's trial, and wrote "Remarks on Gen. William Hull's Memoirs of the Campaign of the Northwestern Army, 1813" (Detroit, 1825).—His son, William Joseph, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 26 Dec., 1804; d. in Chelsea, Mass., 24 Dec., 1848, was educated at the U. S. military academy, became a fur-trapper in Missouri, and subsequently was employed at the Galena lead-mines. About 1828 he became connected with several journals, and for a few years before his death he was editor of the Boston "Herald." He contributed to periodicals, and published "The Polar Regions of the Western Continent Explored" (Boston, 1831), and "Truth, a New-Year's Gift for Scribblers: a Satirical Poem" (1832). He wrote for WilliamApis, the Pequot Indian preacher; a small book on "African Nullification" (1835).—Another son, Henry Hunt, editor, b. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 8 Nov., 1817, was taken by his father to Council Bluffs, Mo., in infancy, and in early life suffered many hardships. He was educated at a military academy in Georgetown, D. C., and in Detroit, after which he entered business, and for a time was librarian of the New York Public Library. On the next day of his marriage, he removed to the country, and settling in Cornwall, N. Y., in 1871, published and edited until 1887 the "Relector of Cornwall," which he relinquished owing to blindness. He devoted much time to photography, and edited "The Photographic Art Journal" in New York in 1851-53, and from 1854 till 1869 the "Photographer's and Fine Art Journal." He is the author of "History and Practice of Photography" (New York, 1849), and has also published a "Dictionary of the Photographic Art" (1883).

SNETHEN, Nicholas, clergyman, b. in Fresh Pond (now Glen Cove), Long Island, N. Y., 15 Nov., 1769; d. in Princeton, Ind., 30 May, 1845. His youth was spent on the farm of his father, Barak, who had served in the British army at the capture of Montreal in 1760. The son entered the itinerant ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1794, travelled and preached for four years in New England and the south, and actively favored the limitation of the episcopal prerogative. His plan for a delegated general conference was adopted in 1808. He also advocated a preachers' anti-slavery tract society, and was active against the future admission of any slave-holder into the church. Afterward he travelled as private secretary to Bishop Francis Asbury, who called Mr. Snethen his "silver trumpet." In 1804-5 he was stationed in New York, whence he removed to his farm in Frederick county, Md. By his marriage he became the holder of slaves, whom he emancipated as soon as the law would permit. From 1809 till 1814 he was again an itinerant. While he was in Georgetown, D. C., he was elected chaplain to the U. S. house of representatives. He was the first to introduce camp-meetings into New York and Maryland, and was a leader of a large meeting on Wye river, Md., in 1809. In 1821 he began to write in favor of lay representation. The refusal of this right by the general conference in 1828, and the expulsion from the church of many of its advocates, led to the formation of the Methodist Protestant church, in which he bore an active part, and in connection with which he travelled and preached after his removal to Indiana in 1829. The expulsion from Indiana by his church, in 1835, led him to become president of the Snethen school for young clergymen in Iowa City. Mr. Snethen became an editor with the Rev. Asa Shinn of the "Methodist Protestant" in 1834, contributed to periodicals, and published "Lectures on Preaching the Gospel" (1822); "Essays on Lay Representation" (1833); and "Lectures on Biblical Subjects" (1835). In Washington, he edited a volume of his sermons (1846).

SNIDER, Denton Jaques, author, b. in Mt. Gilead, Ohio, 9 Jan., 1841. After graduation at Oberlin in 1862, he engaged in teaching, and is now (1898) a lecturer on general literature. He is the author of "A System of Shakespeare's Dramas" (3 vols., New York, 1867); "The Art of the Book in Dellas" (Boston, 1882); "Agamemnon's Daughter" (1884); "Epigrammatic Voyage" (1886); "Commentary on Goethe's Faust" (1886); and "Commentary on Shakespeare's Tragedies" (1887).

SNODGRASS, William Davis, clergyman, b. in West Hanover, Pa., 30 June, 1796; d. in Goshen, N. Y., 29 May, 1883. He was the son of the Rev. Benjamin Snodgrass, who from 1784 until his death in 1846 was pastor of the Presbyterian church in West Hanover. After graduation at Washington college, Pa., in 1815, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1818, he held Presbyterian pastorates in the south till 1823, when he was called to New York city. From 1834 till 1844 he was pastor of a Presbyterian church in the city, 515 Tenth street church in New York city, serving as its pastor in 1846-9. From 1849 until his death he was pastor in Goshen, N. Y. In 1830 he became a director of Princeton theological seminary, and he was president of its board of trustees in 1838. Columbia gave him the degree of D.D. in 1838. He published which he established the Rev. John M. Mason (New York, 1830); "Perfectionism, Lectures on Apostolic Succession" (1844); and several other discourses.

SNOW, Caleb Hopkins, physician, b. in Boston, Mass., 1 April, 1796; d. there, 6 July, 1835. He was the son of Prince Snow, who for several years was deputy-sheriff of Suffolk county. After graduation at Brown in 1815 he was librarian there in 1814-'18, received his medical degree from that university in 1821, and acquired a large practice in his native city. He was the author of a "History of Boston, with Some Account of its Environ" (Boston, 1855), and a "Geography of Boston and Adjacent Towns" (1830).

SNOW, Marshall Solomon, educator, b. in Hyannis, Mass., 17 Aug., 1842. He was graduated at Harvard in 1865, in 1865-'6 was sub-master of high-schools in Worcester, Mass., in 1866-'7 principal of a high-school in Nashville, Tenn., in 1867-'8 professor of mathematics in the University of Michigan; in 1870-'1 professor of Latin and principal of Montgomery bell academy; in 1871 professor of belles-lettres in Washington university, St. Louis, Mo., and since 1874 has occupied the chair of history in that institution. He was appointed registrar in 1871, dean of the faculty in 1877, and since January, 1887, has been acting chancellor of the university. Besides articles upon historical subjects, he has published an excellent monograph upon the "City Government of St. Louis" in the 5th series of "Johns Hopkins University Studies" (Baltimore, 1887).

SNOW, William Dunham, lawyer, b. in Webster, Worcester co., Mass., 2 Feb., 1832. He settled in Rochester, N. Y., where he published "The Tribune" in 1852-4. Afterward he removed to Salamanca, New York, where he served on the board of education in 1863 that made Arkansas a free state, and was elected U. S. senator in 1864 under the proclamation of President Johnson, but was not admitted to a seat. He was largely instrumental in raising a brigade of Arkansas troops for the U. S. army in 1865, and declined the commission of brigadier-general. Since his graduation at Hampden Normal School, he has resided in New York city and the Federal courts. He has invented a successful carburettor, a gas-regulator, a thermostatic apparatus for the maintenance of equal heat for furnaces and steam apparatus, and a system for face-simile telegraphy. Mr. Snow is the author of several anti-slavery poems, and his diary is in the possession of his daughter. made deputy attorney-general, elected to the legislature, and served as speaker in 1842-4. He was state treasurer from 1845 till 1857, treasurer of the U. S. mint from 1857 till 1860, and its director from 1863 till 1864. To supplement his journalistic and literary labors, he published "Descriptions of Coin in the U. S. Mint" (Philadelphia, 1860); "Description of the Medals of Washington, of National and Miscellaneous Medals, and of other Objects of Interest in the Museum of the Mint, with Biographical Notices of its Directors", from 1792 to 1853; "The Mint at Philadelphia" (1861); "The Coins of the Bible, and its Money Terms" (1864); and "The Comptroller Memorial" (Harrisburg, 1867); and contributed articles on the coin of the United States to the National almanac of 1873, and articles on numismatics to Bouvier's "Law Dictionary" (12th ed., Philadelphia, 1888).

His nephew, Archibald L. Snyder, b. in Cumberland county, Pa., 11 Aug., 1837, after graduation at Jefferson college in 1856, was made register of the U. S. mint on 7 May, 1857, became chief coiner on 1 Oct., 1866, and in 1877-9 was postmaster of Philadelphia. In 1879-85 he was superintendent of the general mint, and in 1878 he declined the office of general director of all the mints in the United States. He has made investigations relating to the machinery, and has written articles on subjects relating to coinage, the great seal of the United States, and other subjects. Mr. Snowden was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of Pennsylvania volunteers in 1861, and was subsequently elected captain of the 1st city troop of Philadelphia, which is the oldest military organization in the United States, formed in the city of Philadelphia during the Revolution, and bore a conspicuous part in the battles of Trenton, Princeton, and the Brandywine. He has been identified with railroads, insurance companies, and other business interests.

Snyder, Christopher, called "the first martyr of the Revolution," b. about 1731; d. in Boston, Mass., 29 Feb., 1770. In the year 1759 the sale of non-importation a few merchants continued to sell articles that had been proscribed, and one, Theophilus Lillie, incurred such displeasure that, in order to mark his shop as one to be shunned, a mob, consisting chiefly of half-grown boys, erected near his door a wooden head on a pole, upon which were written the names of the other importers, and a hand pointing to Lillie's shop was also attached. One of his friends, Ebenezer Richardson, attempted to remove this figure, but was pelted and driven into Lillie's house by the mob. Greatly exasperated, he appeared with a musket and fired a random shot into the crowd, which mortally wounded a young lad, Christopher Snyder, the son of a poor widow. Snyder died on the following evening. The news of his death caused a sensation throughout the country. His funeral, on the 26th, was the occasion of a solemn pageant. A procession of 500 children walked before the bier, and the coffin was taken to Liberty tree, where an assemblage of nearly 1,500 persons had gathered. The bells of the city and of neighboring towns were tolled. The newspapers were filled with the report of the funeral, and Christopher Snyder was called the first martyr in the cause of American liberty. The mob seized Richardson and an associate named Wilmot and took them to Faneuil hall, where they were examined and committed for trial. Richardson was declared guilty of murder, but Lieut.-Gov. Thomas Hutchinson refused to sign his death warrant, and after two years' imprisonment he was pardoned by the king.

Snyder, Thomas, governor of Pennsylvania, d. near Selinsgrove, Pa., 29 Nov., 1819. His father, Anthony, a mechanic, emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1758. After his death in 1774 the son apprenticed himself to a tanner in York, Pa., and employed his leisure in study. In 1784 he removed to Selinsgrove, opened a store, became the owner of a mill, and was justice of peace for several years. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of 1790, and in 1795 was elected a member of the house of representatives, of which he was chosen speaker in 1802, serving in this capacity for six successive terms. With him originated the "hundred-dollar act," which embodied the arbitration principle and provided for the trial of causes where the amount in question was less than one hundred dollars. In 1808 he was made governor of Pennsylvania and served three terms. Upon his retirement in 1817 he was elected to the state senate, and died while a member of that body. Snyder county, Pa., was named for him.
SOLANA, Alonso de (sol-lah-nah), Spanish missionary, b. in Solana, Toledo, about 1590; d. in Merida, Yucatan, in 1600. He studied in Salamanca, and was graduated in law, but resolved to enter the church, and united with the Franciscans in Toledo. Afterward he retired to the convent of Salesa, but in 1556 he came with Diego Landa (q. v.) to Yucatan, where he soon became active in the conversion of the Maya Indians. He was much loved by the natives, and several times refused dignities that were offered him to remain with his flock. He wrote "Diccionario Maya y Español," "Sermones en Lengua Maya," and "Noticias sagradas y profanas de las Antigüedades y Conversión de los Indios de Yucatan," the manuscript of which was in the Franciscan convent of Merida, but have been lost.

SOLANO, Juan, Peruvian R. C. bishop, b. in Spain about 1564; d. in Rome, Italy, in 1580. He became a member of the Dominican order and entered the convent of Salamanca. He was nominated for the bishopric of Cuaco, Peru, by Charles V., in 1558, and consecrated in February, 1559, but found it impossible to enter Cuzco after his arrival, as Gonzalo Pizarro, who had just revolted, held that city. Solano joined the royal army, and was present at the defeat of Huarmas, 20 Oct., 1547, where he escaped only by the swiftness of his horse. After this defeat Solano joined Pedro de la Gasca (q. v.), accompanied him in his march against the insurgents, and was present at the battle of Sasahuanana, 9 April, 1548, in which the insurgents were defeated. He was now enabled to exercise pastoral functions in Cuzco, and showed much zeal in defending the rights of the Indians, as well as in converting them to Christianity. As the number of sick and poor among them had largely increased in consequence of the civil war, he insisted on the need of medical men to care for the sick at the expense of the Government. He also wished to obtain a division of his diocese, which he considered too large for the care of a single bishop. After arriving in Spain he laid the reasons for his journey before the court and the council of the Indies, but met with no success. He then went to Rome with the object of interesting Pope Pius IV, in the matter. There too he failed, and, resigning his bishopric in 1561, he retired into the Dominican convent of St. Mary, where he spent the remainder of his life.

SOLAR, Mercedes Marin de, Chilian poet, b. in Santiago, Chill, in 1864; d. there, 21 Dec., 1866. She was a daughter of Jose Gaspar Marin and Luisa Recabarren, and showed from her youth a decided talent for poetry. Her literary reputation was first established by a poem on the death of Gen. Portales, which was published in 1837 in "El Araucano." Soon her poems were widely known, and she and Salvador Sanfuentes (q. v.) may be called the first Chilian poets after the establishment of independence. She contributed several poems to the papers, of which the best are "Pícarra" and "Al pie de la Cruz," and published "Canto Fúnebre a la muerte del General Portales" (Santiago, 1837); a biography of her father (1845); and "Canto a la Patria" (1857). A collection of her poems was published in a volume (Santiago, 1854). See her "Life," by M. L. Ammanetti (1857). Her children, Amelia de Claro and Enrique inherited her poetic talent. The latter, b. in Santiago in 1844, studied in the Jesuit college, and in 1870 was elected to congress for the departments of Rancagua and Curico. He has published poems in "El Independiente," "Estrella de Chile," "Revista de Santiago," "Poesías de Lirios," (Santiago, 1867), and "Leyendas y Tradiciones" (1868).

SOLCHAHA, Miguel (sol-teh-a-nah), Mexican clergyman, b. in Queretaro in 1744; d. in Durango in 1781. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1689, and after finishing his studies, was sent as professor of theology to the College of Durango. When Gaspar Gregorio was sent in 1715 to subdue the Indians of the Nayarit, and the New Bisay and the New Galicia, Bishop Tapiz appointed Solchaga spiritual director of the expedition, and as such the latter brought about that the encomi Tomatiahu, of Nayarit, went in 1721 to Mexico to make a treaty with the viceroy. But on account of sickness Solchaga returned in the same year to Durango, where death overtook him before he could publish his description of the expedition. It was afterward printed in Spain under the title "Carta Relación de la entrada de la Expedición Española en el Nayarit" (Barcelona, 1754).

SOLEY, James Russell, author, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 1 Oct., 1850. He was graduated at Harvard in 1876, became assistant professor of English in the U. S. navy, and in 1878 he was on special duty at the Paris exposition. He also examined the systems of education in European naval colleges, and on his return made an extensive report. In 1882 he was transferred to Washington, where he collected and arranged the navy department library, and since 1883 he has superintended the publication of the naval records of the civil war. He has been lecturer on international law at the Naval war college at Newport since 1885, and has also delivered courses before the Lowell institute, Boston, on "American Naval History" (1885), and "Recent Discoveries in the Counties of the Spanish Cis. (1885). Prof. Soley has published "History of the Naval Academy" (Washington, 1876); "Foreign Systems of Naval Education," the report mentioned above (1880); "The Blockade and the Cruisers" (New York, 1883); "The Recuerdos of Greeley," with Com. Winfield S. Schley (1885); and "The Hun of 1812" (Boston, 1885). He has edited the "Autobiography of Commodore Morris" (Annapolis, 1880), and contributed to the "Battles and Leaders of the Civil War," and to Justin Winsor's "Narrative and Critical History of America."

SOLIS y RIVADENEYRA, Antonio de, Spanish author, b. in Alcalá de Henares, 18 July, 1610; d. in Madrid, 19 April, 1686. He studied the humanities in Alcalá and jurisprudence in Salamanca, and at the age of seventeen wrote a comedy in verse, which was soon followed by others. In 1640 he became private secretary of Duarte de Toledo, Count de Oropeza, president of the council of Castile, and in 1641 he was appointed one of the secretaries of King Philip IV, and chief clerk of the secretary of state, which office he held till 1666, when he became historiographer of the Indies. In the following year he entered the Society of Jesus, but retained his office and devoted all his time to the composition of his great historical work. He published the comedies "Amor y Obligación" (Madrid, 1627); "Un bolo hace cuanto" (1630); “Amor al uso” (1632); “La Gitana de Madrid” (1634); and “Enrique y Ofra” (1641). Some authorities consider him to be the author of “Gil Blas de Santillana,” and look upon Le Sage as only its translator. He also wrote “Poesias sagradas y profanas” (1674), but his chief fame depends upon “Hsychia. Obras Tomo I. y progreso de la America Septentrional” (Madrid, 1684; many subsequent editions), which was translated into French (Paris, 1691), into Italian (Florence, 1699), and into English (London, 1724).

SOLERZANO Y PEREIRA, Juan de (so-lor-tha-no), Spanish author, b. in Madrid, 30 Nov., 1575; d. there in 1654. He studied in the University of Salamanca, and in 1607 was appointed professor of Roman and common law in the same university. In 1609 he was appointed by Philip III. judge of the audiencia of Lima, where he organized the tribunals, introduced improvements in the administration, and promoted the working of the mercury-mines of Huancavelica. In 1627 he returned to Spain, and was successively member of the treasury board, of the council of the Indies, and of the supreme council of Castile. He wrote several valuable juridical works, of which the principal one is “De Indicarian jure disputations” (Madrid, 1653).

SOMERBY, Horatio Gates, genealogist, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 24 Dec., 1805; d. in London, England, 14 Nov., 1872. His ancestor, Anthony, came from England to Newbury, Mass., in 1639. He received a public-school education in his native town, studied art in Boston, and had a studio in Troy, N. Y., for several years, but in 1822 returned to Boston, where he was a friendly painter and japoner. After 1845 he resided chiefly in London as a professional genealogist, and was the first American to devote himself exclusively to such work. He became very skilful, and many families in this country availed themselves of his services in tracing their English ancestry. Mr. Somerby was on confidential terms with George Peabody, and became secretary to the board of trustees of the Peabody fund. He was a member of the New England historic-genealogical society, to whose publications he contributed valuable papers, and a large quantity of his unpublished material is in the keeping of that institution. He died in 1859, of which he had been connected since 1859. He was the originator of systematic research for the purpose of connecting New England families with their ancestors in Great Britain. — His brother, Frederic Thomas, author, b. in Newburyport, 4 Jan., 1814; d. in Worcester, Mass., 18 Jan., 1871, was educated in his native place, and became an ornamental painter. He was for many years a correspondent of the Boston “Post” and the “Spirit of the Times,” and published, under the name of “Cymon,” “Hits and Dashes, or a Medley of Sketches and Scraps touching People and Things” (Boston, 1852).

SOMERS, Richard, naval officer, b. on Somers point, Great Egg harbor, N. J., in 1778; d. near Tripoli, Africa, 4 Sept., 1804. His grandfather emigrated from England about 1730 and settled at Somers point, and his father was colonel of militia, judge of the county court, and an active Whig in the Revolution. The son entered the navy as midshipman, 30 April, 1788, after some experience at sea in small coasting vessels. He sailed from Philadelphia in the frigate “United States” in July, 1788, to Cape Cadiz, and then coast to the West Indies in search of French cruisers during that brief war with France. He was commissioned lieutenant, 21 May, 1799, sailed in the “United States” with the embassy to France on 3 Nov., 1804, and in 1804 again went to France as 1st lieutenant of the slop “Boston,” with Chancellor Livingston on board as passenger. He was appointed to command the schooner “Nantucket,” fitted out to form a part of Preble’s squadron in the war with Tripoli, and he was the first to arrive at that station. After the conclusion of the peace, he commanded the schooner “Boston” on the coast of France and operations at Tripoli in 1803–4. In the first attack he commanded a division of gun-boats, and at one time fought five Tripolitan vessels at close quarters. On 7 Aug., 1804, he led the 1st division of three gun-boats in the second attack, and successfully fought superior forces for three hours. He was promoted commander, 16 Feb., 1804, and was afterward employed in the Mediterranean.

SOMERVILLE, Alexander, Canadian journalist, b. in Springield, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, 15 March, 1857; d. in Toronto, Ont., 1 June, 1885. He was educated in the parish school, entered the army, and served for several years in the Scots greys. He was with his regiment at Birmingham, England, in 1853, at the time of the first reform-bill agitation, and for some act of supposed insubordination was sentenced to receive 200 lashes on the bare back, half of which were inflicted. The whole matter, which has been described by him in his “Diligent Life” (Montreal, 1890), was made the subject of discussion in parliament at the time, and resulted in mitigating the injustice and severity of military discipline. During 1853–7 Mr. Somerville served in a Highland regiment in Spain, and soon afterward he left the service. From 1858 till 1864 he wrote for several of the chief British newspapers, under the pen-name of “Whistler at the Plough,” his graphic descriptive sketches attracting attention. In 1858 he came to Canada, and from that time till his death was engaged in journalism. He edited the "Canadian Illustrated News," and among other works wrote "Autobiography of a Workman" ( Toronto, 1898); "The Story of the Great War" (Liverpool, 1890); "The Whistler at the Plough" (Manchester, 1852); "The Conservative Science of Nations" (Montreal, 1860); and "A Narrative of the Penal Invasion of 1866" (Toronto, 1867).
SONTAGE, George, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1786; d. in Odessa, Russia, 23 March, 1841. His father, William Louis Sontag, a French officer, came to this country during the Revolution, and at its close established a mercantile house in Philadelphia. The son went to Russia in 1815, entered the military service, and with the allied army entered Paris. He became a general in the Russian army and an admiral in the navy.

SONTAG, William Louis, painter, b. near Pittsburgh, Pa., 2 March, 1822; d. in New York city, 22 Jan., 1900. He began in Cincinnati to study art as a profession in 1848. Six years later he settled in New York, where he was active in the establishment of the American Art Union. In 1853 and 1861 he was abroad, spending most of the time in Italy. He has devoted himself to the delineation of American landscape, strongly idealized. His principal works are "View on Licking River, Ky." (1816); four pictures on the "Progress of Civilization," illustrating William Cullen Bryant's poem (1818); "Spirit of Solitude" (1818); Evangeline" (1819); "A Dream of Italy" (1860); "A Morning in the Alleghanies" (1855); "Sunset in the Wilderness"; "Spirit of the Alleghanies"; and "Fog rising off Mount Adams" (about 1858). He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1849, and an academician the following year, and is also a member of the Water-color society and the American academy of design and surgery.

SONTAGE, Henriette, German singer, b. in Coblenz, 13 May, 1805; d. in Vera Cruz, Mexico, 18 June, 1874. Her parents belonged to the theatrical profession, and carefully cultivated her vocal and dramatic powers, which were naturally great. Before she was six years old she sang on the stage in children's parts at Darmstadt, Berlin, and Prague. She studied the art of singing under Carl Lind, of Prague, where, in her fifteenth year, with marked success, she took the leading part in Beethoven's "Jean de Paris." She then went to Vienna, and before she was nineteen she was prima donna of the Berlin stage. Shortly afterward she left for Paris, where she competed successfully with Malibran, Pasta, and Catalani. In 1826 she made her début in London, but at the close of the season she married Count Rossi, a Piedmontese noblemen, and after a triumphant operatic career in the great capitals of Europe retired to private life. She still retained her great love of art for its own sake, and continued to study while mingling in the highest circles of society. In 1848 her husband became involved in political troubles, and lost his fortune. For his sake and for the sake of his children, she resolved to resort again to her art, and accepted an engagement at London for the season of 1849. In 1853, encouraged by the successful career of Jenny Lind, she decided to visit the United States, and in the autumn of that year arrived in New York. Her tour through the chief cities of the Union was magnificent. Repaid by the success of her expectation, in 1854 she accepted an engagement from the manager of the principal theatre of Mexico, at Vera Cruz; but she was suddenly stricken down by cholera while preparing for her first appearance.
SOTHERAN, Léger Félicité, French commissioner, b. in Oyonnax, Ain, 17 March, 1763; d. there, 28 July, 1843. He practised law at Bourg, and going to Paris at the beginning of the French revolution, to become a member of the noted club, "Les amis de la liberté", he wrote pamphlets in advocacy of the enfranchisement of the slaves in the French dominions. The negroes having rebelled in Santo Domingo, Sonthonax, Étienne Polverel, and Jean Ailhaud were appointed high commissioners to the Leeward islands. They sailed from La Rochelle in July, 1791, with an army of 6,000 men, and landed at Cape Francois on 19 Sept. Ailhaud soon returned to France, and Sonthonax and Polverel, after a brilliant campaign, divided the colony into two governments. Gen. Galbaud arrived from France in June, 1793, to assume the command of the French forces, but was opposed by Sonthonax and removed from office. Galbaud then attacked Cape Francois, and, securing possession of the arsenal, compelled Sonthonax to take refuge in the interior. But the latter made his junction with Polverel, and, returning, issued his famous decree of 29 Aug., 1793, which enfranchised the slaves forever. Through the help of the negroes Galbaud was finally defeated, and sailed for the United States. Sonthonax's opposition to the whites continued meanwhile, and they asked succour from the authorities at Jamesburg, N. J. An English expedition landed at Môle St. Nicholas, and soon occupied the principal parts of the colony; Sonthonax retired to Jacmel, and sailed in 1794 for France, where he had been indicted for his conduct. But he easily justified himself before the convention, and was again appointed in 1796 high commissioner to Santo Domingo. After removing Gen. Rochambeau he was compelled to appoint Monsieur Duranceau commander-in-chief, and finally left the island in July, 1797, having been elected a deputy to the assembly of the five hundred by the colony. He was exiled after the coup d'état of 1799, and again in 1803 for having criticised the appointment of Gen. Rochambeau as commander-in-chief in Santo Domingo. Napoleon forsook him to remain in Paris after 1815.

lectured on philological, historical, and popular subjects, and has compiled bibliographical catalogues of many well-known libraries, including those of Rush C. Hawkins, Charles O'Conor, and William Beach Lawrence. His works include "Genealogical Memoranda relating to the Family of Sothern and to the Sept of MacManus" (printed privately, London, 1871-4); "Manchester Dr.槟sian Church Calendar" (Manchester, 1873); "The Life of Admiral Caguestro, Impostor or Martyr." "New York, 1876;" and "Percy Bysshe Shelley as a Philosopher and Reformer." "(1876). He edited vols. vi. and vii. of the "American Bibliopolist" (New York, 1874-5).

SOTHERN, Edward Askey, actor, b. in Liverpool, England, 1 April, 1826; d. in London, 29 Jan., 1881. He was intended by his parents for the ministry, but became an actor, making his first appearance as an amateur in Jersey; and, coming to the United States soon afterward, he made his début in this country at the Boston national theatre in September, 1852, as Dr. Pangloss in "The Dead Land Costas," a play which at this time he was known as Douglas Stewart, and he did not assume his own name till 1858. His early career was marked by seeming inactivity, and he played only minor parts till on 18 Oct., 1858, he was cast for the character of Lord Dundreary in Tom Taylor's comedy "Our American Cousin," at Laura Keene's theatre, New York, where he had been playing for some time. The part consisted of only a few lines, and Sothern assumed it under protest, but made such a hit in it that it was enlarged, and became the great attraction of the play, which ran for one hundred and forty consecutive nights. It is said that that play brought him to the notice of the public, which was one of the most amusing of Sothern's absurdities of manner in this part was at first accidental, and was caused by the actor's stumbling over some "properties" as he made his first entrance on the stage. This slip, with a peculiar limp and drawl, never failed to win the applause of his audiences. Dundreary's part became virtually a series of monologues, which were interspersed in various parts of the original play. On 11 Nov., 1861, he appeared in the part at the Haymarket theatre, London, where the play ran four hundred and ninety-six consecutive nights. He afterward acted in it continually till his death, always with success, except in Paris in 1887, where he was not well received. Besides playing this part, the details of which he constantly changed, Sothern was successful as David Garrick in Robertson's comedy of that name, and in many pieces that were written for him by English playwrights. Though he was very popular in England, where he remained till 1871, he preferred the American stage. He also played in his native country in 1874-6. His last appearance in the United States was at New York on 27 Dec., 1879. Sothern's acting was marked by perfect refinement, even in the most farcical touches of this "Dundreary." He wrote well, though slowly, and but little. The part of Dundreary was almost entirely his own, and he composed the best part of the love scenes in Robertson's comedy of "Home." He was also part author of "Trade," a comedy, which has not yet been acted. The illustration represents him in the character of Dundreary.

SOTO, Bernardo, president of Costa Rica, b. in San José, Costa Rica, in 1833. From his youth he served in the army, and had attained the rank of colonel, when he resigned in 1882. The new president, Prospero Fernandez, called him to his cabinet as secretary of the treasury, and he also had temporary charge of the portfolio of war. In February, 1884, Soto's proposition for the adoption of radical measures of economy caused a cabinet crisis, and the secretaries of war and the interior, Miguel and Victor Guardia, resigned. The president, with the sanction of the assembly, resolved to reduce the cabinet to two secretaries, and Soto was charged with the portfolios of the interior, commerce, and agriculture, being at the same time elected first vice-president, and promoted brigadier. When Gen. Rufino Barrios issued his decree of 28 Feb., 1883, declaring the forcible union of the five Central American republics, including Costa Rica and Guatemala, and the latter declared war upon Guatemala on 10 March. On the next day President Fernandez died suddenly, and Soto, who was preparing the army to march against Barrios, was called to the executive. Leaving the second vice-president in charge, he marched with his contingent to Nicaragua, and, together with the army of that country, invaded Honduras, the enemy of Barrios. There he heard of the death of Barrios at Chalchuta and the collapse of the scheme of union, and returned with his little army to Costa Rica. On the expiration of Fernandez's term, 10 Aug., 1886, Soto was re-elected as constitutional president for the term of four years. During his administration great improvements have been introduced, the finances have been put on a sound basis, and Costa Rica, which had always opposed Central American union, as it was formerly advanced to favor an ambitious leader, has taken the initiative. Delegates of the five republics assembled in Guatemala and concluded, 15 Aug., 1887, a treaty of mutual union with a proviso for the possible establishment of a common currency. In July, 1887, a treaty with Nicaragua, in a personal interview with the president in Granada, for the submission of the dispute regarding the boundary and the interoceanic canal to the arbitration of President Cleveland. He also made an arrangement with an English company for the administration of the different sections of a railroad and the completion of the same from ocean to ocean.
In 1881 he was re-elected for a second term, but in 1883, when President Barrios brought forward again the scheme of a Central American confederacy, with a view of becoming its leader, Soto, out of personal jealousy, opposed the idea strenuously, and in the result, when he was rewarded for his cleverness, he attacked Barrios in several pamphlets. A triumvirate had meanwhile taken charge of the executive, and after Soto’s formal resignation, 15 Oct., 1883, Gen. Bogran, Barrios’s intimate friend and follower, was elected president. Soto came later to New York, where he schemed against Bogran, and in February, 1886, an alleged filibustering expedition for Honduras was captured in the “City of Mexico” by the U.S. sloop “Galena” and brought to Key West. Soto then left New York for Costa Rica, and thence despatched in August of the same year an expedition of seventy-seven men, under the leadership of the officers that had been captured in the “City of Mexico,” to stir up a revolutionary movement. But in Honduras none seemed inclined to join the enterprise, the expedition was defeated and captured near Conchagua, and the four leaders were shot in that city on 18 Oct., 1886. Soto then left Costa Rica, and returned to the United States.

SOTOMAYOR, Cristobal de (sot-o-mah-yohr), Spanish officer, b. in Spain in the last quarter of the 15th century; d. in Guanica, Porto Rico, 25 July, 1581; was a grandson of the famous Cristobal Colon, on whose behalf he went to Porto Rico under the expedition of Diego Columbus in August, 1500, and the same year went to Porto Rico with the expedition of Juan Ceron, who had been appointed governor. In 1510, when Ponce de Leon obtained from King Ferdinand the appointment of governor of Porto Rico, Sotomayor entered his service and became his lieutenant, assisting in the foundation of Caguana and the settlement of the island. Toward the end of 1510 he discovered on the southwest of the island a great bay, on the coast of which he founded the city of Guanica, from which that bay afterward took its name. One year afterward he founded on the north coast another town, which was called after his name, Sotomayor. In 1511, when the cacique Aguncaya, aided by that of Bajus, carried on a war against the Spaniards, Sotomayor and his men were surprised during the night of 25 July and set on fire, and Sotomayor, after a brave resistance, met his death with the greater part of the garrison.

SOTOMAYOR, Pedro de, Central American linguist, b. in Guatemala in 1854; d. there in 1893. He was the son of the Spanish post-commander of his native city, but in 1891 entered the order of St. Francis, and soon became professor of theology and learned in the language of the natives. He was elected in 1892 provincial of his order. He wrote: “Arte, Vocabulario, y Sermones Guatemaltecos” and “Historia de los Varones illustres del Orden de San Francisco, del Reino de Guatemala,” which are preserved in manuscript in the Franciscan convent of Guatemala.

SOUTH, Francis, French buccaneer, b. in Marseilles about 1625; d. at sea near Cuba in 1676. He served on a Dutch merchant vessel, and, being captured in Cuban waters by a Spanish man-of-war, was compelled to enlist among the crew, but in 1632 he deserted, joined the buccaneers in Tortugas, and soon rose to be a leader. After 1653, in association with other chieftains, he participated in the pillaging of Puerto Cabello, San Antonio de Gibraltar, and of the Isla de San Blas. Afterward, joining Sir Henry Morgan, he was placed at the head of a division and led the assault on Puerto del Principe, but, as Morgan kept the larger share of the booty, South left him in disgust. In 1657 he participated in the expedition to Panama, served in the first division, and led the assault on the fortress of San Lorenzo, on Chagres river. Joining Mosve Van Vin in 1672, he ravaged the coast of Guiana, plundering the city of Maracaibo, which paid them a ransom, pilaged the pearl-fisheries near Rio Hacha, and continued the war against the Spaniards till his death.

SOUTELLE, Carlos, Venezuelan soldier, b. in Caracas in 1720; d. there, 11 Feb., 1819. He received an excellent education, and, on the proclamation of independence in 1810, entered the patria service. In 1811 he became secretary to Gen. Francisco Miranda, and, after the capitulation of the latter in 1812, retired to his property in the interior. Afterward he joined Bolivar in the western provinces, and entered Caracas with him, 7 Aug., 1813, but after the defeat of La Puerta on 15 June, 1814, he fled to Barcelona and Margarita. When that island fell into the hands of Morillo, Soutelle went to Cartagena, where he participated in the memorable defence of that fortress against Morillo. He then went to Hayti and joined Bolivar’s expedition in 1816, being second in command of a division during the campaign of 1816. When Morillo pronounced against Bolivar, Soutelle joined the latter, and as his chief of staff occupied Augustura, 17 July, 1817, and was a member of the congress of the year 1818 in that city. Soon after the occupation of Bogota, Soutelle was sent with part of the army to Arequita, and on the way defeated the enemy in Las Cruces. After the occupation of Caracas, 14 May, 1821, he was sent to Barcelona, where he organized the Army of the East, which assisted in the victory of Carabobo on 24 June. When Bolivar left for Bogota on 1 Aug., 1822, he appointed Soutelle as governor of the city, in which place he showed great talent as an administrator. In 1825 he was appointed intendant of the department of Magdalena, and in 1826 Colombian secretary of war under the vice-presidency of Santander. In 1829 he was sent by Bolivar to Venezuela to try to prevent the separation of the Colombian republic, but when he saw the impossibility of preventing it, he retired to Caracas, where he was recalled to the constituent assembly of Venezuela, and as president of that body was one of the chief promoters of a liberal constitution. Gen. Paez called him to his cabinet as secretary of war, and in 1834 he was sent by President Vargas as minister to England, France, and Spain. He was about to conclude with the last-named power a treaty for the recognition of the independence of Venezuela when, in 1836, he was recalled by his election as provisional president, on the resignation of Dr. Vargas. From 1839 till 1842 he was again secretary of war under Gen. Paez, and in the latter year he was elected constitutional president. In 1847 he retired to his estate, but, after the forcible dissolution of congress in 1848, he protested against Vargas’s unconstitutional proceedings, and was obliged to emigrate to New Granada, where he lived till 1858. By a special act of congress he received his pay as general of Colombia. He took no part in the political confusions of his country, and after the fall of Monagas in 1858 he was recalled and ordered to put down the revolution in the western provinces, but whether his measures were not approved he resigned, retiring to his farm. Under the short administration of Paez in 1862 he was again a member of the cabinet, and several times was elected to congress. He was more than a party-leader, and is regarded as among the most honorablen statesmen of Venezuela.
SOUDER. Casper (sow-der), journalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 8 Nov. 1819; d. there, 21 Oct., 1898. He supplemented a common-school education by private study, and in 1830-'4 was connected with the Philadelphia "Dispatch," devoting himself specially to local antiquities. In 1833 he also became associated with the "Evening Bulletin," of which he was afterward an editor and part proprietor till his death. Mr. Soudier was an active supporter of the administration during the civil war. His "History of Chestnut Street," which was published serially, has been praised for its vividness and thoroughness of treatment.

SOULé, Luis Ferdinand (soo-lay-bee), explorer, b. in Pierre-fite-Lestatas, Born in 1857; d. in Bahia in 1856. He became a Jesuit, was sent to labor among the Indians of Brazil, and was attached for years to the Amazon missions. His travels in the country, which extended to Xapó river, gave him opportunities to make geographical observations, and he prepared a valuable chart of the basin of the Amazon, with which he became thoroughly familiar. In 1857 he became assistant of Father Cristobal Acuña and accompanied Texei- ra's expedition, which sailed down the Amazon from Peru to its mouth. The maps and geographical observations in Acuña's narrative, "Descubrimiento del Río de las Amazonas y de su Pro- vincia," are largely based on Soulie's work. Soulie was afterward professor of theology in the college of the Jesuits at Bahia. He left in manuscript "Historia del descubrimiento y de la conquista de la América meridional," which was afterward published (Rome, 1852).

SOULé, Caroline Augusta (soo-lay), author, b. in Albany, N. Y., 3 Sept., 1824. Her father's name was Soule, and she was graduated at Albany female academy in 1841, and on 28 Aug., 1843, married Rev. Henry B. Soule, a Universalist clergyman, who died in 1851, leaving her with five children to support. Since that time she has devoted herself to teaching and to literature. She was corresponding editor of the "Ladies Repository" in Boston from 1851 to 1865, and for eleven years edited and published "The Guiding Star," a Sunday-school fortnightly, in New York. Afterward she was ordained as a minister of the Universalist church, and in 1870 became its first foreign missionary. She is now (1899) pastor of a congregation in Glasgow, Scotland. In a recent letter Mrs. Soule says: "I have written everything from a sermon to a song, and done everything from making so-called molasses in a log-cabin to preaching three times a Sunday in the city of London." Besides numerous contributions to current literature, she has published "Memoir of Rev. H. B. Soule" (New York, 1852); "Home Life" (Boston, 1855); "The Pet of the Settlement" (1859), and "Wine or Water" (1861); and edited for twenty years the "New York Tribune," to which she contributed many articles (1834-'5).

SOULé, George, educator, b. in Barrington, Yates co., N. Y., 14 May, 1834. After the death of his father in 1838 he was taken to Illinois by his mother. He was graduated at Sycamore academy, Ill., in 1852, and during the next three years studied medicine, law, and the commercial sciences in New Orleans and Philadelphia. He afterward entered commercial and literary college in New Orleans, La., of which he is still (1899) president. He was an officer in the Confederate army from 1862 to the close of the war, attaining the rank of lieuten-ant-colonel. He was captured at Shiloh, and afterward was chief of labor bureau of Gen. Kirby Smith's army. Col. Soule is engaged in lecturing and writing on educational and social topics, and has held many offices in benevolent and civic societies. He has published "Practical Mathematics" (New Orleans, 1872); a series of "Philosophic Arithmetics" on a new system (1884); and "Science and Practice of Accountancy" (1887).

SOULé, Joshua, M. E. bishop, b. in Bristol, Me., 1 Aug., 1784; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 6 March, 1867. His father was a man of great local influence, went by the name of "Captain Soule," and was one of the select men of Bristol. When Joshua was sixteen he united with the Methodist church, and was ordained in 1807. He afterward became a Methodist presiding elder and asked that he might travel with him. Consent being given, he began his career as "boy preacher," but, though young, he was tall, dignified, and able, and acquired note as an opponent of Calvinism, Unitarianism, and Universalism. He studied hard and made great progress. When he was but twenty-three he was placed in charge of the state of Maine as presiding elder. He was on the committee to draft the constitution of the delegated general conference, which, since 1813, has been the fundamental law of the church. He was a delegate to the general conference of 1812, and also to that of 1816. At the latter he was elected book-agent and editor of the Methodist Magazine. He did not like these duties, and afterward prepared his "History of the East" as a relection; but in 1829, before that question was raised, he was elected a bishop. A great debate had occurred on whether presiding elders should be elected or, as before, appointed by the bishops. Mr. Soule was opposed to their election, but the majority of the conference voted in favor of it. Having full confidence in his sincerity, they elected him bishop, and gave him the power what he believed to be an unconstitutional law, re-entered the pastorate, and was stationed first in New York and then in Baltimore. In 1824 the general conference reversed its action and re-elected him bishop. These circumstances have no parallel in the history of the denomination, and are indisputable proofs of his great ability and influence. Up to 1842 he continued in the duties of the office, and then visited Great Britain as a delegate from the general conference of the United States to the British Wesleyan conference. In 1844 the general conference was held in New York. Bishop James O. Andrew had become complicated with slavery, and the conference passed a resolution that he should resign his office. Some of his functions until this encumbrance should be removed. It was Bishop Soule's opinion that the conference had no right to pass such a resolution, Bishop Andrew declined the proposition, and the result was a division of the church. Bishop Soule adhered to the southern members, and when the Methodist Episcopal church, south, was established he went with it. He was stationed at Pittsburg, and in 1848 he visited the general conference of the Meth- odist Episcopal church at Pittsburg, but was not recognized as a bishop or a delegate, though he was courteously received as a visitor. At the age of seventy-two he retired from public life. Bishop Soule was a great man intellectually, of remarkable personal appearance, dignified and even conscientious, strong and imperious will. Had he been thoroughly educated, and in early life brought into close relations with educated men, his infirmities, if not eradicated, would have been concealed. As it was, few men in church or state have exerted greater influence over their contemporaries.

SOULé, Pierre, statesman, b. in Castillon, in the French Provinces, in September, 1802; d. in New Orleans, 26 March, 1870. His father held the inherited post of a magistrate when the French revolution began. He then entered the army of the new republic, and rose to a high rank, but finally returned to the bench. Pierre, his youngest son, was sent to the Jesuits' college at Toulouse, to be prepared for ecclesiastical orders; but the rigid discipline was repugnant to him, and he returned home speedily.

The following year he was sent to the city of Bordeaux to complete his education; but he took part in a plot against Louis XVIII., was detected, and fled on foot to the mountains of the ancient Bearn country, where, disguised as a shepherd, he remained a year. The government pardoned him, and he returned to Bordeaux, where he taught in an academy, and he then returned to Paris, where he earned support as a poet, completing his education, and then studied law. In 1824 Soule's pen found access to the Paris Journal des Débats, and introduced him to the intimacy of the liberal leaders. In 1825 he was an editor of "Le Nain jaune," a paper noted for its extreme liberal ideas and the bitterness of its attacks upon the ministers of Charles X. One of the severest of these articles was traced to Soule, and he was arrested and tried before the court correctionnelle. Soule's lawyer sought to soften the severity of the intervening sentence than to defend his client's course, whereupon Soule, indignant at this surrender of his honest convictions, rose in court and defended them boldly, frankly, and eloquently. His sentence was only the more severe—close confinement in the prison of St. Pilague and a fine of 10,000 francs. The only escape from this was self-exile. Soule left Paris, with the passport of his friend, the poet Barthelemy, who closely resembled him. He had an offer from the president of Chili to become his private secretary, and he intended to sail from England with the Chilean charge d'affaires, but when he had crossed the channel the ship on which he was to embark had departed. Soule now was reduced to such a strait that he returned to France, prepared to face the dungeon. At Havre, just as he landed, he was met by a friend, afterward a French admiral, who persuaded him to embark for Hayti, where he arrived in September, 1836. He was kindly received by President Roger, to whom he bore letters of introduction, but finding no opening had departed. Soule next went to Madrid, and then went to New Orleans toward the close of the year. He found a knowledge of English indispensable, and went to Tennessee to study it, becoming for a while a guest of Gen. Andrew Jackson. Afterward he went to Bardstown, Ky., where, failing sick and being without funds, he obtained employment on a plantation, and while engaged in that capacity learned English and studied the elements of American law. On his return to New Orleans, Soule studied Louisiana law in the office of Moore Lisket, speedily passed his examination in English, and then became Lisket's partner. He rose rapidly in his profession, and for many years he was associated in the conduct of most of the celebrated civil and criminal cases in the Louisiana courts; but he was more distinguished for originality, power, and brilliancy of argument than for pedantry as a jurist. He entered politics, in the first presidential campaign after he began his legal career, as a public speaker on the Democratic side. Under the new constitution of 1845 Mr. Soule was elected to the state senate. In 1847 Gov. Isaac Johnson appointed him to the U. S. senate to fill a vacancy, and in 1849 he was elected thereto, and that body he remained till 1853. In all public measures affecting the south he espoused the extreme southern view. He took an active part in the long debates upon Henry Clay's compromise bill of 1850, and led his party in opposition to that measure. He frequently challenged Clay and Webster in debate, and advocated secession without delay, foreseeing, as he claimed, that from compromise to compromise the sovereignty of the states would speedily surrender to the supremacy of a central government. In March, 1853, President Pierce offered Soule the mission to Spain, with the special object in view of the acquisition of Cuba. This news preceded him to Madrid, and he was received there very coldly. At a ball in Madrid a remark by the Duke of Alba, who had assisted in the restoration of Don Carlos and Noliv, who considered it offensive to his family, and, though the duke denied any such intention, a duel with swords was the result. Mr. Soule then challenged the French ambassador, the Marquis de Turgot, as responsible for what had taken place under his roof, and crippled him for life. On 28 Aug., 1854, a revolutionary outbreak took place in the streets of Madrid. It has been charged that Mr. Soule favored this with all his power; but there is no evidence to show it, though he doubtless sympathized, as was natural, with the Spanish Liberal party. In 1854, Mr. Soule was one of the ministers that framed the celebrated "Ostend manifesto" (see PIERCE, FRANKLIN), and it was understood that he was the moving spirit in its preparation. At some previous period he violently attacked Napoleon III., and when on his way to Ostend he was stopped by the authorities at the southern frontier of France; but as soon as the officials at Paris were informed of this they sent him authority to pursue his journey. At the same time French spies followed him to Ostend. Mr. Soule was naturally deeply disappointed by his complete failure upon the manifesto. He resigned in June, 1855, and returned to New Orleans, where he resumed the practice of law without abandoning politics. In 1856, and again in 1860, he warmly advocated the nomination of Stephen A. Douglas for the presidency. After the election of Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Soule, to the surprise of his friends, and because of his "hostile operation" of the southern states to secure what they considered their rights. With this view, when Gov. Thomas O. Moore called a state convention in January, 1861, Mr. Soule was a candidate for delegate, but was not elected. During the canvass he depicted in the darkest colors the calamities secession would bring, and predicted the deplorable effect of the partition of the Union. He would abide by the decision of his state. On the passage of the ordinances of secession he tendered his services to the Confederate government, but, being in failing health, he soon returned to New Orleans, and remained there until the city fell into the hands of the National forces in April, 1862. Shortly afterward he was arrested and taken to Fort Lafayette, New York harbor, where he was imprisoned for several months. Finally he was released and went to Nuan, whence, in the autumn of 1862, he ran the blockade at Charleston and tendered his services to Gen. Beauregard. After serving on his staff for some time as an honorary officer, Mr. Soule went to Richmond in 1863, and was commissioned a brigadier-general to raise a foreign legion; but the plan was not carried out. Mr. Soule then resumed his law practice, and in January, 1864, he became connected with Dr. William M. Gwin in the latter's scheme for settling Sonora, in Mexico, with immigrants from California. This was a project patronized by Napoleon III.; the Confederate government had no connection with it. It failed through disagreement between Maximilian and Dr. Gwin. When, at the close of the war, Mr. Soule returned to New Orleans, though his health was broken and his fortune was gone, he resumed the practice of his profession, but in 1868 he had to give up all work. Soule's remarkable powers of eloquence were acknowledged by Henry Clay and Daniel Webster. The effect of his glowing periods was deepened by a strong, clear, and mellow voice and by a massive and imposing figure, a top-knot of black hair, scorching black eyes, and an olive-tinted face, which was cast in the mould of the great Napoleon's and was full of expression.

SOUÉ, Richard (soo-lé), lexicographer, b. in Dorchester, Mass., 8 June, 1812; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 31 Dec., 1857. He was descended in the sixth generation from George Soule, who was one of the signers of the compact known as the Mayflower. Richard was graduated at Harvard in 1832 and was a civil engineer till 1838. From 1839 till 1855 he engaged in sugar-refining, and after 1855 he devoted himself to literary pursuits. Most of his life was spent in Boston. He was a member of the school committee of that city in 1848 and 1849, and of the legislature in the latter year. From 1853 till 1859 Mr. Soule had supervision of the corps of editors that assisted Dr. Joseph E. Worcester in the preparation of his quarto dictionary. He published "Memorial of the Sprague Family," a poem, with genealogical and biographical notes (Boston, 1847); "Manual of English Pronunciation and Spelling, with a Preliminary Exposition of the English Language," with Priscilla H., and with Al- liam A. Wheeler (1861); "Dictionary of English Slangisms" (1871); and "Pronouncing Hand-Book," with Louisa J. Campbell (1873).

SOULOUQUE, Faustin Élie (soo-loo-k), Hayti-ian emperor under the name of Faustin I., b. in Petit Goave in 1758; d. there 6 Aug., 1847. He was a negro slave of the Mandoings race, and freed by the decree of Président Soultoumox, issued 29 Aug., 1793, and took part in the civil war that raged in the island, and in 1803 in the negro insurrection against the French. He became in 1810 a lieutenant in the horse-guards of President Jean Peloton, and was promoted captain by President Jean Boyer, but in 1813 joined the party of Riviere-Haard, who made him a captain. He was tried for his life by President Guerrier and lieutenant-general by President Jean Riché, and, after the death of the latter in February, 1814, while rival aspirants were disputing and plotting for the succession, the leaders of the senate agreed to elect an old and incapable negro general. Senators Ardonin and Dupuy nominated Soulouque, urged in his favor that he was unable to read or write, and he was unexpectedly elected 1 March, 1847; but, instead of proving a tool in the hands of the senators, he showed a strong will, and, although by his antecedents belonging to the mulatto party, he began to attach the blacks to his interest. The mulattos retaliated by conspiring; but Soulouque began to decimate his enemies by confiscation, proscriptions, and executions. The black soldiers began a general massacre in Port an Prince, which ceased only after the French consul, Charles Revband, threatened to order the landing of marines from the men-of-war in the harbor. Ambitions to unite the two parts of the island, Soulouque invaded the island of Martinique in March, 1849, with 4,000 men, but was defeated in a decisive battle by Pedro Santana near Oeon on 21 April and compelled to retreat. Despite the failure of the campaign, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor on 26 Aug., 1849, under the name of Faustin I., apparently by the will of the people and the unanimous action of parliament. He surrounded himself with a numerous court, created dukes and other nobles, founded military and civil orders, and issued a constitution, reserving to himself the right to rule at any juncture as he pleased. On 18 April, 1852, with his wife Ade- lina, a woman of questionable character, whom he had married in December, 1849, against the advice of his wife and the advice of the people, he went to Peru on the pomp by the view of Port an Prince, in imitation of the ceremony at the coronation of Napoleon I. Toward the close of 1855 he invaded the Domin- ican territory again at the head of an army of 8,000 men, but was again defeated by Santana, and barely escaped being captured. His treasure and crown fell into the hands of the enemy. In the following year a new campaign was again unsuccessful, and two years later there was a commercial crisis in the island. Insurrections began in several counties, but they were put down. In Dec- ember, 1858, Gen. Fabre Gourard put himself at the head of the movement, and, after some encoun- ters with the imperial troops, entered Port an Prince, 15 Jan., 1859. Soulouque's soldiers refusing to fight. He took refuge at the French consulate, and protected in his flight by Gourard, sailed with his family on board the British ship "Melbourne" for Jamaica, arriving in Kingston on 22 Jan., with great riches, consisting of jewelry, diamonds, and money, although his property in Hayti was con- fiscated. After the accession of Salinou in March, 1867, he was permitted to return to Hayti, and died soon afterward.

SOUÉ, Marie Joseph (soo-pay), French physi- cian, b. in Asnières in 1738; d. in Paris in 1794. He studied principally contagious diseases, and presented to the Academy of sciences a memoir in which he asserted that he had discovered the real cause of the plague known as the black cholera, which raged in Europe and Asia in the 14th cen- tury. He was surgeon in the Hôtel Dieu at Paris when news was received that cholera had broken out in Caliac, and at the invitation of the academy Soué went to Peru to study its effects in 1783. He arrived in Callao when the disease was at its height and the city was nearly deserted by physicians, and, offering his services to the authorities, was appointed the Sanitary of Lima. He divided the city into relief wards, and, by pulling down old wooden houses and Indian huts in or near the city, contributed to ward off a greater calamity from Callao. Before returning to France he visited Lima and other large cities, went on botanical expeditions in the Andes, and, passing to Chile, collected an herbarium of about 200 speci- men plants (1784-85). His report to the academy was criticised, as he claimed that cholera was a poisonous blood disease, and suggested as its remedy a treatment by spirits, which he said he had used with great efficacy in Callao. Modern science has in part adopted Sonn’s theory, which was in his time strongly opposed. Although he was very popular in Paris, his title of physician to the king caused his arrest and subsequently his death. His works include “Origine et marche de la poësie” (Paris, 1779); “Le chölon à Callao, son origine, sa marche, ses progrés” (1878); “Comp’D’oeil sur les plantes médicinales du Pérou et du Chili” (1875); and “Monographie du sang et de ses affections” (1791).

SOUTHAMPTON, Henry Wriothesley, Earl of, English statesman, b. 6 Oct., 1673; d. in Hol- land, 10 Nov., 1823. In 1796 he served in the expe- dition of the Earl of Essex to Cadiz, and in 1799 he was general of horse under Essex in Ireland. After seeing further service in Holland, he took part in the insurrection that his former chief headed in London, and was sentenced to death, but pardoned by the queen. He took part in the colonization of this country under Sir Walter Ral- eigh, sending out the expedition in the “Concord,” under Batholomew Gosnold in 1602, at his own ex- pense, and also interested many others in schemes for developing the New World, including his brother-in-law, Lord Arundel, and the latter’s son-in-law, Cecil Calvert, afterward Lord Balti- more. In 1695, with Lord Arundel he despatched an expedition to New England. Though his name does not appear on the charters granted to Lord Baltimore’s company of Virginia, he is credited with the chief part in obtaining it, and in the second charter his name stands next to those of the high officers of state. When his friend, Sir Edwin Sandys, who had converted him to Protestantism, retired from the treasurership of the company (its chief officer, Southampton was unanimously chosen in his stead, and he continued a member of the Board of Trade till his death. A Reformed man, and his sons were seized with fever. The latter died, and the early followed him after recovering sufficiently to reach Bergen-op-Zoom on his way home. Shakespeare dedicated to him his “Venus and Adonis” in 1593, and the “Rape of Lucrece” in 1594, and he is the only man from whom the poet acknowledges receiving a benefit.

SOUTHARD, Henry (suth’ard), congressman, b. on Long Island, N. Y., in October, 1749; d. in Baskingridge, N. J., 2 June, 1842. The family name was formerly Southworth. His father, Abra- ham, removed to Baskingridge in 1757. The son was brought up on a farm and earned money as a day-inherbore to purchase land for himself. He was an active patriot during the Revolution, served in the state house of representatives for nine years, and sat in congress in 1799-1801 and 1803-1812, having been chosen as a Democrat. Mr. Southard was a man of superior talents and possessed a remarka- ble memory. Until he had passed ninety years he neither wore glasses nor used a staff.—His son, Samuel Lewis, senator, b. in Baskingridge, N. J., 9 June, 1787; d. in Fredericksburg, Va., 26 June, 1842, was graduated at Princeton in 1804, taught in his native state, and then went to Virginia as tutor in the family of John Taliaferro. After studying law and being admitted to the bar in that state, he returned to New Jersey and settled at Flemington. He was appointed law-reporter by the legislature in 1814, became associate justice of the state supreme court in 1815, was a presidential elector in 1829, and was chosen to the U. S. senate as a Whig in place of James J. Wilson, who had resigned, serving from 16 Feb., 1821, till 3 March, 1823. In September, 1823, he met his father on a joint committee, and they voted together on the Missouri compromise. In September, 1823, he became secretary of the navy, and he served till 3 March, 1829, acting also as secretary of the treasury from 7 March till 1 July, 1823, and taking charge of the portfolio of war for a time. When he was dining with Chief-Justice Kirk- patrick, of New Jer- sey, soon after his appointment to the navy, the judge, aware of his ignorance of nautical affairs, said: Now, Mr. Southard, don’t you honestly suppose that you know the bow from the stern of a frigate? On his retirement from the secretoryship of the navy in 1829 he became attorney-general of New Jersey, and in 1832 he was elected governor of the state. He was chosen U. S. senator again in 1833, and served till his resignation on 3 May, 1842. In 1841, on the death of President Harrison and the consequent accession of John Tyler, he became president of the senate. He was made a trustee of Princeton in 1832, and in 1833 the University of Pennsylvania gave him the degree of L. L. D. Mr. Southard published “Reports of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1816-20” (2 vols., Trenton, 1819-20), and numerous addresses, including a “Centennial Address” (1832), and “Discourse on William Wirt” (Washington, 1834).—Samuel Lew- is, son, Southard's, (1787-1859), was graduated at Princeton in 1836, and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. He published “The Mystery of Godliness,” a series of sermons (New York, 1848), and single discourses.

Philadelphia, Pa., 20 Oct., 1844. In the following year he returned to Constantinople, and was occupied in the duties of his office until 1846. He then came back to the United States and offered his resignation, which was accepted by the house of bishops in October, 1850. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1845, and the same from Trinity in 1846. He was elected bishop of California in 1850 and of Haiti in 1859, but declined. In 1851 he went to Portland, Me., and organized the diocese of Maine, and remained its bishop for three years, resigning in September, 1854. Since that date he had lived in retirement in Southwick, N. Y. Bishop Southgate's chief publications are "Narrative of a Tour through Armenia, Kurdistan, Persia, and Mesopotamia" (2 vols., New York, 1846); "A Narrative of a Visit to the Syrian Jacobite Church of Mesopotamia" (1844); "A Treatise on the Antiquity, Doctrine, Ministry, and Worship of the Anglican Church," in two volumes (1845); "Questions for the Observance of Lent" (New York, 1850); "The War in the East" (1855); "Parochial Sermons" (1859); and "The Cross above the Crescent, a Romance of Constantinople" (Philadelphia, 1875). He had also contributed freely to church and other literature in magazines and reviews.

SOUTHWICK, Solomon, journalist, b. in Newmarket, N. H., 25 Dec., 1818; d. in Albany, N. Y., 18 Nov., 1859. His father was editor of the Newmarket "Mercury," and an active patriot. After engaging in several humble employments the son entered a printing-office in New York city, and in 1829 removed to Albany, where he was employed by his brother-in-law, John Barber, the owner of the Albany "Register." He soon became Barber's partner, and on the latter's death in 1830 succeeded to his interest in the paper and became its sole editor. Under his management it attained great influence in the Democratic party. Mr. Southwick held many local offices at this time, including those of sheriff of the county and postmaster of Albany, and in 1826 he became a regent of the state university. But he quarreled with his party, his position was discontinued, and he turned editor. In 1839 he established "The Ploughboy," the first agricultural paper in the state, conducting it for a time under the pen-name of "Henry Homespun," and then in his own name. About this period he also conducted the "Christian Visitant," a religious periodical. Subsequently he edited the "National Democrat," in opposition to the views of a majority of his party, and presented himself as a candidate for governor. He was afterward nominated by the anti-Masons for the same office, and conducted for several years the "National Observer," which he had established in the interest of that party. Shortly after this he retired from political life, and between 1833 and 1857 delivered courses of lectures on "The Bible," "Self-Education," which were very popular. For the last two years of his life he was connected with the "Family Paper," which was published by his son Alfred. Just before his death, which came suddenly, he had projected a literary and scientific institute, under his personal supervision, to aid young men in pursuing a commercial education. Mr. Southwick held many addresses and pamphlets, including "The Pleasures of Poverty," a poem (Albany, 1833); "A Schema Warning against Free-Masonry" (1827); "A Layman's Apology for the Appointment of Clerical Chaplains"; letters to Thomas Hertlett, under the pen-name of "Sherlock" (1844); and "Five Lessons for Young Men" (1837).

SOUTHWORTH, Constant, colonist, b. in Leyden, Holland, in 1614; d. in Duxbury, Mass., about 1685. His father, Edward, a merchant and business agent for the Leyden Pilgrims, died in 1621, and his mother, a woman of great worth and ability, came over on a vessel to Plymouth colony in 1623 to become the second wife of Gov. William Bradford, whom she had formerly known. The son was educated by his step-father, and in 1633 was one of the early settlers of Duxbury, which he represented in the legislature, becoming also commissioner for the united colonies, governor of the Kennebec plantation, and assistant governor of Plymouth. He was the supposed author of the supplement to "New England's Memorial," by his cousin, Nathaniel Morton (Cambridge, 1669). He bequeathed to one of his daughters two beds and furniture, "provided she do not marry William Fobbes: but if she do, then to have five shillings." The daughter preferred the latter alternative.

SOUTHWORTH, Emma Dorothy, alias Nettie, author, b. in Washington, D. C., 26 Dec., 1819; d. there, 30 June, 1899. She was educated by her step-father, Joshua L. Henshaw, at whose school she was graduated, and married Frederick H. Southworth, of Utica. She taught in a public school in Washington in 1844-5, and while so engaged began to write stories, the first of which, "The Irish Retriever," appeared in "The Baltimore Saturday Visitor." She subsequently wrote for the "National Era," and became one of its regular contributors. In its columns appeared her first novel, "Misfortune." It originally was intended to be a short story, but grew into a long novel, and was afterward issued in book-form (New York, 1849). With unusual rapidity she wrote her succeeding stories, issuing sometimes three in a year, and they have attained great popularity. Her works display strong dramatic power and contain many excellent descriptive passages of southern life and scenery, to which they are chiefly devoted. In 1853 she settled in a villa on the Potomac heights, near Washington, where she lived until 1856, when she removed to Yonkers, N. Y. Mrs. Southworth claims to have invented for her own use the box-envelope that was afterward patented by others. Her published novels are now (1898) about fifty-six in number. A uniform edition, beginning with "Retribution" and ending with "The Fatal Secret," was issued in Philadelphia in 1872. It includes forty-two stories. Since 1871 her stories comprise "Unknown" (1871); "Kneeling on the Serpent" (1873); "Nearest and Dearest" (1881); "The Mother's Secret" (1883); and "An Exile's Bride" (1887); and others were issued serially in the "New York Ledger." Many of Mrs. Southworth's works have been translated into French, German, and Spanish, and are reprinted in London, Paris, Leipzig, Madrid, and Montreal.

SOUTHWORTH, Nathaniel, artist, b. in Salute, Mass., in 1805; d. in Dorchester, Mass., 25 April, 1849. He signed his name Nathaniel, and he established himself as a miniature painter, his portraits being characterized by accurate drawing and very delicate execution. In 1848 he visited Europe, and after his return practised his profession in New York and Philadelphia.

SOUTMAN, Cornelius, South American explorer, b. near Berbice, Dutch Guiana, in 1806; d. in Harlem, Holland, in 1831, and returned to this country after the death of his father to assume the management of his estate. The general peace of 1783 afforded him facilities to follow his natural tastes, and he explored the three Guianas, crossed to Brazil, and was making botanical researches on the banks of the Guayape river when an uprising of the negroes compelled him to flee, abandoning his papers, which were afterwards burned in the hands of the Omari by his pursuers, and, although he was rescued from the stake by a party of friendly Indians, he never afterward completely recovered from the injuries that he had suffered. In 1793 he visited Batavia and the Sunda archipelago, doubled Cape Horn, visited Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, Saint Eustatius, and several of the West Indian and Barbadoes islands and received a valuable collection of medicinal plants. From 1793 till 1799 he was deputy governor of Surinam. Failing health decided him to reside in this country, and he settled in Harlem, devoting his last years to the culture of tulips and endeavoring to naturalize in his fine garden tropical and medicinal plants from Guiana. His works include "Beschrijving van Cayoëne en Surinam, gegeven door het vaste land van Guyana in Amerika." (The Hague, 1822); "Beschrijving eener Reis in Zuid-America, levendige verschillende beschrijvingen en tient medicinale planten in Brazilie en Guyana." (Amsterdam, 1792); "Reis naar Cayoëne en het binnenland van Guyana en Brazilie." (1822); "Beschrijving van Batavia en van de Eilanden van de Zuidelijke Oceani." (1798, 1829); "Geschiedenis der planten van Guyana, in orde gebracht volgens de sexe- en methode." (Harlem, 1746).

SOUSTRE, Henry Victoriun, Chevalier de, French naval officer, b. near Rochefort in 1729; d. at sea, 12 April, 1782. He entered the navy as a midshipman in 1744, and fought at Louisbourg and in the campaign in Canada in 1756-9. After the conclusion of peace he was sent to the station of North America, and made a cruise in 1751 to Halifax and Newfoundland to determine the longitude of several points. When France declared war against England in 1778 he commanded a frigate and was ordered to the West Indies, where he captured several English privateers. Joining afterward Vaubreil's division, he was employed to convoy troops to Martinique and Santo Domingo, and participated under De Guichen in the engagements of 17 April and 15 and 19 May, 1780. When Count de Grasse left for Chesapeake Bay, 5 July, 1781, Souvestre assumed command of the few frigates that were left at the disposal of the Marquis de Bouillé, and successfully opposed the English forces in the West Indies, repelled their landing in Martinique and Santo Domingo, and conveyed the French troops that captured St. Eustatius, Saba, and St. Martin in 1781. Joining Vaubreil's division early in 1782, he assisted at the battle off Dominica, 12 April, 1782, and through his suggestion Vaubreil, when he saw the perilous position of De Grasse, assumed command of the whole fleet. While carrying Vaubreil's orders to the other divisions Souvestre was killed.

SOUZA, Martim Affonso de, Portuguese governor, b. in Coimbra near the end of the 15th century; d. in Goa, India, 1560. The first Souza, an officer of the Order of St. James, was in 1510 given the post of governor in Brazil, America, of which Cabral had taken possession for the crown of Portugal in 1500, had been visited only occasionally by Portuguese vessels, but when King John III. heard that many French vessels came to the coast of Brazil he resolved to colonize the country. In December, 1539, he dispatched from Lisbon a fleet of five sail and four hundred men, the commander of which was a young officer, with the title of governor of Nova Lusitania, and extraordinary powers to distribute land and exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction. Capturing three French vessels laden with Brazil-wood, he touched the American coast at Cape St. Augustine, whence he dispatched Diego Lede with two ships to explore the coast northward to Amazon river, while he continued to the south, entering Bahia and Rio de Janeiro, where he remained for some time to construct two brigantines and take fresh water. Continuing his voyage to the south, he anchored, on 22 Aug., 1531, at the island of Abino, where from some Spanish settlers he obtained reports of rich mines. He landed near Carneu, and sent into the interior an expedition of eighty men, who discovered the impresible distance of the San Lucho, who had been shipwrecked long ago on the coast, and had received aid and protection from the savages. He arrived with the chief Tybiria at São Vicente, and made a treaty between the hostile Indians and Souza, who thenceforward always received assistance and support from the savages. Besides this colony, Souza, by the advice of Rafael de Castro, sailed in 1532 for the coast of Pratininga on the bank of the river of that name. He sent his brother with a report of his discoveries to Portugal, and established in the neighborhood of the colony the first sugar-mill in the country, having brought cane-plantations from the island of Madeira. In 1533 he was recalled to his native country to consult about the partition of the newly erected hereditary captaincies, but, although he was given the richest of the two, that of São Vicente, he did not return, but in 1544 sailed for India, where he acquired great military fame and died. His brother, Pero Lopes, b. in Coimbra about 1500; d. on the coast of Madagasca in 1559, had served in the navy against the Mediterranean corsairs, when, in 1530, he was appointed by his brother commander of one of the vessels of the expedition to Brazil. He took a principal part in the capture of the French ships, and the command of the largest prize was awarded to him. After saving Martim Affonso from the shipwreck at Chuy, he was sent with his two vessels to explore the river Plate, with orders to rally to the island of Palmas. He sailed on 23 Nov., entered the estuary of the Plate, and beyond the confluence of the Uruguay explored the Parana for a considerable distance above 30 S., returning on 27 Dec., 1541. Having joined his brother at Palmas, he participated in the foundation of São Vicente, and in May, 1542, was sent with despatches to Portugal, being also commissioned to give a detailed report to King John. On the division of the land into capitanies on 28 Sept., 1532, he was awarded two tracts of twenty-five leagues, and sailed in 1535 with a party of colonists to occupy the northern division between Paraná and Pernambuco, but, meeting with opposition from a neighboring tribe, the Potiguares, he went to Europe to collect more money for colonization. He was offered the command of a fleet to the East Indies, and, hoping to obtain funds from his brother, he accepted, but perished on his return voyage by shipwreck on the coast of Madagascar. The manuscript of his report to King John III. lay in the royal archives till it was published by Adolpho de Varnhagen under the title, "Diario de navegacao da Armada, que fôi a terra do Brasil em 1530," (Lisbon, 1829).

SOUZA, Thomé de, first governor-general of Brazil, b. in Souza, Beira, early in the 16th century; d. in Lisbon about 1560. In the hereditary capitanies that had been established in Brazil abuses soon became general, so that King John III., on 7 Jan., 1549, ordered the organization of a general government, or government by rotation, whereby the captain of the colony that he had granted to the captains. For the execution of this difficult and important work the royal choice fell upon Thomé de Souza, a natural son of one of the first families, a prudent and enlightened officer and statesman, who had achieved renown in the wars of Africa and India. He sailed from Lisbon on 2 Feb., 1549, with a squadron of ships, having been granted half the profits of the voyage. In 1551 he was invested with the title of marquis of Parahiba, and at the same time was made viceroy and governor of Brazil, with a board of five councilors, four hundred pardoned convicts, several families as colonists, some artillery officers, engineers, mechanics, and six Jesuits under the head of Father Manuel de Nobrega. On 29 March he entered the harbor of Todos os Santos. The aged Diego Alvares Caramaro (see PARAGUASSO) hastened to welcome the governor-general, and his allies, the Tupinambás, offered their services. There Souza founded a city, naming it São Salvador, which was afterward changed to Bahia de todos os Santos. The assistance that he received from the Tupinambás hastened the progress of building, and soon the cathedral, the governor's palace, a Jesuit college, and one hundred houses had been completed. He organized the administration by a council of justices and other authorities. The colony flourished under Souza's prudent administration, and numerous emigrants arrived, founding new villages. In 1551 a bishopric was established in Bahia, with jurisdiction over the whole Portuguese colony. Souza, weakened by the fatigues of his responsible office, solicited relief, and on 19 July, 1553, his successor, Duarte de Costa, arrived, to whom he delivered the government and sailed for Portugal.

SOWARDS, Joseph, scout, b. in eastern Kentucky about 1840; d. there about 1863. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and at the beginning of the civil war occupied, with his aged father, a small farm in the upper part of Johnson county, Ky. He was a devoted Unionist. The threats of his neighbors caused him to take refuge in the woods. While he was thus in hiding a party demanded of his father his place of concealment, and, on the latter's refusal to disclose it, Judge Cecil, his number, shot the old man dead before his own doorway. Sowards now enlisted in the 8th Kentucky regiment in the National army, and in December, 1861, was selected by Col. James A. Garfield as a scout. Sowards rendered important services, among others going, at imminent risk, into Marshall's camp on the eve of the battle of Middle Creek and reporting to Garfield an ambuscade into which he would doubtless have fallen but for this timely information. On Marshall's retreat from that battle, Judge Cecil was captured, and Sowards upbraided him with the death of his aged father. A taunting reply caused Sowards to lose his self-control, and he shot Cecil as Cecil had shot his father. A court-martial sentenced Sowards to death; but Garfield was careful to explain upon his colonel to select as his guard only such men as were especially friendly to the prisoner, who naturally was allowed to escape. After this he performed the most important services, hanging about Garfield's camp and giving constant information as to the movements of the enemy. No one knew how he lived or where he could be found, but he was sure to appear whenever he was wanted. Through him Garfield was enabled to drive the last organized body of Gen. Humphrey Marshall's men from Kentucky. They had strongly intrenched themselves at Pound Gap, and were fast receiving re-enforcements from Virginia, when Sowards penetrated their camp, learned their strength and position, and then returned to Garfield's lines with the suggestion that he should fall upon and destroy them. The result was the Pound Gap expedition, which Sowards guided over a hundred miles of rough road and through a blinding snow-storm. He was so thoroughly disguised that Garfield, though he knew Sowards was with the troop, did not recognize him until he disclosed himself on the eve of the battle. This is the last that is certainly known of Sowards, but he is reported to have been killed in the following year by a band of Confederate guerrillas.

SOWER, Christopher, printer, b. in Lanshoffer near Marburg, Germany, in 1833; d. in Germantown, Pa., 25 Sept., 1798. He wrote his name Christophe Sauer on his German publications. He was a graduate of a German university, and studied medicine at Halle. He came to Philadelphia in 1724 and settled in Lancaster county as a farmer, but removed in 1731 to Germantown, where, in the same year, he built a large dwelling (see engraving) for his residence. In order to supply the needs of his countrymen who were liberally educated, especially in theology, he first supplied them with Bibles and religious works from Germany. He published almanacs, and gave a weekly news and subscription papers, and issued an almanac, in German, of twenty-four pages, which was continued by his descendants till 1788. In 1739 he brought out the first number of "Der Hoch-Deutsch Pansylvanische Geschichte-Schreiber," a religious and secular journal, a small folio, nine by thirteen inches, which attained a circulation of nearly ten thousand, and had great influence among his countrymen. It was the first of its kind that was published in a foreign language in Pennsylvania. This was followed by a number of larger works and in 1748 by a quarto edition of the Bible in German, Luther's translation, which was limited
SPAIGHT, Richard Dobbs, governor of North Carolina, b. in New Bern, N. C., 25 March, 1758; d. there, 6 Sept., 1802. His father, Richard, was a member of the king's council in 1757, and secretary of North Carolina under the crown in 1762. His mother was the sister of Arthur Dobbs, governor of the colony in 1733-65. The son lost his parents at eight years of age and received his education abroad, being graduated at the University of Glasgow. He returned home in 1778, and at twenty years of age took to the bar. He was a delegate to the convention to frame the constitution of the United States in 1787, and was active in the proceedings. In the Hillsboro', N. C., convention in July, 1788, though afterward a Jeffersonian Republican, he earnestly SOWER, Christopher, b. in Georgenthal, Germany, 9 Oct. 1783; d. at Norristown, Pa., 21 Nov., 1821, removed the establishment to Philadelphia in 1841, where he continued publishing, first in his own name, then successively as Sower and Barnes, Sower, and Barnes and Potts; and Sower, Potts and Co. in 1880. He died while still a child five years after his father's death. He was his father's assistant when the business was incorporated as the Christopher Sower company by a charter granted by the state. Charles G. Sower remains as president of the company.

advocated the adoption of the U.S. constitution, but in vain. He had been in correspondence with Gen. Washington on the subject, and the following interesting paragraph occurs in an unpublished letter to Gov. Spaight, dated Mt. Vernon, May 27, 1788: "I am sorry to find by your letter that the state of North Carolina is so much opposed to the proposed government. If a better could be agreed on, it might be well to reject this; but without such a prospect (and I confess none appears to me), policy I think must recommend the one that is submitted." On the invitation of Mr. Spaight, Washington visited North Carolina, and, in consequence of their united councils, North Carolina ratified the constitution, 31 Nov. 1789. Owing to feeble health Gov. Spaight retired during four years from public life. In 1792 he was elected to the legislature, and he was immediately chosen governor by that body, being the first native of the state that was chief magistrate. In 1793 and 1797 he was a presidential elector. He was a member of congress from 1798 till 1801, and in the latter year sat in the North Carolina senate. He died of a wound that he had received in a duel with John Stanly, his successor in congress.—His eldest son, Richard Dobbs, governor of North Carolina, b. in New Bern, N. C., in 1786; d. there in 1859. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1805, and was a member of the legislature in 1819, and of the state senate in 1829-32. He sat in congress in 1832-5, was again state senator in 1835-36, and governor of the state in 1835-7, being the last governor that was elected by the legislature. Gov. Spaight was a member of the Constitutional convention of 1837, which transferred the election to the popular vote.

SPALDING, Henry Hamry, missionary, b. in Bath, N. Y., in 1804; d. in Lapwai, Idaho, 3 Aug., 1874. He was graduated at Western Reserve college in 1833, and entered the class of 1837 in Lane theological seminary, but left, without graduation, upon his appointment in 1836 by the American board as missionary to the Nez Perces Indians of Idaho. He remained at Lapwai till 1847, when he fled with his family to the Willamette valley upon the murder of his associate, and all those that were attached to his post at Walla-Walla, by the Indians. After this he labored fourteen years among the savages, using his translations of the Scriptures, and acting also in 1846 and 1847 as Indian agent of Oregon. He returned to Lapwai in 1852, combining with his mission work that of superintendent of education for the Nez Percés Indians till 1871. His labors thereafter were under the auspices of the Presbyterians board of missions, and were in northwestern Idaho and northeastern Washington territories. Several thousands of Indians were civilized, converted, and educated by him, and many became professing Christians. Mr. Spalding translated parts of the Bible into the Nez Percé language, which he had reduced to writing.

SPALDING, James Reed, journalist, b. in Montpelier, Vt., 15 Nov., 1821; d. in Dover, N. H., 10 Oct., 1872. His father was for nearly half of a century a well-known physician in Lebanon, Vt. The son was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1840, and was a private tutor in Georgia, at the same time studying law. On his return to Montpelier he was admitted to the bar, but his literary tastes led him to give up his profession, and he spent several years in travel throughout Europe and into Asia as a student of manners, morals, and politics. He was a witness of the events of the French revolution of 1848. His letters to the New York "Courier and Enquirer" during his sojourn abroad won great admiration by their philosophical grasp of events and persons and brilliancy of style. On his return to the United States in the spring of 1850 he became attached to the "Courier and Enquirer" as its leading writer. His reputation was in 1859 to the establishment of the New York "World," and his headship of it. The design of the enterprise was altogether new—that of a model journal conducted throughout on Christian principles, independent of particular parties or political parties, which he firmly opposed. The financial crisis that attended the progress of the undertaking compelled the paper that it passed under a new management and editorship. In 1862 Mr. Spalding took a post in the editorial corps of the New York "Times," and many of its patriotic editorials were from his pen. He was stricken with paralysis when in the full vigor of his powers, and died after years of sickness. Richard Grant White, who was associated with him both in the "Courier and Enquirer" and the "World," wrote of Mr. Spalding: "With a theme congenial and an occasion to arouse his vigor and elegance have never been excelled by a writer upon the city press." His published addresses are "Spiritual Philosophy and Material Politics" (1854), and "The True Idea of the National Policy," 1861. John Burley, clergyman, b. in Montpelier, Vt., 11 Aug., 1835, was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1856, studied law at Tallahassee, Fla., spent two years at Union theological seminary, New York city, and was graduated at Andover seminary in 1861. He was ordained at Vergennes, Vt., the same year, and after holding Congregational pastorates in Horsefly, Caledonia, and other places in Manchester, N. H., took charge in 1885 of the 1st Presbyterian church in Syracuse, N. Y., which place he now holds. Dr. Spalding has done much editorial work on the New York "World," the "Times," the "Watchman," Boston, and the "New Hampshire Journal," which was established by him in 1841. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of New Hampshire in 1837, and of the legislature of the same year. He received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth in 1878. Dr. Spalding has travelled extensively in the Old World. His published sermons and addresses include "Sermon Commemorative of Gen. Samuel F. Strong" (1854); "Scriptural Policy," a political tract (1860); "The Christian, John Parker Hall" (1859); and "The Idea and Necessity of Normal-School Training" (1878). SPALDING, John Franklin, P. E. bishop, b. in Belgrade, Me., 25 Aug., 1828. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1853, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, in 1857, and was ordained deacon in Portland, Me., 8 July, 1857, and ordained a priest, 17 July, 1858, in St. Stephen's church, Belgrade, Me., 14 July, 1858, by the same bishop. He did missionary duty in Old Town, Me., for two years, was rector of St. George's church, Lee, Mass., in 1859-60 assistant minister in Grace church, Providence, R. I., in 1860-1, officiated for a short time in St. John's church, Providence, in 1862, became rector of St. Paul's church, Erie, Pa. This post he held for nearly twelve years. Having been elected missionary bishop of Colorado, with jurisdiction in the territory of Wyoming, he was consecrated in St. Paul's church, Erie, 31 Dec., 1873. Trinité gave him the degree of D. D. in 1874. Bishop Spalding is author of "A Devotional Manual," several tracts, and numerous occasional sermons and addresses. His latest publication is entitled "The Church and its Apostolic Ministry," a course of lectures delivered in St. Mark's church, Denver, in January, 1887 (Milwaukee: Wis., 1887).

SPALDING, Lyman, physician, b. in Cornish, N. H., 5 June, 1755; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 30 Oct., 1831. He was graduated at Harvard medical school, with the degree of M. B., in 1776. In 1788, while still a student, he assisted Prof. Nathan Smith in establishing the medical school at Dartmouth, and also prepared chemical apparatus. He delivered the first course of lectures at the opening of the institution, and published "A New Nomenclature of Chemistry, proposed by Messrs. De Mo- van, Lavoisier, Berthollet and Fourcroy, with Additions and Improvements" (1799). His medical studies were afterward continued at Cambridge and Philadelphia, and he entered upon the practice of medicine at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1799. He was given the degree of M. D. by Dartmouth in 1804 and Harvard in 1811. He devoted much attention to the study of the human structure, was a skilful anatomist, and his preparations, particularly of the lymphatics, were highly praised. In 1812 the College of physicians and surgeons of the western district of the state of New York, at Fairfield, Herkimer co., was incorporated, Dr. Spalding being elected president and professor of anatomy, and he made annual visits to this school. In 1813 he removed to New York city and, a few years later, resigned his position at the college. With Dr. Spalding originated the plan for the formation of the "Pharmacopoeia of the United States," by the authority of all the medical societies and medical schools in the Union. In January, 1817, he submitted the project to the New York county medical society. In February, 1818, it was adopted by the Medical society of the state of New York and ordered to be carried into execution by their committee, Dr. Spalding being one of the number. The first edition of the work was published in 1820, and a new one is issued every ten years. Dr. Spalding was a contributor to medical and philosophical journals, and, besides several lectures and addresses, published "Reflections on Fever, and particularly on the Inflammatory Character of Fever" (1817); "Reflections on Yellow-Fever Periods" (1819); and "A History of the Introduction and Use of Scantellaria Lateritiflora as a Remedy for Preventing and curing Hydrophobia" (1819). Dr. Spalding went to the United States the practice of vaccination as a preventive of the small-pox. He was a trustee of the only free schools that New York then possessed, and aided in the establishment of the first Sunday schools in that city.

SPALDING, Martin John, archbishop, b. near Lebanon, Mass., 26 Feb., 1802; d. in Baltimore, Md., 7 Feb., 1862. In 1821 he went to St. Joseph's seminary in Marion county, where he was graduated in 1826. He then studied theology in St. Joseph's seminary, Bardstown, for four years, and then in the Urban college of the propaganda, Rome, where he won his doctor's diploma by defending for seven hours in Latin 256 theological propositions against some of the ablest theologians of the United States. He was ordained priest on 13 Aug., 1834, and on his return to Kentucky was charged with the pastorate of the cathedral at Bardstown and with the professorship of philosophy in the diocesan college. He was instrumental in founding the "Catholic Advocate," and his articles in this journal attracted wide attention among Roman Catholics in the United States. In 1828 he was appointed president of St. Joseph's college. After holding this post two years he was transferred to the pastorate of St. Peter's church in Lexington. Upon the removal of the see from Bardstown to Louisville in 1841 he returned to the former city, where his presence was thought necessary to reconcile the Roman Catholic inhabitants to the change. In 1844 he was called to Louisville and appointed vicar-general. The age of Bishop Flaget and the illness of his coadjutor to a great extent threw the administration of the diocese into the hands of Dr. Spalding, yet he was frequently engaged in giving lectures in Louisville and other cities, and at the same time prepared some of his works for the press. In February, 1848, he was appointed coadjutor bishop of Louisville, and he was consecrated bishop of Lengene in partibus on 10 Sept. following. He provided for the establishment of parochial schools, a building orphan asylum for boys at St. Thomas and one for boys and girls of German parentage in Louisville, and laid the foundation of a cathedral. He recalled the Jesuits into his diocese, and the Trappist abbey at Gethsemane was established under his auspices. After taking steps to have his diocese divided and the see of Covington created, he visited Europe in 1853-54 to obtain assistants. He then set about establishing the St. Vincent de Paul society, which soon had conferences in the principal towns. In 1857 he founded the American college in Louvain, which up to 1884 has sent 301 priests to the missions of the United States. At the beginning of the Know-Nothing movement he became involved in a controversy with George D. Prentice, and during the riots in Louisville in 1855 he showed great prudence, his influence probably preventing the disturbances from assuming larger proportions. Bishop Spalding did much to secure hospital accommodations for the sick of the National troops that were encamped around Louisville in the first year of the civil war. On the death of Archbishop Kenrick in June, 1864, Bishop Spalding was transferred to the see of Baltimore and installed as archbishop on 31 July. He founded the House of the Good Shepherd in Baltimore, and opened a boys' seminary, which he placed in charge of the Xaverian Brothers. In 1865 he was appointed administrator of the diocese of Charleston, the bishop of which was unable to return, and made successful appeals to the Roman Catholics of the north in aid of their southern brethren. He also secured important contributions for the American college at Rome. In 1868 he presided over the second plenary council of Baltimore, the largest assembly of the kind since the general council of Trent. The work that this body performed was entirely planned by Archbishop Spalding. In 1867 he was present in Rome at the 15th centenary of the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, and again in 1869-70 as a member of the canonical council of Vatican. He was at first opposed to the definition of the dogma of the pope's infallibility on the ground that it was inopportune, but gradually became convinced of its necessity. During the deliberations of the council his scholarship and theological ability produced a marked impression.

After his return to Baltimore in 1870 he made a visitation of his diocese, delivered lectures for the benefit of local charities, built fine parochial schools near his cathedral, and began the Church of St. Pius. Archbishop Spalding acquired great reputation as a lecturer and pulpit orator. He contributed largely to the Roman Catholic literature of the country, and takes high rank as a reviewer. He was for some time one of the editors of the "United States Catholic Magazine." His principal works are: D'Abingh's "History of the Reformation in Ireland" (Baltimore, 1844, 1846); Dublin, 1846; "Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions in Kentucky 1857-1826-7" (Louisville, 1846); "Lectures on the General Evidence of Christianity" (1847; 4th ed., Baltimore, 1866); "Life, Times, and Character of the Rt. Rev. B. J. Flaget" (Louisville, 1852); "Miscellanea: comprising Reviews, Lectures, and Essays on Historical, Theological, and Miscellaneous Subjects" (1855); and "History of the Protestant Reformation in Germany and Switzerland, and in England, Ireland, Scotland, the Netherlands, France, and Northern Europe" (2 vols., 1860).

He also edited, with an introduction and notes, Abbé Darras's "General History of the Catholic Church" (4 vols. New York, 1819), and "History of Archbishop Spalding," which was written by his nephew, John Lancaster Spalding, bishop of Peoria (New York, 1872).—His brother, Benedict Joseph, clergyman, b. in Marion county, Ky., 15 April, 1812; d. in Louisville, Ky., 4 Aug., 1868, studied at St. Mary's college, and entered the diocesan seminary in Bardstown, Ky. In 1832 he went to the College of the Propaganda, where he was ordained a priest five years later, and then entered the priesthood of the Roman Catholic church. On his return to the United States in 1837 he taught for a time in the theological seminary of St. Thomas, and was afterward made agent of St. Joseph's college. In 1840, with the Rev. John Hutchins, he established a seminary for boys in Breckinridge county, which they carried on until 1845, when the latter returned to Bardstown in 1842 to accept the vice-presidency of St. Joseph's college, and continued in that place until 1844, when he was made pastor of the church of St. Joseph, in Bardstown. In 1847 he was called to the charge of the cathedral church in Louisville, and was appointed vicar-general of the diocese. These offices he held until his death, with two exceptions, when during the vacancy of the see he was invested by his superiors with the administration of the bishopric. He received no salary beyond his food and clothing, but gave largely of his own private fortune to those that were in need. Father Spalding was greatly beloved by both Roman Catholics and Protestants for his blameless life, his liberality in his self-sacrificing love for the pope, and he was accordingly consecrated bishop of the new see on 1 May by Cardinal M'Coskey in the cathedral of New York. His administration has been marked by energy, and he has had signal success in developing the resources of his diocese. In 1857 it contained 55 churches, 51 priests, and about 45,000 Roman Catholics. In 1877 there were 163 churches, 113 priests, 32 clerical students, 32 religious institutions, 9 academies, 41 parochial schools, an orphan asylum, and 5 hospitals. Bishop Spalding has given much attention to the question of emigration, and his efforts have attracted numerous emigrants to the west. He also labored successfully to establish a Roman Catholic University in the United States, and his plans for carrying out this enterprise were adopted by the council of Baltimore in 1884. He is a contributor to Roman Catholic periodicals and reviews and the author of the "Life of Archbishop Spalding" (New York, 1872); "Essays and Reviews" (1876); "Religious Mission of the Irish People" (1889); and "Lectures and Discourses" (1882).—Their kinswoman, Catherine, first superior of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, b. in Charlestown, Md., 23 Dec., 1793; d. in Louisville, Ky., 29 March, 1858, was left an orphan at the age of four, and was brought up by an aunt in Kentucky. In 1813 she became a member of a new society of Sisters of Charity, which had been instituted by the Rev. John Spalding, her brother, who was made superior, and, under the patronage of the bishop, opened the convent of Nazareth. In 1814 she established a boarding and day school near the convent, which increased rapidly in numbers and reputation. In 1816 the order was regularly organized, and Mother Spalding and two of her associates were allowed to take the ordinary vows. In 1818 the order was adopted by the pope, who established the Bethlehem day-school, and in 1829 St. Vincent convent was founded in Union county. She opened St. Catherine's school in Scott county in 1823. It was afterward removed to Lexington, where it still exists, and is regarded as one of the community's most flourishing establishments. The Academy of the Presentation was opened in Louisville in 1823, and Mother Spalding took personal charge. She also began the founding of St. Vincent's orphan asylum, in which afterward provision was made for 200 orphan girls, and opened an infirmary. The rest of her life was spent principally in caring for the wants of orphan children, or in visiting the poor and sick of the city. The illness of which she died was contracted while she was hastening through the snow to aid a poor family that lived at some distance from the asylum. Mother Spalding belonged to a family that is distinguished in the annals of the Roman Catholic church in the United States. She was nearly related to Archbishop Spalding and Archbishop Elder. SPALDING, John R., jurist, b. in West Tisbury, Martha's Vineyard, Mass., 3 May, 1798; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 29 Aug., 1886. He was graduated at Yale in 1817, and subsequently studied law under Zephania Swift, chief justice of Connecticut, whose daughter, Lucretia, he married in 1823. In 1819 he was admitted to practice in Little Rock, Ark., but in 1821 he went to Warren, Ohio. Sixteen years later he moved to Ravenna, Ohio, and he was sent to the legislature in 1839-40 as a Democrat, serving as speaker in 1841-2. In 1849 he was elected judge of the supreme court of Ohio for seven years, but when, three years later, the new state constitution was adopted, he declined a re-election and began practice in Cleveland. In 1852 he entered political life as a Freesoiler, and he was one of the organizers of the Republican party. He was a member of congress in 1863-9, where he served on important committees, but he subsequently declined all political honors. Judge Spalding exercised an important influence in restoring the Masonic order to its former footing and in the establishment of the Wisconsin Masonic College.

SPALDING, Simon, soldier, b. in Plainfield, Conn., 16 Jan., 1742; d. 24 Jan., 1814. He removed to Wyoming, Pa., in 1772, and was a soldier in the Revolutionary army, becoming a lieutenant, 26 Aug., 1776, and being promoted to captain, 24 June, 1778. He was present at the action of Bound Brook, N. J., 13 April, 1777, and the escape of the Americans with slight loss was largely due to his personal efforts. He served until the close of the war, and he was in the Sullivan campaign during which he and his company won honor for heroic service. On 30 May, 1783, he removed to Shesquin, Bradford co., Pa., the upper part of the Wyoming settlement, where he rose through the various grades to general of militia. He was a large landholder.

SPANGENBERG, Augustus Gottlieb, Moravian bishop, b. in Klettenburg, Prussia, 15 July, 1704; d. in Berthelsdorf, near Herrnhut, Saxony, 18 Sept., 1792. He was graduated at Jena, and then became an assistant professor in the university there. Subsequently he was appointed to a professor's chair at Halle, but his association with Zinzendorf and other Moravians caused his dismissal at the instance of a group of politicians, who felt that he was dismissed from the university, and joined their church. In 1735 he put himself at the head of a body of Moravian immigrants, and established a colony at Savannah, Ga. Thither came Bishop David Nitschmann, who ordained Spangenberg a presbyter of the church, and sent him to Pennsylvania, where he labored among the German sects. Such work was interrupted by a visit that the bishop commissioned him to undertake to the mission in St. Thomas. After his return he resumed his labors in Pennsylvania, went to Savannah in order to cheer his brethren, who were in distress on account of the war impending between England and Spain, and finally sailed for Europe in 1739. Having been appointed to preside over the Moravian churches in the American colonies, he was conducted to the episcopal see, 15 June, 1744, at Herrnhut. He arrived at Bethlehem, Pa., in the autumn of the same year, and, with the exception of a brief period from 1749 till 1751, which he spent in Europe, ruled the church until 1761 with singular ability. The settlers at Bethlehem, Nazareth, and other Moravian stations were poor and had heavy financial engagements to meet, but Spangenberg provided for them with such care, and managed the affairs of the entire colony so successfully, that his brethren gave him the honorary name of "Joseph." This name he accepted, and used it in signing his letters, and occasionally even official documents. In the year after his arrival at Bethlehem he undertook a visit to Onondaga, the capital of the Six Nations, with whom he concluded a treaty that had in view the establishment of a mission among them. On this journey, which proved to be very arduous and full of dangers, he was adopted into the Iroquois confederacy, receiving the name of Tzirhitonite, or a Row of Trees. In 1752, accompanied by five associates, he made his way into the wilds of North Carolina, where he superintended the survey of a large tract of land that the church had bought from Lord Granville. It was a hazardous and difficult undertaking. In the following year he visited Europe and reported to Count Zinzendorf on the progress of the American work, returning in 1754. During the French and Indian war, and especially after the massacre of the missionaries on the Mahone, near what is now Manch Chunk, Pa., 24 Nov., 1755, he displayed no little courage. Bethlehem became the frontier town in the direction of the Indian country, was surrounded with a multitude of savages, and at the close of the war, Spangenberg was in stated correspondence with the governor of Pennsylvania, who acknowledged the great benefit the bishop was conferring upon the whole colony by thus holding his town. After the conclusion of the war he resumed those visits to the Indian country in which he had always taken a particular delight, and baptized several converts. In 1760 Zinzendorf died, and Spangenberg was called to Europe in order to assist in the government of the Unias Pratrum according to the new constitution. He took his seat in the chief executive board, of which body he was the president for twenty-three years. He lived to be eighty-eight years of age, and his episcopate continued for forty-eight years. Spangenberg was the author of a number of great works, and yet as a Christian humbly as a little child. His presence was commanding; his countenance showed the nobility of his character and the love of an overflowing heart. Among his numerous works the most important are "Die Fidei Futrum" (Barby, 1782; translated into English by La Trobe under the title "Exposition of Christian Doctrine," London, 1784; also "Befugung richtiger Antworten" (Leipsic, 1781); and "Schlusschrift" (1752); two polemical works in defence of Zinzendorf; and "Leben der Grafen von Zinzendorf" (3 vols., Barby, 1782-4); abridged English translation, London, 1885). There are two biographies of Spangenberg, Jeremiah Risler's "Leben Spangenberg" (Barby, 1784), and Carl F. Leiderhose's "Leben A. G. Spangenberg, Bischof der Brüdergemeinde" (Heidelberg, 1846; French translation, Toulouse, 1850; English, London, 1856).

SPARHAWK, Frances Campbell, author, b. in Amesbury, Mass., about 1858. Her education was received in private schools. The poet Whittier was an early and intimate friend of her father, Dr. Thomas Sparhawk. She has published a large number of tales and poems, among which are "The New England Monthly," "The Christian Prince," and "The Bay State Monthly." Her most important contribution to serial fiction is entitled "Elizabeth," a romance of colonial days, and describes New England and the siege of Louisburg. This appeared in "The Bay State Monthly." She is also the author of "A Lazy Man's Work" (New York, 1881); "Little Polly Blatchley" (Boston, 1887), and "Miss West's Class in Geography" (1888).

SPARKMAN, James Truslow, reformer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 27 Sep., 1842. He was educated at Brooklyn polytechnic institute and at Tarrytown institute, after which he followed a special course of commercial training. In 1861 he entered into business with his father, James D. Sparkman, who was a large importing merchant, with whom he continued in business after the Civil war. Mr. Sparkman has been active in politics, although not holding office, and his opinion and counsel are valued by the leaders of the Democratic party. In recent years he has advocated various measures of reform, notably the labor-day bill, the half-holiday bill, the small-parks bill, and the tenant-house reform bill, and has been especially successful in securing the passage of measures of reformatory legislation. He secured the commutation of the sentence of the Theois boycotters, who were imprisoned for a long period at a time when public feeling was bitter against them. Mr. Sparkman has contributed to various periodicals.

Jared Sparks, historian, b. in Wilmington, Conn. 10 May, 1789; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 14 March, 1856. He obtained in 1809 a scholarship in Phillips Exeter academy, through the influence of Rev. Abel Abbott, and, after remaining two years, entered Harvard, where he was also given a scholarship, which he supplemented by teaching during a part of the year. While employed in a private school at Haver de Graces, Md., in 1813, he served in the militia against the British, who captured and burned the town. After his graduation in 1815 he taught a classical course at Lancaster, Mass., but he returned to the university in 1817 to study divinity, and for the two years that he was there he was tutor in mathematics and natural philosophy in the college and editing editor of the "North American Review." In May, 1819, after the completion of his theological studies, he was ordained pastor of a new Unitarian church in Baltimore, Md. He took part in the doctrinal controversy with orthodox theologians. In 1821 he was chosen chaplain of the National house of representatives. He edited in 1821-3 a monthly periodical called the "Unitarian Miscellany and Christian Monitor," in which he printed letters addressed to Rev. Samuel Miller on the "Comparative Moral Tendency of Trinitarian and Unitarian Dogms." That were afterward expanded and republished in a volume (Boston, 1832). He resigned his pastorate in Baltimore in 1823 on account of impaired health, and, after a journey in the western states, returned to Boston and purchased the "North American Review," which he conducted from January, 1824, till April, 1831. He undertook in 1824 the task of collecting and editing the writings of George Washington, and, after examining the papers in the public archives of the thirteen states of the continental federation, he secured possession, through an arrangement with Bushrod Washington and Chief-Justice John Marshall, of the papers of Geo. Washington that were preserved at Mount Vernon. In 1828 he went to Europe for the purpose of transcribing documents in the government archives at London and at Paris. Several years later he made a second journey to Europe, and, in his renewed researches among the French archives, discovered the map with the red line marked upon it, concerning which, and the use made of it by the winning of the last great battle of the Revolutionary War, in which Washington took a prominent part. In 1829 he was made a member of the board of trustees of the University of Washington. In 1830 he was associated with the "American Almanac and Repository of Useful Knowledge," (Boston, 1830-41). He was professor of ancient and modern history at Harvard from 1839 till 1843, and president of the college from February, 1843, till February, 1844, when he resigned on account of failing health. He devoted his last years to a work on the "History of the American Revolution," which he left unfinished. He received the degree of LL.D. from Harvard in 1843, and was a member of many learned societies. The first volume that Dr. Sparks published was "Letters on the Ministry, Ritual, and Doctrines of the Protestant Episcopal Church," in reply to a sermon of Rev. William E. Wyatt directed against Unitarian doctrines (Baltimore, 1820). His sermon before the house of representatives on the death of William Pacrner was printed (Washington, 1829). He began in Baltimore, and continued in Boston, the publication of a "Collection of Essays and Tracts in Theology from Various Authors," with biographical and critical notices (6 vols., 1833-5). In 1837 he published, in the form of two letters to Judge Joseph Story, an account of the Washington papers at Mount Vernon, with a plan for their publication. His "Life of John Ledyard" (Cambridge, 1829), which was translated into German (Leipsic, 1829). While engaged in collecting the public and private writings of President Washington, Sparks, by authority of congress, gathered and edited "The Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, being the Letters of Benjamin Franklin, Silas Deane, John Adams, John Jay, John Laurens, John Izard, Francis Dana, William Carmichael, Henry Laurens, John Laurens, and others, concerning the Foreign Relations of the United States during the Whole Revolution: together with the Letters in Reply from the Secret Committee of Congress and the Secretary of Foreign Affairs; also the Entire Correspondence of the French Ministers, Gerard and Lazure, with Congress" (12 vols., Boston, 1829-30). He also wrote at this time "The Life of Gouverneur Morris" (3 vols., 1832). After nine years of preparatory labor he began the publication of "The Writings of George Washington, being his Correspondence, Addresses, Messages, and other Papers, Official and Private, selected from the Original Manuscripts, with a Life of the Author, Notes, and Illustrations" (12 vols., 1834-8). The first volume, containing the "Life of Washington," appeared in 1835, and was reissued separately (Boston, 1839). An abridgment by the author was also published (2 vols., Boston, 1843). Those parts of the correspondence that were of interest to the French public, with the biography in the introduction, appeared in Paris in 1839 as a separate book. In 1840 he published a new edition of "Vie, correspondance et écrits de Washington," with an introductory discourse by François P. G. Guizot on the influence and character of Washington in the American Revolution (6 vols. and atlas, Paris, 1839-40). The first volume of the correspondence was reprinted in London, but found no sale. An English publisher issued the "Personal Memoirs and Diary of George Washington, with the name of Jared Sparks on the title-page, though without his authorization" (2 vols., London, 1839). Friedrich von Ranke made a German translation of the biography, with extracts from the writings (Leipsic, 1839). Historians and critics generally accorded praise to Sparks for the thoroughness and accuracy of his work; yet his manner of writing linguistic and historical, and suppressing objectionable words and passages, drew upon him the unfriendly criticism of Lord Mahon, who charged the editor not only with omissions, but with substituting and interpolating passages, afterward withdrawing the latter part of the charge. Mr. Sparks, in a "Reply to Lord Mahon and Others" (1832), defended his mode of editing. The letters of Washington to Joseph Reed that were referred to in the controversy were reprinted in their original form (Philadelphia, 1852), eliciting from Sparks "Remarks on a Reprint of Washington.
ton's Letters" (1853). Sparks was the editor of "The Library of American Biography" (10 vols., Boston, 1834-38), containing twenty-six lives, to which a second series of thirty-four lives was added (15 vols., 1844-7). This work passed through many editions. Of the lives he wrote these of Ethan Allen, Benedict Arnold, Father Marquette, Lord Byron,修理, Charles H. and John Ledyard, the latter being reprinted from his previously published work. He edited also the "Works of Benjamin Franklin, with Notes and a Life of the Author" (10 vols., 1836-40). The first volume, containing Franklin's "Autobiography," with notes and a continuation by Mr. Sparks, was issued separately (1844). Besides his "Remarks on American History" (Boston, 1852), additions to William Smyth's "Lectures on Modern History" (Boston, 1841), and other minor works, his only other publication was "Correspondence of the American Revolution, being Letters of Eminent Men to George Washington from the Time of his taking Command of the Army to the End of his Presidency" (4 vols., 1853). He left manuscript journals and a number of autographs, containing those of James Madison, and other eminent men, and recorded conversations with many of them.
His manuscript collection of original materials for American diplomatic history was given to Harvard college. See a "Memoir of Jared Sparks," by Brantz Mayer (Baltimore, 1867), and one by George
E. Ellis (Cambridge, 1892).

SPARKS, William Henry, author, b. on St.
Simon's island, Ga., 16 Jan., 1800; d. in Marietta, Ga., 13 Jan., 1882. He was taken in infancy to his father's plantation in Greene county, and in his eighteenth year was sent to complete his education in Litchfield, Conn., where he subsequently studied law. On his return to Georgia he practised his profession and was a member of the legislature. In 1830 he removed to Natchez, Miss., engaged largely in sugar-planting, and about 1850 entered into a law partnership with Judah P. Benjamin in New Orleans, which was dissolved ten years later.
He declined many public offices, once only accepting the nomination for U. S. senator from Louisiana, but withdrawing in favor of his friend, Alexander Barrow. He contributed largely to southerly publications, and among other verses wrote:
"Somebody's Darling," "The Dying Year," and
"The Old Church-Bell." He published "The Memories of Fifty Years" (Philadelphia, 1870; 4th ed., 1882), and left ready for the press a second volume; also "Father Anselmo's Ward," "Citelah," "The Woman with the Iron-Gray Hair," and other manuscripts.

SPARROW, William, clergyman, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 12 March, 1801; d. in Alexandria, Va., 17 Jan., 1874. He was taken by his father to Ireland in 1803, where he remained until 1817. His education was obtained partly in that country, and was completed in his native land. He entered Cohambia in 1819, and remained for three years, but was not graduated with his class. In 1822 he rejoined his father's family in Ohio. He engaged in teaching, first in Worthington, Ohio, then in Cincinnati, in Miami university as professor of ancient languages, and in 1825 as professor in the same department in Kenyon college, Ohio. He was ordained deacon in Columbus, Ohio, 7 June, 1826, by Bishop Philander Chase, and priest, 11 June, 1829, in Worthington, Ohio, by the same bishop.
From this date onward, John was occupied in educational work in different parishes in Ohio, in editing a church paper, and in the duties of theological professor in Kenyon college. In 1840 he removed to Virginia and became professor in the Episcopal theological seminary at Alexandria, which post he held during the remainder of his life. He received the degree of D. D. from Kenyon college in 1828. Dr. Sparrow was evangelical after the pattern of Charles Simeon, Bishops Meade and Melvill, and Dr. Davenport. He was an excellent teacher and was a ser-monizer of rare excellenee. He published numerous addresses, sermons on special occasions, tractates on important topics, and the like. Two years after his death a volume was published containing his "Life and Correspondence." (Philadelphia, 1876), together with "Fragments," selected from his writings.

SPAUDELING, Edward, inventor, b. in Milford,
N. H., 3 Sept., 1824. He was educated at the public school of his native town, and has since followed the trade of a blacksmith and machinist. Mr.
Spaulding has invented a graduated elliptic spring for carrying heavy loads that is applicable to horse-cars or to freight-cars for which he received in 1850 a medal of excellence at the American institute fair in New York city. He has also patented a wrought-iron shackie which is used in conjunction with his spring, and a magnetic and electric ear telephone for enabling the deaf to hear more readily. Among his other inventions is a process for keeping cider sweet in any climate without bottling or preserving in a cool place. He has taken out about ten patents in the United States and eight in foreign countries.

SPAUDELING, Elbridge Gerry, banker, b. in Summer Hill, N. Y., 24 Feb., 1809; d. in Buffalo, 5 May, 1857. He was a lineal descendant in the seventh generation of Edward Spaulding, who came from England to Massachusetts soon after the arrival of the Puritans in the Mayflower. His father, Edward, was a pioneer from New England to the central New York, the son studied law in Batavia and Attica, N. Y., was admitted to practice in Genesee county, and soon afterward removed to Buffalo, N. Y. He was associated in practice with Heman
B. Potter, George R. Babcock, and John Ganson.
After accumulating a fortune in the practice of the law he gave his attention to banking, in which he has been equally successful. He was made the conductor of the Farmers' and mechanics' bank of Batavia to Buffalo, and soon thereafter became its president. Upon the passage of the Federal banking law the bank was reorganized under its provisions with the name of the Farmers' and mechanics' national bank, and Mr.

Spaulding as president and principal owner.
He had been largely identified with public affai-
s. He was mayor in 1847 and assemblyman in 1848, as a representative in congress in 1849-51, having been chosen as a Whig, was state treasurer in 1853, and again elected to congress as a Republican in 1858, serving till 1863. During his last term in congress Mr. Spaulding achieved a wide reputation. He was a member of the ways and means committee, and chairman of the sub-commmittee that was intrusted with the duty of predparing legislative measures. The result was the presentation and passage of the Greenback or Legal-Tender act, and the National currency bank bill. Both of these were drawn by Mr. Spaulding.
They were offered and urged as war measures, and are claimed to be the best financial system that was ever conceived. The system was adopted in continent. Mr.
Spaulding is entitled to the credit of formulating these measures and securing their adoption. By reason of his connection with this important legislation he has been called the "Father of Greenbacks." Mr. Spaulding prepared a "History of the Legal-Tender Paper Money used during the Great Rebellion" (Buffalo, 1869), which is regarded as standard authority on the subject. He was chosen to deliver the address before the Banking Association at the Centennial exposition, in which he gave a review of "One Hundred Years of Progress in the Business of Banking."

SPALDING, Levi, missionary, b. in Jaffrey, N. H., 22 Aug. 1791; d. in Ceylon, 18 June, 1873. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1815, finished his theological course at Andover seminary three years later, and soon afterward was ordained at Salem, Mass. In 1830 he arrived as a missionary of the American board at Jaffna, Ceylon, where he labored fifty-four years, making but one visit to the United States during that period. In addition to his missionary labors, he superintended the Dedsville boarding-school for girls and prepared tracts, hymns, and school-books in the Tamil language, many of the best lyrics in the vernacular hymn-book being from his pen. Among his principal works are a translation of "Pilgrim's Progress," a "Scripture History," a Tamil dictionary (Madras, 1844), an enlarged edition of an English and Tamil dictionary, "Notes on the Bible," and a revision of the Scriptures in Tamil. He was one of the most accurate Tamil scholars in southern India, using the language with great facility and power. The late Rev. H. B. Stoddard, who first knew him, says he was called, celebrated the fifty-fourth anniversary of his embarkation at Boston for Ceylon, at which time he was the oldest missionary of the American board.

SPALDING, Nathaniel Weston, inventor, b. in the town of North Anson, Me., 24 Sept., 1829. At the age of thirteen he began to turn the trade of a carpenter and builder under the instruction of his father, who was both a school-teacher and a practical mechanic. Afterward learning the trade of a millwright from an uncle and spending a year in a saw-factory, he had become at twenty the chief mechanic of his neighborhood. Going to California in 1851, he went at once to the mines, but did not succeed in any way until he entered the construction of the first quartz-mills in the state. Its success led to the erection of a second on the same stream—Mokelumne river. In 1859 he opened a saw-manufactory in Sacramento, where he began to develop an inventive talent in the line of his business and devised the adjustable saw-tooth that has made him widely known. The demand for these teeth became so great that Mr. Spalding, finding it difficult to supply them in sufficient quantities, was compelled to contrive other devices, and finally brought out the chisel-bit saw-tooth. He has also completed and published a scale for the measurement of logs, which has been adopted as the legal standard in California and other states, as well as in several territories. It is known as the Spalding log-scale. In 1861 he removed his factory to San Francisco, and he has since taken part in the industrial development of California. In 1881 he was appointed by President Garfield to be assistant C. S. treasurer at San Francisco, which office he held until 29 Aug., 1885. During that period he received and disursed, or safeguarded, to his success, ten million dollars, or $820,000,000. Without loss. He has twice served as mayor of Oakland, where he resides, and had been selected by Leland Stanford as a trustee of the Leland Stanford, Jr. university.

SPALDING, Solomon, clergyman, b. in Ashford, Conn., in 1761; d. in Amity, Washington co., Pa., 20 Oct., 1816. After serving in youth in the Revolutionary army, and beginning to study law, he was graduated at Dartmouth in 1785, studied for the ministry, and preached in New England. In 1795 he settled in Cherry Valley, N. Y., where he entered into business with his brother, and four years later in Richfield, N. Y. In 1800 he removed to New Salem (now Compton, Ohio), and established an iron-foundry with Henry Lake. This enterprise proving unprofitable, on account of the war with Great Britain, he went to Pittsburg, and afterward to Amity, Pa., where he died. While residing at Compton, he wrote a romance entitled "The Manuscript Found," purporting to be an account of the original people of this continent, their customs, and conflicts between the different tribes. It pretended to be taken from a manuscript that had been discovered in an ancient mound. Mr. Spalding read his manuscript to some of his friends in 1811-12, and tried to get it published, but without success. In 1830 Mormon elders preached in northeastern Ohio, and their account of how the golden plates, from which the "Book of Mormon" was made, had been found, brought to mind the story written by Spalding twenty years before. A suspicion was raised that the "Book of Mormon" might have been an outgrowth from the latter. This suspicion ripened into a general belief, and in time became the accepted theory of the origin of the Book of Mormon. It is alleged that Joseph Smith, the so-called "prophet," stole, or so the "Book of Mormon" from Spalding's manuscript story. Rigdon having stolen it, or a copy of it, from a printing-office in which he worked in Pittsburg. In 1834 Dr. P. Harbut, who had been expelled from the Mormon church, obtained from the widow of Solomon Spalding, Mrs. Matilda Davison, of Morrison, Mass. A manuscript copy of the Spalding story, and the same year Eber D. Howe, editor of the Painesville "Telegraph," compiled a book entitled "Mormons Unveiled," which was a severe criticism on the "Book of Mormon" and its believers. This book was reproduced in 1840. Upon the title-page and in the last chapter it is suggested the "probability that the historical story of the "Great West" in the "Journey of the Lame Deuce" in the "Book of Mormon" was written by Spalding." From the time Mr. Harbut obtained the manuscript story in 1834 up to 1884 its whereabouts was unknown to the world. In 1884 President James H. Fairchild, of Oberlin college, visited his old anti-slavery friend, Lewis L. Rice, of Honolulu, Hawaiian islands. Mr. Rice in 1839-40 succeeded Mr. Howe in the office of the Painesville "Telegraph," and the books and manuscripts came into his possession. President Fairchild asked Mr. Rice if he had among his old papers anything relating to the early anti-slavery movement which he would contribute to the Oberlin library. When examining these for the book which came upon "an old worn and faded manuscript of about 165 pages of small quarto," which proved to be the longest manuscript of Solomon Spalding. On the title-page was written "The manuscript of the "Book of Mormon,"" by Robert Patterson (Pittsburg, 1882); "New Light on Mormonism," by Ellen E. Dickinson (New York, 1885); and "Early Days of Mormonism," by J. H. Kennedy (New York, 1888).
and was settled over societies in Brever and Hoogport, Mass., but afterward removed to Boston, where he devoted many years to prison-reform, urging upon legislatures the adoption of measures for the benefit and reformation of convicts. He also visited prisons and took discharged convicts to his own home, sometimes six at a time, keeping them till they found employment. During the last of his life, he was a president of the prisoners in Washington he contracted a disease which resulted in his death. His second wife, Catharine Swan Brown, is now (1898) writing his life. He published "Names and Titles of Christ" (Boston, 1842); "Essays on the Punishment of Death" (1844); "Plan for Discharged Convicts" (1844); and "Voices from Prison," a collection of poems (1849). He edited "The Prisoner's Friend" (Boston, 1855-56), a monthly periodical, and was connected with several religious newspapers. His brother, Jonx M., also devoted himself to the cause of prison-reform near Boston, and wrote "Labor for the Prisoner" (Boston, 1848); "Messages from the Superior State" (1852); "Twelve Discourses on Government" (1855); and "The Bowdoin Transylvania.""

SPEAR, Elias, commissioner of patents, b. in Warren, Knox co., Me., 15 Oct., 1834. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1858, entered the National army in August, 1862, as a captain of Maine volunteers, was promoted through the intermediate grades to colonel, and from October, 1863, till February, 1865, commanded a regiment in the Army of the Potomac. He was brevetted for his services at Peebles Farm, where he was in command of a brigade while holding the rank of major, subsequently received the brevet of colonel for gallantry in action, and on 9 April, 1865, that of brigadier-general. He served for a short time as inspector of division, and at the close of the war was in command of a brigade. He was mustered out in July, 1865. In November of that year he became an assistant examiner of railway and civil engineering in the U.S. patent-office. He was appointed examiner in 1868, examiner-in-chief in the same bureau in 1872, and assistant commissioner of patents in 1874. In 1876 he resigned and engaged in private business till January, 1877, when he was appointed commissioner of patents. He held this office till 1878, when he again resigned. He has since been in practice as an attorney and solicitor in patent cases.

SPEAR, Samuel Perkins, soldier, b. in Boston in 1815; d. in New York city, 5 May, 1875. He enlisted in the U.S. army in 1855, and served in the 2d dragoons in the Seminole war and through the Mexican campaign, in which he was wounded at Cerro Gordo. Subsequently he served on the plains against hostile Indians and in the Utah expedition, and was long sergeant-major of his regiment. In the beginning of the civil war he entered the volunteer army as lieutenant-colonel of the 11th Pennsylvania cavalry, his commission dating from 25 Sept., 1861. The regiment was raised as an independent body for scouting services near the seat of war, but in November, 1861, was incorporated in the Pennsylvania state organization. Spear became its colonel on 23 Aug., 1862. He commanded several expeditions during the war, was brevetted brigadier-general on 13 March, 1863, received severe wounds at Five Forks, and resigned on 9 May, 1865.

SPEAR, Samuel Tharp, clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 4 March, 1812; d. in Brooklyn, 1 April, 1891. He was graduated at a medical college in 1833, then studied for the ministry in Troy, N. Y., and was ordained in 1835. In the following year he was installed over the 2d Presbyterian church of Lansingburg, N. Y., from which he was called in 1845 to the South Presbyterian church of Brooklyn, N. Y., holding that pastorate till 1871, since which time he had been connected editorially with the "Independent." He published "Public and Private Morals of the New Testament" (New York, 1846); "Religion and State" (1874); "Constitutionality of the Legal-Tender Acts" (revised ed., 1877); "The Law of the Federal Judiciary" (1883); "The Law of Extradition" (revised ed., 1884); and "The Bible Heaven" (1886). He also published in pamphlet-form eighteen sermons on the rebellion, delivered during the civil war, and ten essays contributed to periodicals. He had received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1851.

SPEECE, Conrad, clergyman, b. in New London, Va., 7 Nov., 1756; d. in Staunton, Va., 15 Feb., 1836. He labored on his father's farm till he was sixteen years old, then attended a grammar-school near his home, and finished his education at Liberty Hall (afterward Washington college). He was graduated at the Virginia college and while a tutor in Hampsden Sidney college in 1779, became a Baptist preacher, but he was licensed in 1801 by the presbytery of Hanover. He was appointed to missionary work, with occasional pastoral charges, in eastern Virginia and Maryland and in the valley west of the Blue Ridge till 1813, when he became pastor of Augusta church, near Staunton, Va. Here Dr. Speece spent the remaining twenty-two years of his life. He was among the eminent preachers of the day, and of great influence in his denomination. He was also noted for his benevolences, and especially for his strenuous efforts to promote the temperance-reform. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1829. He published "The Mountaineer, a volume of essays written in 1833-16 after the manner of "The Spectator," single sermons (1810-32); and hymns, the most important of which is "The Cross of Christ," in the general assembly's collection.

SPEED, James, lawyer, b. in Jefferson county, Ky., 11 March, 1812; d. there, 25 June, 1887. He was graduated at St. Joseph's college, Bardstown, Ky., in 1828, studied law at Transylvania, and began practice at Louisville. His ancestors were identified with that state from pioneer days, and were active participants in the best political life of the young commonwealth. Inheriting a repugnance to every form of oppression and injustice, he was naturally opposed to slavery, and his well-known opinions on that subject prevented his taking any prominent part in political duties until the opening of the civil war. He was then nearly fifty years old, but he had established his reputation as a jurist, and was recognized even by those wholly opposed to him on the issues of the time as able, consistent, and upright. He also held at this time a chair in the Law department of the University of Louisville. A powerful element in Kentucky strove to commit the state to the disunion cause, and against that element he exercised all his tal-

SPEER, Joshua Fry, merchant, b. in Jefferson county, Ky., 14 Nov. 1814; d. in Louisville, Ky., 29 May, 1882, was educated at the local schools and at St. Joseph's college, Bardstown. After leaving college he lived as a clerk in a mercantile house in Louisville. He next went to Springfield, Ill., where he kept a country store for seven years, and formed a close and lasting friendship with Abraham Lincoln, then a young man. He took a warm interest in public affairs, and for a time assisted in editing a newspaper, and had intimate association with men of widely different政治 and religious views. He ran in 1842 and engaged in farming in Jefferson county. In 1848 he was elected to the legislature, but was never again willing, though often solicited, to hold office. In 1851 he removed to Louisville, gaining a handsome fortune in the real-estate business. In 1861 he embraced with arbor the National cause, and was intrusted with many delicate and important missions. He lectured in 1849 and 1851, and was engaged as a surgeon and later in mining. His nephew, John Gilmer, b. in 1852, was educated as a civil engineer, and held the office of assistant city engineer of Louisville. In 1876 he became connected with the transportation bureau of the United States at the World's fair held in Philadelphia, and later he went to New York city, where he joined the staff of the "World," and was successively its managing editor and publisher. Mr. Speed was commissioner-general of the Louisville American exhibition, and in 1885 became its secretary. He has contributed to periodicals.

SPEER, William, missionary, b. in New Alexandria, Pa., 24 April, 1823. He was graduated at Kenyon college, Ohio, in 1847, and attended the medical college of Pittsburg, Pa., and divinity at the Presbyterian theological seminary, Allegheny City. He was licensed to preach in 1846, and in the same year was sent with two colleagues by the Presbyterian board of foreign missions to establish their first mission in Canton, China. He devoted himself specially to hospital work and tract distributing. In 1850, having lost his wife and child, and with failing health, he returned home. In 1852 he was sent on a mission to the Chinese in California, as the first preacher in their own tongue. He soon established a Chinese school, opened a dispensary, lectured on the Chinese in various towns, and largely from the funds thus obtained built a brick mission-house. He organized the first Chinese Christian church in the New World. He founded, and maintained for two years, "The Oriental," a religious and secular paper in Chinese and English devoted to the interests of the emigrants. He greatly influenced religious bodies and thinking people toward throwing open to the Chinese the benefits of Christian civilization. His efforts led to the repeal of the legislative act of 1854—5, designed to exclude the Chinese from the mines. After devoting five years to this mission he was again obliged to go in quest of health. In 1865 he was called to Philadelphia, to be corresponding secretary of the board of education, which he aided in reorganizing, a movement that resulted in the reunion of the two branches of the church, which took place in 1869. In connection with his duties on the board of education he prepared a series of publications, some of which are of permanent value. Relinquishing his educational labors in 1876, Dr. Speer travelled in Japan and China, and has since served the cause of missions on both continents. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him in 1860. His works include "China and the United States" (Hartford, Conn., 1870); "The Great Revival of 1800" (Philadelphia, 1872); "God's Rule for Christian Giving" (1875); and sermons, pamphlets, and reviews.

SPEIGHT, Jesse, senator, b. in Greene county, N. Y., 22 March, 1822; d. in Wheeling, W. Va., 15 Nov. 1847. He received a public-school education, was a member of the lower house of the legislature in 1822, and in 1823—7 of the senate, presiding over both bodies. In 1829—37 he sat in congress, having been chosen as a Democrat, also serving in 1839 as a member of the convention to revise the constitution of North Carolina. Having moved to Pendleton county, Ky., and had an interest in that county in the legislature in 1839, serving as speaker, and in the senate in 1844, of which he was made president. In the latter year he was elected U. S. senator, serving until his death.

SPEIR, Samuel Fleet, surgeon, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 9 April, 1838; d. there, 19 Dec., 1885. He was educated at the Brooklyn polytechnic institute and at the medical department of the University of the city of New York, where he graduated in 1860, with three prizes. He received the prize essay gold medal from the American medical association in 1864. After spending two years in study abroad, chiefly in Paris, he settled in his native city, where he practised his profession. Dr. Speir was connected with various hospitals and dispensaries, and during the civil war served under the U. S. sanitary commission. He had contributed to professional literature and was the inventor of a new method of arresting surgical hemorrhage by artery-constriction, for which he received a prize from the State medical society in 1871, and a new method for the differential diagnosis of fever based on the examination of minute specimens.

SPELMAN, Henry, colonist, b. in England about 1593; d. in Virginia in 1623. He was a son of Sir Henry Speelman, the antiquary, and came to Virginia in 1609. About 1614 he was one of a party under Capt. Ratcliff, a colonel for Jamestown, who was given in search of the owner of gold for the colony. Deceived by the treachery of Powhatan, Ratcliff and his party were slain, two only escaping. Henry, who was saved by Pocahontas, lived several years among the Indians, when he was rescued from Jopekus, the brother of Powhatan, by another party that had sailed up the Potomac for corn. Having acquired the Indian language during his captivity, he was of great use to his countrymen as interpreter till he was killed by the savages in 1622. He left in manuscript a "Relation of Virginia." It was first owned by Dawson Turner, and bought by Lilly, the bookseller, in whose hands it remained ten years. Henry Stevens then bought it for James E. Hunnewell, of Charlestown, Mass., who had a small edition privately printed (London, 1872).

John Spence, b. in Scotland in 1786; d. in Dumfries, Va., 18 May, 1829. He was educated in the University of Edinburgh, but, owing to impaired health, was not graduated. In 1788 he came to this country, settling in Dumfries, Va., as a private tutor, and, having regained his health, entered upon the practice of medicine in 1791. He was active in introducing vaccination into the United States, and acquired distinction in his profession. The University of Pennsylvania gave him the degree of M. D. in 1828. His correspondence with Dr. Benjamin Rush in 1806 was published in the "Medical Museum of Philadelphia." He also contributed to the "Medical Repository" and the "American Journal of Medical Sciences," and left several manuscripts on medical subjects.

SPENCE, John Selby, senator, b. near Snow Hill, Worcester co., Md., 29 Feb., 1788; d. near Berlin, Worcester co., Md., 24 Oct., 1840. His ancestors came to Snow Hill from Scotland about 1680. He was educated at district schools in Worcester and Somerset counties, received his medical degree from the University of Pennsylvania about 1800, and practised his profession in Maryland until his death. After serving in the legislature he was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1823, till 3 March, 1824, and again from 3 Dec., 1831, till 2 March, 1833. He was elected U. S. senator to succeed Robert H. Goldsborough, serving from 1 Jan., 1837, till his death, which occurred at the country-seat of his family near Berlin.—His brother Asa served in the legislature, and was chief justice of the 4th judicial circuit of Maryland, comprising the lower counties; and another brother, Irving, was the author of "Early History of the Presbyterian Church" (Philadelphia, 1838).—His nephew, Thomas Adam, lawyer, b. in Accomac county, Va., 29 Feb., 1810; d. in Washington, D. C., 10 Nov., 1877, was graduated at Yale in 1833, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Snow Hill, Md. He was elected a representative to congress as a Whig and served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1845. In 1872-7 he was assistant attorney-general for the U. S. post-office department.

SPENCE, Robert Traill, naval officer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., about 1785; d. near Baltimore, Md., 29 Sept., 1827. He became a midshipman in the U. S. navy in 1800, and was serving under Decatur on the captured Tripolitan gun-boat "No. 8," when, on 7 Aug., 1804, she was blown up by a hot shot that was sent through her magazine. After the explosion, with her stern blown to pieces and under water, Spence kept on loading the long 29-pounder gun forward, fired it, and, with his crew in pursuit, saved the boat, was admitted to the bar, and sitting astride his piece and waving his cap, went down into the water, but was rescued. His father, Kieth Spence, purser of the U. S. frigate "Philadelphia" when she grounded and was captured, as a prisoner in Tripoli was witness of his son's valor. Robert was made a lieutenant in 1807 and master-commandant in 1813. He was highly commended for his services, and incurred no imminence in laying obstructions in the way of the British fleet off Baltimore, 30 Sept., 1814, and was made a post-captain in 1815 at the age of twenty-seven. In 1822, on the "Cyane," as the senior American naval officer in the West Indies, he issued a protest against Francisco Morales, who had threatened death to Americans in the Spanish Main—an act as much applauded at home as it was effective at the time and place of danger. In Africa he had the first fort at Mombasa ordered to be burned. He was killed in part of the West India fleet in 1826, but died before sailing.—Capt. Spence's sons, Carroll and Charles Lowell Stewart, were afterward in the diplomatic service of the United States, the former being minister to Turkey under President Pierce, and the other secretary of legation, and afterward envoy to Persia. His sister became the mistress of Jabez Cook, and in 1829, Mrs. Charles Bradway.

SPENCE, Asa, soldier, b. in Salisbury, Conn., in September, 1747; d. in Fort Covington, N. Y., in 1828. The first ancestor of the Spencer family, William, came from England to Cambridge, Mass., in 1631, and again in 1633 with his brothers, Thomas and Jared. William and Thomas were among the first settlers of Hartford, Conn., the former being a landed proprietor, a select-man of the town, a deacon of the church, and a deputy of the president of Connecticut in 1639. He prepared the first revival of the laws of that colony, and died in Hartford in 1640. His descendant in the fifth generation, Asa, served throughout the war of the Revolution, and was under Gen. Anthony Wayne at the storming of Stony Point. He early espoused the principles of Democracy under Thomas Jefferson.—His son, James Bradley, soldier, b. in Salisbury, Conn., 26 April, 1781; d. in Fort Covington, N. Y., 26 March, 1848, was an early settler of Franklin county, N. Y., raised a company for the war of 1812, and served as captain in the 29th U. S. infantry at Plattsburg. Subsequently he was county judge and surrogate, and held other local offices in Fort Covington, served in the legislature in 1851-2, and was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1839. —Another son, Abner Peck, settled with his father and brother at Fort Covington, was captain in the 29th U. S. infantry in 1812, and, remaining in the army, was appointed military governor of Arkansas.—James Bradley's son, James Clark, jurist, b. in Fort Covington, Franklin co., N. Y., 26 March, 1815; d. in 1848, and practised in his native town and in Ogdensburg until 1865, serving as U. S. district attorney for four years. He then removed to New York and entered into partnership with Charles A. Rapallo. From 1809 till 1872 he was a judge of the superior court of New York, afterward practising law until 1886, when he was appointed an appellate commissioner.—William's descendant in the fifth generation, Ambrose, jurist, b. in Salisbury, Conn., 13 Dec., 1765; d. in Lyons, N. Y., 13 March, 1848, was educated at Yale and Harvard, where he was graduated in 1783. He studied law under John Canfield, of Sharon, Conn., and settled in Hudson, N. Y., where he was appointed city clerk in 1786. He was elected to the assembly in 1788 and in 1795 to the state senate; and served in 1798, when he was re-elected for four years. He was the author of a bill, which became a law, to abolish capital punishment in all cases except those of treason and murder, substituting imprisonment and hard labor. He also secured the erection of a state prison near New York city. In 1796 he was appointed assistant attorney-general at Schenectady and in 1802-4 he was attorney-general of the state. In 1804 he became a justice of the supreme court, of which he was chief justice from 1819 till 1823. In 1808 he was chosen by the legislature, with Peter J. Munro, to prepare and report such reforms in the chancery system of the state as they should deem expedient. Judge Spencer possessed energy, resolution, and high legal attainments, and was a master of equity jurisprudence. He served as a presidential elector in 1809. He was the warm friend of De Witt Clinton, but separated from him on the question of the war of 1812, and in that year was active in the struggle to prevent the charter of the six-million bank. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1821. After he resumed the practice of law in Albany he held various local offices, and was mayor of that city in 1814, when he was then elected to congress, serving from 7 Dec., 1829, till 3 March, 1831, and during his term united with William Wirt and other philanthropists in endeavoring to arrest the injustice of the government toward the Cherokees. In 1839 he removed to Lyons, N. Y., where he engaged in agriculture. He was president of the Whig national convention in Baltimore in 1844. The University of Pennsylvania gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1819 and Harvard the same in 1821. His last public act was to address a letter to his fellow-citizens in opposition to a proposed amendment to the constitution providing for an elective judiciary with brief terms of office. His decisions are contained in the "New York Supreme Court Reports," 3 vols., 1818-1824, by William Johnson et al., New York, 1819-1825, and "New York Chancery Reports," 1814-1824. See "Memorial of Ambrose Spencer" (Albany, 1849).—His son, John Canfield, lawyer, b. in Hudson, N. Y., 8 Jan., 1798; d. in Albany, N. Y., 18 May, 1855, was graduated at Union college in 1819, and in 1836 became private secretary to Gov. Daniel D. Tompkins. He was admitted to the bar at Cohoes in 1819, became master in chancery in 1811, judge-advocate general in the army on the northern frontier in 1826, attorney general of New York in 1814, and assistant attorney general for western New York in 1815. In that year he was also made district attorney. He was then elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1819, and during his term was one of a committee to examine the affairs of the U. S. bank, and drew up its report. Fifteen years afterward, when Gen. Andrew Jackson was using this report against the bank, Mr. Spencer was found among its friends. In 1820-1 he was a member of the state house of representatives, serving in the first year as speaker, and in 1824-8 he was a member of the state senate, being a leader of the Clinton faction. In 1827 he was appointed by Gov. De Witt Clinton one of the board to revise the statutes of New York, and took an important part in that task. Joining the Anti-Masonic party, he was appointed special attorney-general to prosecute those that were connected with the abdication of William Morgan, but resigned in May, 1830, having involved himself in a controversy with Gov. Enos T. Throop. In 1832 he was again elected to the legislature, and in 1839-40 he was secretary of state and superintendent of common schools. He was appointed U. S. secretary of war on 12 Oct., 1841, and on 3 March, 1843, was transferred to the treasury department, but opposing the annexation of Texas, resigned on 2 May, 1844, and resumed the practice of law. He served on many state commissions and aided in the organization of the State asylum for idiots. In 1849 he made a regent of Union college, which gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1849. He published an edition of Henry Reeve's translation of De Tocqueville's "Democracy in America," contributing a preface and notes (2 vols., New York, 1878). He was a member also, with other Democratic editors, of a "Revision of the Statutes of New York" (3 vols., Albany, 1849). See "Review of John C. Spencer's Legal and Political Career," by Lucien B. Proctor (New York, 1846).—Another son of Ambrose, William Ambrose, naval officer, b. in New York in 1783; d. in New York city, 3 March, 1854, was appointed midshipman in the U. S. navy, 15 Nov., 1809, became lieutenant on 9 Dec., 1814, commander on 3 March, 1818, and captain, 22 Jan., 1841, and resigned on 9 Dec., 1845. He was acting lieutenant in Com. Thomas Macdonough's victory on Lake Champlain, 11 Sept., 1814.—Another son of Ambrose, Theodore, clergyman, b. in Hudson, N. Y., 24 April, 1800; d. in Utica, N. Y., 14 June, 1876. He entered the L. S. military academy, but left it to study law, and became a justice of peace in Auburn, N. Y., became district attorney for Cayuga county. Afterward he studied theology, was pastor of the 24 Congregational church in Rome, and preached also in Utica. Retiring from active work, owing to impaired health, he was made secretary of the American home missionary society for central and northern New York. He was the author of "Travels and Observations in New York, and other theological works. — Thomas's descendant in the sixth generation, Ichabod Smith, clergyman, b. in Rupert, Vt., 26 Feb., 1798; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 25 Nov., 1854, was graduated at Union in 1822 and was principal of the grammar-school in the neighborhood of Cohoes, N. Y., 1823-1825. He was ordained in Canajoharie, N. Y., until 1828. After studying theology he was licensed by the presbytery of Geneva in 1826, and on 11 Sept., 1828, was appointed college pastor, with the Rev. Solomon Williams, of the Congregational church in Northampton, Mass., remaining until 1832. He then became pastor of the 24 Presbyterian church of Brooklyn, N. Y., which charge he held until his death. From 1836 till 1840 he was professor extraordinary of biblical history in Union theological seminary, New York, of which institution he was a founder. In 1839 he was offered the presidency of the University of Alabama and in 1839 that of Hamilton. The latter college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1841. His best-known publication is his "Parker's Sketches," which passed through many editions, and was republished in England and France (2 series, New York, 1850-53. After his death appeared "Sermons," with a memoir by the Rev. James M. Sherwood (2 vols., 1856); "Sacramental Discourses" (1861); and "Evidences of Divine Revelation" (1853). Jared's descendant in the fourth generation, Josiah, b. in East Hudson, Conn., in 1714; d. there, 13 Jan., 1786, joined the northern army in 1778, and was major in the 2d Connecticut regiment under Col. Nathaniel Whiting. He served as lieutenant-colonel in the two following campaigns, rose to the rank of colonel, and was one of the eight brigadier-generals appointed by congress at the instance of Gen. Washington on 22 June, 1759. Taking offence when Gen. Israel Putnam, a younger officer, was appointed over him, he was about to retire from the army, but, deciding to remain, served near Boston until its evacuation, and then marched with his division to the defence of New York. On 9 Aug., 1776, he was appointed major-general, and opposed the evacuation of New York. In August, 1778, he ordered to take command at Rhode Island, which was surrounded by Admiral Sir Peter Parker. The British army having taken possession of Newport, Gen. Spencer assembled a large force at Providence, but the enterprise proved a failure, and, after remaining in the vicinity for several weeks, the militia was dismissed. Gen. Spencer was cashiered for the failure of this expedition, but a court of inquiry attributed the result to forces beyond his control. He resigned on 14 June, 1778, in consequence of an order of congress to inquire into the reasons for his failure, and afterward appeared but little in public life. His brother, Elihu, clergyman, b. in East Haddam, Conn., 12 Feb., 1721; d. in Trenton, N. J., Dec. 25, 1784, was graduated at Yale in 1746, and, with a view to becoming the model of the Indian of the Six Nations, studied their dialect and prepared himself for this office under the Rev. John Brainard and Jonathan Edwards, accompanying the latter to the Indian conference in Albany in 1748. He was ordained on 14 Sept., 1748, and, after laboring in western New York, was appointed pastor of the Presbyterian church in Elizabeth, N. J., in 1750, holding this charge until 1756, when he was elected to the Presbyterian church of Jamaica, L. I. About 1758 he was appointed by Gov. James De Lancey chaplain of the New York troops that were forming for service in the French war, after which he labored in the contiguous congregations of Shrewsbury, Middletown Point, Shark River, and Asbury, N. J. In 1759 he was sent by the synods of New York and Philadelphia with the Rev. Alexander McWhorter on a mission to organize the irregular congregations of North Carolina, which district they again visited in 1755 at the request of the Provincial congress of that colony. As he had contributed to the cause of independence, the Tories were embittered toward him, and on one occasion burned books and papers of his that had been stolen by them. Before his death he was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Trenton, N. J. He was frequently called "Readymoney Spencer," from his facility in expending large sums on various subjects.
mining business in Nevada.—His first wife, Bella Zilla, b. in London, England, 1 March, 1849; d. in Tinselosa, Al. 1 Aug., 1867, came to this country in infancy, and married Gen. Spencer in 1862. She published "The Lost Wife" (Philadelphia, 1844); "Tried and True, a Story of the Rebellion" (Springfield, 1860); and "Strange Surface and Depth" (1872). His second wife, William Loring, b. St. Augustine, Fla., is a niece of Gen. William W. Loring, and daughter of Albert A. Nuñez. She is called "Major," perhaps because of her masculine name. She married Gen. Spencer in 1877. She has published "Salt-Lake Fruit" (Boston, 1885); "Story of Mary" (New York, 1884); republished as "Dennis Day, Carpet-Bag Man," and "Punky Onderdonk, or County Jane" (1887).

SPENCER, Josse Ames, clergyman, b. in Hyde Park, N. Y., 17 June, 1816; d. in Passaic, N. J., 2 Sept., 1898. His family removed to New York, where he entered a printing-office in 1830, and in two and a half years mastered the compositor's art. For several years he was assistant to his father, who was a city surveyor. He was graduated at Columbia in 1857, and at the Episcopal general theological seminary in 1848. While a student he was actively engaged in Sunday-school work in what was then a new part of the city. He was ordained deacon, 28 June, 1849, by Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk, and priest, 28 July, 1851, by the same bishop. He was elected rector of the church in a jurisdictional union and two parishes in his parish his health failed, and he spent a winter in Nice, on the Mediterranean. On returning home he was occupied in educational and various literary pursuits. A return of illness led to his going abroad again, and in 1848-9 he travelled in Europe, Egypt, and the Holy Land. He was chosen to be secretary and editor of the General Protestant Episcopal Board for the publication of the "Bible," which was established in 1831, and served in that capacity until 1857. He accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's church, Flatbush, N. Y., in 1853, which post he held for two years. He was elected professor of the Greek language and literature in the College of the city of New York in 1849, and discharged the duties of this department for ten years of active and useful service, with two years of leave of absence. In 1859 he joined the caliphate of the Standard Bible, and he devoted his time to authorship, editing, and teaching. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1852, and from Trinity in 1872. Dr. Spencer has published "The Christian instructed in the Ways of the Gospel and the Church" (New York, 1841); "History of the Reformation in England" (1846); "The East; Sketches of Travel in Egypt and the Holy Land" (1850); "History of the United States from the Earliest Period to the Death of President Lincoln" (4 vols., 1850-69); "Greek Praxis" (1850); "The Young Ruler who had Great Possessions, and other Discourses" (1851); "A Course of English Reading" (1853); "Sketch of the History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States" (1878); and "Five Last Things, Studies in Eschatology" (1887). He edited "The New Testament in Greek, with Critical and Exegetical Notes on the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles" (New York, 1847); "Cæsar's Commentaries, with Copious Notes and Lexicon" (1848); the "Archaic Series of Greek and Latin Books" (1849); "Richard Chenevix Trench's Poems" (1850); "Nephalus's Anthology," from the manuscripts of Alphons Cressey (1857); and " Origian's Works," vol. iv., in "Anti-Nicene Library" (Buffalo, 1885).

SPENCER, Joseph William, geologist, b. in Dundas, Canada, 26 March, 1850. He was graduated at McGill University, Montreal, in 1874, with first honors in geology and mineralogy, and then studied at the University of Göttingen, where, in 1877, he received the degree of Ph. D. On his return in 1877 he became science master in the Collegiate Institute of Hamilton, Ontario, and in 1880 professor of geology and allied subjects in King's College, Nova Scotia, and became vice-president of the same. In 1882 he was elected professor of geology in the University of Missouri, which chair he held until 1887. The museum building of this university, which is the largest west of Washington, D. C., was designed by him and erected under his supervision, and he also obtained the large geological collection now in the possession of Prof. Joseph G. Norwood and Prof. George C. Swallow for the geological department. Dr. Spencer's work has been mainly in questions relating to surface and glacial phenomena both in America and Europe, and he was one of the pioneers in this country in the department of lacustrine geology. Dr. Spencer is a fellow of the Geological Society of London, and of the American Association for the advancement of science, and a member of other scientific societies in the United States and Canada. His scientific papers exceed thirty in number.

SPENCER, Pitman Curtiss, surgeon, b. in Charlotte county, Va., in 1790; d. in Petersburg, Va., in February, 1861. He was graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1818 and settling in Nottoway county, Va., practised there for fifteen years, after which he went to Europe to pursue his studies. On his return he settled in Petersburg and devoted himself to surgery. He was a successful lithotomist, and claimed to be the first to practise this branch of surgery in this country.

SPENCER, Platt Rogers, originator of the Spencerian system of penmanship, b. in East Fishkill, Dutchess co., N. Y., 7 Nov., 1800; d. in Geneva, Ashtabula co., Ohio, 16 May, 1884. His father, Caleb, a farmer and soldier of the Revolution, died in 1806, and in 1810 the family removed to Jefferson, Ashtabula co., Ohio, then a wilderness. The son was passionately fond of writing. Paper being difficult to get, he wrote on both sides of it. In 1837, he started the "Jeffersonian," the first of his mother's libraries and by permission of a cobbler, upon the leather in his shop. In 1835 he taught his first writing class. From 1816 till 1821 he was a clerk and book-keeper, and from 1821 till 1824 he studied law, Latin, English literature, and penmanship, taught in a common school, and wrote up merchants' books. In 1824 he contemplated entering college with a view to preparing for the ministry, but, being a victim of inherited alcoholism aggravated by the prevalent drinking customs, he fell and his plans were changed. He then taught in New York and Ohio. In 1832 he became a total abstainer, and was, as he believed, the first public advocate in this country of that principle, for which he labored during the remainder of his life. Soon after his reformation he was elected to public office, and was county treasurer twelve years. He was instrumental in collecting the early history of Ashtabula county, and was deeply interested in American history. He early engaged actively in the anti-slavery movement and was an advocate of universal liberty. Through his work and influence as a penman for his system of penmanship, through his pupils, and by his public addresses and encouragement, he was instrumental in founding the business colleges of the United States and in promoting their growth and development. In the winter of 1864 Mr. Spencer delivered before the business college in Brooklyn, N. Y., his last lecture, and gave his last course of lessons in the business college in New York city. His first publications on penmanship were issued in 1848 under the name of "Spencer and Rice's System of Business and Ladies' Penmanship," later published under the title of "Spencerian or Semi-Angular Penmanship." His other publications on penmanship appeared from 1855 till 1870. The New Spencerian expenditure, described in his works, was completed in 1880.

SPENCER, Sara Andrews, reformer, b. in Savona, Steuben co., N. Y., 21 Oct., 1857. Her maiden name was Andrews. After graduation at the normal school of St. Louis, Mo., in 1876, she taught until she married Henry C. Spencer, a son of Platt R. Spencer, in 1884 and removed to Washington, D. C. On 14 April, 1881, he bequeathed and seventy-two women of Washington attempted to register and vote, but were refused. She then brought suit in the supreme court of the District, and Judge David K. Cartter's decision that "women are citizens but have not the right to vote without local legislation" was reaffirmed by the U. S. Supreme court in 1874. In 1871-2 Mrs. Spencer defeated the pending bill before the Senate, and in 1875 she secured a bill from the District of Columbia legislature for the reform of outcast girls, and she was also the author of a bill in congress for a girls' reform-school (1876). From 1874 till 1881 she was secretary of the National woman suffrage association, which she represented at the Republican presidential convention in Cincinnati in 1876, and delivered an address. She also engraved and signed the women's declaration of rights, presented at the Centennial celebration in Philadelphia. In 1871-6 she was president of the District of Columbia woman franchise association, and was general secretary of the Charity organization society of the District of Columbia. She has published "Problems on the Woman Question" (Washington, 1871), and "Thirty Lessons in the English Language" (1873).

SPENCER, Thomas, physician, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., in 1793; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 May, 1857. From 1835 till 1850 he was professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Geneva (now Hobart) college, N. Y., and subsequently he held chairs in medical colleges in Chicago and Philadelphia. Dr. Spencer served as surgeon in the U. S. Navy, 1812-15. He was president of the New York medical association, and was the author of "Practical Observations on Epidemic Diarrhoea known as Cholera" (Utica, 1832); "Introductory Lecture at Medical Institute of Geneva College" (1842); "Lectures on Vital Chemistry, or Animal Heat" (Geneva, 1844-5); and a paper on "The Atomic Theory of Life and Vital Heat" (1853-4). "Memoir of Dr. Spencer," by Sylvester D. Willard, M. D. (Albany, 1859).

SPICER, William Francis, naval officer, b. in New York city, 7 Feb., 1829; d. in the Boston navy-yard, 29 Nov., 1878. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 21 June, 1839, attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1843-5, and became a passed midshipman, 2 July, 1845. He cruised in the West Indies, 1845-6, and in 1846-7, participated in the capture of Tunis, and was promoted to master, 28 June, 1853, and lieutenant, 25 Feb., 1854. His first service during the civil war was in the steamer frigate "Niagara" in 1861. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and commander, 2 Jan., 1863, served in the North Atlantic blockading squadron in command of the steamer "Cambridge," and took part in the attacks on Fort Fisher in 1863-5. He was commissioned captain, 22 April, 1870, and commanded the monitor "Dictator" in 1874-5 during the threatened war with Spain on account of the "Virginius" affair, after which he was at the rendezvous at Boston in 1875-6. He was made commodore, 25 April, 1877, and was commandant of the Boston navy-yard until his death. He was well known as a poet and musician, and was the author of several poems, among which are "Absent Friends and you, Mary," "The Gale," "Manhattan's Dear Isle," "Ah, who can tell?" "The Commodore's Return," "Death at Sea," "Coming Home," "All Hands, up Anchor," "The Old Relief," "Off Sally's Isles," "Adeline," "Maurice," "The Norfolk Girls," "The Date of Emma," and "Valparaiso."

SPIEKER, George Frederick, theologian, b. in Elk Ridge, Lancaster, Co., Md., 17 Nov., 1844. He was graduated at Baltimore city college in 1865, and studied in Gettysburg theological seminary and in the Lutheran seminary in Philadelphia, where he was graduated in 1867. In the same year he was ordained to the ministry by the ministerium of Pennsylvania. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Virginia, at Salem, Va. In 1864 he was called to the professorship of German in the Philadelphia theological seminary, which post he occupied till 1886. Immediately after his graduation there he was called to the professorship of German in the Keystone state normal school, Kutztown, where he remained in 1871-8. On his removal thither he became pastor of Lutheran congregations and in Kutztown, which he served till 1883. Since October, 1883, he has been the pastor of St. Michael's Lutheran congregation, Allentown, Pa. He has been professor of Hebrew in Muhlenberg college, Allentown, since 1885, president of its board of trustees since 1886, and examiner in doctrinal theology of the ministerium of Pennsylvania since 1892. He is an occasional contributor to periodicals, and is associate editor of "The Lutheran Church Review," Philadelphia, in 1883-5. He has published "Hutter's Compend of Lutheran Theology," translated, with Dr. Henry E. Jacobs (Philadelphia, 1868), and "Wilhelminian's Martin Luther," translated from the German (1880).
SPIES. August Vincent Theodore, anarchist, b. Nov. 1838, in Rhinebeck, N.Y.; d. in Chicago, Ill., 11 Nov., 1887. In 1871 he came to the United States and learned the upholsterer's trade in Chicago. In 1876 he became interested in the labor movement, and the next year joined the Socialists. He became in 1889 publisher of the “Arbeiter-Zeitung,” and in 1884 its editor and business manager. He was a ready writer and speaker, of good moral character, and had great influence with those of socialist tendencies. He first became well known by his connection with the labor troubles in Chicago in the spring of 1886. His paper advocated anomaly, and his speeches, when referring to the government and the customs of his adopted country, were bitter, denunciatory, and inflammatory. At one time he belonged to the German Labor party, but after a while the Socialists who had closed most of the machine-shops and manufactories in Chicago, a crowd, estimated to contain 12,000 men, carrying the national flag reversed, assembled to wreak vengeance upon those that continued to work. An attack was made upon the latter. They were defended by the police, who shot five rioters, arrested eleven, and dispersed the mob, which an hour before was addressed by Spies from the top of a freight-car. Spies went to his office, indited a “Revenge Circular,” which was printed and circulated, summoning the workmen to arms to destroy the police. Another one, calling for a meeting for the next day at Haymarket square, urged workmen to come armed and in full force. In the evening a large crowd assembled, and were addressed by Spies and others, when 189 policemen advanced and the crowd was ordered to disperse, whereupon a bomb was thrown into the midst of the police and exploded. Sixty-two policemen were wounded, one was killed on the spot, some others died of their wounds, and many were maimed for life. Great excitement prevailed in the city, and many arrests were made. Spies was arrested, and he be instigators of the Haymarket massacre. All were discharged but seven—Spies; George Engel, a native of Hesse, Germany (b. 15 April, 1836); Oscar Neche, a tailor (b. 2 July, 1850, and educated in Germany); Adolph Fischer, a printer, and native of Bremen, Germany (b. in 1861); Louis Lange, a carpenter (b. 9 Sept., 1844, at Cellebrack, Germany); Louis P. Albert (b. 9 Aug., 1853); and Samuel Fielden (b. in Throckmorton, England, 25 Feb., 1847). These were indicted by the grand jury, and arraigned in court for murder on 21 June. Albert R. Parsons, a native of Montgomery, Ala. (b. 24 June, 1848), who had been indicted but had escaped arrest, gave himself up to be tried with his associates. The trial continued till 29 Aug. All were found guilty and all sentenced to death except Oscar Neche, who was sent to the state-prison. They remained in Cook county jail till November, 1887. Louis Lange committed suicide by exploding a dynamite bomb in his mouth on the 9th. The death-sentence of Schwab and Fiehden was commuted to imprisonment for life on the 10th, and the remaining four were hanged on 11 Nov., 1887.

SPINNER. Francis Elias, financier, b. in German Flats now Mohawk, N. Y., 21 Jan., 1802; d. in Jacksonville, Ill., 31 Dec., 1860. His father, John Peter (b. in Wernsath, Baden, 1 Jan., 1738; d. in German Flats, 27 May, 1848), was a Catholic priest, then embraced Protestantism, married, emigrated to the United States in 1801, and was pastor of Reformed churches at Herkimer and German Flats until his death, preaching at first in German alone, and afterward alternately in German and English. The son was educated carefully at home, where his father engaged his attention, and apprenticed him at first to a confectioner in Albany, and afterward to a saddler in Amsterdam, N. Y. He engaged in trade at Herkimer in 1824, and became deputy sheriff of the county in 1829. He was active in the militia organization, and by 1844 had reached the grade of major-general. In 1855-7 he was sheriff, and in 1858–9 commissioner for building the state lunatic asylum at Utica. When he was removed from this post, on political grounds alone, he became cashier of a bank at Mohawk, of which he was afterward president for many years. He held various local offices, was auditor and deputy naval officer in the naval office at New York in 1843–9, and in 1854 was elected to congress as an anti-slavery candidate. He was a member of the joint committee on privileges and elections, on a special committee to investigate the assault made by Preston Brooks on Charles Sumner, and on a conference committee of both houses on the army appropriation bill, which the senate had rejected on account of a clause that forbade the use of the military against Kansas settlers. Gen. Spinner was an active Republican from the formation of the party. He was twice re-elected to congress, serving altogether from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1861. During his last term he was the chairman of the committee on accounts. When the Lincoln administration was organized, Sec. Salmon P. Chase selected him for the post of treasurer, which he filled, under successive presidents, from 16 March, 1861, till 30 June, 1868. When, during the war, many of the clerks joined the army, Gen. Spinner suggested to Sec. Chase the advisability of employing women in the government offices, and carried into effect this innovation, though not without much opposition. He signed the different series of paper money in a singular handwriting, which he cultivated in order to avoid forgery. In 1868 he resigned his office the money in the treasury was counted, and when the result showed a very small discrepancy, many days were spent in recounting and examining the books of accounts, until finally the mistake was discovered. On retiring from office he went to the south for the benefit of his health, and for some years he lived in West Palm Beach, Florida.

SPINOLA. Francis B., soldier, b. in Stony Brook, Long Island, N. Y., 19 March, 1821; d. in Washington, D. C., 12 April, 1891. After an English education he began business in New York city, where he was elected alderman and supervisor. He subsequently served as a member of the assembly and as a state senator. In 1863 he was a delegate to the Democratic National convention at Charleston, S. C. In 1862 he raised the Empire brigade of New York state volunteers, and on 1 Oct. he was commissioned as brigadier-general. He served in the National army till the close of the war, resigning on 8 June, 1865. He was subsequently connected with banking and insurance companies in New York city, was elected to the state senate, and in 1886 was elected to congress for the term ending 3 March, 1889. He was re-elected.
SPIRE, or SPERER, Georg von, governor of Venezuela, b. in Spire, Germany, about 1496. He entered the brotherhood of the famous Welsers, of Augsburg, and worked his way up as their confidential agent, accompanying in the latter capacity the fleet that was armed by the Welsers in 1528, and sent under Ambrosius von Allfnger to conquer Venezuela. Returning to Europe after Allfnger’s death, Spire obtained from Charles V. the appointment as governor. He entered the service of Nicholas Federmann, who had been Allfnger’s lieutenant. He armed a new expedition in Spain and the Canary islands, and on 22 Feb., 1534, landed at Coro. Against Weisner’s advice, Spire had appointed Federmann his lieutenant. In the following year, accompanied by 450 regular troops and 1,500 friendly Indians, they set out on a journey of exploration to the interior. After marching together for about 200 miles, they divided into two parties, agreeing to meet afterward. Spire experienced great hardships from hostile Indians, and the soldiers, accustomed to march under a burning sun, mutinied several times. When at last they reached the appointed place of meeting without finding any trace of Federmann, the soldiers were discouraged, but Spire animated them by showing them the riches of the “El Dorado,” of which the survivors of Allfnger’s expedition had brought the first reports. They continued the march to the south, but, when the rainy season set in, the overflow of the rivers impeded progress, and the consequent fevers decimated their ranks. Spire persevered for a long time in his search for the El Dorado, until at last his powers were repaid by a mighty river, probably the Orinoco, or its confluent, the Aupre, and early in 1539 he returned to Coro with only eighty ragged and sickly men out of the host he had led forth more than four years before. He set out immediately for Europe to lay his complaint against Federmann before the Welsers, but heard in Santo Domingo of the former’s return to Spain, and was persuaded by the audacity to return to his government, where he died soon afterward. Spire’s narrative to Charles V., which he sent from Santo Domingo, is said to have been published, but no copy of it is known to exist. It is hoped that the manuscript may be among the papers in the archives at Simancas, of which the Spanish government previously undertook the publication.

SPITZKA, Edward Charles, physician, b. in New York city, 10 Nov., 1832. He was educated at the College of the city of New York, and graduated at the medical department of the University of New York in 1855, after which he studied at the medical schools in Leipzig and Vienna, serving in the latter as assistant in the laboratory of embryology and histology. On his return, he set up as a private practitioner, and became a specialist in the treatment of internal diseases, particularly of the nervous system. In 1880-83 he was professor of medical jurisprudence and the anatomy and physiology of the nervous system in the New York post-graduate medical school. He has been consulting physician of the Northeastern dispensary since 1884. Dr. Spitza has made original investigations and discoveries in his special field, and has discovered the interoptic lobes of saurians, the absence of pyramid tracts in the tectae and numerous facts in the anatomy of the human brain. He has been frequently consulted as a medical expert in cases where insanity or injury to the brain or spinal cord was a subject of litigation. Conspicuous among these was his attitude in the trial of President Garfield’s assassin, where both prosecution and defense endeavored to retain his services, but, failing, secured his attendance through an appointment. He then testified to the prisoner’s insanity, and was the only expert that did so. Dr. Spitza is a member of various societies, has been secretary of the Society of medical jurisprudence and medicine since 1886, and was vice-president of the section in neurology at the Ninth international medical congress in 1887. In 1887, he wrote an essay on the somatic etiology of insanity gained the W. and S. Tuke prize, which is given in international competition by the British medico-physiological association, and in 1887, by his paper on the nature of strychnine, he won the William A. Hammond prize, which is awarded by the American neurological association. He is the author of numerous contributions to medical journals, and was one of the editors of the “American Journal of Neurology” in 1881-4. The sections on diseases of the spinal cord and on inflammation, anemia, and hyperemia of the brain in William Pepper’s “System of Medicine” (Philadelphia, 1857) were written by him, and he has published “Treatise on Insanity” (New York, 1883).

SPOFFORD, Harriet Prescott, author, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 3 April, 1823. She is the daughter of Joseph N. Prescott and elder sister of Mary N. Prescott. She was taken in youth by her parents to Newburyport, Mass., which has ever since been her home, though she has spent many of her winters in Boston and Washington. She attended the Putnam free school in her adopted city, and later the Pinkerton academy at Derby, N. Y., where she was graduated at seventeen years of age. At Newburyport her prize essay on Hamlet drew the attention of Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who soon became her friend, Clear, and to her counsel and encouragement. Her father was attacked with slow paralysis about 1850, which rendered him incapable of exertion during the remainder of his life. This misfortune proved upon the mind of her mother, and rendered her a confirmed invalid. As Harriet was the eldest child, she felt the need of making her talents available, and began energetically to work, contributing to the New England Magazine and the Boston Evening Transcript. She worked ten hours a day, and continued her toil for years. These early stories have never been acknowledged or collected. In the “Atlantic Monthly,” in 1859, appeared a sparkling story of Parisian life, bearing the title “In a Cellar.” James Russell Lowell, then editor of the magazine, admired it, but restrained from publishing it, under the belief that it must be a translation from the French, until he was assured that it was written by Harriet Prescott. The story made her reputation, and she became from that day a welcome contributor, both of prose and poetry, to the chief periodicals of the country. Her fiction has very little in common with what is regarded as representative of the New England mind. It is ideal, intense in feeling, and luxuriant in expression. In her descriptions and fancies she revels in sensuous delights and every variety of splendor. In 1863 she married Richard S. Spofford, a lawyer of Boston, cousin of Henry M. Spofford, whose obituary below. Their home is now on Deer island, in Merrimack river, in the suburbs of Newburyport. Mrs. Spofford's books are "Sir Rohan's Ghost" (Boston, 1859); "The Amber Gods, and other Stories" (Boston, 1863); "Azarian" (1864); "New England Legends" (1871); "The Thief in the Night" (1872); "Art Decoration applied to Furniture" (New York, 1881); "Marquis of Carabas" (Boston, 1882); "Poems" (1883); "Hester Stanley at St. Mark's" (1888); "The Servant-Girl Question" (1884); and "Ballads about Authors" (1888).

SPOFFORD, Henry Martyn, jurist, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 8 Sept., 1821; d. in Red Sulphur Springs, W. Va., 20 Aug., 1880. He was graduated at Amherst, at the head of his class, in 1842, and after removing to Louisiana, where he taught and at the same time studied law, was admitted to the bar of that state at Monroe in 1846, and practised in Shreveport. He rose rapidly in his profession, was elected a district judge in 1852, and from 1854 till his resignation in 1858 sat on the supreme bench of the state. He then practised in New Orleans, where he married, in 1856, a daughter of John A. Campbell. After 1870 he spent much of his time in Pullaski, Tenn., engaged in administering the estate of his father-in-law. In 1877 he was elected U. S. senator from Louisiana by the "Nicholls" legislature, but the senate admitted William P. Kellogg, who had been chosen by the rival, or "Packard" legislature. Judge Spofford was the first to serve in that capacity at that Sulphur Springs at the time of his death. Amherst gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1877. His judicial decisions are contained in vols. xi.-xii. of the Louisiana reports. He was co-author of "The Louisiana Magistrate and Parish official Guide" (1847).—His brother, Ainsworth Rand, librarian, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 12 Sept., 1823, received a classical education, and was about to enter college his health failed, and he emigrated to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he established himself as a bookseller and publisher. In 1850 he became associate editor of the Cincinnati "Daily Commercial," and in 1861 he was appointed first assistant librarian in the library of congress at Washington. Three years later he was made librarian-in-chief. During his administration the National library has grown from 70,000 to about 800,000 volumes. The change in the law of copyright that was effected in 1870 has made the position of the librarian an honorous and important one, as all American copyrights are issued from his office, and all copyright publications are required to be deposited in the National Congression Library. As a librarian, Mr. Spofford is widely known for his comprehensive knowledge of books and their contents. He is a member of many historical and philosophical societies, and received the degree of L. L. D. from Amherst in 1884. He has written largely for the periodical press on historical, economic, and literary topics, and has published, besides catalogues of the library of congress, the American below, and Treasury of Facts, Statistical, Financial, and Political" annually since 1878; and has edited with others a "Library of Choice Literature" (10 vols., Philadelphia, 1881-8); "Library of Wit and Humor" (5 vols., 1884); and "A Practical Manual of Parliamentary Rules" (1884).

SPOONER, Alden Jeremiah, historian, b. in Sag Harbor, Long Island, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1810; d. in Hempstead, Long Island, 2 Aug., 1881. His father, Alden, was the founder of the "Long Island City Star," which the son and his brother carried on for many years afterward. He studied law and practised in Brooklyn, but devoted himself largely to local history, and wrote many articles on that subject for periodicals. He was the originator in 1863 of the Long Island historical society, and gave more than 1,000 books and pamphlets as a nucleus for its library. Mr. Spooner edited, with notes and memoirs of the authors, Gabriel Furman's "Notes, Geographical and Historical, relating to the Town of Brooklyn," (Brooklyn, 1863); and Silas Wood's "Sketch of the First Settlement of the Several Towns on Long Island" (1865).

SPOONER, Benjamin F., soldier, b. in Mansfield, Ohio, 27 Oct., 1825; d. in Lawrenceburg, Ind., 5 April, 1861. At the beginning of the Mexican war he enlisted in the 3d Indiana regiment, and was chosen 2d lieutenant. After serving in Gen. Zachary Taylor's campaign he returned home, studied law, and prctised in Lawrenceburg, holding the office of prosecuting attorney of Dearborn county for several years. At the beginning of the civil war he became lieutenant-colonel of the 7th Indiana regiment, with which he fought at Philippi and Laurel Hill, and he afterward held the same rank in the 1st Indiana, with which he was present at Shiloh and the siege of Corinth. He then resigned and returned home, but was soon made colonel of the 83d Indiana, and took part in the engagements around Vicksburg, the battle of Mission Ridge, and the Atlanta campaign, receiving a wound at Kennesaw mountain that necessitated the amputation of his left arm. He then resigned on a sick certificate on his resignation in April, 1865, and on 13 May of that year was brevetted brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers. He was U. S. marshal of the district of Indiana till 1879, when failing health compelled him to resign.

SPOONER, John Colt, senator, b. in Lawrenceburg, Ind., 6 June, 1843. His father, Judge Philip L. Spooner, was a well-known real estate. The family removed to Madison, Wis., in June, 1859, and the son was graduated at the state university in 1864, where he enrolled as a private in the 40th Wisconsin infantry. He subsequently returned and served as assistant state librarian, but entered the army again as captain in the 50th Wisconsin regiment. After he was mustered out in July, 1866, with the brevet of major, he studied law with his father; was admitted to the bar in 1867, became Gov. Lucas Fairchild's private secretary, and was then assistant in the attorney-general's office till 1870, when he removed to Hudson, Wis., and began the general practice of his profession. He was elected a member of the legislature in 1872, and was active in his support of the state university, on whose board of regents he served from 1882-5. In 1883 he took his seat in the United States senate, and in 1887 was re-elected as a Republican. In 1892 he was nominated for governor.

SPOONER, Lysander, lawyer, b. in Athol, Mass., 19 Jan., 1808; d. in Boston, Mass., 14 May, 1887. He studied law in Worcester, Mass., but on completing his course at Harvard he removed to New York and was admitted to the bar in 1831. He opened an office for himself in the southern part of the state, and was at once engaged in his business and succeeded in having it removed from the statute-books. In 1844 the letter postage from Boston to New York

...Spotswood, Alexander, governor of Virginia, b. in Tangier, Africa, in 1676; d. in Annapolis, Md., 7 June, 1740. He was bred to arms from an early age, served under the Duke of Marlborough, was dangerously wounded at Blenheim, and became deputy quartermaster-general. He was then appointed governor of Virginia and arrived there in June, 1710, bringing with him as a pet for his house a beagles corps, which had been withheld from the province. The satisfaction with which this was received by the people and the evident necessity of such a protection turned his attention to the condition of their laws, and he introduced reforms in the constitution, in the general administration of justice, and in the character of the revenue laws and the collection of taxes, receiving the co-operation of the assembly and the approval of the people, while the burgesses voted £2,000 to build him a "palace." In the second year of his administration the house of burgesses refused to provide the means that he asked for repelling the invasion of the French from Canada, and he therefore requested the home government for assistance. Virginia also refused to concur with Maryland in proposals for the discharge of the public debt, but, notwithstanding these differences, his popularity was unimpaired for years. He exerted himself in behalf of William and Mary college, assisted in raising a large fund for its support and in restoring the building that had been burned several years before his arrival, established a school for the education of Indian children, insisted on rigid economy in the offices under his control, and supported every measure that was conducive to the general prosperity. He was the first to explore the Appalachian mountains.

was the author of an act to improve the staple of tobacco and make tobacco-notes the medium of ordinary circulation. Although the welfare of Virginia was his constant aim, he was often imperious and contemptuous. On one occasion he remarked to the house of burgesses that the people had made a mistake in choosing “a set of representatives whom heaven has not generally endowed with the ordinary qualifications requisite to legislators,” and in placing at the head of standing committees men who could neither “spell English nor write common sense.” The most bitter conflict in which he was involved was that of church patronage. In this capacity he arranged the transfer of mails with much energy, bringing Philadelphia and Williamsburg within eight or ten days of each other, and through his influence Benjamin Franklin was appointed postmaster of Pennsylvania. On his domain of 40,000 acres he found beds of muscoe, and, establishing a furnace, thus gave to Virginia coal. He was also interested in promoting vine-culture. At his houses on the Rappahannock and at Yorktown he maintained the country state of the time and of his rank. In 1710 he was made a major-general to command an expedition to the West Indies, and died while attending to the embarkation at Annapolis. He bequeathed his books, maps, and mathematical instruments to the college and Mary college. Gen. Spottswood’s official account of his conflict with the burgesses is printed in the “Virginia Historical Register,” and he is best described in William Byrd’s “Progress to the Mines,” included in “The Westover Manuscripts,” containing the History of the Dividing-Line between Virginia and North Carolina,” written from 1728 to 1750 and published by J. F. Rulif (Petersburg), 19th Century. The vignette is from a portrait now in the Virginia State Library. His letters were used by George Bancroft, and then were lost sight of until 1873, having been taken to England by George W. Featherstonehough. They were bought from the latter’s widow by the Virginia historical society in 1872, and published as “The Official Letters of Alexander Spottswood, Lieutenant-governor of Virginia in 1710-1712,” in the collections of the Virginia historical society, with an introduction and notes by Robert A. Brock (2 vols., Richmond, 1882-5). His speeches to the assembly in 1714–18 are preserved in William Maxwell’s “Virginia Historical Register” (vol. 15). His son, Robert, was killed in the Indian War in 1757.—His grandson, Alexander, a soldier in the Revolution, was appointed major of the 2nd Virginia regiment. He married Eliza, the daughter of Gen. William Augustine Washington and the niece of Gen. George Washington.—The second Alexander’s brother, John, served also in the army, and was promoted to major general. Gen. ALEXANDER SPOTTST was a naval officer in the U.S. army, and commanded the artillery under Gen. Andrew Jackson at the battle of New Orleans. In acknowledgment of his bravery, Gen. Jackson presented Maj. Spotts with a sword. The son entered the navy as a midshipman, 2 Aug., 1837, and made a cruise around the world in the ship “John Adams” in 1837–39, in which he participated in two battles on the island of Sumatra with the natives, who had committed piratical acts against American merchant ships. He attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1842–3. During the Mexican war he served in the “Lexington” on the Pacific coast in 1846–9, participated in the engagements that resulted in the conquest of California, on the blockade of the Mexican Pacific ports, and at the capture of Guaymas, San Blas, and La Paz. He was promoted to master, 4 Apr., 1851, and to lieutenant, 25 Nov., 1851. Though a native of the south, he promptly announced his devotion to the Union, taking command of the schooner “Wanderer” in June, 1861, and acted as captain of the port of Key West. In July, 1862, he took charge of the steamer “Magnolia” on the Eastern Gulf blockade. He was promoted to command, 5 Aug., 1862, and had the steamer “South Carolina” on the South Atlantic blockade in 1863–4. He was transferred to the steamer “Pawnee,” in which he participated in both attacks on Fort Fisher. In June, 1865, he was detached and ordered to the Mare island navy-yard, where he served until October, 1867. His duties had taken him to California so often that he made his home in San Francisco, and was one of the first naval officers to identify himself with the interests and development of California. He was promoted to captain, 6 Aug., 1886, commanded the steamers “Saratoga” and “Pensacola” in the Pacific squadron in 1870–72, and was made paymaster, 17 Aug., 1882, as light-house inspector on the Pacific coast in 1872–74, being commissioned commodore, 25 Sept., 1873. He served as president of the board of inspection on the Pacific coast until 1889. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 28 May, 1881, and took command of the U.S. naval force on the South Atlantic station in July. He was on a cruise to visit the ports of that station when he was stricken with apoplexy while receiving the farewell visit of the British colonial governor at Port Stanley. After his death the authorities gave a lot in the cemetery for his burial, and every honor was paid to the American admiral.

SPRAGUE, Alfred White, author; b. in Honolulu, 17 June, 1821; d. in Wellaston, Mass., 7 Dec., 1891. His father, Daniel Chamberlain, was the first missionary to the Sandwich Islands in 1819, and built the first frame house there, and his mother was the first white woman to land on those islands. He was graduated at Amherst, and in 1849 changed his name to Sprague by an act of the legislature of Massachusetts. He was professor of natural philosophy and chemistry in Washington university, St. Louis, and from 1859 to 1863 he was experimental清晨on these subjects in private schools in Boston. In 1863 he applied the automatic regulation of heat to the manufacture of nitrous-oxide gas for surgical purposes. Mr. Sprague is the author of lectures entitled "Chemical Experiments" (Boston, 1853); and "Elements of Natural Philosophy" (1856).

SPRAGUE, Charles, poet, b. in Boston, Mass., 26 Oct., 1791; d. there, 22 Jan., 1873. His father, Samuel, a native of Hingham, Mass., was one of the party that removed to the then new town of Winthrop, and in 1804 he entered mercantile life, and in 1816 was taken into partnership by his employers. In 1820 he became teller in the State bank, and on the establishment of the Globe bank in 1824 he was employed as cashier, serving there until 1865, when he retired from business. Mr. Sprague first attracted attention as a poet when he won a prize for the best prose at the opening of the Park theatre in New York. He achieved similar success at the opening of other theatres in Philadelphia, Salem, and Portsmouth. In 1823 he obtained the prize for the best ode to be recited at the exhibition in the Boston theatre of a pageant in honor of Shakespeare, and in 1830 he pronounced an ode at the centennial celebration of the settlement of Boston. In 1829 he delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa society of Harvard a poem on "Curiosity," which was considered his best production. Among his shorter poems are the "Ode to Shakespeare" and the "Winged Worshippers." Edwin P. Whipple says: "His prologues are the best which have been written since the time of Pope. His "Shakespeare Ode" has hardly been exceeded by anything in the same manner since Gray's "Progress of Poetry." But the true power and originality of the man are manifested in his domestic pieces. "The Brothers," "I see Thee Still," and "The Family Meeting" are the finest concentrations of natural affection in our literature. There have been several collections of Mr. Sprague's writings (New York, 1841); his "Prose and Poetical Writings," of which the Author (Boston, 1850); and other editions (1855 and 1870).

His son, Charles James, poet, b. in Boston, Mass., 16 Jan., 1823, was educated in private schools, and became cashier of the Globe bank in 1841, serving until 1892. For many years he was curator of botany in the Boston society of natural history, and he is known among cryptogamists for his collection of lichens. He has published several lists of New England fungi. Mr. Sprague has contributed poems to journals and magazines, and has written articles for scientific papers. During the past thirty years he has translated numerous poems for part-songs.

SPRAGUE, Charles Ezra, author, b. in Nassau, N. Y., 9 Oct., 1842. He was graduated at Union college in 1860, and since 1875 he has been secretary and president of the Union Dime Savings institution of New York city. During the civil war he served in the army, was severely wounded at Gettysburg, and was given the brevet of captain in 1865. He is the inventor of the "sprague checkbook," has devised numerous account-keeping forms, and also a savings-bank system for testing the accuracy of accounts, and has written many articles on the subject, on which he has also lectured at Columbia college. Mr. Sprague is the first prominent advocate in the country of the international use of the English language through the medium of the vernacular, and in 1887 he has edited the "Vokalspel," issued as part of "The Offering," and he is the author of "Logical Symbolism". printed privately, New York, 1882, "The Hand-Book of Volapuk" (1888), and "The Story of the Flag," a poem read before the survivors of the 4th New York regiment (Albany, 1886).

SPRAGUE, John Titcomb, soldier, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 3 July, 1810; d. in New York city, 6 Sept., 1878. In 1831 he became 2d lieutenant in the marine corps, and served in the Florida war, being twice promoted for meritorious conduct, and brevetted captain on 15 March, 1842. He was given that full rank in 1846, and brevetted major on 30 May, 1848. He was made major of the 1st infantry, 14 May, 1861, and, when stationed with his regiment in Texas, he signed a petition to Governor David E. Twiggs, but was released on parole, and became mustering and disbursing officer at Albany, N. Y., and adjutant-general of the state, with the rank of brigadier-general, holding this post until 1865. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 44th infantry in March, 1863, and colonel of the 5th infantry on 12 June, 1865, and in that year served in Florida and was made military governor, but retired from the army on 15 July, 1870. He was the author of "Origin, Progress, and Conclusion of the Florida War" (New York, 1845).

SPRAGUE, John Wilson, soldier, b. in White Creek, Washington co., N. Y., 4 April, 1817; d. 4 Dec., 1863. He was educated in common schools, and entered Reusscher polytechnic institute, Troy, but was not graduated. He then became a merchant, and in 1851-2 was treasurer of Erie county, Ohio. He was made a captain in the 7th Ohio volunteers at the beginning of the civil war, became colonel of the 63d Ohio in 1862, and was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 30 July, 1864, receiving the brevet of major-general, U. S. volunteers, on 13 March, 1865. He also declined a seat in the 39th U. S. Congress. After the war he was general manager of the Winoon and St. Peter railroad, Minn., but removed to Washington territory in 1870, having been made general agent and superintendent of the Northern Pacific railroad, which office he resigned in 1882. After that he was engaged in various enterprises, and was for five years president of the National bank in Tacoma, Washington.

SPRAGUE, Peleg, jurist, b. in Dixbury, Mass., 27 April, 1793; d. in Boston, Mass., 13 Oct., 1860. After graduation at Harvard in 1812, he studied in the Litchfield law-school, was admitted to the bar in 1815, and practised in Augusta, Me., and afterward in Hallowell. He was a member of the Maine legislature in 1822, elected to congress as a Whig, 7 March, 1823, and then chosen U. S. senator from Maine, serving from 7 Dec., 1829, till 1 Jan., 1835, when he resigned and practised law in Boston. He was a presidential elector on the Harrison and Tyler ticket in 1840, and from 1841 till 1865 was U. S. judge for the district of Massachusetts. He was the last surviving member of the U. S. Senate of 1830-2, in which Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Thomas H. Benton, and Robert
Y. Hayne served. As a judge and lawyer he was much esteemed, and he was regarded as a fine debater. Harvard gave him the degree of L.L. D. in 1847. He published "Speeches and Addresses" (Boston, 1858), and his "Decisions in Admiralty and Maritime Cases in the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts, 1841-1861," were edited by Francis E. Parker (Philadelphia, 1861). In this work "Two Charges to the Grand Jury," 1851 and 1861, are included.

SPRAGUE, William, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Cranston, R. I., 3 Nov., 1799; d. in Providence, R. I., 19 Oct., 1856. He received a good education at an early age, became a member of the assembly, and in 1832 was chosen speaker of the house. He was then elected to congress as a Democrat, served from 7 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1857, and, declining a re-election, became governor of Rhode Island in 1853-9. He was elected to the U. S. senate in place of Nathan F. Dixon, serving from 18 Feb., 1842, till 17 Jan., 1844, when he resigned, and was subsequently a member of the Rhode Island legislature. In 1848 he was an elector on the Taylor and Fillmore ticket. He was largely engaged in the manufacture of cotton, and was president of the Hartford, Providence, and Fishkill railroad, and of two banks.—His nephew, William, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Cranston, R. I., 12 Sept., 1830, received his education in common schools, served in his county, and was largely engaged in making calico-prints. Subsequently he became a manufacturer of linen, woollen goods, and iron, a builder of locomotives, and an owner of railroads and steamships. In 1860 he was a governor of Rhode Island. He had served as colonel in the state militia, offered a regiment and a battery of light-horse and artillery to serve in the civil war, and with this regiment participated in the battle of Bull Run, where his horse was shot under him. He received a commission as brigadier-general of volunteers, which he declined. He also served in other actions during the peninsular campaign, including Williamsburg and the siege of Yorktown. He was chosen to the U. S. senate as a Republican, was a member of the committee on manufactures, and chairman of that on public lands, his term extending from 4 March, 1855, till 3 March, 1857, when he resigned. His manufacturing establishments. He operated the first rotary machine for making horse-shoes, perfected a shoe-making-machine, and various processes in calico-printing, especially that of direct printing on a large scale with the extract of madder without a chemical bath. Gov. Sprague claims to have discovered what he calls that portable ciple of the orbit as inherent in the direction of the lines. He asserts that money is endowed with two tendencies, the distributive and the aggregative, and that when the latter predominates, as before the civil war, decadence results: but that when the former is in the ascendency, as was until recently the case, there is progress. He received the degree of A. M. from Brown in 1861, of which university he has been a trustee since 1866.

SPRAGUE, William Buel, clergyman, b. in Amboy, Conn., 16 Oct., 1793; d. in Flushing, L. I., 7 May, 1876. He was the son of Benjamin Sprague, a farmer. After graduation at Yale in 1815 he was a private tutor, studied two years at Princeton theological seminary, and in 1819 was ordained pastor of the 1st Congregational church in West Springfield, Mass., as a colleague of Rev. Joseph Lathrop, D. D., remaining there till 1829, when he was installed as pastor of the 2d Presbyterian church in Albany, N. Y. He held his charge till 1835, when he resigned and removed to Flushing. In 1828 and 1836 he visited Europe. He received the degrees of A. M. from Yale in 1819; S. T. D. from Columbia in 1828, and Harvard in 1848; and LL. D. from Princeton in 1869. Dr. Sprague made extensive collections of religious pamphlets and autographs, and presented the former to the state library at Albany, to which he also gave a manuscript volume of the "Letters of Gen. Sir Jeffrey Amherst." Dr. Sprague also presented the library of Harvard the papers of Gen. Thomas Gage. His autographs, numbering nearly 100,000, probably the largest private collection in the world, are now in the possession of his son. He was the author of more than 100 published sermons, memoirs of his father's family, and wrote many introductions to books. His principal work is "Annals of the American Pulpit" (9 vols., New York, 1857-'69). His other books are "Letters to a Daughter" (1829); "Letters from Europe" (1828); "Letters to Young People" (1830); "Lectures on Revivals" (1832); "Hints designed to regulate the Intercourse of Christians in the Controversy between True Christianity and various other Systems" (1837); "Life of Rev. Edward Dorr Griffin" (1838); "Letters to Young Men, founded on the Life of Joseph" (2d ed., 1845); "Aids to Early Religion" (1847); "Words to a Young Man's Consciousness" (1848); "Women of the Bible" (1850); "Visits to European Aristocracy" (1855) and "Practical Life of Patrick Dwyer in Spenser's American Biography" (1845); and "Memoirs" of Rev. John and William A. McDowell" (1864).

SPRANGER, Daniel Guerin, Hebrew colonist, b. in Holland about 1610; d. in Cayenne, South America, in 1664. He accompanied Maurice de Nassau in the conquest of Brazil, as he had a contract for furnishing supplies to the invading army. During sixteen years he lived in Brazil occupied in colonization schemes, and opened an extensive trade between that country and Amsterdam. When the Portuguese army recovered possession of Brazil in 1654 all Hebrews living in the country were expelled, and Spranger sought refuge in the island of Cayenne, which had been abandoned by its former possessors, the French company of the island. Although he was opposed at first by the Caribs Indians, he gained their favor with presents and made a treaty with their principal chief, who granted to him the absolute possession of the island. Being joined by several parties of Hebrews from Brazil, he undertook to colonize the island, and succeeded. This is the more remarkable as it is the only instance in which a Hebrew colony has exclusively devoted itself to agriculture. Spranger introduced the culture of the sugar-cane and indigo-plant, which so prospered that, according to Jacques Dutertre in his "Histoire générale des Antilles," under Spranger's administration the island of Cayenne was reputed an El Dorado. The population of the island at that time was about 600—all Hebrews. In 1659 the Dutch company, organized in Amsterdam for the colonization of Guiana, sent a party of 250 Jewish emigrants, and 150 more from Leipzig followed in the next year. The colony was destroyed in 1664 by Le Fèvre de la Barre, who took Cayenne, and again expelled all Jews. Springer being killed while he was preaching his last sermon.

SPREAD, Robert, forger, b. in England in 1813; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Dec., 1856. He gained notoriety by fabrication of autograph letters of Washington, Franklin, and Lord Nelson. Of his life prior to the time when he came to the United States nothing is known. Settling in Philadelphia about 1838, he began to deal in a small way in books relating to America, autographs, and prints, frequently obtaining literary rarities. Finding himself unable to supply the demand for genuine autograph letters of eminent men of the Revolution, he began to make and sell counterfeits. Being an expert penman, he soon acquired great facility in imitating the handwriting of Washington, Franklin, and others. These counterfeits were written on paper of the period, with ink prepared so as to give the appearance of age to the writing, and readily deceived those who were not experts. He was frequently arrested by the civil authorities for obtaining money under false pretences, but always escaped punishment by confessing his guilt and expressing contrition for his offence. Most of his forgeries, such as those of Franklin, and Nelson were sold in Canada and England. To sell his forgeries he resorted to various devices, finally pretending in his letters that he was a daughter of Gen. Thomas J. Jackson, who was compelled by poverty to part with family papers. By these means he sold many counterfeit autographs to Confederate bond-holders in England. At the time of his death he was an inmate of a hospital and in poverty. See "The American Antiquarian" for May, 1888.

SPRING, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Northbridge, Mass., 10 March, 1746; d. in Newburyport, Mass., 4 March, 1879. After graduation at Princeton in 1771 he studied theology there and under Dr. Joseph Bellamy, Samuel Hopkins, and Stephen Jeptha Ward, in West Newton, England, and was licensed to preach in 1774. In 1776 he joined the volunteer corps of 1,100 men under Col. Benedict Arnold as chaplain, marched with them to Canada, participated in the attack on Quebec, and saw Burr attempt to carry Montgomery from the field. At the close of 1776 he left the army, and in February, 1777, he preached to the congregation in Newburyport, of which he became pastor, serving from 1777 until his death. He possessed great influence and weight of character, was a leader of the Hopkinson party (see Hopkins, Samuel), and was active in promoting the union of the two parties in the Congregational churches by the establishment of the Andover theological seminary, of which he was a founder. He was also an originator of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. Dartmouth gave him the degree of A. M., in 1789, and Williams that of S. T. D., in 1806. He published several controversial works, and about twenty-five miscellaneous discourses, including one on the death of Washington and one on the duel between Aaron Burr and Alexander Hamilton.—His son, Gardner, clergyman, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 24 Feb., 1795; d. in New York city, 18 Aug., 1873, was graduated at Yale in 1805, taught in Bermuda for two years, and on his return studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1808, but abandoned his profession, studied at Andover theological seminary, and on 10 Aug., 1819, was ordained pastor of the Brick Presbyterian church in New York city, where he continued until his death, although he was offered the presidency of Hamilton and Dartmouth colleges. In 1856 he removed with his congregation to the new church on Murray hill. During the last years of his life Dr. Spring seldom preached, his pulpit being filled by an assistant. Hamilton gave him the degree of S. T. D.
in 1819, and Lafayette that of D. D., in 1833. In addition to many pamphlets he published "Essays on the Distinguishing Traits of Christian Character" (New York, 1815); "Fragmentum from the Study of a Pastor" (1839); "Obligations of the World to the Bible" (1841); "The Attraction of the Cross" (1845); "The Bible not of Man" (1847); "Discourses to Students" (1847); "The Power of the Pulpit" (1848); "The Merry-Seat" (1849); "First Things" (2 vols., 1851); "The Glory of Christ" (2 vols., 1852); "Memoirs of the Rev. Samuel J. Mills" (1854); "Contrast between Good and Bad Men" (2 vols., 1859); and Pulpit Ministra-tions or Sabbath Readings, a Series of Discourses (2 vols., 1860); and "Personal Reminiscences of the Life and Times of Gardiner Spring" (2 vols., 1866). He also published several occasional sermons, the last of which are contained in the "Brick Church Memorial" (New York, 1861). Many of his books were translated into French and other languages, and republished in Great Britain. A collective edition of his earlier works was published (2 vols., New York, 1855).

SPRINGER, Renben Runyan, philanthropist, b. in Franklin, Ky., 16 Nov., 1800; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 10 Dec., 1884. The family, originally from Sweden, settled in Delaware in the 17th century. Renben's father, Charles, a native of West Virginia, moved to Kentucky, was a soldier during the War of Independence, and afterward postmaster at Franklin. At thirteen his son became a clerk in the post-office, and in three years succeeded his father as postmaster. He next was a clerk on a steamboat that ran between Cincinnati and New Orleans, soon acquired an interest in the boat, and thus laid the foundation of his fortune. Later he became a partner in a steamboat company, and engaged in various enterprises, but retired in 1849 on account of his health, and never resumed active business. He went abroad repeatedly, buying many fine works of art, most of which are now the property of the Cincinnati art museum. He gave to the Music hall, the Exhibition building, the Odeon theatre, and the Art museum in that city, in all $200,000, to private charities, and to the churches, which he was a member, more than $100,000, and at least $30,000 annually in the way of benevolence, besides contributing liberally and regularly to various charities and public enterprises. He left about $3,000,000 to his nearest of kin, having no children: also annuities to the College of music, the Music hall and the Art museum, and nearly $400,000 to various Roman Catholic charitable institutions, among these, $40,000 to the cathedral schools, $30,000 to St. Peter's benevolent society, and $100,-

SPRINGER, William McKendree, lawyer, b. in New Lebanon, Sullivan co., Ill., 30 May, 1836. His family removed to Jacksonville, Ill., in 1839. He attended the Illinois college, and was graduated at Indiana university in 1858, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1858, and practised in Springfield, Ill., where he still resides. He was secretary of the State constitutional convention of 1862, served in the legislature in 1871-2, which was engaged in revising the laws of the state, and was elected to Congress as a Republican, 1872, and re-elected 1873. On 15 Dec., 1875, he introduced in the house his resolution declaring the president of retiring from the presidential office after the second term has become a part of our republican system, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions, which was adopted—yeas, 233, nays, 18. This large affirmative vote contributed materially to the defeat of President Grant for re-nomination in 1876 for a third term. In 1873 he was appointed chairman of the committee on expenditures in the state legislature, and has been a member of other important committees, including the Potter committee, which investigated the president-electoral election of 1876, and of the joint committee which reported the electoral commission bill of 1876-7, and in 1882-3 delivered numerous and ex-hortative speeches in congress on the establishment of the tariff commission and the revision of the tariff. He has also important personal notables and his amendment to the bill granting $1,350,000 to the Centennial commissioners and his successful efforts in recovering the amount through the U.S. supreme court have won for him a wide reputation. During the 39th congress he secured favorable action in the committee on territories, of which he was chairman, on his bill to provide for the organization of the territory of Oklahoma, and on his bill to enable the people of Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico to form constitutions and state governments. In 1888 he was chairman of the committee of the whole pending the protracted debate on the tariff bill. In May, 1888, he was renominated as a candidate for the 34th congress. His wife, Rebecca Ruter, author, was born in Indiana, and is the daughter of the Rev. Calvin W. Ruter, a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1850 she was graduated at the Wesleyan female college, Cincinnati, and on 15 Dec., 1859, she married Mr. Springer. She is the author of numerous fugitive poems, and of two novels, "Beecwood" (Philadelphia, 1849) and "Serafina" (1851).

SPROUT, Ebenezer, elder, b. in Middleborough, Plymouth co., Mass., in 1722; d. in Marietta, Ohio, in February, 1800. He entered the Provincial army as a captain early in 1775, was promoted major and lieutenant-colonel, and finally given command of the 3d Massachusetts regiment. He was in Gen. John Glover's brigade at the battle of Trenton, 1776, and in July, 1781, was appointed brigadier-inspector by Barons Steuben. After the war he was a surveyor at Providence, R. I., where he married a daughter of Com. Abraham Whipple. Subsequently he went to the west, and in 1786 began a survey of the territory now within the borders of the state of Ohio. In 1788 he led the party of emigrants that settled Marietta, and he was for fourteen years sheriff and colonel of militia. He was tall and commanding in person, and was known among the Indians as "The Big Buckeye."

SPROULL, Thomas (sprawl), clergyman, b. near Freeport, Pa., 15 Sept., 1806; d. in Pittsburg, 20 March, 1892. He was graduated at the Western university of Pennsylvania in 1829 and graduated from the Presbyterian congregation of Alleghany and Pittsburg from 1831 till 1868. He was a professor in 1838-40 in the Reformed Presbyterian theological seminary, and in 1840-45 in the middle Eastern and Western seminaries. In 1856 he was re-elected, and in 1874 was made professor emer-
it. In 1867 he was elected president of the school of the Reformed Presbyterian church. He edited "The Reformed Presbyterian" in 1855-63 and "The Reformed Presbyterian and Covenant" in 1863-71, both in Pittsburg. He received the degree of D. D. from Westminster college, Pa., in 1857, and that of L.L. D. from the Western university of Pennsylvania in 1886.
pamphlets, he has published "Projections on Theology" (Pittsburg, Pa., 1882).

SPRUCE, Presley, senator, b. in Delaware in 1783; d. in Smyrna, Del., 13 Feb., 1863. He was for some time a resident of the State, where he was engaged in business. He was sent to the State senate, of which body he was elected president, and also represented Delaware in the U. S. senate from 6 Dec., 1847, till 3 March, 1853. He belonged to the Wing party in politics.

SPRY, William, jurist, b. in England; d. in Barbadoes, W. I., in September, 1772. He married a niece of the Earl of Chatham, and in 1764, arrived with his family at Halifax, Nova Scotia, having been appointed judge of the vice-admiralty court over all America, which had been recently constituted by act of parliament. In the proclamation that announces the opening of the court he is styled "The Right Worshipful William Spry, Doctor of Laws." The other officers of the new court were: vice-admiral, the Earl of Northumberland; registrar, the Hon. Spencer Perri- val; marshal, Charles Howard, gent. These officers probably expected to fulfill their duties by deputies. Judge Spry opened his court at Halifax on 9 Oct., 1764. Its creation had been opposed in the colonies, and the passage of the stamp-act the next year, with the accompanying disturbances, probably prevented its extension to other provinces. Judge Spry was appointed governor of Barbadoes in June, 1765, and died in office.

SQUIER, Ephraim George, author, b. in Bethlehem, N. Y., 17 June, 1821; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 17 April, 1888. In early youth he worked on a farm, attended and taught school, studied en- gineering, and became interested in American antiquities. He was associat- ed in the publication of the "New York State Mechanic," at Albany, in 1841-2, and engaged in jour- nalism in Hartford, Conn., and Chillicothe, Ohio, in 1843-8, during which pe- riod he also investig- ated the ancient monuments of the Mississippi valley in conjunction with Dr. Edwin Hamilton Davis (q. v.), and pre- pared the narrative that was published in vol. i. of the "Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge" (Washington, 1848). He also made an examination of the ancient re- mains of New York state under the auspices of the New York historical society to whose request he appointed special charge "affaires to all the Central American states in 1849, and negotiated treaties with Nicaragua, Honduras, and San Salvador. In 1853 he made a second visit to Central America to examine a line for a projected interoceanic road, and to make further study of the archaeology of the country. In 1856 he received the medal of the French geographical society for his researches. In 1863 Mr. Squier was appointed U. S. commis- sioner to Peru, where he made an exhaustive inves- tigation of Inca remains and took numerous photo- graphs of them. In 1868 he was appointed consul-general of Honduras at New York, and in 1871 he was elected the first president of the Anthropologi- cal institute of New York. In 1874 his health be- came so seriously impaired as to preclude further original research, and though he subsequently re- covered sufficiently to direct the final preparation and revision of Manuals of Peru for publication, the affection resulted in his death. He was a member of numerous historical, archaeological, and scientific societies, and several years chief editor of Frank Leslie's publishing-house. Besides many official reports, scientific papers, magazine articles, and contributions to the "Encyclopædia Brita- nica" and foreign periodicals, his works include "Original Views of America," "The American Genus," "Smithsonian Contributions to Knowl- edge," (1849); Buffalo, (1851); "Serpent Symbols" (1852); "Nicaragua, its People, Scenery, and Monu- ments" (New York, 1852); "Notes on Central America" (1854); "Watkins, or Adventures on the Mosquito Shore" (1855); "The States of Central America" (1857; revised ed., 1876); "Monographs of Authors who have written on the Aboriginal Languages of Central America" (1869); "Tropical Fibres and their Economic Extraction" (1861); and "Perú: Incidents and Explorations in the Land of the Incas" (1877).

SQUIER, Miles Powell, clergyman, b. in Cornwall, Vt., 4 May, 1792; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 22 June, 1866. He was graduated at Middlebury in 1811, and ordained in Edinburgh to preach by a Congregational association. After laboring at Oxford, Mass., and Ver- gennes, Vt., and doing missionary work for a year in western New York, he was ordained on 3 May, 1816, the first pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church of Buffalo, N. Y., which relation he main- tained until 1824. In 1824-6 he acted as financial agent for the Auburn theological seminary, and from 1826 till 1834 he was secretary of the Geneva agency of the American home missionary society. In 1834 he founded the Geneva lyceum, and was occupied in superintending its affairs until 1841. The next eight years he resided at Ge- neva, but supplied the pulpits of various neighboring churches. From 1849 till 1863 he was pro- fessor of biblical and critical science in Beloit. Wis. The remaining three years of his life were spent in Geneva. Dr. Squier was an earnest student and fearless in the expression of opinion, but genial in manner. Besides contribut- ing to the periodical press, he published "The Problem Solved, or Sin not of God" (New York, 1856); "Reason and the Bible, or the Truth of Religion" (1860); "Miscellaneous Writings, with an Autobiography, edited and supplemented by the Rev. James R. Boyd, of Geneva, N. Y." (1865).

STACY, James, clergyman, b. in Liberty county, Ga., 2 June, 1830. He was graduated at Oglethorpe university, Ga., in 1849, studied theology at Colum- bia, S. C., and in 1853 was ordained by the Georgia presbytery. After preaching as a supply until 1857, he was called to the Auburn theological seminary, Ga.; Presbyterian church, where he still re- mains. He has been stated clerk of the presbytery of Atlanta from its organization in 1857 to the present time, and has held the same office in the synod of Georgia since 1856. He is president of the board of directors of the theological seminary at Columbia, S. C. He received the honorary de- gree of D. D. from the Western College of the S. W. Dr. Stacy has published a prize essay on the "Holy Sabbath" (Richmond, 1877); "Water Baptism" (1882); and "Day of Rest" (1885).

STADEN, Hans (stah-den), German traveller, b. in Hesse-Homburg in 1529; d. there about 1565. He had received a good education and was in moderate circumstances, when desire for travel led him to enlist in 1847 on a ship that was bound for Brazil. He returned, 9 Oct., 1848, and going to Seville, enlisted as a volunteer in an expedition for La Plata river, which sailed in March, 1849, on reaching the mouth of the river two ships sank in a storm, and, after vainly trying to build a bark, part of the shipwrecked crew set out overland for Asuncion, while the other sailed upon the third vessel for Brazil. In 1850, Stager was shipwrecked, and Staden, with a few survivors, passed to the continent and established themselves at São Marco in 1852. A few weeks later Staden, while engaged in a hunting expedition, was captured by a party of Tupinamba Indians, who carried him to their village, where he was to be devoured at the next festival, but he won the friendship of a powerful chief, whom he cured of a disease, and his life was spared. The Portuguese tried several times to negotiate for Staden's ransom, but the Indians declined all overtures. At last he made his escape on a French ship, and on 22 Feb., 1855, arrived at Honfleur, in Normandy, and thence went immediately to his native city, which he never left again.

He is one of the most interesting and remarkable of the so-called "Geschichten von Landsleuten in der Neun Welt. America genannten, von Hans Stadenss Homburg in Hessen" (Marburg, 1555), which contains also a summary of the manners of Tupinamba Indians and a description of their villages, has been translated into French and reprinted in the collection of Henry Ternaux-Compans.

Edward Anson, blockholder, a native of Ontario county, N. Y., was born April 22, 1835; d. in Chicago, Ill., 26 March, 1885. At sixteen years of age he entered into the service of Henry O'Reilly, a printer, who subsequently became a pioneer in the building and operating of telegraphs. He followed O'Reilly in his enterprise, and when the latter established a line from Philadelphia to Harrisburg he was placed in charge of the first office at Lancaster, Pa., in 1846. He then went to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he made several improvements in the construction of batteries and the arrangement of wires, and in 1852 he was made general superintendent of the principal lines in the west at that time. After the consolidation of the Western union company with these he was still superintendent of the entire system, and in 1861 these lines is much indebted. At the opening of the civil war he was asked to take the management of the telegraphs in southern Ohio and along the Virginia line, to which he consented and at once prepared a cipher by which he could safely communicate with those who had the key. In October he was called to Washington and appointed general superintendent of government telegraphs in all departments. He remained in service till September, 1868, and was brevetted brigadier general of volunteers for valuable services. In 1869 Gen. Stager returned to Chicago, and, in addition to his duties as general superintendent, he was the president of many enterprises, among which was the Western electric manufacturing company, one of the largest and most influential in the world. He was also interested in the Babcock manufacturing company and several others. He secured a consolidation of the two telephone companies in Chicago, and was president of them and also of the Western Edison electric light company, and a director in many corporations.

J. W. Stalnaker, b. in Trumbull county, Ohio, Nov. 24, 1831, was educated in the public schools of his native town, and entered the office of Geo. P. T. Bradley as a printer. In 1853 he removed to Cleveland, where he spent several years in the production of a German language newspaper, the German Journal, and was afterward assistant editor of the Ohio Statesman and the Union. He has been editor of the Cleveland Advertiser (in 1863), of the Ohio Light (1865) and of the Cleveland Evening Post (1868-70). He is a member of the Junior League of Union and of the Cleveland Press Association, and a director of the Cleveland U. O. S. and of the Republic Union. He is married with Mary A. Davis, and has four children.

In 1876; "Pastor's Record" (Albany, 1876); "Hand-Book to Lutherman Hymns" (Philadelphia, 1879); "How to keep Church Debits and how to keep Churches out of Debt" (New York, 1886); and "Mary's Book for Church Work" (1887).

John Bernhard, diplomatist, b. in Siegmahn, Oldenburg, 16 March, 1823; d. in Rome, Italy, 6 Jan., 1900. He came to this country, and Hungarian revolution occurred. Stahel joined the revolutionists and served on the staffs of Gen. Arthur Görger and Gen. Richard Delamare Guyon. After the success of the Austrian arms he went to Germany, thence to England, and finally to New York City. There he essayed journalism, and in 1859 was editor of the "Deutsche illustrierte Familienblätter," an illustrated German weekly. He became, in May, 1861, lieutenant-colonel of the 45th New York Voluntary, commanded that regiment in the first battle of Bull Run, and was made colonel. He was promoted brigadier-general, 12 Nov., 1861, given a brigade in Gen. Lewis Benker's German division, and took part in the battle of Cross Keys, Va. 8 June, 1862. He was subsequently in command of a division of Gen. Franz Sigel's army corps, the 11th, and on 14 March, 1863, was commissioned major-general. He resigned from the army, 8 Feb., 1865. In 1866 he was made U. S. consul at Yokohama, Japan, but after three years' residence there he was compelled to return on account of impaired health. He was engaged in mining from 1870 till 1877, when he was again appointed consul to Japan. There he remained till the close of 1881, when he was appointed U. S. consul-general at Shanghai, which latter office he resigned in 1885. He has since been engaged in business in New York City.

Richard Morrell (stag), artist, b. in Leeds, England, 7 Sept., 1817; d. in Newport, R., 11 Oct., 1881. When he was about thirteen years of age he was placed in an architect's office, and he subsequently rapidly read his way in portrait-painting. In 1831 he came to the United States with his father, and four years later he settled with the family in Newport. In his artistic efforts he met with encouragement and advice from Washington Allston, and soon devoted himself entirely to miniature-painting. Among his portraits are those of Washington Allston, Edward Everett, Daniel Webster, William H. Prescott, and others. Some of his miniatures were exhibited at the Royal academy, and received warm praise. He was a regular exhibitor at the Academy of Design, New York, of which he was elected an associate in 1856, and an academician in 1861. He visited Europe in 1857-9, and again in 1872-4. The last twenty years of his life were devoted to miniature-painting, and he made portraits as well as genre pieces and landscapes. Among his works in oil are portraits of himself, of Russell Sturgis and George H. Calvert, and the "Crossing Sweeper": "The Sailor's Grave" (1863); and "A't's Cradle" (1863).

Stall, Sylvanus, clergyman, b. in Elizabethtown, Columbia co., N. Y., 18 Oct., 1847. He was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1872, and at the theological seminary there in 1874, after studying also in Union theological seminary, New York city. He was ordained by the Hartwick Lutheran synod in 1874, and has held pastorates at Cobleskill, N. Y., in 1874-7, Martin's Creek, Pa., in 1877-80, and Lancaster, Pa., in 1880-7. In the last-named year he retired from the active duties of the ministry in order to devote his time to "Stall's Lutheran Year-Book" (Lancaster, Pa.), which he originated in 1884. He has been statistical secretary of the general synod since 1885. He has published a "Pastor's Record" (Albany, 1876); "Hand-Book to Lutheran Hymns" (Philadelphia, 1879); "How to keep Church Debits and how to keep Churches out of Debt" (New York, 1886); and "Mary's Book for Church Work" (1887).
New York city till 1847, studied law, and was a judge of the Cincinnati court of common pleas in 1853-5. He took part in the Liberal Republican movement of 1878, and was appointed minister to Italy in 1879. He was the author of "Technicalities and Principles of the Philosophy of Nature" (Boston, 1848) and "Concepts and Theories of Modern Physics" (New York, 1882).

STANBERY, Henry, attorney-general, b. in New York city, 20 Feb., 1806; d. there June 26, 1881. He was the son of Jonas Stanbery, a physician, who removed to Zanesville, Ohio, in 1814. Henry was graduated at Marietta college, Pa., in 1830, and began the study of law in that year, but could not be admitted to the bar until he was of age, in 1834. Then, at the invitation of Thomas Ewing, he began practice in Lancaster county, Ohio, and rode the circuit with him. Mr. Stanbery remained for many years at Lancaster. In 1846 the office of attorney-general of Ohio was created by the general assembly, and he was elected to be its first occupant. He accordingly removed to Columbus, where he resided for about five years. At that time the U.S. courts were held there, and Judge Stanbery established a large and valuable practice in them as well as in the supreme court of Ohio. In 1850 he was elected a delegate to the convention that framed the present state constitution. In 1853 he removed to Cincinnati, and in 1858 was appointed attorney-general of the United States by President Johnson. This office he accepted, after consultation with his friends, solely from a desire to assist in carrying the government safely through the perilous period that followed the war, and resigned it at the request of the executive to become one of his counsel on the impeachment trial. His health at the time was so delicate that most of his arguments were omitted from writing. On the termination of the trial he was nominated by the president to the office of justice of the U.S. supreme court; but the senate refused to confirm him. He then returned to Cincinnati, where he was president of the Law association of that city, but held no other public office. He wrote occasionally on political questions, and sometimes in the State press. As a lawyer, although he was learned in technicalities and skilled in applying the nice rules of evidence and practice, he especially delighted in the discussion of general principles. As a practitioner he was quick to perceive the slightest weakness in his opponent's case. He never attempted to browbeat or mislead a witness, but knew how to secure full and true answers even from those who had come upon the stand with hostile intentions.

STANISH, Myles, soldier, b. in Lancashire, England, about 1584; d. in Duxbury, Mass., 3 Oct., 1636. It is supposed that he was a son of the Standish family of Duxbury Hall in Lancashire, and that his name was erased from the family register to deprive him of a share in the estate. The name is ancient, and it is said that at the meeting between Richard H. and Wat Tyler, relates how the latter was killed by a "squire of the kynges called John Standysyse," who was knighted for this act. Later another Sir John Standish participated in the battle of Agincourt. While still a youth, Myles entered the English forces on the side of the king, and from the nursery to the sea, he joined in Leyden the colony that sailed in the "Mayflower" from Plymouth, England, on 16 Sept., 1620. The vessel anchored in the Bay of Cape Cod on 21 Nov., 1620, and on 25 Nov. sixteen armed men, "every one his Musket, Sword, and Corset, Under the command of Captain Myles Standish," were set ashore for a second exploration. They marched in single file through what is now Provincetown, where they saw several Indians, followed their tracks about six miles, and spent the night in the woods. Three subsequent expeditions were sent out. On the third, after landing in the vicinity of Eastham, they went toward Wellfleet, found the Indian burying-place and Indian houses, and encamped before nightfall at Nauskeket. On the following day they were surprised by the Indians, upon whom Standish fired, but the skirmish was slight. On 29 Sept., 1621, after the founding of Plymouth, a party of ten men, with three savages as guides, under command of Standish, who had been appointed military captain in February, 1621, explored Massachusetts Bay. They anchored off what is now Thomson's island, which Standish explored and named Trevore. This party also explored the broad plain known as "Massachusetts fields," the gathering-place of the tribes, which comprised a part of what is now Quincy. In 1622 Thomas Weston sent out emigrants to plant a new colony, which they did at Wessagusset (now Weymouth). They incurred the enmity of the Massachusetts Indians, who formed a plot to destroy them; but, fearing that such an act would be avenged by the Plymouth colony, they decided to exterminate the English. Before this plan was executed, Massasoit revealed the plot, and the Plymouth colonists determined that no one go out on an expedition to Wessagusset. Fearful of exciting the suspicion of the Indians by an armed body, Myles Standish selected eight men to march to the relief of that colony, which he found in a wretched condition. By Massasoit's advice, Standish, with a few of his men, entered the chiefs Pecknood and Wituwamat, with a half-brother of the latter, into a room, and, closing the door, killed the Indians after a desperate fight. This was the first Indian blood that was shed by the Pilgrims. A general battle ensued in the open field, from which the Indians fled and in which no lives were lost. This victory of Standish spread terror among the savages, and, as a warning to further depredations, the head of Wituwamat was exposed to view at Plymouth. When the news of Standish's victory reached the pious John Rin- don, the pastor at Leyden, he wrote to the govern- or of Plymouth on 19 Dec., 1623, "to consider the disposition of their captain, who was of a warm temper," and concluded with the remark: "O how happy a thing had it been that you had converted some before you had killed any!" In the summer of 1625 the colony was in great trouble, owing to its unhappy relation with its partners, the so-called "merchant adventurers" in London, and Capt. Standish was sent to England to seek relief, bearing a letter from Gov. William Bradford to the council of New England urging their intervention in behalf of the colony; but Bradford says that, on account of the plague in London, Standish could accomplish nothing. In 1628 Standish captured Thomas Morton, of Merrymount (p. 4). In retaliation for an attack of D’Aulnay (see CHiNTSE PRI dUCHE, ARNAX 63), who drove away in 1634 a party of Plymouth men at Penobscot, Plymouth despatched a vessel and a force under Standish to compel the surrender of the French at that post; but this expedition failed. In addition to being the military leader of every exploit of importance in the colony, his counsel was often required in civil affairs, and for many years he was also treasurer as well as the colony. He was not a member of the Plymouth commission, but was a dissenter from the dissent-

ers. He was resolute, stern, bold, and of incorruptable integrity, “an iron-nerved Puritan who could hew down forests and live on crumbs.” A portrait, painted on an old panel, was found in 1857

in a picture-shop in School street, Boston, bearing the date 1625, and v. Etatis Dom, 35,” on which the name of M. Standish was discovered after removing the frame. It now hangs in Pilgrim hall, Plymouth, and is reproduced in the accompanying signette. His first wife, Rose, died on 29 Jan., 1621, and his second courtship has been made the subject of a romance by Henry W. Longfellow, in which there are several anachronisms. Although his enemy, John Alden, won his chief Bradford, and his other Malles, they remained close friends until death, and later generations of the Standish and Alden families intermarried. A tradition says that his second wife, Barbara, was the younger sister of

Rose Standish. In his will, dated 7 March, 1655, he left his property to his wife, Barbara, and his four sons, Alexander, Myles, Josias, and Charles. His goods and chattels, worth £550, were exhibited in the court that was held in Plymouth on 1 May, 1657. One of his swords is preserved in the cabinet of the Massachusetts historical society, and another is in Pilgrim hall. Plymouth. Several other reli-xes are in the possession of the Pilgrim society.

The coat of arms, a shield of ingenuity embroidered

made by his daughter,

Lora. In 1632 several of the “Mayflower” families settled in Duxbury,

Mass. Standish established himself on “Captain’s

Hill,” so named from his military office, and it is probable that he was buried there. He is supposed to that his house stood unoccupied until after 1696,

and that it was then enlarged by his son Alexander, who it thought was a trader and possibly town-clerk of Duxbury. The present house was built by this son. A granite monument is now being erected to his memory on Captain’s Hill,

Duxbury, as seen in the accompanying illustration. The shaft is one hundred and forty feet up on it stands a statue of Standish looking eastward. His right hand, holding the charter of the colony, is extended toward Plymouth, while his left rests upon his sheathed sword.

STANLEY, Leland, senator, b. in Watervliet,

Albany co., N. Y., 9 March, 1824; d. in Palo Alto, Cal., 21 June, 1886. His ancestors settled in the valley of the Mohawk, N. Y., about 1720. When twenty years old he began the study of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1849, and the same year began to practice at Port Washington, Wis. In 1852, having lost his law library and other property that he removed to California and began mining for gold at Michigan bluff, Pioneer co., subsequently becoming associated in business with his three brothers, who had preceded him to the Pacific cost. In 1856 he returned to San Francisco and engaged in mercantile pursuits on a large scale, laying the foundation of a fortune that had recently been estimated at more than $90,000,000. In 1856, Mr. Stanley founded a vessel, the “California, and served as a delegate to the Chicago convention

that nominated Abraham Lincoln to the presidency. He was an earnest advocate of a Pacific railroad, and was elected president of the Central Pacific company when it was organized in 1861. The same year he was elected governor of California, and served from December, 1861, till December, 1863.

As president of the Pacific road he superintended its construction over the mountains, building 530 miles in 293 days, and on 10 May, 1869, drove the last spike at Promontory point, Utah. He also became interested in other roads on the Pacific slop,

and in the development of the agriculture and manufactures of California. In 1885 he was elected by the U. S. Congress for the full term of six years from 4 March, 1886. In November, 1893, Mr. Stanford gave the state of California $820-

000,000 to be used in founding at Palo Alto a university whose curriculum shall not only include the usual collegiate studies, but comprise instruction in telegraphy, type-setting, writing, journalism, book-keeping, farming, civil engineering, and mining. The cornerstone was laid on 14 May, 1887, and the various structures were completed within three years, and the institution in successful operation.

President Harrison delivered a course of law lectures there in 1894. Included in the trust fund for the maintenance of the university is Mr. Stanford’s estate at Vina, Tehama co., Cal., which is said to be the largest vineyard in the world. It comprises

30,000 acres, 3,500 of which are planted with bearing vines. Mr. Stanford died suddenly at Menlo

Park, his magnificent residence.

STANLEY, Anthony Dunond, mathematician, b. in East Hartford, Conn., 2 April, 1810; d.

dee, 13 March, 1853. He was graduated at Yale in 1830, was appointed tutor in 1832, and assistant professor in 1837, and was tutor in classical studies in 1836, which office he held until his death. He published an “Elementary Treatise of Spherical Geometry and Trigonometry” (New Haven, 1843), and “Tables of Logarithms of Numbers, and of Logarithmic Sines, Tangents, and Secants to Seven

Places of Decimals, together with Other Tables” (1846).

He also edited an edition of “Day’s Algebra,” assisted in the revision of “Webster’s Quarto Dictionary” (1847), and left several unfinished works in manuscript.

STANLEY, David Sloan, soldier, b. in Cedar Valley, Ohio, 1 June, 1828. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1852, and in 1853 was detailed with Lieut. Amiel A. Whipple to whistle along the 45th parallel. As liutenant of cavalry from 1855 till his promotion to a captaincy in 1891, he spent the greater part of his time in the saddle. Among other

Indian engagements he took part in one with the Cheyennes on Solomon's Fork, and one with the Comanches near Port Arbuckle. At the beginning of the civil war he refused high rank in the fed-erate army. In the early part of the war he fought at Independence, Forsyth, Dug Springs,

Wilson's Creek, Rolla, and other places, and was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 Sept., 1861. He led a division at New Madrid, and the commanding general reported that he was "especially indebted" to Gen. Stanley for his "efficient aid and uniform zeal." Subsequently he was commended for his "entirely active and covered the enemy's attack with severe loss, and he was especially commended by Gen. William S. Rosecrans at Iuka. At Corinth he occupied the line between batteries Robinson and Williams, and was thus exposed to the severest part of the attack of the enemy, and, although other parts of the line gave way, his was never broken. Gen. Stanley was appointed major-general of volunteers on 29 Nov., 1862. He bore an active part in most of the battles of the Atlanta campaign, and as commander of the 4th army corps he took part in the battle of Jonesborough. After Gen. George H. Thomas was ordered to Nashville, Gen. Stanley was directed on 6 Oct. to command the Army of the Cumberland in his absence. Until he was severely wounded at Franklin, he took an active part in the operations and battles in defense of Nashville. His disposition of the troops at Spring Hill enabled him to repel the assault of the enemy's cavalry and afterward two assaults of the infantry. A few days afterward, at Franklin, he fought a desperate hand-to-hand conflict. Placing himself at the head of a reserve brigade, he regained the part of the line that the enemy had broken. Although severely wounded, he did not leave the field until long after dark. When he recovered he rejoined his command, and, after the war closed, took it to Texas. He had received the brevets of lieutenant-colonel for Stone River, Tenn., colonel for Resaca, Ga., brigadier-general for Ruff's Station, Ga., and major-general for Franklin, Tenn., all in the regular army. He was appointed colonel of the 22d infantry, and spent a greater part of the time up to 1874 in Dakota. In command of the Yellowstone expedition of 1873, he successfully conducted his troops through the unknown wilderness of Dakota and Montana, and his favorable reports on the country led to the subsequent emigration there. In 1874 he went with his regiment to the lake stations, and in 1879 moved it to the plains. He followed the buffalo trails in the western part of the state. He also restored the confidence of the Mexicans, which had been disturbed by the raid that the U. S. troops made across the boundary in 1878. He was ordered to Santa Fé, N. M., in 1882, and placed in command of the district of New Mexico. While he was stationed there, and subsequently at Fort Lewis, compiled a report, entitled "New Mexico, the Navajos, Utes, and Jicarillas," all of which he quoted without bloodshed. The greater part of his service has been on the Indian frontier, and he has had to deal with nearly every tribe that occupies the Mississippi and Rio Grande valley, thus becoming perfectly acquainted with the Indian character. In March, 1884, he was appointed a brigadier-general in the regular army, and he served as colonel of the 16th volunteer regiment of Texas. Gen. Stanley was retired in June, 1892.

STANLEY, Frederick Arthur, Lord, governor of Canada, b. in London, England, 15 Jan., 1841. He is the youngest son of the fourteenth Earl of Derby, and brother of the late earl. After receiving his education at Eton, he entered the Grenadier guards in 1858, became lieutenant and captain in 1862, and retired from the army in 1865. He represented Preston in parliament, as a Conservative, from July, 1863, till December, 1868, when he was elected for North Lancashire. He was lord of the admiralty from August till December, 1868, and financial secretary for war from February, 1874, till August, 1877, when he became financial secretary to the treasury. On 17 June, 1878, he was appointed secretary of state for war, which portfolio he held till he went out of office with his party in April, 1880. In the government of Lord Salisbury he was secretary of state for the colonies from June, 1883, till February, 1886, and in the cabinet of August, 1886, he was appointed secretary for education, and raised to the peerage with the title of Lord Stanley of Preston. In June, 1888, he was appointed governor-general of Canada, in succession to the Marquis of Lansdowne, who had been appointed governor-general of India. In 1894 Lord Stanley married Lady Constance, eldest daughter of the fourth Earl of Clarendon. His elder brother, being childless, he in 1893 succeeded to the earldom of Derby, and returned to England.

STANLEY, Henry Morton, explorer, b. near Denbigh, Wales, in 1840. His name was originally John Rowlands. He was placed in the poor-house at St. Asaph when he was three years old, remaining there and being educated for ten years. In 1855 he sailed as a cabin-boy to New Orleans, where he was adopted by a merchant, whose name he took instead of his own. This merchant died without leaving a will, and young Stanley enlisted in the Confederate army, was taken prisoner, and subsequently volunteered in the U. S. navy, serving as acting ensign on the iron-clad "Ticonderoga." At the close of the war he went as a newspaper correspondent to Turkey. In 1868 he accompanied the British army from Suez to Jerusalem as correspondent of the New York "Herald." When he was in Spain in the service of the same paper he was asked by its proprietor, in October, 1869, to go and find Dr. David Livingstone, the African explorer, of whom nothing definite had been heard for more than two years. After attending the opening of the Suez canal, visiting Constantinople, the Crimea, Palestine, the valley of Egypt, the Euphrates, Persia, and India, Stanley sailed from Bombay, 12 Oct., 1870, and reached Zanzibar, on the eastern coast of Africa, early in January, 1871. There he organized his search expedition and set out for the interior on 21 March with 192 followers. On 10 Nov. he found Dr. Livingstone at Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika, where he had just succeeded to the northeast. Stanley furnished Dr. Livingstone with supplies, explored the northern part of Lake Tanganyika with him, and remained till February, 1872, when Livingstone set out on that journey from which he never returned, while Stanley made his way back to the coast, sailing thence on 14 March, 1872, and reaching England late in July. The British association entertained him at Brighton, where, on 16 Aug., he gave an account of his expedition. On 27 Aug., the queen sent him a gold snuff-box set with diamonds, and on 21 Oct. a banquet was given him by the Royal geographical society. In 1853 he received the patron's gold medal of the Royal geographical society. The New York "Herald" and the London "Daily Telegraph" again sent Stanley to explore the lake region of equatorial Africa. He reached Zanzibar in the autumn of 1855. There learning that Livingstone had died in central Africa, he determined to shape his course north-west and explore that region of Lake Victoria Nyamwezi. Leaving at the head of 300 men, after many hardships and severe encounters with the natives, he reached it in February, 1856, having lost on the way 104 men by death or desertion. He circumnavigated the lake, sailing about 1,000 miles and manually examining all the inlets, in a boat that he had brought with him in pieces, and found it to be a single large lake, instead of a series of lagoons, as had been supposed by Richard F. Burton and Livingstone, so that the opinion of the explorers Speke and Grant was confirmed. Thus was Lake Victoria Nyamwezi proved to be the largest body of fresh water in the world, having an area of 30,000 square miles. On 14 July, 1857, continuing his explorations, he set out westward toward Lake Albert Nyamwezi, and found that it was not, as had been supposed, connected with Lake Tanganyika. The hostility of the natives barred his further advance, and, forced to return to Ujiji, he resolved to reach the coast by descending the great river that had been discovered by Livingstone and named the Luambil. But which Stanley had called the Livingstone in honor of its discoverer. The latter had thought that it might be identical with the Nile; others supposed it to be part of the Congo, and Stanley, by his descent of it, proved that these last were correct. The descent, chiefly by canoes, took eight months, was accomplished under very great difficulties and privations, and cost him the lives of thirty-five men. On his reaching a west-coast settlement, a Portuguese man-of-war took him to St. Paul de Loanda, whence an English vessel conveyed the party to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence to Zanzibar, where what remained of the men who had joined his expedition were left at their own homes. Stanley reached England in February, 1858. On 28 June, 1878, at the Sorbonne, Paris, he was presented with the cross of chevalier of the Legion of honor by the president of the French geographical society. In 1879-'82 he was again in Africa, sent out by the Brussels African international association with a view to develop the great basin of the river Congo. The king of the Belgians devoted 50,000 a year from his own private means toward this enterprise. In 1884 Stanley completed the work, establishing trading-stations along the Congo from its mouth to Stanley pool, a distance by the river of 1,000 miles, and founding the free state of the Congo, but he declined to be its first governor. On 13 Jan., 1857, he was presented with the freedom of the city of London. Later he went on an African expedition to the Soudan, sent out for the relief of Emin Pasha. He has published "How I Found Livingstone" (New York, 1872); "Through the Dark Continent," an account of his second expedition (1878--84); "The Congo Free State" (1885); "In Darkest Africa" (1890); and "Through South Africa" (1898).

STANLEY, Edward, statesman, b. in New Berne, N. C., about 1811; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 12 July, 1872. He was the son of John Stanley, who was several times speaker of the North Carolina legislature and twice a member of congress. The son was educated at Capt. Aiden Partridge's academy in Middletown, Conn., studied and practised law, and was elected to congress as a Whig in 1836, and re-elected for the two succeeding terms. Having left congress in 1843, he represented Beaufort in the state house of commons from 1844 till 1849, serving during his last term as speaker. In 1845 he was elected attorney-general of the state. He was re-elected to congress in 1848 and returned for the succeeding term, at the close of which, in 1853, he removed to California, where he practised his profession, and in 1857 was the unsuccessful Republican candidate for governor. After the capture of New Berne on 14 March, 1862, and the occupation of other points in North Carolina by National troops, President Lincoln appointed Stanley military governor of his native state. The people were embittered by this, and, after vainly endeavoring to consolidate and give effect to the Unionist sentiment in North Carolina, he resigned and returned to California.

His brother, Fabius, naval officer, b. in New Berne, N. C., 15 Dec., 1815; d. in Washington, D. C., 5 Sept., 1882, entered the navy as a midshipman, 20 Dec., 1831, was promoted to lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, and during the Mexican war was attached to the Pacific squadron, where he did good service, participating in the capture and defence of San Francisco and other California ports. He assisted at the capture of Guaymas, where he led the storming party, and commanded a night expedition to capture the town of Mazatán, where with thirty men he passed through the enemy's lines, spiked the guns, and returned in safety. He was also present at the capture of Mazatán, commanded the outposts, and had frequent skirmishes with the enemy, in one of which he had a hand-to-hand contest, and received a lance wound in the breast. He was highly commended for his zeal and ability, and received the thanks of two secretaries of the navy for his services in the Mexican war. He commanded steamers of the Pacific mail company in 1850-1. During the Paraguay expedition he commanded the store-ship "Supply," and in 1859-60 he had the steamer "Wynandotte" on the south side of Cuba. While he was at Key West he prevented what he supposed to be an attempt by the secessionists to seize Fort Taylor in December, 1860; but the rumor was contradicted, and he was relieved from his command for his excessive zeal, and sent to command the receiving-ship "Independence," in California. He was commissioned commander, 19 May, 1861, and was in the steamer Narragansett in the Pacific in 1862-4. He received the thanks of the state department for his diplomatic services in Mexico during this period. He commanded the "State of Georgia" on the coast of South Carolina in 1864-5, cooperated in the expedition up the Santee, and had
STANNARD, George Jefferson, soldier, b. in Georgia, Wi., 20 Oct., 1820; d. in Washington, D. C., 31 May, 1886. He received an academic education, worked on his father's farm, teaching in winter, and was a clerk in a foundry from 1845 till 1850. In 1851 he entered the mercantile business. He was a colonel of militia when the civil war began, and was the first man in Vermont to offer his services after the president's call for volunteers. He was commissioned as lieutenant-colonel of the 2d Vermont regiment, which was mustered into the service in May, 1861. He was at the first battle of Bull Run, and while stationed near the Chain bridge in the following autumn frequently led scouting parties into the enemy's territory. In May, 1862, he was commissioned colonel of the 9th Vermont infantry, which was stationed at Harper's Ferry when Col. Dixon S. Miles surrendered that post, and on being paroled went into camp at Chicago. On 11 March, 1863, he was commissioned as brigadier-general. His brigade of Vermont troops came up at the close of the first day's battle at Gettysburg. On the second day he held the left slope of Cemetery hill till he was ordered farther to the left in the afternoon to oppose Gen. James Longstreet's assault after the rout of the 3d corps. His brigade closed the gap speedily, saving two batteries, retaking another, and capturing two Confederate guns. On the third day it opposed a solid front to Gen. George E. Pickett's division, and, when the Confederate column turned slightly to the left, threw the assailants into confusion by a flanking fire. Gen. Stannard was wounded in the action, and could not return to the field till May, 1864. At Cold Harbor he was struck by a rifle-ball, but brought off the remnants of his command. He led the advance on Petersburg, and was assigned to the command of a division, but was again wounded and, moreover, disabled by sickness. When he rejoined the army after a few weeks of absence he led the advance upon the defences of Richmond north of James river, and captured Fort Harrison, for which he was brevetted major-general on 28 Oct., 1864, but when the enemy attempted to shell his batteries on the day after the battle a bullet shattered his arm, necessitating amputation. He returned to his home, and in December, 1864, after the rain on St. Albans, was placed in charge of the defence of the northern frontier of Vermont. He resigned on 27 June, 1866, and was appointed collector of customs for the district of Vermont, which office he held till 1874.

STANNARD, Arthur J., author, b. in New York city in 1781; d. about 1855. He graduated at Columbia in 1799, and licensed to preach in 1810. Besides contributing to periodicals, he published several sermons and addresses, and was the author of "Elementary Catechism on the Constitution of the United States" (Boston, 1828) and a "Report of the Trial of Judge James H. Peck, on an Impeachment of High Crimes and Misdemeanors in the House of Representatives of the United States" (1833). His reports of the debates in congress for twenty years are embodied in Joseph Gales's and William W. Sinton's "Register of Debates" (14 vols., Washington, 1825-37). He also wrote and illustrated books for children.

STANNARD, Howard, explorer, b. in New York city, 8 Feb., 1834; d. in Madison, Wis., 17 April, 1863. Early in life he became a civil engineer, and in October, 1858, he was placed in charge of the survey of proposed canals to unite Lake Erie and Lake Michigan with the Wabash river, and was also engaged in other surveys of western rivers. In 1855 he had charge of numerous public works in Indiana, in 1856 he made a survey of James river with a view toward improving the harbor of Richmond, and in 1857 he surveyed Illinois and Kaskaskia rivers, being afterward engaged upon the survey for a railroad from Milwaukee to Dubuque, and again on the Hennepin canal from Milwaukee to Mississippi river. He became 1st lieutenant of U. S. topographical engineers on 7 July, 1858, captain in 1840, and in 1841 was engaged in a survey of the lakes. In 1842-5 he was in charge of the survey of the harbor of Portsmouth, N. H., a work which for minute accuracy of detail is unsurpassed in this country. In 1847 he was charged with the construction of an iron light-house on Cays-fort reef, Florida, which is the largest light-house on our coast. From 1849 till 1851 he was engaged in the Great Salt Lake expedition, his report of which gave him a wide reputation. In 1852-3 he was engaged upon the lake harbors, and in 1856 he was assigned to the charge of the military roads in Minnesota. He was appointed major on 28 Sept., 1859, and at the time of his death he was mustering and disbursing officer at Madison. Maj. Stannard published "An Expedition to the Valley of the Great Salt Lake of Utah" (Philadelphia, 1852; 2d ed., 1855).

STANNBURY, Joseph, merchant, b. in England in 1750; d. in New York city in 1800. He emigrated to Philadelphia, where he became an importing merchant, and was generally respected for his integrity. In 1760 it was reported that he "sung 'God save the King' in his house, and that a number of persons present bore him the chorus," and before the close of that year he was imprisoned in Burlington, N. J. In 1777 he was appointed by Sir William Howe a commissioner for selecting and governing the city watch of Philadelphia, and in 1778 he was a manager of that officer's lottery for the relief of the poor. In 1780 the Whigs were again in possession of Philadelphia, and again imprisoned him, and the agent of the loyalists' estates was directed by the council of Philadelphia to make an inventory of his possessions. His request for permission to live within the British lines was granted on the condition that he should provide himself and family with a boat and fix his quarters then on Long Island, and that he would do nothing injurious to the Whig cause. He was liberated, his property was restored, and with his family he resided in New York during the remainder of the war, and afterward removed to Nova Scotia, but returned to Philadelphia in 1785, intending to resume his former occupation, but, threatened with violence, went to Hamilton, Wis., where he became secretary of an insurance company. He wrote in support of the crown, and his verses were edited by Winthrop Sargent under the title of Stannbury's and Odeil's "Loyal Verses" (Albany, 1800).

- His son, Philip, traveller, b. in New York city about 1802; d. about 1820, was the author of "A Pedestrian Tour of Two Thousand Three Hundred Miles in Canada, the United Provinces of the River Plate, New Granada, and the New England States, performed in the Autumn of 1821" (New York, 1822). This work, which is exceedingly rare, is characterized by great keeness of observation, and contains one of the best descriptions extant of the important battle-fields included in the conquest of Canada in 1759-63, its invasion during the war of 1812, the wars with the Indians in the New England states, the Revolutionary contest in Massachusetts, and the disastrous expedition of Gen. Burgoyne. As a comparison between the customs, habits of living, modes of thought and educational interests of New England and New York, of eighty years since and to-day, Stansbury's work is valuable.

STANSEL (styled by Spanish and Portuguese writers STANCEL, ESTANSEL, and ESTANCEL), Valentine, German astronomer, b. in Morau in 1831; d. in Breslau, 18 Dec., 1875. He became a Jesuit in 1857, and taught rhetoric and mathematics in the colleges of Ohmuzt and Prague. He was in Brazil in 1864, and published observations on the comets that appeared in that and the following year. He was appointed professor of theology in the Jesuit college of San Salvador, and continued to make astronomical observations, the results of which he sent to Europe. There is a full list of his works in Backer's "Bibliothèque des cérivains de la Compagnie de Jésus" (6th series), in which it is also shown that the dates of his death given in the "Bibliographie universelle" and other biographical dictionaries are incorrect. His principal writings are "Orbis Alfonsinus" (Evora, 1658); "Legatus uranice ex orbe novo in veteran; hoc est, Observationes Americana cometarum facta consertaque ac in Europam missae" (Prague, 1683); "Uranophi- lus celestis peregrinatorus, sive De Uranographia..." (Antwerp and Ghent, 1685); and "Mercurius Brasiliacus, sive Celi et soli brasilienisis economicae."

STANTON, Daniel, Quaker preacher, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1708; d. there, 28 June, 1770. He began to preach in 1728, travelled in New England and the West Indies, went to Europe in 1738, and visited the southern colonies in 1744, preaching zealously against slavery as well as worldly sins and the vices of society. See "Journal of His Life, Travels, and Gospel Labors." (Philadelphia, 1772).

STANTON, Edwin McEasters, statesman, b. in Steubenville, Ohio, 19 Dec., 1814; d. in Washington, D. C., 24 Dec., 1869. His father, a physician, died while Edwin was a child. After acting for three years as a clerk in a bookstore, he entered Kenyon college in 1831, but left in 1833 to study law. He was admitted to the bar in 1836, and, beginning practice in Cadiz, was in 1837 elected prosecuting attorney. He returned to Steubenville in 1838, and was supreme court reporter in 1839-5, preparing vol. xi, xii, and xiii. of the Ohio reports. In 1848 he removed to Pittsburg, Pa., and in 1857, on account of his large business and the superior court, he established himself in Washington. During 1857-8 he was in California, attending to important land cases for the government. Among the notable suits that he conducted were the first Erie railway litigation, the Wheeling bridge case, and the Manney and McCormick reaper case. When Lewis Cass retired from President Buchanan's cabinet in 1856, Jeremiah S. Black was made secretary of state, Stanton was appointed the latter's successor in the office of attorney-general, 30 Dec., 1860. He was originally a Democrat of the Jackson school, and, until Van Buren's defeat in the Baltimore convention of 1844, took an active part in political affairs in his locality. He favored the Wilmot proviso, to exclude slavery from the territory acquired by the war with Mexico, and sympathized with the Free-soil movement of 1848, headed by Martin Van Buren. He was an anti-slavery man, but his hostility to that institution was qualified by his view of the obligations imposed by the Federal constitution. He had held no public office before entering President Buchanan's cabinet except those of prosecuting attorney for one year in Harrison county, Ohio, and reporter of the Ohio supreme court for three years, being wholly devoted to his profession. While a member of Mr. Buchanan's cabinet, he took a firm stand for the Union, and at a cabinet meeting, when John B. Floyd, then secretary of war, demanded the withdrawal of the United States troops from the forts in Charleston harbor, he indignantly declared that the surrender of Fort Sumter would be, in his opinion, a crime, equal to that of Arnold, and that all who participated in it should be hung like André. After the meeting, Floyd sent in his resignation. President Lincoln, though now his predecessor, was so disposed to maintain a free communication with Mr. Stanton, called him to the head of the war department on the retirement of Simon Cameron, 15 Jan., 1862. As was said by an eminent senator of the United States: "He certainly came to the public service with patriotic and not with sordid motives, surrendered a most brilliant position at the bar, and with it the employment of which, in the absence of accumulated wealth, his family was in daily need." Infirmities of temper he had, but they were incident to the intense strain upon his nerves caused by his devotion to duties that would have soon prostrated most men, however robust, as they finally prostrated him. He had no time for elaborate explanations for refusing trifling or selfish requests, and his seeming abruptness of manner was often but rapidity in transacting business which had to be thus disposed of, or be wholly neglected. As he sought no benefit to himself, but made himself an object of hatred to the dishonest and the inefficient, solely in the public interest, and as no enemy ever accused him of wrong-doing, the vigor of his character has been to detract from the high estimate placed by common consent upon his character as a man, a patriot, and a statesman.

Mr. Stanton's entrance into the cabinet marked the beginning of a vigorous military policy. On 27 Jan., 1862, was issued the first of the president's war orders, prescribing a general movement of the troops. His impeachment Gen. George B. McClellan's apparent inaction caused friction between the administration and the general-in-chief, which ended in the latter's retirement. He selected Gen. Ulysses S. Grant for promotion after the victory at Fort Donelson, which Gen. Henry W. Halleck in his report had ascribed to the bravery of Gen. Charles F. Smith, and in the autumn of 1862 sent General Grant from the superintendence of the three armies operating in the southwest, directed him to relieve Gen. William S. Rosecrans before his army at Chattanooga could be forced to surrender. President Lincoln said that he never took an important step without consulting his secretary of war. It has been asserted that, on the eve of Mr. Lincoln's second inauguration, he asked Grant to make terms of peace with Gen. Lee, and that Mr. Stanton dissuaded him from such action.
According to a bulletin of Mr. Stanton that was issued at the time, the president wrote the despatch directing the general of the army to confer with the Confederate commander on none save purely military questions without previously consulting the members of the cabinet. At a cabinet council that was held in consultation with Gen. Grant, the terms on which Gen. William T. Sherman proposed to surrender the rebel state of Virginia were approved, obviously by the direction of Sec. Stanton. Those were: (1) that it was unauthorized; (2) that it was an acknowledgment of the Confederate government; (3) that it re-established rebel state governments; (4) that it would enable rebel state authorities to restore slavery; (5) that it involved the question of the Confederate government; (6) that it amounted to a proclamation of the state government of West Virginia; (7) that it abolished confiscation, and relieved rebels of all penalties; (8) that it gave terms that had been rejected by President Lincoln; (9) that it formed no basis for peace, but relieved rebels from the pressure of defeat, and left them free to renew the war. Gen. Sherman defended his course on the grounds that he had before him the public examples of Gen. Grant's terms to Gen. Lee's army, and Gen. Weitzel's invitation to the Virginia legislature to assemble at Richmond. His central motive, in giving terms that would be cheerfully accepted, he declared to be the peaceful disbandment of all the Confederate armies, and the prevention of guerrilla warfare. He had never seen President Lincoln's telegram to Gen. Grant of 3 March, 1863, above quoted, nor did he know that Gen. Weitzel's permission for the Virginia legislature to assemble had been rescinded.

A few days before the president's death Sec. Stanton tendered his resignation because his task was completed, but was persuaded by Mr. Lincoln to remain. After the assassination of Lincoln a serious dispute occurred between President Andrew Johnson, and the Republican party, and Mr. Stanton took sides against the former on the subject of reconstruction. On 5 Aug., 1865, the president demanded his resignation; but he refused to give up his office before the next meeting of congress, following the urgent counsels of leading men of the Republican party. He was suspended by the president on 13 Aug. On 13 Jan., 1868, he was restored by the action of the senate, and resumed his office. On 21 Feb., 1868, the president informed the senate that he had removed Sec. Stanton, and designated a secretary ad interim. Mr. Stanton refused to surrender the office pending the action of the senate on the president's message. At a late hour of the same day the senate resolved that the president had not the power to remove the secretary. Mr. Stanton, thus sustained by the senate, refused to surrender the office. The impeachment of the president followed, and on 26 May, the vote of the senate being "guilty," 55, "not guilty," 19, he was acquitted—two thirds not voting for conviction. After Mr. Stanton's retirement from office he resumed the practice of law. On 29 Dec., 1869, he was appointed by President Grant a justice of the supreme court, and he was forthwith confirmed by the senate. Four days later he expired.

The value to the country of his services during the civil war cannot be overestimated. His energy, inflexible integrity, systematized industry, comprehensive view of the situation in its military, political, and international aspects, his power to command and supervise the best services of others, and his unbridling will and invincible courage, made him at once the editor of the president, the hope of the country, and a terror to dishonesty and peculiarity. The vastness of his labors led to insufficiency in repelling opportunities, which made him many enemies. But none ever questioned his honesty, his patriotism, or his capability. A "Memoir" of Mr. Stanton is at present in preparation by his son, Lewis M. Stanton.

STANTON, Henry Browster, journalist, b. in Griswold, New London co., Conn., 29 June, 1865; d. in New York city, 14 Jan., 1887. His ancestor, Thomas, came to this country from England in 1635 and was chosen interpreter-general of the Indian dialects, and subsequently judge of the new New London county court. His father was a manufacturer of woolens and a trader with the West Indies. After receiving his education the son went in 1826 to Rochester, N. Y., to write for Thurlow Weed's newspaper, "The Monroe Telegraph," which was advocating the election of Henry Clay to the presidency. He then began to make political speeches. He removed to Cincinnati to complete his studies in Lane theological seminary, but left it to become an advocate of the anti-slavery cause. At the anniversary of the American anti-slavery society in New York city in 1834 he faced the first of the many mobs that he encountered in his tours throughout the country. In 1837-40 he was active in the formation of Free-soilers into a compact political party, which was resisted by William Lloyd Garrison and others, and which resulted in lasting dissension. In 1840 he married Elizabeth Cooly, and on 12 May of that year sailed with her to London, having been elected to represent the American anti-slavery society at a convention for the promotion of the cause. At its close they travelled through Great Britain and France, working for the relief of the slaves. On his return he studied law with Daniel Cooly, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Boston, where he gained a reputation especially in patent cases, but he abandoned his profession to enter political life, and removing to Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 1847, represented that district in the state senate. He was a member of the Free-soil party previous to the formation of the Republican party, of which he was a founder. Before this he had been a Democrat. For nearly half a century he was actively connected with the daily press, his contributions consisting chiefly of articles on current political topics and elaborate biographies of public men. Mr. Stanton contributed to Garrison's "Anti-Slavery Stories,""Anti-Slavery Stories," "Liberator," wrote for the New York "Tribune," and from 1868 until his death he was an editor of the New York "Sun." Henry Ward Beecher said of him: "I think Stanton has all the elements of old John Adams: able, stanch, patriotic, full of principle, and always unpopular. He has a decided love of controversy which keeps a man from running against them."

Mr. Stanton was the author of "Sketches of Reforms and Reformer in Great Britain and Ireland" (New York, 1849), and "Random Recollections" (1866). He was the father of Judge Daniel Cady, and, after receiving her first education in her home, she was graduated at Mrs. Emma Willard's seminary in Troy, N. Y., in 1832. While attending the World's anti-slavery convention in London in 1840 she met Lucretia Mott, with whom she was in sympathy, and with whom she signed the call for the first Woman's rights convention. This was held at her home in Seneca Falls, on 19 and 20 July, 1848, on which occasion the first formal claim of suffrage for women was made. She addressed the New York legislature on the rights of married women in 1854, and in advocacy of divorce for drunkenness in 1860, and in 1867 spoke before the legislature and the constitutional convention, maintaining that during the revision of the constitution the state was representative of the original seed. And she said that citizens of both sexes had a right to vote for members of that convention. She canvassed Kansas in 1862 and Michigan in 1874, when the question of woman suffrage was submitted to the people of those states, and since 1869 she has addressed congressional committees and state constitutional conventions upon this subject, besides giving numerous lectures. She was present at the convention held in 1863 by the national committee of her party, and was chosen a delegate to the Woman's national committee of 1874, of the Woman's political league in 1863, and of the National woman's suffrage association until 1873. In 1866 she was a candidate for Congress. She has written many calls to conventions and addresses, and was an editor with Susan B. Anthony and Parker Pillsbury of "The Revolution," which was founded in 1868, and is joint author of "History of Women's Suffrage" (vols. i. and ii., New York, 1870; vol. iii., Rochester, 1886).—Their son, Theodore, journalist, b. in Seneca Falls, N. Y., 19 Feb., 1851, was graduated at Cornell in 1876. In 1880 he was the Berlin correspondent of the New York "Tribune," and he afterward engaged in journalism in New York and Chicago, and was editor of "Chillicothe, Ohio Express," which was founded in 1855, and has translated and edited Le Goff's "Life of Thiers" (New York, 1879), and is the author of "The Woman Question in Europe" (1884).

STANTON, Joseph, senator, b. in Charlestown, R. I., 19 July, 1739; d. there, 15 Dec., 1821. He served as 2d lieutenant in the Rhode Island regiment that was raised for the expedition against Canada in 1759, was a member of the general assembly of Rhode Island from 1768 till 1774 and of the committee of safety in 1776, and a delegate to the State convention that adopted the constitution of the United States in 1789. He was elected a U. S. senator, as a Democrat, serving from 23 June, 1799, till 3 March, 1803, was again a member of the Rhode Island house of representatives, and was afterward elected a senator, serving from 7 Dec., 1801, till 3 March, 1807.

STANTON, Oscar Fitzalan, naval officer, b. in Sag Harbor, N. Y., 18 July, 1834. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 29 Dec., 1849, and was warranted midshipman from the same date. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy at Annapolis in 1853, promoted to master, 16 Sept., 1855, and commissioned lieutenant, 2 April, 1856, serving in the steamer "Memphis," on the Paraguay expedition, in 1856—9, on the coast of Africa in 1859—60, and in the ships "St. Mary's," of the Pacific squadron, from December, 1869, till April, 1872. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, commanded the steamer "Tioga," in the special West India squadron, in 1862—3, and the steamer "Panola," on the Western Gulf blockading squadron, in 1863—4. In 1865 he was on ordnance duty at New York, and he served at the naval academy until May, 1867. He was promoted to commander, 13 Dec., 1867, and had the charge of the 1st contingent of the Atlantic squadron, and the "Purveyor," on special service, in 1867—9. He commanded the receiving-ship at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1871, the steamer "Monocacy," on the Asiatic station, from 1872 until 1874, when he was transferred to the "Yantic." He was promoted to captain, 11 June, 1879, and in November, 1881, went on duty at the Naval academy at Annapolis, where he remained until November, 1884, when he took command of the steam frigate "Tennessee," flagship of the North Atlantic station. He was made commodore in 1893, rear-admiral, 1894, and was retired the same year.

STANTON, Richard Henry, jurist, b. in Alexandria, Va., 9 Sept., 1812. He received an academic education at the University of Virginia, and practised in Maysville, Ky. Being elected to congress as a Democrat, he served from 3 Dec., 1849, till 3 March, 1853, and he was presidential elector on the Buchanan ticket in 1856, state attorney for his judicial district in 1858, a delegate to the National Democratic convention in 1860, and district judge in 1868—74. He has edited the "Maysville Monitor" and "Maysville Express," and published a "Code of Practice in Civil and Criminal Cases in Kentucky" (Cincinnati, 1855): "Practical Treatises for Justices of the Peace, etc., of Kentucky" (1861); and a "Practical Manual for Executors, etc., in Kentucky" (1862).—His brother, Frederic Perry, lawyer, b. in Alexandria, Va., 24 Feb., 1814; d. near Ocala, Fla., 4 June, 1894, obtained a good education, and was graduated at Columbia college in 1833. He studied law, was admitted to the bar of Alexandria in 1834, and removed to Memphis, Tenn., where he practised his profession. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, till 3 March, 1855, and in 1855—57 was chairman of the judiciary committee. He was also elected governor of Tennessee, Kansas territory, and he was governor of Kansas from 1858 till 1861. In 1863—4 he edited with Robert J. Mather the "Continental Monthly," and he had published numerous speeches in pamphlet-form.—Richard Henry's son, Henry Thompson, poet, b. in Alexandria, 30 June, 1834; d. in Frankfort, Ky., 8 May, 1898, was educated in Kentucky and at the U. S. military academy, but was not graduated. He served as captain and major in the Confederate army. For several years he had been connected with the U. S. Indian commissioners in selecting lands for Indian reservations. He had invented an iron tie for binding cotton-bales, and is the author of "The Moneyless Man, and Other Poems," published in 1875. From 1855 till 1866 he edited the "Kentucky Visitor."

STANTON, Robert Livingston, clergyman, b. in Puchang, Conn., 28 March, 1810; d. at sea, 23 March, 1855. After graduation at Lane seminary he was ordained by the presbytery of Mississippi in 1839, and held charge of churches in Blue Ridge, Miss., from 1839 till 1841. Woodville, Miss., in 1841—3, and in New Orleans, La., from 1843 till 1851, when he became president of Oakland college, Miss., serving until 1854. From 1855 till 1862 he was pastor of a Presbyterian church in Chillicothe, Ohio, from 1862 till 1866 he was professor of pastoral theology and homiletics in Dunville theological seminary, and from 1866 till 1871 he was president of Miami university. In 1871-2 he engaged in literary work in New York, and subsequently he was an editor of the "Herald and Presbyter" in Cincinnati. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Princeton, and by Washington college, Va., in 1852. Dr. Stanton is the author of "The Church and the Rebellion" (New York, 1864).

STANTON, Siles Troumbull, journalist, b. in Stonington, Conn., 10 Dec., 1840; d. in New York city, 29 Oct., 1883. At the age of 17, he entered the law office of William H. Russell's collegiate and commercial institute, New Haven, Conn. In 1858-59 he was appointed aide on the brigade staff of the National guard. During the canvass of 1890 he served as secretary of the Republican state central committee, and was an alternate delegate to the Republican national convention at Chicago in that year. He was executive secretary of state in Connecticut in 1879-80, and was a member of the house of representatives in 1881-2, and served in the state senate in 1884-6, being president pro tempore in 1885-6. He was defeated for secretary of state on the Republican ticket in 1882, and in that year declined the post of secretary of legation in Paris. Early in life he devoted himself to journalism, and from Norwich, Conn., "Bulletin" and the Worcester, Mass., "Press," achieving a reputation as a humorist.

STANWIX, John, British soldier, b. in England about 1790; d. at sea in December, 1786. His uncle served with reputation in the wars of Queen Anne as a brigadier-general. Entering the army in 1796, John became a captain of the grenadiers in 1799, major of marines in 1744, and lieutenant-colonel in 1755, and was appointed equerry to Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1749. In 1752 he was promoted to the government of Carlisle, which city he represented in parliament. In 1754 he became deputy quartermaster-general of the forces, and on 1 Jan., 1756, he was made colonel-commandant of the 1st battalion of the 60th or royal American foot. In this capacity he was the southern district. During 1757 his headquarters were at Carlisle, Pa., and he was appointed brigadier-general on 27 Dec. of that year. After his relief by Gen. John Forbes in 1758, Gen. Stanwix went to Albany, whence he was ordered to the Onedia carrying-place, to secure that important position by the erection of a work which was called Fort Stanwix in his honor. A map of this fort, with an account of its history, is contained in the "Documentary History of New York" (vol. iv.), and the Harvard college library possesses a copy of the manuscript journal of Ensign Moses Dorr, which includes an account of the building of Fort Stanwix. In 1759 he returned to Pennsylvania, repaired the 6th foot, and was a member of parliament for Appleby. He was lost at sea while crossing from Dublin to Holyhead in "The Eagle" packet.

STAPLES, John Jacob, manufacturer, b. in Prussia; d. in Newtown, Long Island, N. Y., in 1840. Early in life he came to New York, and was identified with the Methodist church, being a trustee and steward of the John street preaching-house in 1774-8. He was one of the first to introduce sugar-refining into this country. His first refinery was in Hector street, and the second and larger one at Liberty street. The term the famous "sugar-house" in which the British confined American prisoners during the Revolution. Mr. Staples acquired wealth, but his property was lost by his son, John Jacob, who engaged in speculations in England.

STAPLES, Walter Redd, jurist, b. in Patrick Court-House, Va., 24 Feb., 1826; d. 20 Aug., 1897. He was a student of law at the College of William and Mary, and studied law, and was admitted to practice in 1848. He served in the legislature in 1857-8, was presidential elector on the Whig ticket in 1856 and 1860, and one of four commissioners to the Provisional congress that met in Montgomery, Ala., in 1861. He served in the Confederate congress for the subsequent three years, and took an active part in its deliberations. In 1870-82 he was a judge of the supreme court of Virginia. He was one of the three revisers of the code of laws for the state in 1884-6, elector on the Democratic presidential ticket in 1884, and was also the counsel for the Richmond and Danville railroad. During his term on the bench he acquired a national reputation for the learning, soundness, and conservatism that characterized his judicial opinions. He also took high rank as a political speaker.

STAPLES, William Read, jurist and historian, b. in Providence, R. I., 10 Oct., 1798; d. there, 19 Oct., 1868. After graduation at Brown in 1817, he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1819. He was associate judge of the Rhode Island supreme court from 1835 till 1854, and was chief justice from 1854 till 1878. In 1860, and at his death he was secretary and treasurer of the Rhode Island historical society for the encouragement of domestic industry, contributed biographies to its transactions, and was a founder of the Rhode Island historical society, serving as its librarian, secretary, and vice-president. Brown gave him the degree of L.L. D. in 1862. He edited the second and 8th edition of the Rhode Island historical society's collections, and Samuel Gorton's "Simplicities' Defence against Seven-Headed Policy" (Providence, 1835), and published the "Annals of Providence to 1832" (1843): "Documentary History of the Destruction of the 'Gaspee'" (1845); "Proceedings of the First General Assembly for the Incorporation of Providence Plantations in 1647" (1847); and "Rhode Island Form-Book" (1859).

STARBUCK, Calvin Washburn, journalist, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 20 April, 1822; d. there, 15 Nov., 1870. He was educated at the public schools of his native city, but, as his parents' means were limited, he began very early to support himself. He learned the printing trade, and, having saved a little money, established, at nineteen, the Cincinnati "Sanguine." He was the first editor of the newspaper. Being the fastest type-setter in Ohio, he prepared a large part of the paper for years, and also assisted in distributing it to subscribers. It rapidly gained success, and its weekly edition had at one time the largest circulation in the west. To his exertions and generosity are mainly due the Relief union, the Home of the friendless, and other charitable institutions of Cincinnati, while his philanthropic gifts were many and constant. During the civil war he strove by voice and pen to establish the National credit when the government needed money. To the families of the men in his employment who had enlisted he continued their regular pay while they were in the service. When in 1864 the governor of Ohio tendered the home-guards of the state to the country for a hundred days. Stark left his business and went into the field.

STARK, John Henry, store-keeper-proprietor, b. in Samsonville, Fulton co., N. Y., 27 Aug., 1827. He received a good education, intending to study a liberal profession, but began business in a dry-goods store in Follownile, N. Y., in 1845. He was postmaster of the place under President Polk's administration. Afterward he began to hire canal-boats to carry freight in the waters about New York city. Succeeding in this enterprise, he was soon able to buy boats, and he next invested in steamboats. Having purchased large vessels, he ran on the Ohio river, and for some years was a merchant-principal. Subsequently he became a large freight-factor on the Canadian lakes, and in 1877 he was elected to Congress, and served one term.

STARK, Andrew, born in the county of Renfrew, Scotland, 1790; d. in Denny-head, Scotland, 18 Sept., 1849. He was graduated at the University of Glasgow in 1811, studied theology at the University of Edinburgh, taught in London, and was licensed to preach in 1817 by the Associate presbytery of Edinburgh. He was pastor of the congregation of South shields in 1817-18, and in 1818-20 he was installed pastor of the Grand street associate church. In 1849, owing to impaired health, he visited Scotland, where he died. His remains were brought to this country. The University of London gave him the degree of LL. D. about 1845. He published several sermons, and wrote a "History of the Secession," in a series of papers published in the "Review," and contributed in the "associate Presbyterian Magazine," to which he was a frequent contributor.

STARK, Benjamin, senator, b. in New Orleans, 26 June, 1829; d. in New London, Conn., 10 Nov., 1898. He was educated at an academy, entered a counting-house in New York, and became a merchant. In 1845 he removed to Oregon, and engaged in trade with the Sandwich islands, but studied law in 1850, was admitted to the bar of Oregon, and began practice in Portland, of which city he was a founder. He was a member in 1853 of the territorial house of representatives, and in 1860 of the state house of representatives, and was appointed a U. S. senator from Oregon as a Democrat, in place of Edward D. Baker, serving from 27 Feb., till 1 Dec., 1862. He was a delegate from Oregon to the National Democratic convention at Chicago in 1864, and from Connecticut to the one in New York in 1868. Since 1867 he had been a member of the board of education of New London, Conn., a director of the New London Northern railroad company, and since 1871 a deputy to the U. S. Senate. He consented on condition that he should not be subject to any orders but his own; and to this the council of state agreed, because the men would not march without him. Setting out with a small force for Bennington, he there learned that Burragey had despatched Col. Frederick Baum with 500 men to seize the store-collected at that place. Sending out express to bring Stark, marched out to meet him, hearing of which, Baum interceded himself in a strong position about six miles from Bennington, and sent to Burragey for reinforcements. Before they could arrive, Stark attacked him on 16 Aug., 1777. Tradition says that he called to his men as he led them to the assault: "There they are, boys. We beat them today, or Molly Stark's a widow?"—another of his sentences that has gone into history. Doubts have been cast on its authenticity, for Mary Stark's name was Elizabeth. The second British force of 500 men, under Col. Breyman, presently arriving on the scene, was likewise totally defeated. Of the 1,000 British, not more than a hundred escaped, all the rest being killed or captured, a result of great importance, as it led ultimately to the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga. Col. Bascom, who was mortally wounded, said, just before death, "They fought more like hounds-bandas than soldiers." The American loss was only about seventy. Washington spoke of it immediately as "the great stroke struck by Gen. Stark near Bennington"; and Bar- oness Riedesel, then in the British camp, wrote: "This unfortunate event paralyzed our operations."

For this victory Stark was made a brigadier-general, 4 Oct., 1777, and given the thanks of congress. He continued in active service during the remainder of the war, displaying everywhere distinguished ability and commanding the northern department in 1778 and 1781. In 1783 he retired to his farm, where he lived in republican simplicity till his death at the age of ninety-three. When he was eighty-nine years old congress allowed him a pension of sixty dollars a month, but this was more than his simple tastes and habits this was not essential to his comfort. He was a good type of the class of men who gave success to the American Revolution. With the exception of Gen. Thomas Sumter, he was the last surviving general of the Revolutionary army. He was buried on his own grounds on the east bank of Merrimack river at Manchester, where a simple granite obelisk was placed in 1829 to mark his resting-place. The citizens of Manchester planted memorial trees around it in 1876. In August, 1887, the cornerstone was laid in Benning- ton of the monument seen in the illustration. It is an obelisk of limestone, 301 feet high from foundation to apex. It is also proposed to erect at Manchester a massive eque- trine statue in bronze of the general. Stark's biography was written by Edward Everett in Sparks's "American Biography." See also his "Life and Official Correspondence," by his grandson, Caleb Stark (Concord, N. H., 1869).—His broth- er, William, soldier, b. in London-derry, N. H., 12 April, 1774; d. on Long Island, N. Y., about 1782, acquired a good education, and was among the first to whom the proprietors granted lands in London- derry. Previous to the erection of a public meet- ing-house the town-meetings were held at his home. He served in the old French war, and, as a captain of rangers on the northern frontier, was at Ticon- deroga, and fought under Gen. Jeffrey Amherst at Louisburg and Fort Beausant, N. B., in 1758.

At the beginning of the Revolution he applied for the command of a regiment, but another officer was preferred by the New Hampshire assembly, and deeming this an insult, he entered the British service as colonel. He endeavored to persuade his brother John to adopt this course, but without suc- cess. He is described as possessing great bravery and hardihood, but as wanting in moral brassiness. His name appears in the banishment and prescripwanee, Wis., and practised law until 1861. On 17 May, 1861, he was made colonel of the 1st Wisconsin volunteers, took part in the battles of Falling Waters, 2 July, 1861, and Edward's Ferry, 29 July, 1861, and was mustered out on 21 Aug., 1861. Reorganizing his regiment for three years, by special order of the war department, he again enlisted, and served in Kentucky and northern Alabama. He participated in the battle of Perryville, Ky., 8 Oct., 1862. He was also engaged at Stone river, 31 Dec., 1862, and 1-2 Jan., 1863, and remained on duty at Murfreesboro, Tenn., until 23 June, 1863. He was appointed brigadier-general of U. S. volunteers on 17 July, 1863, commanded brigades and divisions of the army of the Cumberland, participated in the attack at Chickamauga, 19-21 Sept., 1863, where he was wounded, in battles around Chattanooga, Tenn., 23-25 Nov., 1863, and in the assault and capture of Mission Ridge, Tenn., 23-25 Nov., 1863. He served on the court-martial that tried Gen. William A. Hammond, surgeon-general, U. S. army of the Cumberland, and several posts in Tennessee and Alabama, he was mustered out of the army on 11 May, 1865. After farming for several years in Wisconsin, and occupying posts of importance and trust, he removed to Washington, D. C., where he engaged in practice, having been admitted to the bar in 1857.—His cousin, Henry, was a lawyer and a judge in Wisconsin.

STARRS, Henry, Canadian statesman, b. in Kingston, Ont., 13 Oct., 1816; d. in Montreal, 29 Dec., 1882. He entered the legal profession in Canada in 1835. Henry was educated at Montreal college, and was for several years a member of the firm of Leslie, Starnes and Co., wholesale merchants in Montreal. He represented Chateaugay in the Canadian assembly from 1857 till 1859, when he retired. He became a member of the executive council, province of Quebec, in 1878, speaker of the legislative council in 1879, was commissioner of railways in 1882-4, and commissioner of public works in the Taillon ministry for a short time in 1887. Mr. Starnes had been warden of Trinity church, manager of the Ontario bank in Montreal, president of the Sheldon County railway, and mayor of Montreal in 1856 and 1858.

STARR, Alfred Adolphus, lecturer, b. in New York, Nov. 25, 1810, educated at private schools in New York and in Mendiham, N. Y., after which he entered mercantile life, which he abandoned in 1845, and began to deliver lectures, which he illustrated with a crude solar microscope made of pasteboard. Afterward he made an oxygen-hydrogen microscope, and several years later he produced a fine apparatus. He has given more than 2,500 lectures and exhibitions before schools and colleges, and was also connected with Phineas T. Barnum. Using a microscope of enormous power, he projected living specimens on his screen, and, being skilful manipulator, regulated their performances with dexterity, showing water-insects and annelidae feeding upon fonts with each other. He was one of the first to procure a patent (1858) to light railroad-cars with gas.

STARR, Eliza Allan, author, b. in Deerfield, Mass., 29 Aug., 1821. She received her education in her native town, became a member of the Roman Catholic church in 1850, and has since devoted herself principally to the study of Christian art. In 1856 she went to Chicago. She has published a volume of poems (1867), and "Patron Saints" (New York, 1871).

STARR, Frederick Ratchford, author, b. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 19 June, 1821; d. in Philadelphia, 27 April, 1889. He became president of an insurance company in Philadelphia, but retired in 1876 and entered the Echo farm, a dairy and stock-farm that has become widely known. Later the Echo farm company was organized by him, which controls large creameries throughout a great part of Litchfield county. Mr. Starr served in the Connecticut legislature in 1863-4, and had been interested in temperance and other reforms. He had lectured and is the author of "Dudley Dunlap, the New-boy" (Philadelphia, 1866); "May I Not? or Two Ways of Looking through a Telescope" (1867); "What Can I Do? A Question for Professing Christians" (1867; revised ed., 1885); "Farm Echoes" (New York, 1881); and "From Shore to Shore" (Philadelphia, 1887).

STARRS, William, clergyman, b. in Drumquin, County of Tyrone, New Ireland, in 1850; died in New York city, 6 Feb., 1878. After receiving a good classical education, he studied theology at Maynooth college, near Dublin, Ireland, came to this country in 1829, was received into the diocese of New York, completed his theological course at St. Mary's seminary, Baltimore, and in 1834 was ordained a priest at St. Patrick's cathedral in New York. In 1841 he was appointed by President Johnson to the bishopric of Galveston, Texas, but resigned in 1846. He was then chosen to become a Republican, and served from 4 March, 1861, until his death, being thrice re-elected.

STARNES, Henry, Canadian statesman, b. in Kingston, Ont., 13 Oct., 1816; d. in Montreal, 29 Dec., 1882. He entered the legal profession in Canada in 1835. In 1841 he was made pastor of St. Mary's church in Grand street, New York, serving until 1853, when he was appointed rector of St. Patrick's cathedral and vicar-general of the archdiocese of New York. After the death of Archbishop Hughes in 1864, Dr. Starrs was administrator of the diocese until the succeeding bishop was appointed, to whom he acted as assistant, until the bishop was installed more in 1866, and also filled this office at two councils of the province. For twenty years he was the spiritual superior of the Sisters of Charity, and president of the trustees of St. Vincent's hospital. He was instrumental in instituting the Sisters of Mercy and Sisters of the Good Shepherd.

STAUTHINGTON, William, clergyman, b. in Coventry, Warwickshire, England, 4 Jan., 1770; d. in Washington, D. C, 12 Dec., 1829. He was graduated at the Baptist theological institution, Bristol, in 1792, and the next year came to this country, landing at Charleston. After preaching for more than a year at Georgetown, S. C, he removed to New York city, and thence to New Jersey, reading a number of years at the same time at Bordentown, where, in 1797, he was ordained, and then at Burlington. At the latter place he remained until 1805, when he accepted a call to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church of Philadelphia. After a successful ministry there of six years, he identified himself with a new enterprise, which resulted in the formation of a church and the erection of a large house of worship on Sansom street. His pastorate of this church, extending from 1811 till 1822, was one of great success. Besides preaching regularly three times on Sunday and once or twice during the week, he was the principal of a Baptist theological school. In 1822 he was called to the presidency of Columbian college, D. C, which office he resigned in 1827 and STEARNS, Charles Woodward, physician, b. in Springfield, Mass., in 1818; d. in Longmeadow, Mass., 8 Sept., 1887. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, and took his medical degree at the University of Pennsylvania in 1840. After practicing for some time he entered the army as a surgeon, subsequently travelled and studied in Europe, and at the opening of the civil war resumed his profession as surgeon of the 3d New York regiment. He was on service at Fort McClary, Baltimore, Suffolk, Va., Fortress Monroe, and in the field. Dr. Stearns was widely known as an enthusiastic Shakespearean student and writer. His principal works are "Shakespeare's Medical Knowledge" (New York, 1847); "The True Source of Wisdom and Knowledge" (1859); and a "History of the Constitution of the United States" (1872).

STEARNS, George Luther, merchant, b. in Medford, Mass., 8 Jan., 1899; d. in New York, 9 April, 1865. His father, Luther, was a teacher of reputation. In early life his son engaged in the business of ship-handyer, and after a prosperous career under the management of ship-handyers, during 35 years, resided in Medford. He identified himself with the anti-slavery cause, became a Free-soiler in 1848, aided John Brown in Kansas, and supported him till his death. Soon after the opening of the civil war Mr. Stearns advocated the enlistment of negroes in the national army. The 54th and 55th Massachusetts regiments, and his 56th career (colored), were largely recruited through his instrumentality. He was commissioned major through the recommendation of Sec. Stanton, and was of great service to the National cause by enlisting negroes for the volunteer service in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Tennessee. He was the founder of the "Commonwealth," and "Right of Way" newspapers for the dissemination of his ideas.

STEARNS, John, physician, b. in Williamsburg, Mass., 16 May, 1770; d. in New York city, 18 March, 1848. He was graduated at Yale in 1790, and at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York, in 1812. He settled at Waterford, N. Y., in 1793, was in the New York senate in 1809-10, in 1810 removed to Albany, and in 1819 went to New York city, where he resided the remainder of his life. He originated the Saratoga county medical society, and in 1809 the Medical society of the state of New York, and in 1840 was the first president of the New York academy of medicine. He was also a founder of the American tract society. He contributed valuable medical discoveries to the New York "Medical Repository," and published numerous addresses (1812-47).

STEARNS, John Glazier, author, b. in Auckorth, Cheshire co., N. H., 22 Nov., 1795; d. in Clinton, N. Y., 16 Jan., 1874. He was graduated in the first class at Hamilton literary and theological institution (now Madison university) in 1822, and was ordained a minister of the Baptist church. He was for fifty years a preacher in central New York, and published, among other works, "Dialogues on the Means of separating Masonry from the Church of Christ" (Utica, 1828); "Inquiry into the Nature and Tendency of Freemasonry" (1829); "An Antidote for the Doctrine of Universal Salvation" (1829); "Essays on the Influence of the Spirit and the Word in Regeneration"; "The Primitive Church" (1833); "The Sovereignty of God and Moral Agency" (1836); "Letters on Freemasonry" (1839); and several smaller works.

STEARNS, John Newton, editor, b. in New Ipswich, N. H., 24 May, 1829; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 21 April, 1895. He was carefully prepared for college, but impaired health prevented his entering. On attaining his majority he came to New York city and engaged in literary pursuits. In 1858 he became editor and proprietor of "Merry's Museum," and was widely known as "Robert Merry." He joined the order of the Sons of Temperance when it was in its infancy, and in 1866 was chosen most worthy patriarch, its highest office in this country. At his suggestion, in 1865, the National temperance society and publication-house was organized, and he was appointed its corresponding secretary and publishing agent. In 1865 he became treasurer of the organization of "Women for Temperance Advocates," and he had since held that place as well as having charge of the "Youth's Temperance Banner." In addition to his editorial work, he had issued annually since 1869 "The National Temperance Almanac and Toetotder's Year-Book," and he had published "The Temperance Chorus" (New York, 1867); "The Temperance Speaker" (1869); "The Centennial Temperance Volume" (1875); "The Prohibition Songster" (1885); and "One Hundred Years of Temperance" (1886).

STEARNs, John William, educator, b. in Sturbridge, Mass., in 1840. He was graduated at Harvard in 1860, was appointed professor of Latin in the University of Chicago in 1865, and in 1874 became director of the National normal school in that city. He was then president of the normal college at White River, Wis.

STEARNs, Junius Brutus, artist, b. in Arlington, Vt., 2 July, 1810; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 17 Sept, 1895. He was a pupil at the Academy of design, New York city, where in 1848 he became an associate, and an academian the following year. In the same year he went to Europe and spent some time in Paris and London. He became in 1851 recording secretary at the National academy, holding that post until 1865. His work was mainly in portraiture, but he painted also numerous historical subjects. Of these the best known are the "Washington Series," five paintings representing Washington as a citizen, farmer, soldier, statesman, and Christian. His "Millennium" is a notable design.

STEARNs, Oakman Sprague, b. in Bath, Me., 20 Oct., 1817; d. in Newton Centre, 21 April, 1893. He was graduated at Waterville college and at Newton theological institution in 1846, and was instructor in Hebrew there in 1846-7. He was pastor of the Baptist church at Southbridge, Mass., in 1847-54, at Newark N. J., in 1854-5, and at Newton Centre, Mass., in 1855-7. Since 1868 he has been professor of biblical interpretation of the Old Testament in Newton theological institution. Colby gave him the degree of D. D. in 1863. He has translated Suttorius' "Person and Work of Christ" (Boston, 1849), and was the author of "A Syllabus of the Messianic Passages in the Old Testament," Boston, 1847.

STEARNs, Ozora Pierson, senator, b. in De Kalb, Lawrence county, N. Y., 15 Jan., 1821; d. in San Diego, Calif., 3 June, 1896. He was educated at Michigan university, where he was graduated in the literary department and in law in 1860. Immediately after his graduation he began practice in Illinois. In 1867 he was appointed associate justice of the Illinois supreme court, and in 1868 he was elected prosecuting attorney for Clinton county. In August, 1862, he entered the National army as lieutenant in the 29th Illinois, and in September was commissioned colonel of the 39th regiment of U. S. colored infantry. His regiment suffered severely at the mine-explosion before Petersburg on 30 July. He accompanied Gen. Benjamin F. Butler on his Fort Fisher expedition, was with Gen. Alfred H. Terry at the capture of that fort, and afterward remained with his command in North Carolina until he was mustered out of the service in December, 1865. He then returned to Rochester, N. Y., was soon afterward offered the professorship of agriculture in Cornell university, which he declined, was again elected county attorney, and then appointed register in bankruptcy. In 1871 he was elected U. S. senator for the unexpired term of Daniel S. Norton, deceased, and served for a short period. In the spring of 1872 his health being much impaired, he returned to the farm, but later years became judge of the 39th judicial district of Michigan, which office he held ever since. He was in favor of granting the right of suffrage to women.—His wife, Sarah Burger, reformer, b. in New York city, 30 Nov., 1836, is the daughter of Edward G. Burger. She was educated chiefly at the Ann Arbor high-school, and the State normal school, Ypsilanti, Mich. In 1888 and afterward she made formal application to be admitted as a student to the Michigan state university, which, though it was refused, had an influence in finally deciding the regents in 1890 to make their classes open to women. During the civil war Mrs. Stearns was well known as a worker on the sanitary commission, and lectured on half a dozen subjects in the several cities and towns where she resided. Col. Stearns in 1863, and removed to Minnesota in 1866. For many years she had been vice-president for Minnesota of the National woman suffrage association. She is president of the Illinois home society, and was instrumental in establishing a temporary home for needy women and children in that city. She was also five years an active member of women's rights.

STEARNs, Samuel, author, b. in Bolton, Mass., in 1747; d. in Brattleborough, Vt., 8 Aug., 1819. He became a physician and astronomer, practicing his profession first in Worcester, Mass., then in New York, and finally in Brattleborough, Vt. For his supposed loyalty to King George III, he suffered greatly from the persistent attacks of the Sons of Liberty and was confined for nearly three years in a prison in Worcester, Mass. While he was a resident of New York he made the calculations for the first nautical almanac in this country, which he published, 20 Dec., 1782. He edited the "Philadel- phia Magazine" in 1789, and published "Tour to London and Paris" (London, 1790); "The Magnet and the Magnetic World," (London, 1790); "The American Herbal, or Materia Medica" (Walpole, N. H., 1801). He labored twenty-eight years on a "Medical Dispensatory," and to obtain information for it travelled for nine years in Europe and this country, but died before its completion. On the list of subscribers for this work were the names of several English and American imprints.

STEARNs, Samuel Horatio, clergyman, b. in Bedford, Mass., 12 Sept., 1801; d. in Paris, France, 15 July, 1837. His father, Samuel, was for forty years pastor of the Congregational church in Bedford, Mass. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1823, became minister of the Congregational church, and served as such fourteen years. He afterward was appointed president of the university, and on 16 April, 1844, till his death. A volume of his discourses, with a memoir by his brother, William A. Stearns, was published (Boston, 1838).—His brother, William Augustus, clergyman, b. in Bedford, Mass., 11 March, 1803; d. in Amherst, Mass., 8 June, 1876, was graduated at Harvard in 1827, studied theology at Andover, and, after teaching for a short time at Duxbury, was ordained a minister of the Congregational church, and installed pastor of the church at Cambridgeport, Mass., 14 Dec., 1831. When the Rev. Edward Hitchcock resigned the presidency of Amherst college in 1834 Mr. Stearns was chosen to succeed him, and he held the office till his death. He published "Infant Church Membership" (Boston, 1844); "Infant Church Member's Gudie" (1845); "Life and Select Discourses of Rev. Samuel H. Stearns" (1846); "Discourses and Addresses" (1856); "A Plea for the Nation," posthumous (1876); and sermons and discourses.—William Augustus's son, William French, merchant, b. in Cambridgeport, Mass., 9 Nov., 1834; d. in Orange, N. J., 21 May, 1874, was engaged in the East India trade, and for several years was a resident of Bombay, India, as head of the firm of Stearns, Hark and Co. On his return to this country he established a house in New York for the same class of trade. He rendered great services to the American board of foreign missions during the civil war, built a church for Amherst college, and, as the personal friend and correspondent of Dr. David Livingstone, aided largely in fitting out his last expedition.—Another brother of Samuel Horatio, Jonathan French, clergyman, b. in Bedford, Mass., in 1808; d. 12 Nov., 1899, was graduated at Harvard, studied theology at Andover seminary, and was licensed to preach in 1834. He was minister of the Presbyterian church in Newburyport, Mass., in 1835-49, and in December, 1849, became pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in Newark, N. J., which connection continued about thirty years. In 1836 he was a commissioner from the presbytery of London-derry to the general assembly in Pittsburg, and he was moderator of the general assembly that met in Harrisburg in 1868. He published "Sermon on the Death of Daniel Webster" (Newark, 1852), and "Historical Discourses relating to the First Presbyterian Church in Newark" (1853).—Another broth- er, Eben Sperry, educator, b. in Bedford, Mass., in 1821; d. in Nashville, Tenn., in 1885, was graduated at Harvard in 1841, was master of the normal school at Framingham, Mass., of the Albany female academy, and in 1854 became chancellor of Nash- ville university. Amherst gave him the degree of D. D. in 1876.—Samuel Horatio's cousin, Edward Josiah, author, b. in Bedford, Mass., 24 Feb., 1810; d. 6 July, 1890, was graduated at Harvard in 1833, ordained a clergyman of the Episcopal church, and was professor of modern languages in St. John's college in 1849-53. At other times he was either teaching or rector of a parish. He published "Notes on Uncle Tom's Cabin" (Philadelphia, 1853); "Practical Guide to English Pronunciation" (Boston, 1857); "The Afterpiece to the Comedy of Convocation" (Baltimore, 1870); "Birth and New Birth, a New Treatment of an Old Subject" (1872); "The Faith of Our Forefathers," (New York, 1879); and "The Archbishop's Champion Brought to Book" (1881).

STEIBNIS, Emma, artist, b. in New York city, 1 Sept., 1837; d. there, 25 Oct., 1882. For several years she devoted herself to painting in oil and water-colors, working also in crayon and pastels. She subsequently turned her attention to sculpture. In 1857 she went to Rome, where she studied under an Italian master, and also with Paul Akers. She executed a large fountain representing "The Angel of the Waters" (1860) in Central park, New York; "Horatio Mann in Boston" (1860); "Joseph," "The Angel of Prayer," and a bust of Charlotte Cushman (1859); a bust of John W. Stebbins in the Mercantile library, New York; and other works. While in Rome she won the friendship of Charlotte Cushman, with whom she returned to the United States in 1857. She prepared a memoir of Miss Cushman, at her request, after the actress's death (Boston, 1878).

STECKEL, Louis Joseph Réué, Canadian civil engineer, b. in Wintzenheim, Alsace, 6 Sept., 1841. He was educated at Benfeld, Alsace, and at Laval university, Quebec. He came to Quebec in 1857, and in the following year went to the western part of the United States, remaining till 1860, when he returned to Quebec. After studying civil engineering at Ch南宁市alum, he practised his profession successfully, and has been chief clerk of the engineering branch of the department of public works, Canada, since July, 1850. In addition to other important work, he carried on extensive hydrographic surveys in 1881-2 of St. Lawrence ship-channel between Quebec and Cap à l'oeche, and from 1884 till 1887 extensive geodetic levelling operations at Binghamton, and Raphael and St. Lawrence rivers, from Lake Champlain to tide-water in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. He invented in 1868 a perfected flute, called the "Harmonic flute," and exhibited at the Indian and colonial exhibition, in London in 1886, a piccolo constructed on his system, and geodetic rods as perfected by him. He has published "Treatise on Geometry and Trigonometry" (1880), and "Essay on the Contracted Liquid Vein affecting the Present Theory of the Science of Hydraulics" (ottawa, 1884).

STEDINGK, Curt Boigislaus Louis Christopher, Count von, Swedish soldier, b. in his father's castle of Finnau, Pomerania, 26 Oct., 1740; d. in Stockholm. He was graduated at the University of Upsala in 1768, entered the Swedish army in his youth, took part in the war against Prussia, and, entering the French service in the Royal regiment of Sweden, rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. At Versailles, where he remained on duty, he lived on intimate terms of friendship with Count Axel Fersen. In command of a brigade of infantry he sailed in D'E斯塔ing's fleet in 1778, and gained credit in the operations against West Indies and the capture of St. Domingo and Granada. In the attack upon Savannah, 9 Oct., 1779, the rashness and probable failure of which he predicted to D'E斯塔ing, he led one of the two principal assaults, and, after planting the American flag on the last intrenchment, was wounded and compelled to retreat with the loss of half his brigade of cavalry. After returning to France the king made him colonel of the regiment of Al- sace and knight of the Protestant branch of the Order of St. Louis, while the king of Sweden, in recognition of his services in America, made him colonel of dragoons and knight of the Order of the Sword. He also received the badge of the Society of the Cincinnati. He left France in 1787, took part in the war between Sweden and Russia, and was rewarded for his services by being appointed Swedish ambassador at St. Petersburg in 1790, which post he long retained. In 1814 he repaired to Paris in command of the Swedish army, and was the ambassador of the king of Sweden to sign the treaty of peace with France.

STEDMAN, Charles, soldier, b. in Philadelphia in 1755; d. in London, 26 June, 1812. He entered the army, served as an officer under Lord Percy at Lexington in 1775, and subsequently with Lord Howe in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and with Lord Cornwallis in the south. During his later years he was a deputy-comptroller of the stamp-office. He published "The History of the Origin, Progress, and Termination of the American War" (2 vols., London, 1794; Dublin, 1794). This excellent work is especially valuable for its military maps. William Thomas Lowndes ascribes its authorship to Dr. William Thompson.

STEDMAN, Edmund Clarence, poet, b. in Hartford, Conn., 8 Oct, 1853. The son of Edmund B. Stedman, a merchant of Hartford, and Elizabeth C. Dodge, who was a sister of William E. Dodge, and who, subsequently to the death of Mr. Stedman, married William B. Kinney. Mr. Stedman is further related through his mother to William Ellery Channing, Bishop A. C. Cox, Ex-President of Cornell University, and E. T. W. Higgins. He was prepared for college at Norwich, Conn., and in 1874 entered Yale, where he distinguished himself in Greek and in English composition. His poem of "The Wreath" was published in the "Yale Literary Magazine" in 1875, received a first prize. In his junior year he was suspended for irregularities, and did not receive his degree until 1874, when he was restored to his class, and received the degree of A. M. From 1875 to 1876 Mr. Stedman edited successively the Norwich "Tribune" and the "Winsted Herald." He then removed to New York city, where he contributed to "Vanity Fair," "Putnam's Monthly," "Harper's Magazine" and other periodicals, and finally drifted into journalism. During 1879 his poems "The Diamond Wedding," "How Old John Brown took Harper's Ferry," and similar lyrics appeared in the "Tribune." Their success led him to issue his "Poems, Lyric and Idyllic" (New York, 1880). He held the editorial staff of "The World" (1881-4), and was war correspondent for that paper, 1861-3. Later he accepted an appointment under Attorney-General Bates, but in 1864 he returned to New York and relinquished journalism to adopt some pursuit that would leave him more leisure for literary work. To this end Mr. Stedman soon purchased a seat in the stock exchange, and became a broker. His poetry of this period is included in "Alice of Monmouth, an Idyll of the Great War" (New York, 1864); "The Blameless Prince" (Boston, 1869); "Poetical Works" (1873). With T. B. Aldrich, he edited "Cameos" (Boston, 1874), selected from the works of Walter Savage Landor. He also edited, with an introduction, "Poems of Austin Dobson" (New York, 1880). About 1875 Mr. Stedman began to devote attention to critical writing, and contributed to "Scribner's Monthly" a series of sketches, which were later rewritten and published as "Victorian Poets" (Boston, 1877; London, 1878; 13th ed., with a supplement, bringing it down to 1887). In a similar manner he prepared "Poets of America" (Boston, 1886). With Ellen M. Hutchinson he edited a "Library of American Literature" in eleven volumes (1888-90). In 1891 Mr. Stedman succeeded Mr. Lowell as president of the American copyright league. In the same year he delivered the inaugural lecture of the Cornell chair of poetry at Johns Hopkins university. These lectures were repeated at Columbia college and at the University of Pennsylvania, and were afterward published in the volume "The Nature and Elements of Poetry" (1892). In 1895 appeared "A Victorian Anthology." "An American Anthology" is now in press, the two volumes supplementing their editor's critical reviews of the poetry of Great Britain and the United States during the 19th century. In 1894-5 Mr. Stedman also edited and brought out, in conjunction with Prof. G. E. Woodberry, a definitive edition of Poe's works, in ten volumes, with a biography, and critical essays on Poe's tales, criticisms, and poems. In 1897 appeared "Poems, Chiefly on the Civil War," and a Collected Edition has been published on public occasions. The most important of which are "Gettysburg," 1871; the "Dartmouth Ode," 1873; "The Monument of Greeley," 1876; "The Death of Bryant;" "Meridian," an Old-Fashioned Poem" (read at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Yale class of 1853), 1878; "Corda Convenia" (read before the Summer school of chiliasm and the Celestial Ode" set to music by Horatio Parker, 1894. He has also been engaged during many years on a complete metrical translation of the Greek idyllic poets. Other publications include "Octavius Royal Fontham and the New Faith" (New York, 1876); "Hawthorne, and other Poems" (1877); "Lyrics and Idyls" (London, 1879); "The Poets of the Civil War," which was republished in New York in 1882. In 1891 Mr. Stedman received the degree of L. H. D. from Columbia, and in 1884 the degree of LL. D. from Yale. In 1896 he removed from New York city to Lawrence Park, Bronxville, N. Y., where he now resides. His cousin, Griffin Alexander, soldier, b. in Hartford, Conn., 6 Jan., 1858; d. near Petersburg, Va., 6 Aug., 1864, was graduated at Trinity in 1879, and began to study law, but in 1861 entered the volunteer army as captain in the 5th Connecticut regiment. He was transferred to the 11th Connecticut as major after seeing service in the Shenandoah valley, and took part in the battle of Antietam, leading half of the regiment in the charge on the stone bridge, and receiving a severe wound. After the war he entered the Washington office of the Federal Engineering, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg, and at the beginning of the overland campaign of 1864 was placed at the head of a brigade. He repeatedly won the commendation of his superiors, and was mortally wounded in one of the skirmishes that followed the mine-explosion at Petersburg. Fort Stedman, one of the works near that place, had been named for him. He had been strongly recommended for promotion to brigadier-general, and was given that rank by brevet, to date from 5 Aug., 1864. His grave at Hartford is marked by a monument of granite and bronze.

STEDMAN, John Gabriel, British soldier, b. in Holland in 1744; d. in England in 1797. He early lost his paternal estate, and expected to enter the navy, but accepted an ensign’s commission in the Scotch brigade in the Dutch service, and was a lieutenant when in 1772 a negro insurrection began in the colony of Surinam. He commanded a small troop of soldiers and the expedition that was sent to suppress it, and was given the brevet rank of captain. On his return in 1777 he was promoted to major, and just before resigning from the service, at the beginning of hostilities with England in 1783, was made lieutenant-colonel. He published a valuable “Narrative of an Expedition against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam,” which contains a full picture of the interior of that country and its inhabitants (2 vols., London, 1796; enlarged edition, 1806).

STEEDMAN, Charles, naval officer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 24 Sept., 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 13 Nov., 1890. He entered the navy, became a passed midshipman, 14 Jan., 1834, and cruised in the Mediterranean frigates “Constitution” and “United States.” He was promoted to lieuten-ant, 23 Feb., 1841, and during the Mexican war served in the sloop “St. Mary’s” in 1846–7. At the bombardment of Vera Cruz he commanded the siege-guns in the naval battery on shore, and participated in other operations on the coast, and in the boat expedition that captured Tampa. He was commissioned commander, 14 Sept., 1855, and in Feb., 1857, was promoted to the rank of captain, and commanded the brig “Dolphin.” Notwithstanding the efforts of his family and friends in his native state to induce him to join the seceded states, he remained loyal and rendered valuable service to the Union. He immediately asked for duty, took command of the railroad ferry steamer “Maryland,” and conveyed Gen. Benjamin F. Butler with the 5th Massachusetts regiment from New Orleans to St. Louis, Mo., in April, 1861. He then went to the west temporarily and assisted Admiral Foote in organizing the naval forces that operated on the Mississippi river in the gun-boats. In September, 1861, he commanded the steamer “Beauregard,” in which he led the second column of vessels at the capture of Port Royal, S. C., and participated in operations on the coast of Georgia and Florida during the winter of 1861–2. He returned north in the spring, and took command of the steamer “Paul Jones,” in which he assisted in the capture of Fort McAllister, on Ogeechee river, in August, 1862, and operated on St. John’s river, Fla., during the following month. He was promoted to captain, 13 Sept., 1862; and in the steamer “Powhatan” took part in the blockade off Charleston and in several engagements there. He then towed the captured ram “Atlanta” to Philadelphia, took command of the steamer “Ticonderoga,” and went to the coast of Brazil in pursuit of the Confederate cruiser “Florida” until November, 1864. He participated in the two attacks on Fort Fisher, remained in command of the “Ticonderoga” on a cruise in the Mediterranean, and returned in command of the steamer “Ticonderoga” to New York. He was promoted to commodore, 25 July, 1866, and was in charge of the Boston navy-yard in 1869–72. He was made a rear-admiral, 25 May, 1871, and retired, 24 Sept., 1873.

STEEDMAN, James Barrett, soldier, b. in Northumberland county, Pa., 30 July, 1818; d. in Toledo, Ohio, 18 Oct., 1883. He went to Ohio in 1837 as a common laborer at the Wells and Erie canal, and in 1843 was chosen to the legislature of that state as a Democrat. In 1849 he organized a company to cross the plains to California in search of gold, but he returned in 1850, and in 1851 became a member of the Ohio board of public works. During Buchanan’s administration he was printer at Washington, and in 1860 he was a dele-
Wilson's Creek, and also in charge of the south-eastern district of that state after February. He had become colonel of the 8th Iowa regiment on 23 Sept., 1861, and on 29 Jan., 1862, was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. He led a division in the Army of the Southwest from May till November, 1862, being engaged at Round Hill, 7 July, and in the occupation of Helena, Ark. On 29 Nov., he was made major-general of volunteers, and, after engaging in the Yazoo expedition, he commanded a division in the Vicksburg campaign, taking part in the operations at Young's Point, the advance to Grand Gulf, the attack on Jackson, and the siege of Vicksburg. Engaged in this campaign, he retained the brevet of colonel in the regular army, 4 July, 1863, and on 26 Aug., he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel. From July, 1863, till 6 Jan., 1864, he was at the head of the Army of Arkansas, taking part in the capture of Little Rock, 10 Sept., 1863, and then till 29 Nov., he commanded the department of that state. He led a column in the Mobile campaign, and at the close of the war received the brevet of brigadier-general, U.S. army, for services in the capture of Little Rock, and that of major-general for services during the war. He was then transferred to Texas, and placed in command on the Rio Grande, and from 21 Dec., 1865, he had charge of the Department of the Columbia. From 23 Nov., 1867, till his death, he was on leave of absence. He was then promoted colonel of the 20th infantry, 28 July, 1869.

STEELE, Joel Dorman, educator, b. in Lima, N. Y., 14 May, 1836; d. in Elmira, N. Y., 25 May, 1886. He was graduated at Genesee college in 1858, and then taught at the Mexico academy, of which institution he was appointed principal in 1870. Soon after the beginning of the civil war he served a short time in the New York volunteers, and served in the peninsula campaign, being severely wounded at Seven Pines. He was chosen principal of the Newark, N. Y., high-school in 1862, and in 1866 accepted a similar office in the Elmira free academy, which place he retained until 1872. Subsequently he devoted his time exclusively to the preparation of text-books. The first of these, "Practical Chemistry," was prepared for him by the regents of the University of the state of New York in 1870, and during the same year he presided over the New York state teachers' association. In 1872 he was elected a fellow of the Geological society of London, and also in 1872 he was chosen by the alumni a trustee of Syracuse university, in which Genesee college had been merged, and to that university he bequeathed $50,000 to found a professorship of theistic science. Dr. Steele was the author of a popular series of scientific text-books, each intended for a course of fourteen weeks, including "Chemistry" (New York, 1867); "Astronomy" (1868); "Natural Philosophy" (1869); "Geology" (1870); "Human Physiology" (1873); "Zoology" (1875); an "Essays to the Practical Applications in Steele's Sciences" (1871); also "Barnes's Popular History of the United States" (1875); and with his wife, Esther Baker Steele, a series of brief histories, including "The United States" (1872); "France" (1874); "Ancient Peoples" (1883); "Medieval and Modern Peoples" (1885); "General History" (1883); "History of Greece" (1886); and "History of Rome" (1884).

STEELE, John, soldier, b. in Augusta county, Va., about 1755; d. about 1805. He entered the Revolutionary army, served as an officer at the battle of Point Pleasant, Va., 10 Oct., 1774, and at the battle of Germantown was shot through the lungs. He was for many years one of the executive conil of his native state, and in John Adams's administration served as a commissioner to treat with the Cherokee Indians. From 1798 till 1801 he was secretary of Mississippi territory.

STEELE, John, soldier, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 15 Aug., 1738; d. in Philadelphia, 27 Feb., 1827. He was educated for a Presbyterian clergyman, but on the breaking out of the war of the Revolution entered the army, in which he rose to the command of a company, 23 March, 1778. He was seriously wounded at the battle of the Brandywine, and retired from the service, 1 Jan., 1783. In 1801 he was elected state-senator, but, as he held a United States appointment, his seat was declared vacant. In 1804 he was re-elected, and in 1806 became speaker of that body. In 1806 he was the Democratic candidate for U. S. senator, but was defeated by Andrew Gregg. He served as one of the commissioners to adjust the damages sustained by the Wyoming sufferers at the hands of the Indians. In 1808 President Jefferson appointed him collector of the port of Philadelphia, which post he filled during the remainder of his life. He also held the rank of brigadier-general in the Pennsylvania militia.—His brother, ARCHIBALD (1741-1832), was adjutant at the siege of Quebec under Arnold, afterward deputy-quartermaster-general, and at the time of his death was major-general of militia. His other brother was James, soldier, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 16 Jan., 1765; d. at Harrisburg, Pa., 30 Sept., 1845, received a classical education, and was a man of considerable enterprise. He erected a paper-mill on Octorara creek, and subsequently two cotton-mills. He served in the war of 1812-14, and for meritorious conduct was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general of militia; but he retired from business and removed to Harrisburg, where he died. His son, Francis B. Steele, was military store-keeper at the Falls of St. Anthony, Minn., for a long period.

STEELE, John, statesman, b. in Salisbury, N. C., 1 Nov., 1764; d. there, 14 Aug., 1815. His mother, Elizabeth, entertained at her house in Salisbury on Gen. Nathanael Greene, who was then discouraged and penniless, and insisted on his accepting two small bags of specie, her earnings for years. "Never," says Greene's biographer, "did relief come at a more needed moment." John was educated as a merchant, but when he had arrived at manhood became a successful planter, and was also active in politics. He was elected to the legislature in 1787 and 1788, and in the latter year, as a member of the convention to consider the U. S. constitution, made fruitless efforts to secure its adoption. He was a member of the first two congresses, from April, 1790, till 2 March, 1793, having been elected as a Federalist, and was again in the legislature in 1794-5. On 1 July, 1796, Gen. Washington, then in command, made him first treasurership, which office he held through Adams's administration, resigning on 15 Dec., 1802, though President Jefferson solicited him to remain. He was a commissioner to adjust the boundary between North and South Carolina in 1806, and was again in the legislature in that year and in 1817-18, serving as speaker in 1818. He was elected to a second term on the day of his death. He was active in militia matters, and attained the rank of general.

STEELE, William, soldier, b. in Albany, N. Y., in 1819; d. in San Antonio, Tex., 12 Jan., 1885. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1840, assigned to the 2d dragons, and served in the Florida war, the military occupation of Texas, and the war with Mexico, being promoted 1st lieutenant. 9 May, 1846, and brevetted captain for gallantry at Canton and Churubusco. He was stationed in Texas from 1849 till 1852, being promoted captain, 10 Nov., 1851, and was then in New Mexico till 1854. From that time till the civil war he was chiefly in Kansas, Dakota, and Nebraska, taking part in several expeditions against hostile Indians. He resigned on 30 May, 1861, joined the Confederate States of America in her quarrel with the Union, and took part in Gen. Henry H. Sibley’s expedition to New Mexico. On its return he was made brigadier-general, 12 Sept., 1862, and in January, 1863, was assigned to the command of the Department of Western Arkansas and the Indian territory. He commanded at Galveston, Tex., in December, 1863, and had charge of a cavalry division in Louisiana in 1864, where he opposed the Red River expedition of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks. In 1867 he became a commission merchant in San Antonio, Tex., and for some time after 1874 he was adjutant-general of the State. In this office he did good service by procuring and publishing, at great pains and expense, lists of escaped convicts and other fugitives from justice, which he furnished to refugees from the State of Texas as the statute permitted.

STEENDAM, Jacob, Dutch poet, b. in Holland in 1616. It is uncertain when or where he died. He came to the colony of New Amsterdam about 1632, and stayed there till 1632, when he returned to Holland. During his residence in the Dutch settlement he owned farms at Amsterdam and Mespath, a house and lot on what is now Pearl street, and another on Broadway. He lived about five or six years after his return, and made a voyage to Batavia, where he may possibly have died. The little that is known of him is due to the researches of Henry C. Murphy, who, when he was U. S. minister to the Hague, discovered some poems written by Steendam on New Amsterdam, and had them printed with an English version in the same metre. The work is entitled "Jacob Steendam noch vaster, A Memoir of the First Poet in New Netherland, with his Poems descriptive of the Colony" (The Hague, 1861). The poems are "Complaint of New Amsterdam, in New Netherland, to her Mother, of her Beginning, Growth, and Present Condition," and "The Praise of New Netherland; Spurring Verses to the Lovers of the Colony and Brothership to the vaster of the New World, in Friesland, Peter Cornelis Piickshoy, of Zierckeveen."

STEENSTA, Peter Henry, clergyman, b. near Franeker, Friesland, Netherlands, 24 Jan., 1833. He emigrated to the United States and entered Shurtleff college, Ill., where he was graduated in 1858. He then became a minister in the Baptist church, but afterward united with the Episcopalians, and was appointed rector of Grace church, Newton, Mass., in 1864. He became professor of Hebrew and Old and New Testament exegesis in the Episcopal theological school of Cambridge, Mass., in 1868. He translated and edited "Judges" and "Ruth" in the American edition of Lange’s "Commentary" (New York, 1873). The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Shurtleff college in 1892.

STEIGER, Ernst, German-American bibliographer, b. in Gastewitz, Saxony, 4 Oct., 1832. He was trained as a book-seller, emigrated in 1855 to New York city, and in 1863 opened an independent business. He became the publisher of important works of German-Americans and of language textbooks, and also a manufacturer and importer of all the commodities owned by the Schleicher firm. Steiger is the author of "Der Nachdruck in Nordamerika" (New York, 1860); "Das Copyright-Law in den Vereinigten Staaten" (1869); and "Periodical Literature," a bibliography (1873).

STEIN, Conrad (stine), German historian, b. in Heidelberg in 1701; d. in Breslau in 1792. He was for many years professor of history in the University of Breslau, and afterward made researches in the state and private libraries of Europe and America upon the ancient history of the latter. His works include "Abhandlung über die Atlantida der Alten, und ihrer Zusammenhange mit America" (Breslau, 1790): "Geschichte der Entdeckungen durch Scandinavische Seefahrer vom 15ten zum 16ten Jahrhunderte" (1754); "Hilf der deutschen Aussehungen in Nord-Amerika" (1755); "Abhandlung über die Spanischen Eroberer Cortés, Pizarro, und Almagro" (1757); "Historische Notizen über die Entdeckung von Venezuela durch die Welsers" (1758); "Kurze Beschreibung von America" (1759); and "Abhandlung über die Indianer-Rasse oder Rothölntere, deren Geschichte und Zusammenhang mit der germanischen Rasse" (1760).

STEINBEL, Roger Nelson, naval officer, b. in Middleton, Md., 27 Dec., 1810. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 27 March, 1829, and cruised in the schooner "Porpoise." He was in the flotilla near Vera Cruz in 1833. He was on duty in New York at the naval school in 1834-8, and became a passed midshipman, 23 June, 1838. He was commissioned lieutenant, 23 Oct., 1843, served in the coast survey until 1847, and then was on the Brazil station, on special duty in Washington, and in the steamer "Mississippi," on the East India station, in 1857-9. When the civil war began he went to Cincinnati to fit out river gun-boats, and then rendered good service in the Mississippi river flotilla. He commanded the river gun-boat "Lexington" at Belmont when Gen. Grant’s force was defeated and saved by the gun-boats in November, 1861. From August, 1861, until May, 1862, he participated in several engagements, and contributed greatly to the successes and victories at Lucas Bend, 9 Sept., 1861, Fort Henry, 6 Feb., 1862, Island No. 10 from 16 March until its capture on 7 April, 1862, and in the action with the rams at Fort Pillow in May, 1862. In this last engagement his vessel, the "Cincinnati," was sunk, and he was seriously wounded. He then had special duty at Philadelphia and Pittsburg, and served as superintendent of the U. S. Navy Yard at New York, from 27 July, 1866. He commanded the "Canal-bugna" in the Mediterranean in 1866-7. He next served at the rendezvous in Boston, and was commissioned commodore, 13 July, 1870, and appointed commander-in-chief of the Pacific squadron in 1872. He was retired on 27 Dec., 1872, and subsequently promoted to rear-admiral on the retired list 5 June, 1874.

STEINER, Lewis Henry, physician, b. in Frederick city, Md., 4 May, 1827; d. in Baltimore, 18 Feb., 1892. He was educated at Marshall college, Pa., where he received the degree of A. M. in 1849, and was graduated the same year at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania. He began to practise in Frederick, but in 1852 removed to Baltimore, where for three years he was associated with Dr. John R. W. Dunbar in the conduct of the Baltimore medical institute, at the end of which time he returned to Frederick. Soon after he began to practise his attention was especially directed to chemistry and the allied sciences, and during his residence in Baltimore his time was largely occupied in teaching. He was professor of chemistry in the University of Maryland, and also of chemistry and pharmacy in the National medical college, Washington, in 1853; lecturer on chemistry and physics in St. James college, Md., in 1854; lecturer on applied chemistry in the Maryland college of pharmacy in 1855. During the civil war he was actively employed as an inspector by the U. S. sanitary commission, and for a period was in charge of its operations in the Army of the Potomac as chief inspector. In 1871 he was elected by the Republicans to the state senate for two years. He was re-elected in 1873 and again in 1879. From 1855 till 1858 he was a contributor to, and afterward assistant editor of, "The American Monthly Review." In 1884 he was appointed librarian of the Enoch Pratt free library, remaining there till his death. He had published "II. Will's Outlines of Chemical Analysis," translated from the 3d German edition, with Dr. Daniel Brad (Cambridge, 1855), "Cantate Domino: A Collection of Chants, Hymns, etc., for Church Service," with Henry Schwing (Boston, 1859); "Report containing a Diary kept during the Rebel Occupation of Frederick, Md., etc." (New York, 1862); and also translations from the German, with his own notes, into the English tongue.

STEINHAUER, Henry Bird, Canadian clergyman, b. in the Ramah Indian settlement, Lake Simcoe, Ontario, in 1804; d. at Whitefish Lake, Northwest territory, Canada, 29 Dec., 1885. He was a pure-blooded Chippewa Indian, and received his name of Steinhauner from a German family that adopted and educated him. He accompanied the Rev. John Evans, a Methodist missionary, to the northwest in 1840, and settled at Norway House, where he remained until 1855, and made himself useful to the missionaries as an interpreter. He assisted Mr. Evans in inventing and perfecting the Cree syllabic characters, in which nearly all books in the Indian languages are printed in the northwest. He also translated into Cree the Old Testament from the book of Job to the end of the lesser prophets, and most of the New Testament. He was ordained a minister in 1858, and lived at Whitefish Lake.

STEINHEFER, Juan (stein' hay-fer), German botanist, b. in Silesia about 1850; d. in Sonora, Mexico, in 1716. He studied medicine, entered the Society of Jesus as lay-brother, and was sent as a priest on several missions to New Spain. He accompanied the missions of Sonora, making a study of the flora of that region, which was entirely unexplored. He wrote "Florilegio Medicinal Mejicano" (Mexico, 1712; Amsterdam, 1719; and Madrid, 1732).

STEINZIT, William (stv-nits), chess-player, b. in Prague, Bohemia, 17 May, 1836. He was educated in Prague, and finished his studies at the Polytechnic institute in Vienna. He gained the first prizes at several European tournaments, notably in London in 1872 and in Vienna in 1873. At the exhibition in Vienna in 1872 he tied for the prize. Since 1862 Mr. Steinitz has won all single-handed games against other famous players. In October, 1882, he came from London to New York, remaining until April, 1883, when he returned to Europe. At the London chess-tournament in the autumn of 1883 he again came to this country, since which time the United States has been his permanent residence. From 1885 until the present time (1898) he has edited the "Chess Magazine," published in New York city. In 1876 he published in London a pamphlet entitled "The Match between Messrs. Steinitz and Blackburn." In his recent contest with Mr. Zukertort in New York city his best efforts, by contrast with the great memory and science of his opponent, displayed remarkable originality and facility of thought.

STEINWAY, Henry Engelhard (stine' way), piano-forte manufacturer, b. in Wolfshagen, Germany, 15 Feb., 1767; d. in New York city, 7 Feb., 1871. The original spelling of the name is Steinweg. After receiving a common-school education in his native place, he was first apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, then worked in an organ-factory, and thereafter to the art of piano-forte making. His earliest efforts were zithers and guitars, for his own amusement. At the age of fifteen the boy was left an orphan and thrown on his own resources. After a time Mr. Steinway began to make piano-fortes in a small way in his native place, but, being dissatisfied with the surroundings, came with his family to New York city in 1850. Here for several years father and sons were employed as journeymen in noted factories, until they resolved to unite their knowledge and experience and establish the firm of Steinway and Sons. In 1862 they gained the first prize in London in competition with the most eminent makers in Europe; and this victory was followed in 1863 by a similar success at the Universal Exposition in Paris. As a manufacturer, artist, and teacher, and other high authorities, the Steinways have done more to advance the durability, action, and tone-quality of their instruments than any other makers of Europe or America.—Henry Engelhard's son, Albert, b. in Seesen, Germany, 10 June, 1840; d. in New York city, 14 May, 1857, early in the career, was engaged to the colored staff of the 6th regiment of New York volunteers, and later became brigadier-general on the staff of Gov. John T. Hoffman.

STEINWEHR, Adolph Wilhelm August Friedrich, Baron von, soldier, b. in Blankenburg, duchy of Brunswick, Germany, 25 Sept., 1822; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 25 Feb., 1871. His father was a major in the ducal service, and his grandfather a lieutenant-general in the Prussian army. Adolph was educated at the military academy in the city of Brunswick, and entered the army of the duchy as lieutenant in 1841. In 1847 he resigned and came to the United States to offer his services to the government during the Mexican war. Failing to obtain a commission in the regular army, he received orders from the War Department in Washington to accept the rank of captain in the volunteer army.

In 1854 he again visited this country and purchased a farm near Wallingford, Conn. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a regiment, the 29th New York, which he commanded at the first battle of Bull Run, forming part of the reserve under Col. Dixon S. Miles. On 12 Oct., 1861, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers and placed at the head of the 2d brigade, Gen. Louis Blankenburg's division, which was attached in May, 1862, to the Mountain department under Gen. John C. Frémont. When Gen. Franz Sigel assumed command of the corps, after the organization of the Army of Virginia, Gen. Steinwehr was given the 2d division, and with it took part in the campaign on the Rapidan and Rappahannock in the following year. After marching into Fredericksburg, the command of the corps passed into the hands of Gen. Oliver O. Howard, and under that officer fought in the battles of Chancellorville and Gettysburg. He remained with the army until the close of the war. His home for several years before his death was in Cincinnati, Ohio, where he presided over the Eclectic Series of school geography that was widely circulated, and published "A Topographical Map of the United States" and "The Centennial Gazetteer" (Philadelphia, 1873).
STEPHENS, Adam, soldier, b. in Virginia about 1730; d. there in November, 1791. He joined the expedition to the Ohio with a company in 1754, was promoted lieutenant-colonel, and in the absence of George Washington commanded the forces at Winchester, whence he set out in 1758 with an expedition against the Creeks for the relief of the colonists of South Carolina. He had charge of the frontier defenses in Virginia in 1763, performed important services in bringing to a termination the French and Indian wars, and at the beginning of the Revolution was given the command of a regiment. He was made a brigadier-general on 4 Sept., 1778, fought at Trenton, and on 19 Feb., 1777, was promoted major-general. He led one of the attacking columns at the Brandywine. At Germantown his division became involved in a combat with the troops of Gen. Anthony Wayne, owing to a fog. He was held responsible for the blunder, accused of intoxication, and in the winter of 1777-78 dismissed from the service.

STEPHENS, Sir George, bart., Canadian capitalist, b. in Dufftown, Banffshire, Scotland, 5 Feb., 1829. After passing some time in a castle house in London, he came to Canada in 1859 and entered the warehouse of William Stephen and Co., Montreal. In a few years he obtained a junior partnership and on the death of his relative Sir William Stephen, in 1862, he purchased the latter's interest and became head of the firm. He was elected president in 1876 of the Bank of Montreal, in 1878 of the Manitoba and Minneapolis railway, and in 1881 of the Canadian Pacific railway, but resigned the latter poston Feb. 10, 1888. He was granted the confederation medal in 1868, and created a baronet in 1886. In 1891 he was raised to the peerage of Great Britain, with the title of Baron Mount Stephen. With his cousin, Sir Donald A. Smith, he founded in 1886 the Montreal scholarship of the Royal college of music, London, England.

STEPHENS, James, publicist, b. in Poole, Dorsetshire, England, in 1793; d. in Bath, England, 10 Oct., 1822. He was educated at Winchester, became a barrister, and subsequently was a parliamentary reporter. He received an appointment in the prize court in the island of St. Christopher, W. I., returned to England with an ample fortune, and obtained a large practice as advocate in prize cases before the privy council. He was returned to parliament for Taaffe, appointed under-secretary for the colonies, and made a master in chancery for his services in drawing up the system of continental blockade against Napoleon. He was connected by marriage with William Wilberforce, whose religious and anti-slavery principles he shared. Mr. Stephen was the author of a pamphlet, which Lord Brougham described as "of great merit," entitled "War in Disguise," or "War and Non-Neutrals." (London, 1805-6; New York, 1806), which elicited a reply from Governor Morris, "An Answer to War in Disguise." (London and New York, 1806). He also published "Speech of the Hon. John Randolph in H. R. U. S., on Non-Importation, with Observations." (1806); "American Arguments on Neutral Rights," etc. (1806); "Speech in the H. of C. on the Overtures of the American Government." (1809); "The History of Touissant L'Ouverture." (1814); and "The Slavery of the British West India Colonies Delineated," etc. (2 vols., 1825).
nestic affairs, under the plea of regulating its own organization. On the same principle Mr. Stephens, as senator-elect from Georgia, in 1860, was not allowed to sit. Georgia not having complied with the terms of congress. He advocated the annexation of Texas by legislative resolution as early as 1838-9, and opposed the John Tyler treaty of 1844, but, with seven other southern Whigs, secured the passage of the Martin-Brown plan of 1845. He bitterly opposed President James K. Polk on the Mexican war, but adopted all its results as a godsend of southern territory. In 1848 he had a personal encounter with Judge Cone, of Greensboro, which illustrated the physical courage for which he had been noted from youth—the courage that comes, not from principle or duty, but from after indifference to occurrences. The difficulty grew out of a quarrel on the Clayton compromise of 1848. Cone cut Stephens terribly with a knife and cried: "Now,—you, retract, or I'll cut your throat." The bleeding, almost dying Stephens said: "Never—cut!" and grasped the swiftly descending knife-blade in his right hand. That hand never again wrote plainly. Few of the witnesses of the affair, which occurred on the piazza of Thompson's hotel, Atlanta, expected him to recover. He did, however, in time to make a speech in favor of Zachary Taylor for the presidency, the campaign being drawn to the stand by the people. In 1850 Mr. Stephens opposed the secession movement at the south, and thought the admission of California as a free state a blessing, as repealing the Missouri restrictions and opening all the remaining territories north and south to slavery.

He was one of the authors of the "Georgia platform" of 1850. Its first resolve was: "That we hold the American Union in secondary importance only to the rights and principles it was designed to perpetuate." On the nominations of Franklin Pierce and Gen. Winfield Scott, at Baltimore, the lines of Whig and Democrat were drawn for the last time. Pierce approved the settlement of 1850: Scott did not. Stephens, with Charles O. Faulkner, Walker Brooke, Alexander White, James A. Garfield, Robert Toombs, James Johnson, Christopher H. Williams, and Meredith P. Gentry, killed the Whig party forever by their famous card of 3 July, 1852, giving their reasons for refusing to support Gen. Scott. Stephens wrote it. Daniel Webster was nominated without a party, but died, and Toombs and Stephens voted for him after he was dead. In 1854 Mr. Stephens defended the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act, as embodying the principle of 1850, "the people of the territories left free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions (including slavery), subject only to the constitution of the United States." In 1859 he retired from congress, and in a farewell speech in Augusta, Ga., intimated that the only way to get free slaves and settle the territories with slave-holding voters was to reopen the African slave-trade.

Mr. Stephens seemed a bundle of contradictions, but he always acted upon reasons and principles. While a state-rights man, he supported Harrison in 1840. In 1844, though in favor of the acquisition of Texas, he supported Clay, who said it would open the slave issue and make war, as it did. In 1845 he voted with the Democratic party in admitting Texas. In 1846 and 1847 he stood with Calhoun and the Whig party upon the Mexican war. His home resolutions in February, 1847, became the basis of the Whig campaign of 1848. Gen. Zachary Taylor was elected president on the same policy in 1848. In 1850 he differed with Fillmore on policy, as he had with Polk, and approved the compromise of Clay. In 1854 he was with Stephen A. Douglas, and in 1856 aided to elect James Buchanan, his extreme foe. In 1858 he resigned his seat in congress, saying: "I saw there was bound to be a smash-up on the road, and resolved to jump off at the first station." In 1860 he supported Stephen A. Douglas for the presidency against John C. Breckinridge, the professed exponent of state rights, holding that the territorial views of Mr. Douglas were his life-long principles. In 1860 he made a great Union speech, and in 1861 he was the leader of all sections of Georgia peace party, and all the three supported by speeches and letters the Linton-Stephens peace, and habeas corpus resolutions passed by the Georgia legislature in that year. In February, 1863, he was at the head of the peace commission on the part of the Confederate government in the Hampton Roads conference. After the downfall of the Confederacy he was arrested and confined for five months in Fort Warren, Boston harbor, as a prisoner of state, but in October, 1865, he was released on his own parole. On 22 Feb., 1868, he made a strong reconstruction speech and plea for the new Freedmen. He had been chosen to the senate by the legislature, but congress ignored the restoration of Georgia to the Union under the presidential proclamation of Andrew Johnson, and Mr. Stephens was not seated. On 10 April, 1866, he was called to testify before the congressional reconstruction committee. He both testified and spoke on his life-long theme. In 1867 he published the first volume of his "War between the States." In December, 1868, he was elected professor of political science and history in the University of Georgia, but declined from failing health. He was kept in the house by rheumatism nearly four years. In 1870 he completed the second volume of "The War between the States," but in a more partisan and less hopeful tone than the first volume. Later in the year he conceived the idea of a "School History of the United States," which he carried out (1870-1). He taught a law class in 1874, as a means of support, and edited and became in part proprietor of the Atlanta "Sun," which was published chiefly to defeat Horace Greeley for the presidency. The enterprise proved financially unsuccessful, and exhausted all the profits of his books. By Sept., Charles O'Connor had declined the "straight-out" nomination in Louisville, and with that died Mr. Stephens's last hope. He was defeated in his canvass for a seat in the U.S. senate in November, 1871, but in 1874 was elected to congress. He opposed the civil rights bill in a speech on 5 Jan, 1874, and the repeal of the increase of salary act. He was re-elected in 1876, and continuously served until his resignation in 1881. In the course of his career, he advocated going behind the returns and settling aside these of Florida and Louisiana, but opposed all resort to force for securing Mr. Tilden. In January, 1878, he reviewed the question in the "International Review." On the announcement that Mr. Hayes was elected he advised acquiescence. He compiled and published a collection of his writings, "The Signing of the Emancipation Proclamation," 12 Feb., brought praise from all quarters. An old admirer proposed to send his cuttings to congress after he should cease to be able to go. In 1881-2 he undertook to write a "History of the United States," which he completed and published just before his death (New York, 1883). It had neither the vigor nor the value of his "War between the States," and was a failure, carrying with it its last bonds, in which he had invested part of the proceeds of his really great life-work. He had received a bad sprain in May, 1882, on the capital steps, and at the close of the session left Washington forever. In 1882 he was elected governor of Georgia, by 60,000 majority, over Gen. Lucas J. Gartrell, a Confederate officer and lawyer. He was at that time an excellent governor. He made his last public speech at the Georgia sesquicentennial celebration in Savannah, 12 Feb., 1883. —His brother, Linton, jurist, b. in Crawfordsville, Ga., 1 July, 1835; d. in Sparta, Ga., 14 July, 1872, was left an orphan at the age of three years, but his education was cared for by friends, and he was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1843. He then studied law at the University of Virginia and at Harvard, was admitted to the bar in his native state, and, taking an active part in politics, represented the counties of Taliaferro and Hancock in the legislature for several years. In 1858 he was appointed to a vacancy in the supreme court of Georgia, and his decisions, contained in three volumes of the "Georgia Reports," are characterized by their precision and perspicuity. Judge Stephens was a delegate to the Georgia secession convention in 1881, and opposed that measure, but subsequently proposed a preamble and resolution declaring that the lack of unanimity in the convention was in regard to the proposed remedy and its application before a resort to other means of redress, and not as to alleged grievances. This was adopted, and he signed the ordinance. During the civil war he was a member of the Georgia legislature, where he introduced the peace resolutions of 1864, and vigorously denounced the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus by the Confederate congress. He also served in the army, and attained the rank of colonel. He continued his activity in politics during the reconstruction era, and the canvass of 1872 publicly spoke in favor of the selection of a purely Democratic ticket instead of adopting the candidacy of Horace Greeley.

STEVENS, Ann Sophia, author, b. in Derby, Conn., in 1815; d. in Newport, R. I., 20 Aug., 1886. Her maiden name was Winterbotham. She married Edward Stephens in 1831, and shortly after resided in Portland, Me., where she edited "Portland Magazine" in 1835, and continued to edit it till 1837. In 1836 she issued a collection of writings by natives or residents of Portland, which she entitled "The Portland Sketch-Book." Meanwhile her writings were beginning to be known, and when her husband received an appointment in the New York custom-house in 1837 she made that city her residence. She edited "The Ladies' Companion" for four years, wrote for "Graham's Magazine," and "Peterson's Magazine," and was for some time associate editor of those periodicals. She founded "The Ladies' World" in 1843 and "The Illustrated New Monthly" in 1846, and was during her life a frequent contributor to various other periodicals. She also wrote several poems, one of which, "The Polish Boy," has long been a favorite for recitation in schools. Her principal short stories were: "Mary Berwent," for which she obtained a prize of $400; "Malvia Gray," "The Patchwork Quilt," and "A Story of Western Life." In 1850 she made a tour through Europe and the East. On her return she published her first long novel, "Fashion and Famine" (New York, 1854), which is the best known, if not the best of, her stories. In France three different translations of it were published. Although Mrs. Stephens belonged to the intense school of novelists, her attention to the picturesque details and her clearness of vision enabled her to be very realistic in the transcription of natural scenes, and she never hesitated to visit hospitals, public institutions, and even dangerous resorts, in search of striking types of character. Her principal works besides those mentioned include: "Zana, or the Heiress of Clare Hall" (London, 1854; re-published as "The Heiress of Greenhurst," New York, 1857); "The Old Homestead" (1855; 2 vols., Philadelphia, 1860); "Sybil Chase" (1862); and "Alma's Plot" (1863). Mrs. Stephens also wrote a "Pictorial History of the War for the Union." A uniform edition of her writings was issued (Philadelphia, 1869; new ed., 23 vols., 1886).

STEVENS, Daniel, clergyman, b. on his father's farm, Licking Creek, Bedford co., Pa., in April, 1758; d. in Bolivar, Tenn., 21 Nov., 1830. He was graduated at Jefferson college, Conningsburg, Pa., in 1803, at the end of a two-years' course, with the highest honors, served as tutor in college for a short time, and then opened a school in Easton, Md. Although of a Baptist family, he resolved to apply for orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. After due preparation he was ordained deacon in Upper Marlborough, St. Mary's co., Md., in February, 1809, by Bishop Chaggett, and priest at the diocesan convention in Baltimore in 1810 by the same bishop. His earliest service was in Chestertown; thence he went to Centerville, Queen Anne co., where he labored for four years. Deeming a change necessary for health, he moved to Hayre de Grace, Hartford co. In 1829 he received the degree of D.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. He was then called to the church in Staunton, Va., where he remained until 1828. Soon afterward he became rector of St. Peter's church, Columbus, Tenn., and from 1833 till 1849 he was rector of St. James's church, Bolivar, Tenn. He was very active and serviceable in organizing the church in Tennessee and electing its first STEPHENS, Barret Marion, author, b. in 1829; d. in East Hampden, Me., in 1888. She appeared on the stage under the name of "Mrs. Rosalie Somers," but abandoned it in 1851 for literature. She wrote "Home Scenes and Home Sounds" (Boston, 1853) and a novel, "Hagar, the Martyr" (1854), and also edited magazines, in which many of her productions appeared.

STEPHENS, Henry Louis, caricaturist, b. in New York city, Dec. 13, 1824; in Bayonne, N. J., Dec. 1829. About 1852 he went to New York under an engagement with Frank Leslie, and after a year or so transferred his services to Harper Brothers. Mr. Stephens was a prolific artist, and accomplished a great amount of work for book and magazine illustration. He was well known as a caricaturist, excelling especially in the humorous delineation of animals and the drawing cartoons and sketches for "Vanity Fair" (1859-63), "Mrs. Grundy" (1868), "Punchinello" (1870), and other periodicals. He gave some attention also to painting in water-colors, but rarely exhibited his works.

STEPHENS, John Lloyd, traveller, b. in Shrewsbury, Massachusetts, X. J., 28 Nov., 1805; d. in New York city, 10 Oct., 1872. He was graduated at Columbia in 1822, and, after studying law at Litchfield, Conn., and New York, was called to the bar. He practised his profession during eight years in the latter city, at the same time figuring occasionally as a public speaker at meetings of the Democratic party, of which he was a warm supporter. His health becoming impaired, he undertook a extensive journey of travel in 1837, and extended his travels to some parts of Asia and Africa along the Mediterranean. He wrote a series of letters describing his journey, which appeared in Hoffman's "American Monthly Magazine." When he returned to New York in 1836 he found that these letters had been the most popular feature in the periodical. This fact induced him to publish a number of additional accounts of his travels, all of which he published "Incidents of Travel in Egypt, Arabia Petraea, and the Holy Land" (2 vols., New York, 1857). This was followed by "Incidents of Travel in Greece, Turkey, Russia, and Poland" (1829). These works achieved success in England as well as in the United States, and repeated editions of them appeared in London. In 1839 he was sent by the government of Central America; but the confederation was failing to pieces when he arrived there and he did not succeed in the object of his mission. He resolved, however, to explore the country to which he had been accredited. Accompanied by an English artist, Frederick Catherwood, he made himself familiar with the most important cities of Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras, San Salvador, and Guatemala, and was the first to give an accurate account of the antiquities of Central America. He published after his return to New York the "Incidents of Travel in Central America, Chiapas, and Yucatan" (2 vols., 1841). It contained graphic accounts of the social and political condition of Central America, but its chief title to the celebrity that it at once attained was its revelation of a new and rich field for archeological research. The illustrations, taken on the spot by Mr. Catherwood, added to the interest of the work. Stephens retired to a central America, making Yucatan the principal scene of his next investigations, which were carried on in a more thorough manner. The fruits of his labors appeared in his "Incidents of Travel in Yucatan," with 120 engravings from drawings by Frederick Catherwood (2 vols., 1843). He was elected delegate to the New York constitutional convention in 1846, and he also took an active part in organizing the first line of ocean steamships between New York and Bremen. He went to the latter city on board the "Washington" as an officer in the company and paid a visit to Baron Humboldt. In 1849 he became a member of the company that was formed for building a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama, and the rest of his life was devoted to the promotion of that enterprise. He was successively vice-president and president of the company and negotiated with the government of New Granada, and the constant and personal supervision that he gave to the work planted the seeds of the disease from which he died. A monument to him has been erected on the highest point overlooking the railroad.

STEPHENS, William, president of the colony of Georgia, b. in the Isle of Wight, England, 28 Jan., 1671; d. in Georgia in August, 1758. He was educated at Winchester school and King's college, Cambridge, and studied law, but, abandoning it for public affairs, was a member of parliament and held several important offices. About 1730 he went to South Carolina for the purpose of surveying a barony of land. He was well pleased with his reception in the colony, became intimate with Gen. James Oglethorpe, and, on the recommendation of the latter, was appointed secretary to the trustees in Georgia in 1731. His duty in this office consisted in supervising the affairs of the colony. He was made president of the county of Savannah in 1741, and of the whole province in 1743. He was elected president of the colony in 1750, and gave such evidence of mental and physical decline that he was requested to resign. He wrote "A Journal of the Proceedings in Georgia, beginning October 20, 1732," (3 vols., London, 1742). This work includes "State of the Province," which brings the narrative down to 26 Oct., 1741. The latter was also published separately (London, 1742). The work, which is exceedingly rare, especially the third volume, is believed to be of great importance in connection with the early history of Georgia. His son, Thomas, was the author of "The Castle-Builder, or the History of William Stephens, of the Isle of Wight" (2 ed., London, 1565).

STEPHENS, Mathew, statesman, b. in Berkshire, Mass., in 1823; d. after 1844. He removed to Washington county, Tenn., and engaged in farming. The constitution of Tennessee, adopted in 1796, gave the right of suffrage to all free men. Under it free colored men voted until 1844, when a convention was called and a new constitution adopted, which deprived them of the right. In that constitution the right of restricting the suffrage was boldly opposed by twenty members; thirty-eight voted for the re-

STERNE, till frequent the in the New He (Boston, New Legislation, the vital He there, to 4th Gen. STEUBEN nals 668 department paratus. elation 1883) gation the Legislation aated nopolies, the Engineer in Gotha, 1838. Representation" his mining-school the in the United States was 27, and in 1885 was the Adjutant-general of the United States Army. He was a native of Pennsylvania, and was educated at the University of Pennsylvania. He took a prominent part in the American Civil War, serving as a colonel in the 13th Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and as a major general in the Union Army. He was brevetted major general in the Regular Army for his services in the war.

STETEFELDT, Carl August, mining engineer, b. in Holzhausen, near Gotha, Germany, 28 Sept., 1838. He was educated at the gymnasium in Gotha, the University of Göttingen, and at the mining-school in Clausthal, where he was graduated in 1861. Soon afterward he came to this country, and since that time he has been engaged in the practice of his profession as a mining engineer and metallurgist. At present (1888) he devotes himself principally to consultation, and has his office in New York. He is widely known through the mining districts by his invention of the Setefelt furnace, which is extensively used in the west for the roasting of silver ores preparatory to the extraction of the metal by either amalgamation or cyaniding. Mr. Stetefeldt has been a member of the American Institute of Mining Engineers since 1881, and was its vice-president in 1882-3. Besides technical papers he has written "The Lixiviacion of Silver Ores with Hypo- sulphite Solutions." (New York, 1888).

STETSON, Charles Augustus, hotel-proprietor, b. in Newport, Mass., 17 May, 1810, d. in New York, 29 March, 1888. His father was proprietor of a hotel in Newburyport. The son adopted the same calling, and after taking charge of the Tremont house, Boston, in 1839, and Barnum's hotel, Baltimore, in 1842, became proprietor of the Astor house, New York, in 1847, and kept it till 1875, for the first twenty years of this period in partnership with Robert B. Coleman. In 1851 he was quartermaster-general of New York, and he was usually known by his military title. Gen. Stetson acquired a wide reputation as a hotel-keeper in the days when the Astor house was almost the only hotel of consequence in New York. He was intimate with many eminent men, including Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Rufus Choate, and William H. Seward. The Astor house was the scene of all the great public dinners of those times, and the regular resting-place of congressmen from the eastern states in going to and returning from Washington. During the civil war Gen. Stetson showed many acts of kindness to soldiers on their way through New York, and he was publicly thanked by Gov. John A. Andrew, of Massachusetts.

STEUBEN, Frederick William Augustus Henry Ferdinand von, known in this country as Baron Steuben, German soldier, b. in Magdeburg, Prussia, 15 Nov., 1730; d. in Steubenville, N. Y., 28 Nov., 1794. His father, a captain in the army, returned from a war in the Crimea, whither he was ordered. The boy was only ten years old when the father returned to Prussia. He was educated in the Jesuit colleges at Neisse and Breslau, and distinguished himself as a mathematician. At fourteen he served with his father in the war of 1744, and was present at the siege of Prague. At the age of seventeen he entered as an infantry regiment, and in two years was promoted to ensign, and four years afterward to lieutenant. He served in the seven years' war and was wounded in the battle of Prague. In 1754 he was made adjutant-general in the free corps of Gen. John von May, but after the death of the latter he re-entered the regular army in 1758, and took part in the siege of Kolberg. In 1762 he was made aide to Frederick the Great, and took part in the celebrated siege of Schweidnitz, which closed the military operations of the seven years' war. Resigning his post in the army, he was presented with the em- ploy of the cathedral of Halleberg on a salary of 1,200 florins, and afterward was made grand mar- shal to the Prince of Holstein, with an additional salary of 1,200 florins. Although he received brilliant offers from the king of Sardinia and em- poror of Austria to enter their service, he declined, and, with a salary of 1,178 florins, enabled him to live in elegant ease, if he felt no de- sire to re-enter military life. But in 1777, while on his way to Eng- land to visit some English noblemen, he spent some time at Paris. Meeting here Count St. Ger- main, the French minister of war, who, knowing that the American colonists lay in their ignorance of military tactics and want of discipline, endeavored to persuade him to come to this country and instruct the soldiers. But the baron declined to give up his honors and his ample income and risk everything on our desperate fortunes. The French minister, however, brought about an interview with Benjamin Franklin and Silas Deane. The manner in which the former received him offended him, and this, with other reasons, caused him to abandon the proj- ect altogether. Recalled by Germain, he at length yielded to the latter's solicitations and promises, and resolved to cast his fortunes with the struggling colonies. Embarking in a French gun-boat under the name of Frank, he set sail from Marseilles, 11 Dec., 1777, and after a stormy passage of fifty-five days, during which the forecastle took fire three times while there were 1,200 pounds of powder aboard, and a mutiny was suppressed, he arrived at Portsmouth, N. H. The entire population went out to receive him. He at once wrote to con- gress, offering his services to the colonies, saying that the motive that brought him here was to "serve a nation engaged in the noble work of fending its rights and liberties," and adding that, although he had "given up an honorable title and lucrative rank," he asked "neither riches nor hon- ors." To Washington he expressed the same sen- timents, and said he wished to serve simply as a volunteer. He immediately began his journey inland for the south. A Tory landlord, in the course of the journey, declared that Steuben had nor provisions for the party. Steuben leveled his pistol at the man's head and demanded both. They were quickly furnished, and in the morning the baron liberally rewarded his host in continen- tial money. Presenting himself to congress, he pro- posed to enter the army as a volunteer, and, if his "services were not satisfactory or the colonies failed to establish their independence, he would receive nothing." If, on the other hand, they were successful and he remained in the army, he expected "to be refunded the income he had given up, and remunerated for his services." This gen- erous offer was accepted, and he departed for Val- ley Forge, where the American army lay encamped. When the aide-de-camp of Frederick the Great reached the encampment and saw the half-starved soldiers creep out of their huts, poorly armed and only half clad, he was astonished and said, "no European army could be kept together a week in such a state." A less noble and less reso- natuure would have abandoned his enterprise at the outset. He began at once, and from that day our whole military system assumed new shape. The awkwardness of the men, at times, would throw him into terrible rage, but his kindness, care, and liberality toward the suffering soldier made him a beloved figure. In May, 1778, however, be- fore the departure of Washington, made him inspector- general of the army with the rank of major-general, and he at once entered on his duties and appointed sub-inspectors throughout the army. A thorough system of discipline and economy was established, until the whole army became a single machine in his hands. It is impossible to give in detail the great work he accomplished. It was unseen by the country in general, for it was unattended with outward display, but it can be safely said that no major-general in the field did half so much toward our success as this great organizer and disciplina- rian. The result of this discipline was seen in the next campaign, in the battle of Monmouth, when he rallied the reeling and disordered troop of Charles Lee in the left wing of the army, taking the left wing and Alexander Hamilton, who saw the steady action of the troops under Baron Steuben, said he "had never known till that day the value of discipline." In the trial of Lee that followed, the testimony of Steuben offended the former, and he made some disarranging remarks in regard to it. Steuben im- mediately challenged him, but Lee apologized, and nothing came of the matter. Steuben now wished to take command in the field as major-general, but the American officers manifested so much opposi- tion to it, on account of being outranked, that he withdrew his request and devoted himself to his old monotonous work, much of which seemed to him more befiting a drill-sergeant than a major- general. In the autumn of 1780 he published a manual for the army, furnished with diagrams to explain his rules. It was entitled "Regulations for the Order and Discipline of the Troops of the United States." Each chapter was written first in poor German, then translated into poor French, then put into good French, and lastly into good English, in which last condition it was entirely un- intelligible to Steuben. It was of great service to the purpose, became the law and guide of the army, and, even after the war, was adopted by several of the states. In this year he was selected as one of the court-martial to try Maj. John Andre. After the defeat of Gen. Horatio Gates at Camden he was sent to Virginia to aid Gen. Nathaniel Greene, then operating in North Carolina. Although he had never had a soldier to command, he had little of consequence to him, as his chief duty was to forward troops to Greene as fast as he could raise them. The result was, that when Arnold invaded Virginia he had only 150 men under him, and he was compelled to see the traitor ravage the country before his eyes; but he did everything in his power to harass him. Soon afterward Cornwallis was beaten near Yorktown, and Steuben took his place as major-general in the line. He was in the trenches when the proposition to surrender was received. Lafayette came to relieve him; but this he refused, declaring that European etiquette re- quired that the officer that received the first offers- of surrender must, out of respect to his com- mand, keep his post till the terms of capitulation were agreed upon or hostilities resumed.

After the close of the war he was sent to Canada to demand the surrender of the posts on the frontier, but, not succeeding, he returned to headquarters. He now retired to private life and resided in New York city, where he remained for several years. Congress refused to fulfill its contract with him to pay him for his services, but he was given grants of land in Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. The latter he declined to accept when he found it consisted of the confiscated estates of an old Tory who would be left destitute, and, in the kindness of his heart, interceded for him. He was given also a whole township near Utica, N. Y., and, after seven years' delay, congress at length allowed him a pension of $2,400. He now retired to this land, and, clearing off his acres, built a log house, seen in the illustration, and settled down for life, though he returned every winter to New York city. On 22 Nov., 1794, as he was making preparations for this annual visit, he was struck with paralysis, and six days afterward he died. As he had requested, he was buried near his house, with his military cloak around him and the star of honor that he always wore on his breast. Only about thirty farmers attended his funeral. Col. North, his favorite aide, to whom he left all his property, erected a simple monument over his grave, to which many visitors annually resort. Numerous anecdotes are told of him, illustrating the tenderness and generosity of his nature. These traits were especially exhibited in his eagerness to help the army at Newbern. His life has been written by Francis Bowen, in Sparks's "American Biography," and by Friedrich Kapp (New York, 1869).

STEVE's, Aaron Fletcher, congressman, b. in Derry, N. H., 9 Aug., 1819; d. in Nashua, N. H., 10 May, 1857. He was educated at Pinkerton academy, Derry, removed to Peterborough, after which he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1843, and gained a high reputation as a lawyer. He was a member of the legislature in 1843, a delegate to the Whig national convention in 1852, and a representative in the legislature again in 1854. He identified himself with the Republican party when it was first organized, and was again sent to the legislature in 1856 and the following years. He was one of the first to enroll in the civil war, and was made major of the 1st New Hampshire volunteers, subsequently appointed colonel of the 13th regiment, and brevetted brigadier-general on 8 Dec., 1864, for gallantry at Fort Harrison, where he was wounded. On his return home he was elected to congress and reelected for the following term, serving from 4 March, 1867, till 3 March, 1871. From 1870 till 1884 he was a member of the legislature, and took part in its debates.

STEVE's, Abel, author, b. in Philadelphia, 19 Jan., 1815; d. in San José, Cal., 12 Sept., 1897. He was educated at Wesleyan, and became pastor of a Methodist Episcopal church in Boston. He traveled in Europe, and on his return took charge of a church in Providence, R. I. He went to Boston in 1849, and edited "Zion's Herald" till 1852. In 1853-4 he was the editor of the "National Magazine" in New York city. In 1856, on his return from a second European journey, he was elected editor of the "Christian Advocate and Journal." He received in the same year the degree of LL. D. from Indiana university. In 1860-2 he was pastor of a church in New York city, and in 1862-5 of the one at Mamaroneck, N. Y. From 1865 till 1874 he was one of the editors of the "Methodist." Subsequently he travelled extensively in the United States and Europe, and finally settled in Geneva, Switzerland, as pastor of the Union church there, and correspondent of American newspapers. While editing church papers, he became interested in the history of Methodism, which reduced to a connected narrative in a series of works that wore the first of their kind and remain the standard authority on the subject. His publications include "An Essay on the Early History of the Methodist Episcopal Church" (1863); "Memorials of the Introduction of Methodism into the Eastern States" (2 vols., Boston, 1857-59); "Methodism in America and Cuba" (1864-5); "The Great Reform," a prize essay (1856); "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America" (4 vols., 1864-7); German translation, Cincinnati, 1867); "The Centenary of American Methodism" (1865); "The Women of Methodism: its Three Foundesses, Susanna Wesley, the Countess of Huntingdon, and Barbara Heck" (1866); "A Comprehensive History of American Methodism" (1867); "Mata's Life of the Rev. Thomas Coxe" (Boston, 1875); "The History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States" (4 vols., 1871); "Character Sketches" (1882); and "Christian Work" (1882).

STEVE's, Charles Ellis, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 July, 1853. He studied at the University of Pennsylvania and Yale, was graduated in 1875 at Berkeley divinity-school, Middle-town, Conn., spent one year in studying in Europe, and was ordained by Bishop Beekman of New York to the Protestant Episcopal church in 1877. He became rector of a church in Brooklyn, N. Y., and in 1878 secretary of an auxiliary of the board of missions of his denomination. For several years he was associate editor of the "Living Church." The degree of Ph. D. was given to him by Wooster university. He became an examining chaplain of the diocese of Long Island in 1886, and in 1887 was made archdeacon of Brooklyn. He is a member of the Royal geographical society of London and of the Society of antiquaries of Edinburgh, among other learned societies, and in 1888 received the degree of D. D. from Wooster university, and that of D. C. L. from King's college, Nova Scotia. Dr. Stevens has published occasional pamphlets and frequent articles in the press, also "Sources of the Constitution of the United States considered in Relation to Colonial and English History" (New York, 1894).

STEVE's, Ebenezer, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 22 Aug., 1751; d. in Rockaway, L. I., 22 Sept., 1823. He was a member of the artillery company of the British army which was defeated in the battle of Bunker Hill in June, 1775. Afterward he served as an artillery officer in the Continental army, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 8 May, 1776.
dition against Quebec. He joined Henry Knox's regiment of artillery, was made a captain on 11 Jan., 1776, and on 5 Nov. received the brevet of major. He commanded the artillery at Ticonderoga and Stillwater, and on 30 April, 1778, was made lieutenant-colonel of John Lamb's regiment. He served under Lafayette in Virginia, and for a part of the time under Lord Cornwallis during the siege of Yorktown. After the Revolution he became an eminent merchant of New York City. He was major-general of the state militia, and, with Morgan Lewis, master'd for active service against the British the militia of the city in September, 1781.

-His son, Alexander Haldson, surgeon, b. in New York city, 4 Sept., 1789; d. there, 30 March, 1837, was graduated at Yale in 1817, studied in the office of Dr. Edward Miller, attended medical lectures in the College of physicians and surgeons and at the University of Pennsylvania, and was graduated M.D. by the latter institution in 1811. His thesis on "The Proximate Causes of Inflammation" was praised by medical men. He took passage for France with the object of pursuing a surgical career, being invited by an English cruiser and taken into Plymouth, he went to London and received the instructions of Dr. John Abernethy and Sir Astley Cooper for a year, and then studied for a year longer under Alexis Bover and Baron Larrey in Paris. On his return to the United States he was appointed a surgeon in the army. Establishing himself in New York City, he was selected professor of surgery in 1818, and in the following year resigned his active duties in this institution and in the college, and thenceforth acted mainly as a consulting surgeon, both in public and private practice. He was appointed consulting surgeon to the New York hospital and emeritus professor in the College of physicians and surgeons, of which he was made president in 1841. He was president of the American medical association in 1849. In 1849 he received from the New York state university the degree of LL.D. He retired from the presidency of the college faculty in 1855. Besides his contributions to medical periodicals, he published "Inflammation of the Eye" (Philadelphia, 1811); "Cases of Fungus Haematoles of the Eye" (New York, 1818); with John Watts, Jr., and Valentine Mott, "Medical and Surgical Register, consisting chiefly of Cases in the New York Hospital" (1818); an edition of Astley Cooper's "First Lines of Surgery" (1822); "Clinical Lecture in Injuries" (1837); "Lectures on Lithotomy" (1838); "Address to Graduates" (1847); and "Plan of Humanity in behalf of Medical Education," an address before the New York state medical association (1849).-Another son, John Austin, banker, b. in New York city, 22 Jan., 1795; d. there, 19 Oct., 1874, was graduated at Yale in 1813, entered mercantile life, and became a partner in his father's business in 1818. He was for many years secretary of the New York chamber of commerce, and one of the organization committee of the Metropolitan Exchange. From its first establishment in 1819 till 1849 he was president of the Bank of Commerce. He was a Whig in politics, but an earnest advocate of low tariffs. He was chairman of the committee of bankers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia which first met in August, 1861, and decided to take $50,000,000 of the government 7-30 loan. They subsequently advanced $100,000,000 more, and the terms of the transactions were arranged chiefly by Mr. Stevens, as the head of the treasury and moderator. His advice was frequently sought by the officers of the treasury department during the civil war. He was many years governor of the New York hospital, and took an interest in other benevolent institutions. -John Austin's son, John Austin, author, b. in New York city, 21 Jan., 1827, was graduated at Harvard in 1846, became a merchant in New York, and in 1862 was chosen secretary of the New York chamber of commerce, holding the office for six years. He has been librarian of the New York historical society, and has devoted himself to the investigation of topics of American history. He founded, and for many years edited, the "Magazine of American History." His publications include "The Valley of the Rio Grande; its Topography and Resources" (New York, 1841); "Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce on Ocean Navigation" (1854); "Colonial Records of the New York Chamber of Commerce" (1867), containing illustrations and biographical and historical sketches; "The Progress of New York in a Century" (1876); "The Expedition of Lafayette against Arnold; published by the Maryland historical society (Baltimore, 1878); and "Albert Gallatin in the American Statesman" (1883). He contributed the historical chapters to the "History of Newport County" (Boston, 1888).

STEVENS, Edward, soldier, b. in Culpeper county, Va., in 1745; d. there, 17 Aug., 1820. He commanded a battalion of militia at the battle of Great Bridge, 9 Dec., 1775, and in 1776 was appointed colonel of the 10th Virginia regiment. Joining Washington's army in New Jersey in 1777, he checked the attack of Gen. William Howe's forces at the battle of the Brandywine, and, by holding the road till nightfall, prevented a serious disaster. He served with credit at Germantown, and was made a brigadier-general. On 14 Aug., 1780, he joined the army of Gen. Horatio Gates with 700 Virginia militia, and urged him to encircle Lord Cornwallis' force near Camden. It was claimed that it was too late to retreat, or mistrusting the report of Lord Cornwallis. His brigade began the attack, but, being unfamiliar with the use of the bayonet, they gave way when the enemy charged. At Guilford Court-House they resisted the British attack with steadiness, although finally forced back. Gen. Stevens, who was severely wounded, received the praise of Gen. Nathanael Greene for his conduct in this action. He also served with credit at the siege of Yorktown. From the adoption of the state constitution till 1790 he sat in the Virginia senate.

STEVENS, George Barker, educator, b. in Spencer, Tioga co., N. Y., 13 July, 1854. He was educated at Cornell and Rochester, and was graduated at the latter university in 1874. At the expiration of a year at Rochester theological seminary, he entered the divinity-school at Yale, where he was graduated in 1880. He was pastor of a Congregational church, in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1880-2, and in December, 1882, assumed the charge of a Presbyterian church at Watertown, N. Y. In 1883, after examination on a two years' course in philosophy, he received the degree of Ph. D. from Cornell University. In 1885-6 he studied theology in the universities of Berlin and Leipzig, and in 1886 received the degree of D. D. from Jena. On his return to the United States he was appointed professor of New Testament exegesis and interpretation at Yale. He has contributed theological and philosophical articles to religious magazines, and edited the "Homilies of Chrysostom on the Acts and Romains" for Dr. Philip Schaff's edition of "Post-Nicean Church Fathers."

STEVENS, Isaac Ingalls, soldier, b. in Andover, Mass., 28 March, 1818; d. near Chantilly, Fairfax co., Va., 10 Sept., 1862. He was graduated at the Military Academy in 1829, ranking first in his class, and was commissioned a 2d lieutenant of engineers. He was promoted 1st lieutenant on 1 July, 1840, and served as assistant of the corps of engineers during the war with Mexico, being engaged at the siege of Vera Cruz and at several desultory actions near Churubusco, where he gained the brevet of captain. He was placed at Chapultepec, mayor, at Molino del Rey, and at the battle of Puebla, on the coast of Mexico, where he was severely wounded. He superintended fortifications on the New England coast in 1841–5 and in 1848–9, and had charge of the coast-survey office in Washington, D. C., from 11 Sept., 1849, till 17 March, 1853, when he resigned, having been appointed governor of Washington territory. He was at the same time placed in charge of the exploration of the northern route for a Pacific railroad. In 1853, at the head of a large exploring party, he surveyed a route between St. Paul, Minn., and Puget sound, and established the navigability of the upper Missouri and Columbia rivers for steamers. He was superintendent of Indian affairs by virtue of his office of governor, and in 1854-5 he made treaties with the Indians of the territory by which they relinquished their titles to more than 100,000 square miles of land. He also crossed the Rocky mountains to conclude a treaty, in October, 1855, of friendship with the Blackfeet Indians, at the same time interfering successfully to make peace between them and the hunting tribes of Washington and Oregon. While he was absent on this expedition the disaffected Indians of Washington territory rose against the whites. He returned before January, 1856, called out 1,000 volunteers, and conducted a campaign against the revolting Indians that was so vigorous and successful that before the close of 1856 they were subdued and their chiefs slain. White sympathizers with the Indians were driven from their homes and confined in the towns, and when Chief-Justice Edward Lander issued a writ of habeas corpus for their release, Gov. Stevens declared two counties under martial law, and on 7 May, 1856, caused Judge Lander to be arrested in his court-room, and held him a prisoner till the close of the war. He resigned in August, 1857, and un- der his direction 18 volunteers, serving for two successive terms, served from 1 Dec., 1857, till 3 March, 1861. In Congress he vindicated his course in the Indian war, and saw his treaties confirmed, and the scrip that he had issued to pay the volunteers assumed by the government. In the presidential canvass of 1860 he acted as chairman of the executive committee of the Breckinridge wing of the Democratic party. But when the leaders of his party afterward declared for secession, he publicly denounced them, and urged President Buchanan to remove John B. Floyd and Jacob Thompson from his cabinet. At the intelligence of the breach with the British, he hastened from the Pacific coast to Washington, and was appointed colonel of the 79th regiment of New York volunteers, known as the Highlanders. The regiment had lost heavily at Bull Run, and expected to be sent home to recruit. Dis appointment at being kept in the field and commanded by regular army officers caused eight companies of the regiment, with the courage and wisdom with which he restored discipline won the respect of the men, who, by their own desire, were transferred to his brigade when he was commissioned as brigadier-general on 28 Sept., 1861, and took part in the Port Royal expedition. He attacked the Confederate batteries on the Ce-sar in January, 1862, and captured them with the cooperation of the navy. In the expedition gaged in actions on Stono river, and commanded the main column in an unsuccessful assault on the enemy's position near Seesville. After the retreat of Gen. George B. McClellan from his position before Richmond, Gen. Stevens was ordered to Virginia. He commanded a division at Newport News, and made a major-general on 10 Aug., 1862, serving under Gen. B. F. Butler in the campaign in northern Virginia. He was engaged in skirmishes on the Rappahannock, distinguished himself at Manassas, and while leading his division at the battle of Chantilly was killed with the colors of the 93rd regiment in his hand. He published "Campaigns of the Rio Grande and Mexico," with Notices of Recent Work of Mexico; and "Report of Explorations for a Route for the Pacific Railroad near the 47th and 49th Parallels of North Latitude, from St. Paul, Minn., to Puget Sound," which was printed by order of Congress, 1859–60. STEVENS, James Gray, Canadian jurist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 25 Feb., 1822. His father, Andrew Stevens, was a prominent physician. Another, Grace Buchanan, daughter of Sir Colin Campbell, of Auchinbreck, was an author. He was educated at Edinburgh University, came to New Brunswick in 1849, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1850, and practised his profession at St. Stephen's, N. B. He was a member of the New Brunswick assembly in 1860–5, was created a queen's counsellor in February, 1867, the same year was appointed judge of four counties, and in 1873 was a delegate from New Brunswick to the convention in Montreal, which resulted in the union of the various Presbyterian bodies in Canada. He has been president of St. Croix agricultural society thirty years. He is the author of "An Analytical Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Courts of New Brunswick from 1825 to 1878, inclusive" (St. John, 1873); a further digest of the same reports from 1873 to 1885 (Toronto, 1887); "Index to the Statutes, Rules, Orders, Regulations, Treaties, and Proclamations of the Dominion of Canada" (St. Stephen's, 1876); and "Indubitable Offences and Summary Convictions" (Toronto, 1877). STEVENS, John, member of the Continental congress, born in New York city about 1708; d. in May, 1782. He was the son of John, who came from England in 1699 at about the age of seventeen, studied and practised law, and became a large land-owner. The son settled in New Jersey, and was one of the joint commissioners for defining the boundary-line between New York and that colony in November, 1771. Resigning as a royalist commissioner in June, 1776, he was, from 21 Aug., 1776, till 1782, vice-president of the council of New Jersey, presiding over the joint meetings of the two branches of the legislature. He was elected to the Federal congress in November, 1788, and on 18 and 20, 1787, he presided over the convention that ratified the United States constitution.

His son, John, engineer, b. in New York city in 1748 or 1749, d. at Hoboken, N. J., 6 March, 1838, was graduated at King's (now Columbia) college in 1768, and was admitted to the bar, but practised little. During the Revolutionary war he held several offices, among which was that of treasurer of New Jersey in 1776-9, and at this date, he married and resided in winter on Broadway, New York—and in summer on the island of Hoboken, which he then owned. His life was devoted to experiments at his own cost for the common good. In 1790 he petitioned congress for protection to American inventors, and his petition was referred to a committee, which reported a bill that became the law of 10 April, 1790, the foundation of the American patent law. He had begun the application of steam in 1788, and now continued them, having as his associates Nicholas I. Roosevelt and the elder Brunel, who afterward built the Thames tunnel. Toward the close of the century he was engaged with his brother-in-law, Robert R. Livingston, and Roosevelt, in building a steamboat to navigate Hudson river, the legislature of the state of New-York having previously offered a monopoly of exclusive privilege to the owners of a boat that, complying with given conditions, should attain a speed of three miles an hour; but their boat failed to achieve the required speed, and their joint proceedings were interrupted by the appointment of Livingston and Fulton by Fitz-James, D. in 1804. In Paris, Livingston met Robert Fulton, and afterward was associated with him in establishing steam navigation. Stevens persevered, and in 1804 built a vessel propelled by twin screws that navigated the Hudson. The boiler was tubular, and the screw was the short four-threaded screw that is now used. That it was a helix, his letter of 1804 to Dr. Robert Hare, of Philadelphia, shows. This was the first application of steam to the screw-propeller. The engine and boiler of this steamboat were in the Stevens institute at Hoboken, N. J., Mr. Stevens always upheld the efficiency of the screw and the screw advantages for ocean navigation. Shortly after his death his sons placed the engine and boiler referred to in a boat, which was tried before a committee of the American institute of New York, and attained a speed of about nine miles an hour.

It is remarkable that after 1804 no serious attempt was made for the improvement of the screw until 1837, when it was brought into use simultaneously in England and the United States. Still more remarkable is the fact that its introduction into use in England was by the Archimedean screw of a single thread, and in America by a multi-threaded screw on the outer surface of a cylinder; that the first was completely modified in the course of five or six years into the short four-threaded screw that was used by Stevens in 1804, and that in about ten years the multi-threaded screw was also replaced by the screw of 1804. In 1807, assisted by his son Robert, he proposed a paddle-wheel steamboat "Phoenix" that plied for six years on the Delaware. Prof. James Renwick, who from his own observation has left the best description extant of Fulton's boat, the " Clermont," as she ran in the autumn of 1807, says that "the Stevenses were but a few days later in moving a boat with the required velocity," and that "being shut out of the waters of New York by the monopoly of Livingston and Fulton, Stevens conceived the bold design of conveying his boat to the Delaware by sea, and this boat, which was so near repaying the honor of first success, was the first to navigate the ocean by the power of steam."

Fulton had the advantage of a steam-engine that was made by James Watt, while his predecessors were provided only with inferior apparatus of the work of common blacksmiths and millwrights. The piston-rod of the "Phoenix" was guided by slides instead of the parallel motion of Watt, and the cylinder rested on the condenser. Stevens also surrounded the water-wheel by a guard-beam. Among the patents that were taken out by Stevens was one in 1791 for generating steam; two in the same year described as improvements in the bellows and on Thomas Savary's engine, both designed for pumping; the multi-tubular boiler in 1803, which was patented in England in 1805 in the name of his eldest son, John C.; one in 1816 for using slides: an improvement in rack railroads in 1824; and one in 1824 to render shallow rivers more navigable. In 1822 he made the first experiments with artillery against iron armor. He then proposed a circular vessel, to be rotated by steam to train the guns for the defence of New York harbor. On 11 Oct., 1811, he established the first steam-ferry in the world with the "Juliana," which plied between New York city and Hoboken. In 1813 he invented and built a ferry-boat made of two separate boats, with a paddle-wheel between them which he finally abandoned. The simplicity of its construction and its economy, this description of horse-boat continued long in use both on the East river and on the Hudson. In February, 1812, shortly before the war with England and five years before the beginning of the Erie canal, Stevens addressed a memoir to the commission appointed to devise water-comminication, urging instead of a canal the immediate construction of a railroad. This memoir, with the adverse report of the commissioners, among whom were De Witt Clinton, Governor Morris, and Chancellor Livingston, was published at the time, and again, with a preface, by Charles King, president of Columbia, in 1852, and by the "Railroad magazine." Between the seaboard and the lakes and arguments contrast strongly with the answer of the commissioners on the impracticability of a railroad. At the date of the memoir, although short railroads for carrying coal had been in use in England for upward of 200 years, there was not a locomotive or passenger-car in use in the world. Stevens's plan was for a passenger and freight railroad for general traffic from Albany to Lake Erie having a double track, made with wooden stringers capped with wrought-plate rails resting on piles and operated by locomotives. He enumerates comprehensively the advantages of a general railroad system, naming many details that were afterward found necessary, putting the probable future speed at from twenty to thirty miles an hour, or possibly at from forty to fifty. He gives a definite plan and detailed estimates of the construction and cost. His plan is identical with that of the successful South Carolina railroad built in 1830-32, the first long railroad in the United States, which has been described as "a continuous and prolonged bridge." The accuracy of his estimates was proved by the cost of this road. Stevens in 1834 applied to the state of New Jersey for a railroad charter from New York to Philadelphia. He received the charter in February, 1835, and located the road, but proceeded no further. In 1836, with Horace Binney and Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, he obtained from the state of Pennsylvania a charter for a railroad from Philadelphia to Lancaster, on the site of the present Pennsylvania railroad. These two were the first railroad charters that were granted in this country. On 23 Oct., 1834, he obtained a patent for the construction of rail roads. In 1836, at the age of seventy-eight, to show the operation of the locomotive on the railroad, he built at Hoboken a circular railway having a gauge of five feet and a diameter of 220 feet, and placed on it a locomotive with a multi-tubular boiler which carried about half a dozen people at a rate of over twelve miles an hour. This was the first locomotive ever run on a railroad in America. Col. Stevens was an excellent classical scholar, and not only a close student of natural philosophy, but fond of metaphysical speculations, leaving several philosophical treatises, which have never been published. He was through life an enthusiastic botanist and amateur gardener, importing and cultivating many new plants.

The accompanying engraving represents Castle Point, Mr. Stevens' residence in Hoboken, N. J., which in 1835 was replaced by the present more spacious mansion.—The second son, John Cox, b. 24 Sept., 1785; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 13 June, 1857, was graduated at Columbia in 1806, and married Maria C. Livingston on 27 Dec., 1809. In the early part of his life he resided on his estate at Anthonyville, on the Livingston manor, and later in New York city. He was from his youth a devoted yachtsman. He organized the New York yacht club, was its first commodore, and commanded the "America" in the memorable race in 1851.—Another son, Robert Livingston, b. 18 Oct., 1827; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 29 April, 1836, having a strong engineering bias, began to assist his father when only seventeen years old. He took the "Phoenix" to Philadelphia by sea in June, 1836. At the death of Fulton the speed of steamboats on the Hudson was under seven miles an hour, and at about that date Robert L. Stevens built the "Philadelphia," which had a speed of eight miles. He built many steamboats, increasing the speed of each successive one up to 1832, when the "North America" attained fifteen miles. From 1815 until 1840 he stood at the head of his profession in the United States as a constructor of steam vessels and their machinery, making important improvements, which were generally adopted. In 1821 he originated the present form of ferry-boat and ferry-slips, making his boats with guards encircling them throughout, and constructing the ferry-slips with spring piling and spring fenders. In adopting the overhead working-beam of Watt to navigation, he made important improvements, inventing and applying, in 1818, the cabin-board cut-off, and in 1824 the gallow-frame that is now used for the column that supported the working-beam, and making that beam of wrought-iron strap with a cast-iron center, instead of purely of cast-iron. This he improved in 1829 into the shape that is now universally used. He lengthened the proportionate stroke of the piston, and invented the split working-beam, a working-beam and a new valve, which was a modification of the Comish double-beat valve, and is now always used on the beam-engine. He placed the boilers on the wheel-guards and over the water, improved the details in every part, and finally left the American working-beam for walking-beam engine in its present form. At the same time he strengthened the boiler, beginning with a strengthening of the side plates, increasing the strength of the boilers, so that fifty pounds could be safely carried. He made the first marine tubular boiler in 1831, and was among the first to use anthracite coal. In the hulls of his vessels he gradually increased the amount of iron fastening until it was finally more than quadrupled, increasing the strength of vessel while diminishing their weight. He reduced the vibration of the hull by the masts and rods that are now used, and added greatly to their strength by his overhead truss-frame. On the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester railway in 1830, he went to England, where he had made, from a model he brought over, the rails and from a model he was building for his brother Edwin, A., in New Jersey. This rail is the well-known T-pattern, used in this country and in large part of Europe, which is fastened by spikes without the intervention of chairs, which are required by the form of rail that is still used in England. He also then ordered from the Stephenson the locomotive called the "John Bull," the prototype of those that are made in this country, which is now preserved at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington. Toward the close of the last war with England Robert was engaged in making a bomb that could be fired from a cannon instead of from a mortar, and that could thus be applied to naval warfare. In connection therewith he made many experiments on the Hudson river, for which he obtained from the government the loan of heavy ordnance, and finally he succeeded in producing a successful percussion-shell. President Madison then appointed a board to test this shell in the harbor of New York, both against solid targets of wooden beams and against an actual section of a ship of the line, built for the purpose, each being demolished by a single shell. The government then adopted the shell, purchasing a large quantity, together with the secret of its construction. In 1814 Edwin, under the direction of his father, had experimented with shot against included iron-plating, and in 1841, when, on account of the U.S. boundary disputes with England, public attention was directed to naval defence, he made a series of experiments, which he and his brothers had before the government. President Tyler appointed a commission of officers of the army and navy to superintend, at Sandy Hook, the experiments of the brothers on the application of iron to war-vessels as a protection against shot, and many tried iron ships, ranging from sixteen to eighteen inches thick and a half feet thick, resulted effectively the force of a sixty-four pound shot fired at thirty yards with battering charges. Thereupon an act was passed, 14 April, 1842, authorizing the secretary of the navy to contract with Robert L. Stevens for an iron-clad steam vessel. Stevens immediately began to excavate a dry dock for his vessel, which he had finished within a year, and also had his vessel planned, and began its construction; but the contract was changed in the latter part of 1843, when Com. Robert F. Stockton constructed a wrought-iron cannon having a bore of ten inches and throwing a round shot that pierced a four-and-a-half-inch target. At each subsequent and important increase of the thickness of the gunwale either at the bow or stern, the increased thickness of armor necessary for defence required increased tonnage in the vessel that Stevens had contracted to build, causing interminable interruption and consequent delay. This vessel, which was known as the Stevens battery, lay in its basin at Hoboken for many years, and was never launched. It was the first iron-clad ever projected, preceding by many years the small iron-clad vessels used by the French at Kinsbruck in 1854.—Another son, James Alexander, b. in New York city, 29 Jan., 1790; d. in Hoboken, N. J., 7 Oct., 1873, graduated at Columbia in 1808, and admitted to the bar in New York city in 1811. In connection with Thomas Gibbons, he established the Union steamboat line between New York and Philadelphia, which led to the suit of Ogden vs. Gibbons, memorable for the decision that placed all the navigable waters of the United States under the jurisdiction of the general government.—Another son, Edwin Augustus, b. in Hoboken, N. J., 28 July, 1795; d. in Paris, France, 8 Aug., 1868, after assisting his brother Robert, in 1826 took charge of the iron-plating in 1841 and was shortly after made a member of the Cambridge and Auburn bridge charter for which the two brothers obtained from the state of New Jersey in 1839. They worked the project so vigorously that the road was opened for traffic on 9 Oct., 1832, the elder brother being president and the younger treasurer and manager. In the next twenty years the railroad system of the United States, stretching from New England, was formed, and in aiding this development the two brothers were conspicuous, inventing and introducing many appliances on the road, locomotives, and cars. The germ of many improvements afterward perfected on other roads can be traced back to the Camden and Amboy. Of this the vestibule car is a modern instance. The brothers, while engaged in railroad affairs, still retained their great interests in navigation, and made many improvements in it. In 1837 the elder brother applied for a force draught to the "North America," and its use immediately became general, while in 1842 the younger patented the air-tight fire-room for this force draught, and applied it on many vessels. This double invention of the two brothers is now used in all the great navies of the world. Both the brothers spent a great part of their lives in devising and effecting improvements in the means of attack and defence in naval warfare. Robert had bequeathed the Stevens battery to his brother, and Edwin, at the beginning of the civil war, presented to the government a plan for completing the vessel, together with a small vessel, called the "Naugatuck," to demonstrate the practicability of his plans. This small vessel was accepted by the government, and was one of the fleet that attacked the forts at Meramac. She was a twin screw vessel, capable of being immersed three feet below her load-line, so as to be nearly invisible, of being raised again in eight minutes by pumping out the immersing weight of water, and of turning end for end on her centre in one minute and a quarter. The government refused to appropriate the money on the plans that were proposed by Mr. Stevens, and at his death he left the vessel to the state of New Jersey, together with $1,000,000 for its completion. He founded the Stevens institute (see illustration), bequeathing to it and to the high-school a large plot of ground in Hoboken, and $150,000 for the building and $500,000 for endowment.—His widow, Martha BAYARD, has devoted $800,000 to religious and charitable institutions, among which may be mentioned the erection of the Church of the Holy Innocents at Hoboken. STEVENS, John, clergyman, b. in Townsend, Mass., 6 June, 1788; d. in Granville, Ohio, 30 April, 1857. He was graduated at Middlebury college, Vt., in 1812, and studied at Andover theological seminary. In 1825 he became classical tutor in Middlebury college, where he remained for three years. Removing to Ohio, he served for seven years as editor of the "Baptist Weekly Journal." In 1838 he was made professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Granville college (now Denison university), performing at the same time the main duties of president. From 1843 till 1859 he was employed as district secretary of the American Baptist missionary union. In the last-named year he resumed a professorship in Granville college, and continued in this relation until 1875, when he resigned the chair and made emeritus professor. He received in 1875 the degree of D. D. from the University of Rochester. STEVENS, Paul, Canadian author, b. in Belgium in 1839; d. in Coteau du Lue, Canada, in 1882. He emigrated to Canada, became editor of "La patrie" in Montreal, and was afterward professor of literature in the College of Chamby. He returned to Montreal in 1860, and was for some time editor of "L'Artiste." He then became a tutor in the De Beaucer family at Coteau du Lue, where he remained till his death. He published "Fables" (Montreal, 1867). This work gained him the title of the "Lafontaine of Canada," and he is the only Canadian that has distinguished himself in this species of composition. He also wrote "Contes populaires." (Montreal, 1870). STEVENS, Phineas, soldier, b. in Sudbury, Mass., 29 Feb. 1707; d. in Chignecto, Nova Scotia, 6 Feb., 1756. He was a descendant of Thomas Stevens, of London, England, a supporter and friend of the Massachusetts colony, whose father, Thomas Stevens, of Devonshire, was one of the signers of Sir Walter Raleigh's patent of Virginia. He removed with his parents to Rutland, Mass., about 1714, and when sixteen years old was carried as a captive to St. Francis by Indians, among whom he learned the savage mode of warfare. During King George's war he was lieutenant of Fort No. 4, which was erected at the farthest settlement on Connecticut river, now Charleston, X. H. When it was attacked in May, 1746, he routed the Indians in a bold sally, and on 19 June he defeated them in the open field. The fort was blockaded during the summer by French and Indians, who attempted to carry it by assault in August. In March, 1747, Capt. Stevens, who had evacuated the fort in the winter, resumed possession with thirty men, and in April they sustained an attack of 400 Frenchmen and savages. He held the fort till the close of the war. In 1749 he was sent to Canada by Gov. William Shirley to negotiate an exchange of prisoners. He went again in 1752 to treat for an exchange of prisoners, and was twice more sent back from activity among the Indians. After the renewal of hostilities he took part in Col. Robert Monckton's expedition against the French settlements in Nova Scotia, and died on the march to Beau Sejour. The journal of his trip to Canada in 1749 is printed in the "New Hampshire Historical Collections."—His son, Simon, settler, b. in Rutland, Mass., 1732; d. in Charlton, Mass. X. H., lieut.-tenant of Capt. John Stark's company in the expedition against Ticonderoga in 1758, was taken prisoner, and in May, 1759, escaped from Quebec, sailed down St. Lawrence river in a captured schooner, and reached a British post after many adventures, which are recounted in his unpublished journal. During the Revolution he served as a loyal volunteer in the British army.—Another son, Enos, loyalist, b. in Rutland, Mass., 13 Oct., 1739; d. in Barnet, Vt., in 1808, was carried off by the St. Francis Indians from Charleston when ten years old, and held in captivity three months. He was a volunteer in the royal army on Long Island, and was engaged in foraging in privateers along the coast, and in the Revolution. He joined the emigrant refugees who went to Nova Scotia. After several years he returned to Charleston, X. H. He subsequently settled at Barnet, Vt. He kept a journal of the events in which he participated from 1777 till 1783.—Enos's son, Henry, antiquary, b. in Barnet, Vt., 13 Dec., 1791; d. there, 20 July, 1867, was educated at Peckham academy, Vt., and early began to collect manuscripts, tracts, newspapers, and printed volumes relating to American history, especially that of Vermont. He was the founder and first president of the Vermont historical society. The most valuable part of his collection was placed for safe-keeping in the state-house at Montpelier, where in 1867 it was burned. He was a member of the legislature for two terms.—Henry's son, Enos, inventor, b. in Barnet, Vt., 22 Jan., 1816; d. there, 31 Jan., 1877, was graduated at Middlebury college in 1838, and taught for the next seven years in Paradise, Pa. He assisted Dr. Samuel G. Howe in investigating the condition of the idiots of Massachusetts in 1847-8, and then returned to Barnet and engaged in agriculture and engineering. He invented a system of musical notation, apparatus for automatically recording atmospheric changes, an instrument for phrenological measurements, a legislative teller that was put in use by congress in 1858, and other intricate machines, originated an astronomical theory of weather indications, and published pamphlets on astronomy, music, and phrenology, and many papers on agricultural topics.—Another son, Henry, bibliographer, b. in Barnet, Vt., 24 Aug., 1819; d. in South Hampstead, England, 28 Feb., 1886. His early education was received at the school of his native village. He was afterwards for a time at Middlebury college. He engaged in teaching at intervals, and also held a clerkship in the treasury department at Washington. In 1841 he entered Yale, where he was graduated in 1845, and then studied law a short time at Cambridge. Meanwhile he became much interested in his father's work, and devoted his attention to early colonial history and the historical relations between the states and England. Through his acquaintance with collectors of historical and genealogical books and manuscripts, and with an increasing knowledge of their wants, under their encouragement and support, he visited London in search of Americana in 1845, and remained there forty years until his death. During his long residence, frequently making visits to the United States for the acquisition of the principal books of the period, and, to use his own expression, "drifted" one day into the British museum and presented to Sir Anthony Panizzi his letter of introduction from Jared Sparks. His coming was most opportune, for the authorities had just discovered that the museum was deficient in modern American books. The assistance of Mr. Stevens was immediately secured in supplying the deficiency, and from that time until his death he was their trusted agent for procuring North and South American books of all kinds, including state and national laws, journals and documents. As a result, the library of the British museum contains a larger collection of American books than any single American library. At the same time he was supplying many American public and private libraries with the rarest of Americana. Many books supplied by him at moderate prices are now worth fifty times the amount that was paid him for them. He soon became an experienced bibliographer, giving special attention to the early editions of the English Bible, and to early voyages and travels, especially those relating to the South Seas, and became one of the highest authorities. John Carter Brown was one of his early correspondents, and he may be said to have formed the Lenox library, as he was James Lenox's agent to collect the rarest book treasures. He was an indefatigable bibliographer and a generous correspondent. He was constantly putting forth bibliographical brochures, and his catalogues are highly prized for their minute accuracy and valuable notes, as well as for peculiar excellence of typography. He never forgot the state in which he was born, but frequently signed himself Henry Stevens of Vermont, or wrote after his name the initials G. M. B., "Green Mountain Boy." He was a genial friend, full of quaint sayings and good-humor. In 1852 he was made a fellow of the Society of antiquaries. In 1857 he was a member of the committee for promoting the Caxton exhibition, and catalogued the exhibit of Bibles. The same year he became a member of the Librarian's association and took an active part in all its meetings. He formed a large collection of documents relating to Benjamin Franklin, which he freely allowed to be copied by proper authorities. He wrote extensively on bibliographical subjects, and left several unpublished essays, among which were investigations respecting Columbus and a supplement to Louis Fagan's "Life of Panmizzi," containing anecdotes relating to the British museum. Among his publications are "Catalogue of My English Library" (London, 1855); "Catalogue of a Library of Works relating to America" (1854); "Catalogue of Raisonne of English Books" (1854); "American Bibliographer" (Chiswick, 1854); "Catalogue of American Books in the Library of the British Museum" (London, 1857); "Analytical Index to Colonial Documents of New Jersey in the State Paper Office of England" (New York, 1858); "Catalogue of American Maps in the British Museum" (London, 1859); "Catalogue of Canadian Books in the British Museum" (1859); "Catalogue of Mexican and other Spanish-American and Western Indian Books in the British Museum" (1859); "Bibliotheca Americana" (1861); "Historical Nuggets" (1862); "The Humboldt Library" (1863); "Historical and Geographical Notes on the Earliest Discoveries in America" (New Haven, 1869); "Bibliotheca historica" (Boston, 1870); "Schedule of 2000 American Historical Nuggets" (London, 1870); "Bibliotheca Americana et Historica" (part l, London, 1872); "American Books with Tails to "Em"" (1873); "Bibles in the Caxton Exhibition" (1878); "History of the Oxford Caxton Memorial Bible" (1878); "Photo-Bibliography" (1878); "Historical Collections (2 vols., 1881-6); "Who Tells our New English Books?" (1885); and "Recollections of James J. F. Cabot" (1896). He also held important positions relating to American history, the latest being "The Dawn of British Trade to the East Indies" (London, 1886). Another son, Benjamin Franklin, bibliographer, b. in Barnet, Vt., 19 Feb., 1833, entered Middlebury college, but on account of feeble health did not finish his course. He went to London to join his brother Henry in 1860, engaged in the book-selling business with him, married a daughter of the printer Whittingham, and after the death of his father-in-law had charge of the Chiswick press. He is U.S. despatch agent in London, is a purchasing agent there for American libraries, and sends English publications to the United States. Mr. Stevens has edited and published "The Campaign in Virginia in 1861," containing documents relating to the war, and "The Papers of Henry Clinton and Lord Cornwallis (2 vols., London, 1888), and "Facsimiles of Manuscripts relating to America, 1733-83" (25 folio vols., London, 1889-98), a work of great national importance, carefully indexed.

STEVENS, Thaddeus, statesman, b. in Danville, Caledonia co., Vt., 4 April, 1792; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 Aug., 1868. He was the child of poor parents, and was sickly and lame, but ambitious, and his mother toiled to secure for him an education. He entered Vermont university in 1810, and after it was closed in 1812 on account of the war he went to Dartmouth, and was graduated in 1814. He began the study of law in Pownal, Vt., continued it while teaching an academy in Yorik, Pa., was admitted to the bar at Boll Air, Md., established himself in 1816 at Gettysburg, Pa., and soon gained a high reputation, and was employed in many important suits. He devoted himself exclusively to his profession till the contest between the strict constructionists, who nominated Andrew Jackson for the presidency in 1828, and the other wing of the party, who nominated General Jackson for the presidency, came the Whigs, drew him into politics as an ardent supporter of John Quincy Adams. He was elected to the legislature in 1836 and the two succeeding years. By a brilliant speech in 1835, he defeated a bill to abolish the recently established common-school system of Pennsylvania. In 1836 he was a member of the State constitutional convention, and took an active part in its debates, but his anti-slavery principles would not permit him to sign the report recommending an amendment that restricted the franchise to white citizens. He was a member of the legislature again in 1837, and in 1838, when the Whig party was on the decline, and in dispute between the Democratic and anti-Masonic parties led to the organization of rival legislatures, he was the most prominent member of the Whig and anti-Masonic house. In 1838 he was appointed a canal commissioner. He was returned to the legislature in 1841. He gave a farm to Mrs. Lydia Jane Pierson, who had written poetry in defence of the common schools, and thus aided him in saving them. Having incurred losses in the speculations of 1842 to Lancaster, Pa., and for several years devoted himself to legal practice, occupying the foremost position at the bar. In 1848 and 1850 he was elected to congress as a Whig, and ardently opposed the Clay compromise measures of 1850, including the fugitive-slave law. On retiring from congress, March, 1853, he confined himself to his profession till 1858, when he was returned to congress as a Republican. From that time till his death he was one of the Republican leaders in that body, the chief advocate of emancipation, and the representative of the radical section of his party. His great oratorical powers and force of character earned for him the title, applied to William Pitt, of the "great commoner." He urged on President Lincoln his plan of emancipation, and the manner in which the emancipation proclamation, took the lead in all measures for arming and for enfranchising the negro, and initiated and pressed the fourteenth amendment to the Federal constitution. During the war he introduced and carried acts of confiscation, and after its close he advocated rigorous measures in reorganizing the southern states on the basis of universal freedom. He was chairman of the committee of ways and means for three sessions. Subsequently, as chairman of the house committee on reconstruction, he reported the bill which divided the southern states into five military districts, and placed them under the rule of army officers until they should adopt constitutions that conciliated suffrage and equal rights to the blacks. In a speech that he made in congress on 24 Feb., 1868, he proposed the impeachment of President Johnson. He was appointed one of the committee of seven to prepare articles of impeachment, and was chairman of the board of managers that was appointed on the part of the house to conduct the trial. He was excessively positive in his convictions, and attacked his adversaries with bitter denunciations and sarcastic taunts, yet he was genial and witty among his friends, and was noted for his uniform, though at times impulsive, acts of charity. While skeptical in his religious opinions, he resented slighting his bravery in this action he was made a lieuten-tenant, 24 July, 1813, while he was with Com. Oliver H. Perry at Erie, Pa., assisting in the building and equipment of the lake squadron. In the battle of Lake Erie he commanded the ship "Trippe," and fought against the rear of the enemy's line, passing ahead of the "Parrise" and "Peregrine," pouring grape and canister into the "Queen Charlotte" until she struck her colors, and, with Stephen Champlin, chasing and bringing back two of the enemy's vessels when they tried to escape. For these achievements he was voted a silver medal by congress, and presented with a sword by the citizens of Charleston. He was ordered in Aug., 1814 to the South Sea, or Java," which Com. Perry was fitting out for a cruise in the Mediterranean. In 1815, by legislative enactment, he changed his name to Stevens, which was that of his early benefactor. In 1819-20 he was attached to the frigate "Constellation." He performed valuable service in the cruise of Com. David Porter for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies, commanding successively the "Asp," the "Jackal," and the schooner "Shark," of the Mosquito fleet, being promoted master-commandant on 3 March, 1823. His last command afloat was the "Ontario," ship, which was attached to Com. James Biddle's Mediterranean squadron in 1830-32. He was made a captain, at that time the highest rank in the service, on 27 Jan., 1836, and commanded the navy-yard work-station at Washington until his death. His son, Thomas Holdup, naval officer, b. in Middletown, Conn., 27 May, 1809; d. in Rockville, Md., 15 May, 1866, was appointed a mid-shipman, served as aide to President Tyler in 1842, received his commission as lieutenant in 1843, and in 1853-5 commanded the schooner "Faging" in surveys of the California and Oregon coasts. When the civil in 1885. He was educated at the village school of his native place, and subsequently he came to the United States, and became an enthu-

astic bicyclist. He conceived the idea of making a tour around the world on his wheel, and, starting from San Francisco on 22 April, 1884, made his way across the continent of America, thence to England, and through Europe to Constantinople, where he remained some time. He traveled through several countries in Asia was prohibited by their governments, and at times his advance was very difficult, owing to the hostility of the natives, but ultimately persevering, he reached Japan, whence he went by steamer to San Francisco, landing on 24 Dec., 1886. His experiences were given in a series of letters to a magazine which he has since collected in book-form as "Around the World on a Bicycle" (2 vols., New York, 1887-89).

STEVENS, Thomas Holdup, naval officer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 22 Feb., 1795; d. in Washington, D. C., 22 Jan., 1841. He lost his parents, whose name was Holdup, in early life, and was adopted by a citizen of Charleston, who procured for him a midshipman's warrant in 1799. In the beginning of the war of 1812 he volunteered for service on the lakes, was assigned to duty under Capt. Samuel Angus on the Niagara frontier, and took part in a night attack on the enemy's works opposite Black Rock, preparatory to the contemplated descent of Gen. Alexander Smythe on the Canada shore. He was one of the leaders of a deputation that visited the enemy's artillery and of a scaling-party that dislodged the British gendarmes by burning their barracks, and, although wounded in the right hand by a canister-shot, remained after the naval force had retreated, and, with two other midshipmen and five seamen, crossed Niagara river at great risk in a leaky canoe. at the battle of West Point, and commanded the first expedition to Cumberland and White House to open James river, taking part in the demonstration against Petersburg and the battle of Malvern Hill. On 14 July, 1862, he captured the Confederate gun-boat "Teazer." He was promoted commander 20 July, 1862, and assigned to the "Monitor," with which he covered the flank of the army on James river and its rear during the withdrawal from the peninsula. In September, while attached to Com. Charles Wilkes's flying squadron, he captured five prizes, and chased the privateer "Florida" on the Bahamas banks. On 7 Oct., 1862, off St. George, Bermuda, he stopped the steamer "Fanny," of the British squadron, while she was under the convoy of the British sloops-of-war "Despere," and both commanders cleared their decks for action. Early in August, 1863, he assumed command of the ironclad "Patapsco," and in the engagements with the forts in Charleston harbor he performed gallant services. After a severe engagement with the batteries on Sullivan's island, he led a boat attack against Fort Sumter. Afterward he commanded the "Oneida," of the Western Gulf blockading squadron, but was temporarily transferred to the ironclad "Winnebago" for the operations before Mobile in July, 1864, in which he was conspicuous for the handling of his vessel and his personal daring. He commanded the "Oneida" off the coast of Texas in 1865, was commissioned captain on 23 July, 1866, commodore on 20 Nov., 1872, and rear admiral on 27 Oct., 1879, and, after commanding the Pacific fleet and acting as president of the board of visitors at the U.S. naval academy, he retired on 27 May, 1881.—His son, Thomas Holdout, is a lieutenant in the U.S. navy.

STEVENS, Walter Husted, soldier, b. in Penn Yan, N.Y., 24 Aug., 1887; d. in Vera Cruz, Mexico, 12 Nov., 1897. He was graduated at the U.S. military academy in 1848, and commissioned as lieutenant of engineers. He was engaged in constructing and repairing fortifications at New Orleans, La., built two forts on the coast of Texas, removed the great Colorado river raft by order of congress, and built the Ship channel light-house in 1844. He succeeded the erection of the custom-house at New Orleans after Maj. Pierre T. G. Beauregard was called away, and also built the custom-house at Galveston, Tex. In May, 1861, having resigned his commission and entered the Confederate service, he accompanied Gen. Beauregard to Virginia as his chief engineer. He was made a brigadier-general, and was the chief engineer of the Army of Northern Virginia until the autumn of 1862, when he was placed in charge of the fortifications of Richmond. He completed these defences and again became chief engineer of Lee's army, and continued as such to the close of the war. He then sought and obtained employment as an engineer on the Mexican railway between Vera Cruz and the city of Mexico, and at the time of his death was its superintendent and constructing engineer. An English company was building this road, and during the revolution in which Maximilian was deposed Gen. Stevens remained in sole charge of it, and he skillfully preserved the property through that difficult period.

STEVENS, Walter Le Conte, physicist, b. in Gordon county, Ga., 17 June, 1847. He is the nephew of John Le Conte, A.M., and graduated at the University of South Carolina in 1868, where he spent the year 1870-'7 at the University of Virginia, and meanwhile had held the professorship of chemistry at Oglethorpe college, Atlanta, Ga., in 1871-'2, and taught physics at Chatham academy, Savannah, Ga., in 1873-'6. Prof. Stevens then settled in New York, and, after teaching several years, was called in 1882 to the chair of mathematics and physics in Packer collegiate institute in Brooklyn. In connection with his class-work he has invented various improved forms of physical apparatus, of which his organ-pipe sonometer and reversible stereoscope are the best known, descriptions of which have been published in the "American Journal of Science." He is a member of scientific societies and secretary of the Brooklyn academy of science and art. The honorary degree of Ph. D., was conferred on him by the University of Georgia, in recognition of his writings on "Physiological Optics," which were published simultaneously in the "American Journal of Science" and the London "Philosophical Magazine" in 1881-'2. Prof. Stevens has written for the "North American Review," the "Popular Science Monthly," and other journals, prepared the parts relating to the physics of the earth's crust, the ocean, and the atmosphere in "Appletons Physical Geography" (New York, 1887), and rewrote J. STEVENS, William Bacon, P. E., bishop, b. in Bath, Me., 13 July, 1815; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 June, 1885. He received his early education at Phillips Andover academy, but, his health failing, he went abroad and spent two years in travel. At the end of that time he returned and pursued the study of medicine at Dartmouth, receiving his degree from this college in 1837, and also one from the Medical college of South Carolina. He went to Savannah, Ga., upon graduating, where he established his practice for five years. In 1841 he received the appointment of state historian of Georgia, and published several volumes, among which were "The Historical Collections" (Savannah, 1841-'2). About this time his attention was directed toward the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and, relinquishing the profession of medicine, he began a course of study in preparation for orders. He was ordained deacon in Christ church, Savannah, Ga., by Bishop Elliott, 28 Feb., 1843, and organized and took charge of Emmanuel church, Athens, Ga., of which he became rector on his advancement to the priesthood, 7 Jan., 1844. In this year also he was elected professor of belles-lettres, oratory, and moral philosophy in the University of Georgia. In 1845 he was sent as a deputy to the general convention from his diocese. In 1848 he accepted the rectory of St. Andrew's church, Philadelphia, Pa., and received the degree of D.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. The consecration of the diocese having elected him assistant bishop, he was consecrated in St. Andrew's church, 3 Jan., 1861, and Union college conferred upon him the degree of LL. D. Upon the death of Bishop Alonso Potter in 1865, he became bishop of Pennsylvania. The diocese of Pennsylvania was divided in 1863, the western counties being erected into a new diocese, which took the name of Pittsburgh. Again in 1871 another division was made by the setting off of the diocese of central Pennsylvania. In the mean time Bishop Stevens had been appointed to the charge of the American Episcopal delegation to the council of Europe, and made one or more visits of supervision during the six years of his oversight. At the Pan-Anglican council in 1878 he was chosen to preach the closing sermon, which he did in St. Paul's church, London. He was in feeble health for many years during the latter part of his life, and at last, in 1886, Bishop Whittaker was elected his assistant, and thereupon he retired to a quiet life as bishop of the See of Edinburgh.

His works include "Discourses before the Historical Society of Georgia" (Savannah, 1841); "History of Silk-Culture in Georgia" (1841); "History of Georgia" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1847); "Parables of the New Testament Unfolded" (1853); "The Bow in the Cloud" (1853); "Home Service" (1856); "The Lord's Day" (St. Louis, 1857); "History of St. Louis" (St. Louis, 1858); "Montreal and the Canadians" (1858); "Sabaths of Our Lord" (1872); "Sermons" (New York, 1879); and many essays, charges, and tracts.

STEVENSON, Alexander Allan, Canadian printer, b. in Riccarton, Ayrshire, Scotland, 29 January, 1829. He came with his family to Canada in 1846, and learned the printing trade in Montreal. He edited the "Sun" newspaper, and subsequently embarked in a general printing business, which he conducted till 1870. In 1855 he assisted in organizing the Montreal field-battery, in 1856 he became its commander, and he participated with this corps in 1858 in the military celebration in connection with the laying of the first Atlantic cable, his command then being the only British military organization to carry the union flag down the streets of New York since the evacuation. In 1874 he received the Conservative nomination to the Dominion parliament for Montreal, west, but was defeated, though his opponent was afterward unseated on the charge of bribery by agents. He has since been nominated twice, but refused to serve. He has taken a leading part in Montreal literary and social circles, and is president of the council of arts and manufactures of the province of Quebec.

STEVENSON, Andrew, statesman, b. in Culpeper county, Va., in 1784; d. at Blenheim, his estate, in Albemarle county, Va., 25 Jan., 1857. He studied law, won a high place in his profession, and in 1804 was chosen to the state house of delegates, of which, after serving several terms, he became speaker. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1823, till 2 June, 1834, when he resigned. From 1827 till 1834 he was speaker of the house. From 1836 till 1841 Mr. Stevenson was minister to England. On his return he became rector of the University of Virginia, and he devoted the rest of his life to the duties of that office and to agricultural pursuits.—His son, John White, senator, b. in Richmond, Va., 4 May, 1842; d. in Covington, Ky., 10 Aug., 1886, was educated at Hampden-Sidney and the University of Virginia, where he was graduated in 1862, and in 1841 settled in Covington, Ky., where he practiced law with success and served in the Kentucky legislature as a Whig, 1843-7. He was a leader of the State constitutional convention of 1849, was chosen a delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1848, 1852, and 1856, and from 1857 till 1861 sat in the lower house of congress. He was a delegate to the Philadelphia Union conven-
STEWART, Sarah Hackett, physician, b. in Buffalo Grove, Ill., 2 Feb., 1843. She was graduated at the State university, Bloomington, Ill., in 1863, and a year later was studying at the South Kensington scientific schools, London. On her return to the United States she entered the Woman's medical college, Chicago, where she was graduated in 1875. Since that time she has held several professorships in the same college and many posts of honor in other medical associations and institutions. In 1876 she was a delegate from the Illinois state medical society to the American medical association at Philadelphia, and was the first woman physician to be elected a member of that body. She was one of the promoters of the Home for incurables and Training school for nurses in Chicago, and outside of her large practice has found time to publish works on "Biology" (2 vols., New York, 1873), and "Physiology" (Chicago, 1880).

STEWENSON, Thomas Greely, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 3 Feb., 1836; d. near Spottsylvania, Va., 10 May, 1864. He early entered the militia, and at the opening of the civil war was major of the 4th infantry battalion. He had a high reputation as a drill-master, and trained a large number of young men that afterward entered the National army. After doing a term in the Regular army and in the Confederate service, he recruited the 24th Massachusetts regiment in the autumn of 1861, and commanded it in the capture of Roanoke island and New Berne in 1862. After holding the outpost defences of the latter place for several months, he conducted several expeditions within the enemy's lines, and on 6 Sept. successfully defended Washington, D. C., against a superior force. He led a brigade against Goldsboro' and Kinston later in the year, and in the expedition against Charleston in February, 1863, having been made brigadier-general of volunteers on 27 Dec., 1862. He aided in the reduction of Morris island, and led the reserves in the assault on Fort Wagner. After a visit to the north to recruit his health, he was placed at the head of the 1st division of the 9th corps. He was killed at the head of his troops in the battle of Spottsylvania. A memoir of Gen. Stevenson was printed privately after his death (Cambridge).

STEWART, Theophilus Gould, clergyman, b. in Gouldtown, N. J., 17 April, 1813. His parents were of African descent. He was licensed to preach at twenty years of age, and at twenty-one entered the African church, and was stationed in Camden, N. J. He went to the south in 1863, and preached and taught in South Carolina and Georgia. He wrote the platform upon which the Republican party of Georgia was first organized, and returning to the north in 1871, by appointment of his church, reopened the missions in the island of Haiti. On his return from Haiti he was president of the Protestant Episcopal divinity-school in Philadelphia, and also studied in the School of eclection there. He has written an "Essay on Death, Hades, and the Resurrection"; "The End of the World"; and "Genesis Re-read" (Philadelphia, 1888).

STEWARTSON, Thomas, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 July, 1857; d. there, 30 June, 1888. He was graduated at the College of Physicians and surgeons of Philadelphia in 1880, and continued his studies in Paris. On his return he was associated with various hospitals in Philadelphia, and was an active member of the board of health for many years. About 1845 he removed to Savannah, Ga., where he made a specialty of the treatment of yellow fever. In 1849 he introduced this country the new silk-worm, Bombyx cyphania, which he fed on leaves of the ailanthus-tree. He was the author of "A Life of Dr. Ger- manus von Leonhardi," translated by Adolphus Wood, "Researches on Ephesypena of the Lambs" (Philadelphia, 1858); and edited, with additions, Elliotson's "Principles of Medicine" (Philadelphia, 1844).

STEWART, Alexander, British soldier, b. in England about 1749; d. in December, 1784. He was appointed captain in the 5th foot in 1764, and reached the grade of colonel in 1780. During the wars of the Revolution he served in the Continent army from 1778 to 1781, he commanded the British forces in South Carolina, and was defeated at Eutaw Springs on 8 Sept. by Gen. Nathanael Greene, being subsequently compelled to retreat to Charleston. In 1780 he was made a major-general.

STEWART, Alexander, Canadian jurist, b. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 30 Jan., 1794; d. there, 1 Jan., 1868. He was the son of a Scottish Presbyterian minister, was educated at the Halifax grammar-school, and became a clerk in the ordnance department. He afterward entered a house that was engaged in the West India trade, and soon became a member of the firm, but studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1822. He became a member of the Nova Scotia assembly in 1826, the legislative council in 1832, and the Legislative council in 1843 as a representative. In 1846 he became master of the rolls and judge of the vice-admiralty court, and in 1856 he was made a companion of the Bath.

STEWART, Alexander Peter, soldier, b. in Rogersville, Hawkins co., Tenn., 2 Oct., 1821. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1842, became 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery, and was acting assistant professor of mathematics at the academy from 1843 till 31 May, 1845, when he resigned. He was then professor of mathematics and natural and experimental philosophy in Cumberland university, Tenn., in 1845-9, and in Nashville university in 1845-5, and became city-surveyor of Nashville in 1855. He was appointed by Gov. Isham G. Harris major of the corps of artillery in the provisional army of Tennessee, 17 May, 1861, and became brigadier-general in the Confederate army, 8 Nov., 1861, major-general, 2 June, 1863, and lieutenant-general, 23 June, 1864. He was engaged in the battles of Belmont, Shiloh, Perryville, Murfreesboro', and the campaign about Hoover's Gap, Tullahoma, Chattanooga, and through the Dalton-Atlanta campaign under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. He was with Gen. John B. Hood in his movements in the rear of Gen. Sherman's army, and destroyed the railroads and captured the garrison at Big Shanty and Acworth. He was at Franklin and Nashville under Hood, and at Col's Farm, in North Carolina, under Johnston. In 1888 he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the University of Mississippi, Oxford, and University of Alabama, at Tuscaloosa.

STEWART, Alexander Torney, merchant, b. in Lisburn, near Belfast, Ireland, 12 Oct., 1803; d. in New York, 10 April, 1876. He was the descendant of a Scotch emigrant to the north of Ireland and the only son of a farmer, who died when he was a school-boy. He studied with a view to entering the ministry, but, with his guardian's consent, abandoned that idea. He entered the business of a banking-house in the summer of 1823, without any definite plans for the future. He was for a period employed as a teacher in a select school in Roosevelt street near Pearl, then one of the fashionable localities of the city. Returning to Ireland, he received the moderate fortune his father had left him, bought a stock of Belfast lace and linens, and on reaching New York opened a store at No. 285 Broadway, 2 Sept., 1823, for which he paid a rent of $250 per annum, giving as a reference Jacob Clinch, whose daughter, Cornelia, he soon afterward married. The amount of the capital invested was about $2,000,000. The young merchant had a sleeping-room in the rear of his shop, and under these humble conditions was formed the germ of the most extensive and lucrative dry-goods business in the world. In 1829 he removed to a larger store at 262 Broadway, and soon afterward he again removed to 257 Broadway. He displayed a genius for business, met with remarkable success from the first, and in 1848 had accumulated so much capital that he was enabled to build the large marble store on Broadway between Chambers and Seventh streets, which afterward was devoted to the wholesale branch of his business. In 1862 he erected on the block bounded by Ninth and Tenth streets, Broadway and Fourth avenue, the five-story iron building used for his retail business. This was said to be the largest retail store in the world at that time. Its cost was nearly $8,500,000. About 2,500 persons were employed in the building, the current expenses of the establishment were more than $1,000,000 a year, and the aggregate of sales in the two stores for the three years preceding his death amounted to about $200,000,000. Besides these two vast establishments, Mr. Stewart had branch houses in different parts of the world, and was the owner of numerous mills and manufactories. During the war his annual income averaged nearly $2,000,000, and in 1865 he estimated it at above $1,000,000. In 1867 Mr. Stewart was chairman of the honorary commission sent by the United States government to the Paris Exposition. In March, 1869, President Grant appointed him secretary of the interior, but his confirmation was prevented by an old law which excludes from that office all who are interested in the importation of merchandise. The president sent to the senate a message recommending that the law be repealed in order that Mr. Stewart might become eligible to the office, and Mr. Stewart offered to transfer his enormous business to trustees and to devote the entire profits accruing during his term of office to charitable purposes; but the law was not repealed, as it was believed that Mr. Stewart’s proposed plan would not effectually remove his disabilities. His acts of charity were numerous. During the famine in Ireland in 1846 he sent a ship-load of provisions to that country and gave a free passage to as many emigrants as the vessel could carry on its voyage. The government of this country, supposing only that they should be able to read and write and of good moral character. After the Franco-German war he sent to France a vessel laden with flour, and in 1871 he gave $50,000 for the relief of the sufferers by the floods in Silesia, as he would not permit his portraits of any description to be made. He was also one of the largest contributors to the sum of $100,000 presented by the merchants of New York to Gen. Ulysses S. Grant as an acknowledgment of his great services during the civil war. At the time of his death Mr. Stewart was completing, at the cost of $1,000,000, the iron structure on Fourth avenue between Thirty-second and Thirty-third streets, New York, intended as a home for working-girls. He was also building at Hampstead Plains, L. I., the town of Garden City, the object of which was to afford to his employees and others airy and comfortable houses at a moderate cost. Mr. Stewart’s wealth was estimated at about $40,000,000. His real estate was assessed at $3,450,000, which did not include property valued at more than $300,000 on which the taxes were paid by the tenants. He had no blood relatives, and by his will the bulk of his estate was given to his wife. He bequeathed $1,000,000 to an executor of the will appointed to close his partnership business and affairs. Many bequests were made to his employees and to other persons. He left a letter, dated 29 March, 1873, addressed to Mrs. Stewart, expressing his intention to make provision for various public charities, by which he stated: "I have been born and have spent my life in the business, and my interests were transferred by his widow to other persons, who continued the business under the firm-name of A. T. Stewart and Co., which was soon changed to E. J. Donning and Co. Mr. Stewart’s residence, on the corner of Fifth avenue and Thirty-fourth street, a marble mansion, seen in the accompanying illustration, is perhaps the finest private house in the United States, and among the largest and most valuable in the country, was sold at auction in New York in 1887. Two of his most important portraits were presented to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. There was no satisfactory portrait of Mr. Stewart, and that from which the accompanying vignette is taken was painted after death by Thomas Lehr. He was slight and graceful, of medium height, with fair hair and complexion, and light-blue eyes. He possessed refined taste, love of literature and art, and was fond of entertaining, which he did in a delightful manner. At his weekly dinners might be met men of distinction in all the various walks of life—from the emperor of Brazil and a Rothschild, to the penniless poet and painter. What was said of Stewart in the dedication of a volume published in 1874 was but the simple truth—that he was “the first of American merchants and an endowment of about $15,000 per annum, to the dioce of Long Island, N. Y., 2 June, 1883.

STEWART, Alvan, a former, b. in South Granville, Washington co., N. Y., 1 Sept., 1790; d. in New York city, 1 May, 1839. His parents removed when he was five months old to Crown Point, N. Y., and in 1795, losing their possessions through a defective title, to Westford, Chittenden co., Vt., where the lad was brought up on a farm. In 1808
he began to teach and to study anatomy and medicine. In 1809 he entered Burlington college, Vt., supporting himself by teaching in the winters, and,
visiting Canada in 1811, he received a commission under Gov. Sir George Prevost as professor in the Royal school in the seigniory of St. Armand, but he returned to college in June, 1812. After the declaration of war he went again to Canada, and was held as a prisoner. On his return he taught and studied law in Cherry Valley, N. Y., and then in Paris, Ky., making his home in the former place.
where he practised his profession and remained a lifetime.
He was a persistent advocate of protective duties, of internal improvements, and of education. He removed to Utica in 1832, and, though he continued to try causes as counsel, the remainder of his life was given mainly to the temperance and anti-slavery causes. A volume of his speeches was pub-ished in 1860. Among the most conspicuous of these was an argument, in 1857, before the New York state anti-slavery convention, to prove that congress might constitutionally abolish slavery
on the “Right of Petition” at Pennsylvania hall, Philadelphia, and on the “Great Issues between Right and Wrong” at the same place in 1858; before the joint committee of the legislature of Vermont; and before the supreme court of New Jersey on a habeas corpus to determine the constitutionality of slavery under the new state constitution of 1846, which last occupied eleven hours in delivery. His first published speech against slavery was in 1855, under threats of a mob. He then drew a call for a state anti-slavery convention for 21 Oct., 1855, at Utica. As the clock struck the hour he called the convention to order and addressed it, and the programme of business was completed ere the threatened mob arrived, as it soon did and dispersed the convention by violence. That night the doors and windows of his house were barred with large timbers, and fifty loaded muskets were provided, with determined men to handle them, but the preparations kept off the menacing invasion. “He was the first,” says William Goodell, the historian of abolitionism, “to insist earnestly, in our consultations, in committee and elsewhere, on the necessity of forming a distinct political party to promote the abolition of slavery. He gradually brought the leaders into it, was its candidate for governor, and this new party grew, year by year, till at last it held the balance of power between the Whigs and Democrats, when, uniting with the former, it constituted the Republican party. The characteristics of Mr. Stewart’s eloquence and conversation were a strong and abounding humor, a memory that held large reservoirs at command, and in an emergency, a rich philosophy, strong powers of reasoning, and an exuberant imagination. A collection of his speeches, with a memoir, is in preparation by his son-in-law, Luther R. Marsh.

STEWART, Archibald, member of the Continental congress. He resided in Sussex county, N. J., prior to the Revolution, and was active in the movements that hastened it. In July, 1774, he was appointed one of the committee to nominate deputies to the Continental congress, which was to meet in Philadelphia the following September, and in 1775 he was chosen a representative from Sussex county in that congress to fill a vacancy.

STEWART, Austin, author, b. in Prince William county, Va., about 1752; d. after 1830. He was born in the state of New York in Washington Bath, N. Y. He afterward fled to Canadaigua, and in 1817 he engaged successfully in business in Rochester. In 1826 he delivered an oration at the celebration of the New York emancipation act, and in 1826 he was elected vice-president of the National convention of negroes at Philadelphia.
The following year he removed to a small colony that had been established in Canada West, in the township Wilberforce, and was chosen its president. He used his own funds to carry on the affairs of the colony, but, finding that no more land would be sold to the colonists by the colonists from the colony, returned to Rochester in 1837. He thereafter opened a school in Canadaigua, and after two years became an agent for the “Anti-Slavery republic of the Sandwich Islands.” Twenty-twenty years a Slave and Forty Years a Freeman (2d ed., Rochester, N. Y., 1859).

STEWART, Charles, soldier, b. in County
Donegal, Ireland, in 1729; d. in Flemington, N. J., 24 July, 1809. His grandfather, of the same name, was a Scottish officer of dragoons, who, for services in the battle of the Boyne, was given an estate in Ireland. The younger Charles came to this country in 1750 and became a deputy surveyor-general of the province of Pennsylvania. In 1774 he was a member of the first convention in New Jersey that issued a declaration of rights against the aggres-sions of the crown, and in 1777 a delegate to its first Provincial congress. By his adopted state he was made colonel of its first regiment of minute-men, and of the regiment in 1776. In 1777 he was appointed by congress commissary-general of issues in the Continental army, serving as such on Washington’s staff till the close of the war. In 1784-5 he was a representative from New Jersey in Congress.—His grandson, Charles Samuel, diaryman, b. in Flemington, N. J., 16 Oct., 1795;
d. in Freeport, N. Y., 15 Dec., 1839, was graduated at Harvard in 1815. Afterwards studying law, he took a theological course. He was ordinated and sent as missionary to the Sandwich islands in 1823, but, owing to the failing health of his wife, returned in 1825, and afterward lectured through the northern states in advocacy of foreign missions. In 1828 he was appointed chaplain in the U. S. navy, and during his visits to all parts of the world he collected material for his works. He was subsequently stationed for many years at New York, where, in 1856-7, he edited the "Naval Magazine." In 1862 he was retired, and at his death he was the senior chaplain in the navy. The degree of D. D. was given him in 1863 by the University of New York. His works include "Residence at the Sandwich Islands, 1833-25," which is an authority on the early history of that mission (New York, 1828); "Visit to the South Seas in the U. S. Ship "Vincennes," with Scoresby in Brazil, Peru, etc." (2 vols., 1831; improved ed., by Rev. William Ellis, 3 vols., 1839); "Sketches of Society in Great Britain and Ireland in 1832" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1834); and "Brazil and La Plata in 1839-53; the Personal Record of a Cruise" (New York, 1856).

Charles Samuel's son, Charles Seaforth, soldier, b. at sea, 11 April, 1825, was graduated in 1840 at the U. S. military academy, where he was assistant professor of engineering in 1849-54. He was made 1st lieutenant in the corps of engineers in 1854, serving as assistant engineer in 1854-7, and as superintendent engineer in the construction of fortifications in Boston harbor till 1861, having been promoted captain in 1860. He served during the civil war in the corps of engineers, was made major in 1862, and was chief engineer of the Army military division in 1864-5. He was made lieutenant-colonel in 1865, colonel in 1862, and was retired in September, 1866.

STEWART, Charles, naval officer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 July, 1778; d. in Bordentown, N. J., 6 Nov., 1862. His parents were Irish; his father died in 1789, and his mother left with seven sons to provide for four children. He entered the merchant marine as cabin-boy in 1791, and quickly rose to the command of an Indianan. Entering the navy as lieutenant, 3 Sept., 1798, he served in the frigate "United States" in the West Indies, operating against the prizes of the French privateers. On 16 July, 1800, he was appointed to command the schooner "Experiment," in the West Indies. Stewart rescaped the French schooners "Beaux Aims." He was also chased by two French vessels, which he skilfully avoided, and by following them he fought and captured one, the schooner "Diana," before the other vessel could assist in the engagement. On 16 Nov., 1800, he boarded the privateer "Louise Bridger," and the next month he rescued sixty women and children that had been wrecked while flying from a revolution in Santo Domingo. The Spanish governor of the island wrote a letter of thanks to the president for Stewart's services. He was retained on the list of lieutenants in the naval reorganization of 1801. In 1802 he served as executive of the "Constellation." Blockading Tripoli, but returned in 1803 and placed in command of the brig "Siren," in Preble's squadron, off Tripoli, where he convoyed Decatur in the "Intrepid" to destroy the "Philadelphia," and participated in all the attacks on Tripoli, being included in the vote of thanks by congress on 3 March, 1805, to Preble's officers. While blockading Tripoli he captured the Greek ship "Catapedia" and the British brig "Source" for violating the blockade. As master-commander he took the charge of the "Essex" and went with the fleet to Tunis, where he convinced his commander-in-chief that it was illegal to make war except by decimation of congress. He returned home in 1806, commanding the "Constellation," and was promoted to captain, 23 April, 1806. He superintended the construction of gun-boats at New York in 1806, and 1807, was engaged in the merchant marine in 1808-12, but returned to the service in 1812, and with Bainbridge dissuaded the cabinet from the proposed policy of not sending the navy to sea against the British. He was assigned to command the "Argus" and "Hornet" in a special expedition to the West Indies on 23 June, 1812, but the order was canceled, and he was appointed to command the "California." In going to Norfolk he met a British fleet, which he skilfully avoided, and then participated in the defense of the town. In the summer of 1813 he took command of the "Constellation," destroyed the "Picton," an armed merchant ship, and the brig "Catherine" and "Phoenix," chased several British ships-of-war and the frigate "La Pique," narrowly escaped two British frigates near Boston. With new sails he left Boston in December, 1814, captured the brig "Lori Nelson" off Bermuda, 21 Dec., 1814, and the ship "Susan" off Lisbon, and on 23 Feb., 1815, took two British ships-of-war, the "Cyane" and "Levant," after a spirited engagement of fifty minutes. While he was at anchor at St. Jago, Cape de Verde, the British fleet appeared, from which he narrowly escaped with the "Constellation," and the "Cyane," the "Levant" being recaptured by the fleet in the neutral harbor which she had just left. He received from congress a vote of thanks, a sword, and a gold medal, from the Pennsylvania legislature a vote of thanks and a sword, and the freedom of the city of New York. Like the famous frigate, represented in the illustration, Stewart received the sobriquet of "Old Ironsides." He commanded the Mediterranean squadron, in the "Franklin," in 1816-18, and the Pacific squadron in 1820-24, where he caused a paper blockade to be unmade, and vindicated the rights of American commerce. He was commissioner of the navy in 1836-2, commanded the Philadelphia navy-yard in 1838-41, and in 1841 he was nominated as a candidate for president, but was not nominated. He had charge of the Home squadron in 1842-3, commanded the Philadelphia navy-yard again in 1846, and from 1854 till 1861. He was retired as senior commodore in 1856 and flag-officer in 1860, and on 16 July, 1862, was commissioned rear-admiral, after which he was on waiting orders until his death. He was in the service seventy-one years, and the senior officer for seventeen years. On 21 May, 1855, his daughter, Delia Tebor, married Charles Henry Parnell, and she became the mother of Charles Stewart Parnell, the Irish home-rule leader in the British parliament.

STEWART, Charles James, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. at Galloway House, Wigtownshire, Scotland, 31 April, 1777; d. in London, England, 10 July, 1837. He was the third son of John, seventh Earl of Galloway, was educated at home and at Oxford, where he was graduated in 1799, and the same year was ordained in the Church of England. He was first settled as a pastor at Orton Longueville and Rolph Bridge, near Peterborough, in 1799, where he remained eight years, and sometime during that period he was the secretary for the propagation of the gospel, he was appointed to the mission of St. Armand, Eastern townships, Lower Canada. There was no church in his mission, but he erected one at his own expense. In 1819 he was appointed a visiting missionary in the diocese of Quebec, which then included the whole of Canada, and suffered much hardship in travelling over a vast extent of sparsely settled country, without roads or adequate means of conveyance. On the death of Bishop Mountain in 1825, Dr. Stewart was nominated to the see of Quebec as his successor, and he was consecrated on 1 Jan., 1826, by Archbishop Sutton, at Lambeth palace. In May, 1827, Bishop Stewart returned to Quebec and was installed in the cathedral of that city. Henceforth till his resignation, he devoted his attention to the interests of his church and the cause of Christianity in general. While he was in Canada he spent the whole of his private fortune in the service of the church and in charity, and promoted the erection of many churches in various parts of the country. In 1836 Oxford gave him the degree of D. D. He published a "Short View of the Eastern Townships in Lower Canada" (London, 1832); "The Stewart Missions, a Series of Letters and Journals, with a Brief Memoir of Bishop Stewart," edited by Rev. W. J. D. Waddilove, A. M. (London, 1838); and "Life of Bishop Stewart," by the Rev. John N. Norton (1839).

STEWART, David, senator, b. in Baltimore, Md., 13 Sept., 1800; d. there, 5 Jan., 1879. He was graduated at Yale in 1824, and, after studying law, was admitted to the bar in 1821. Mr. Stewart had a large practice, and acquired reputation as a successful lawyer. In 1838 he was elected to the Maryland senate, and subsequently he was appointed to succeed Reverdy Johnson in the U. S. senate, where he served from 8 Dec., 1849, till 14 Jan., 1850. For some time he held the office of commissioner of public buildings for the District of Columbia. He was one of the contributors to an ephemeral publication called "The Rainbow," that was issued during 1821 in Baltimore.

STEWART, Electra Maria Sheldon, author, b. in Le Roy, Genesee co., N. Y., 6 Sept., 1817. She was educated in Detroit, Mich., whither she removed with her parents when she was very young. She edited the "Life of Charles Freake," in London, England, in 1853—4, contributed ten sketches to the state pioneer collections of Michigan, and is the author of several Sunday-school books, under the name of Electra Maria Sheldon; and "The Early History of Michigan" (New York, 1859).

STEWART, Ferdinand Campbell, physician, b. Philadelphia, Pa., 14 Oct., 1815. He was educated at William and Mary, and graduated at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1837. Subsequently he spent five years in professional study in Edinburgh and Paris. On his return he began the practice of medicine in Williamsburg, but was encouraged by his success to remove to New York city, where he was active until 1849. He obtained charge of medical and surgical wards in Bellevue hospital, and at the same time received in his office students that had the benefits of this clinical instruction. In 1849 he volunteered his services during the prevalence of typhus fever, and prescribed daily for two hundred dangerously ill patients. When Bellevue hospital was reorganized Dr. Stewart was appointed a member of the committee to recommend a new and improved plan, and after its adoption was made one of the visiting medical officers. In 1849 he was appointed the first physician of the marine hospital at Staten island, but declined the appointment, and continued in that office until 1851, meanwhile reorganizing that institution. Dr. Stewart continued to reside on Staten island until 1855, when the death of his father led to his removal to England in order to obtain estates to which he had fallen heir. He was a member of medical societies both in the United States and Europe, and in 1847 held in London, England, the New York academy of medicine whose success was principally owing to his exertions. He was its secretary until his removal from New York city, held the office of vice-president three times, and on three different occasions was anniversary orator. In 1848—9 he was chairman of the committee on typhus fever, when the disease had almost caused a panic in the city. He was for several years a member of the board of health and the association for the suppression of the abuse of intoxicating drinks. He served as an officer of a committee appointed by the governor and legislature of the state of New York to ascertain the means of prevention that held its first meeting in New York in 1846, and was secretary of the meeting in Philadelphia in 1847, and he was also a member of the committee that drafted the constitution of the American medical association in 1847. Dr. Stewart was for many years the family physician of President Tyler, and refused several diplomatic appointments that were offered him by the president. He invented and introduced several instruments that have found use in genito-urinary diseases. In addition to his contributions to medical journals, he was in 1844—5 editor of the "New York Journal of Medicine," and he published a translation of "Socquetten on Club-Foot" (Philadelphia, 1839); "Hospitals and Surgeons of Paris" (New York, 1842); and "Cases, 240,000, of the American medical association (1849—50), embracing statistics and regulations of the medical colleges of the United States, and an account of similar institutions in all parts of the world.

STEWART, George, Canadian journalist, b. in New York city, 26 Nov., 1848. At an early age he removed with his parents to Canada, settled in St. John, New Brunswick, and was educated in the grammar-school there. He began the publication of the "Stamp-Collector's Monthly Gazette" in 1865, but relinquished it in 1867, and founded "Stewart's Literary Quarterly Magazine," which he published and edited for five years. He was for a short time city editor of the St. John "Daily News," for two years literary editor of "The Weekly Watchman," and for one year of "The Lieford's Canadian Monthly," which he left in 1879 to become editor of the Quebec "Morning Chronicle," from which he retired in 1898 to become editor of the "Daily Mercury." In 1882 he was named one of the original members of the Royal society of Canada by the Marquis of Lorne. After 1885 he was several times elected to the Literary and historical society of Quebec, and in 1885 he became a fellow of the Royal geographical society of England. In 1886 the degree of D. C. L. was conferred on him by King's university, Nova Scotia, and by the University of his college in 1888, and he was given that of doctor of letters in 1888 by Laval university, Quebec, for his services to literature in Canada. Dr. Stewart has contributed Canadian articles to the "Encyclopedia Britannica," and to English, American, and Canadian periodicals, and is well known as a lecturer on literary and historical subjects. He has published "The Story of the Great Fire in St. John, N. B." (Toronto, 1877); "Evanings in the Library" (1878); "Canada under the Administration of the Earl of Dufferin" (1878); "Emerson the Thinker" (1879); "Alcott the Concholyst" (1880); and "Essays from Reviews" (2 series, 1880 and 1881).

STEWARD, Gideon Tabor, lawyer, b. in Johnstown, N. Y., 7 Aug., 1824. He removed with his parents to Oberlin, Ohio, where he was educated. Subsequently he studied law in Norwalk and then with Noah H. Swain in Columbus. In 1846, after his admission to the bar, he began practice in Norwalk, where he was soon editor of the "Reflector." He was elected county auditor as a Whig and held that office during three terms. In 1861 he removed to Iowa, where he purchased the Dubuque "Daily Times," and published it during the civil war. At the time of its purchase it was the only daily Union paper in the northern half of the state. Previously he was one of the proprietors of the Toledo "Blade;" and after the war he was a member of its board of directors. In 1865 he returned to Norwalk, where he has since continued his law-practice. Mr. Stewart was three times elected grand worthy chief temple by the Good Templars of Ohio. In 1853 he took part in the Maine law campaign of that year, and then endeavored to organize a permanent prohibition party. He was chairman of a state convention in 1854 which made the first attempt of forming such a party, but the movement failed on account of the troubles in Kansas and the civil war. In 1869 he was one of the delegates from Ohio to the Chicago convention that formed the National prohibition party. Since that time he has been nominated three times for governor, seven times for supreme judge of the state, and once for president. In 1870, and once for vice-president in 1876, when with Green Clay Smith as candidate for president, he received a popular vote of 9,522. For fifteen years he was a member, during four of which he was chairman of the national executive committee of his party. In 1876, 1880, and 1884 the prohibition state convention unanimously instructed the Ohio delegates to present him in the National convention as their choice for presidential candidate, but each time he refused to have his name brought forward. Mr. Stewart has written much in advocacy of the temperance reform, and many of his public addresses have been extensively circulated.

STEWARD, Jacob Henry, physician, b. in Chautauqua, N. Y., 14 Dec., 1824; d. in Malone, N. Y., 23 Aug., 1884. He studied at Yale for three years, and was graduated at the medical department of the University of New York in 1851. Four years later he began practice in Peekskill, N. Y., but in 1855 he removed to St. Paul, where he obtained recognition as one of the most skilful practitioners of that city. In 1856 he was appointed physician of Ramsey county, St. Paul, and in 1857-63 he was surgeon-general of Minnesota, also serving as a member of the governor's staff and as a member of the state senate in 1858-60. On 17 April, 1861, he joined the 1st Minnesota volunteers, which was the first regiment that was received by President Lincoln, thus making Dr. Stewart the ranking surgeon in the volunteer service. He remained on the battle-field of Bull Run, was paroled, and allowed to care for his wounded at Sudley-church hospital until they were able to be removed to Richmond, when he was permitted to return home without exchange for voluntarily remaining on the battle-field in the discharge of his duty. The sword taken from him when he was made prisoner was given back to him by Gen. Beavarn in recognition of his faithfulness to duty. On his return to Minnesota he was appointed surgeon of the board of enrolment, and held that office until the close of the war. In 1864 he was elected mayor of St. Paul, and he was re-elected for four terms (1864-73). Dr. Stewart was the only Rotarian that has ever held that office in St. Paul, as the vote of the city is Democratic. From 1865 till 1870 he was postmaster of St. Paul, and he was then elected to congress as a Republican, serving from 15 Oct., 1877, till 4 March, 1879. He was appointed surveyor-general of the state in 1880, and held that office for four years. Dr. Stewart was president of the Minnesota state medical society in 1855-6, and president of the board of physicians and surgeons to St. Joseph's hospital in St. Paul.

STEWARD, James, physician, b. in New York city, 7 April, 1799; d. in Rye, N. Y., 12 Sept., 1864. He was educated at Queens (now Rutgers) college, and then, after studying medicine with Dr. Valentine Mott, was graduated in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of New York city, 1823. Dr. Stewart began practice in New York city, and made a specialty of pulmonary complaints and diseases of children. He was one of the founders of the northern dispensary and its second consulting physician. For more than twenty years he was medical examiner of the Mutual benefit insurance company and of most of the large companies previous to his death held a similar place with the Home life insurance company. In 1857 his essay on "Chorea infantum" received the prize that was offered by the New York academy of medicine. He published anonymously "A Few Remarks about Sick Children in New York and the Necessity of a Hospital for them" (1829), and "The National Practical Dispensary for Sick Children, to be conducted on the same plan as St. Luke's hospital and to be called Christ's hospital for children." He also published a translation of Charles M. Billard's "Treatise on the Diseases of Children," with an appendix (Philadelphia, 1839); "A Practical Treatise on the Diseases of Children" (New York, 1842) and "The Young Man" (1848).

STEWARD, John, Canadian statesman, b. in Musselburgh, Scotland, 24 Nov., 1773; d. in Quebec, Canada, 5 June, 1858. He engaged in business, was president of the Board of Trade and of the Bank of Montreal, and master of Trinity House. Under the administration of Sir George Prevost he was appointed deputy paymaster-general of the army. On the accession of Lord Dalhousie in 1819, Mr. Stewart became a member of the legislative and executive councils, and was appointed sole commissioner of the Jesuit estates, of which he had been for many years previously a member of the board of management. He was for a long time president of the executive council of Canada.

STEWARD, Robert Merceinus, governor of Missouri, b. in Truxton, N. Y., 12 March, 1815; d. in St. Joseph, Mo., 29 Sept., 1871. He went to Kentucky as a boy, and in 1838 settled on the Buchanan county, Mo. In 1845 he was a delegate to the State constitutional convention, and for ten years he was a member of the state senate. He was elected gov-
STYLES

STEWART, Thomas Metcalf, lawyer, b. in Charleston, S. C., Dec. 28, 1834. He is of African descent. After his graduation at the University of South Carolina in 1855 he practised law in Columbia, S. C., and was professor of mathematics in the State agricultural college, Orangeburg, S. C. He entered the ministry in 1878; after studying at Princeton. In 1882 he became professor of belles-lettres and law in Liberia college, and spent a year on the west coast of Africa, serving also as general agent for industrial education in Liberia. In January, 1886, he was admitted to the bar of New York city. Mr. Stewart has contributed to newspapers and magazines and is the author of "Liberia, the American-African Republic." (New York, 1882), and "Perils of a Great City." (1887).

STEWART, Virgil Adam, b. in Jackson co., Ga., 27 Jan., 1809. In 1835 he became acquainted with John A. Murrell, who was the chief of an organization that existed throughout the south and southwest and made a practice of enticing negroes from their owners, with promise of freedom, and then selling them in a distant part of the country. The risen conspirees recognized one another by signs, and dexterously concealed their identity. Their crimes included robbery and murder. Mr. Stewart succeeded in gaining full information concerning the plans of the organization, which included an extended uprising of the negroes, who were incited by promises of freedom to rebel and slay all the whites on the mainland. Mr. Murrell, the leader of the conspiracy, was to take advantage of the condition of affairs and plunder generally. A knowledge of this plot, which was divulged to Stewart by Murrell, led to the arrest of the latter, and his subsequent sentence to imprisonment for ten years. After the conviction, Stewart published a pamphlet account of the affair, under the title of "The Rise of a Conspiring Organization," giving the names of the conspirators. This quickly disappeared, statements were industriously circulated that Stewart was a member of the band, and efforts were made to murder him. See "The History of Virgil A. Stewart and His Adventure in capturing and exposing the Great Western Land Pirate and his Gang." (New York, 1836).

STEWART, Walter, soldier, b. about 1756; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 14 June, 1796. He espoused the American cause at the beginning of the Revolutionary war, raised a company for the 3d Pennsylvania battalion, was commissioned captain, 6 Jan., 1776, and appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. Gates, 26 May, 1776, in which capacity he served until 17 June, 1777, when he was commissioned by the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania colonel of the state regiment of foot. He took command on 6 July, 1777, and led it at Brandywine and Germantown. By resolution of congress, 12 Nov., 1777, his regiment was annexed to the Continental army, becoming the 13th regiment of the Pennsylvania line. On 17 Jan., 1781, it was incorporated with the 2d Pennsylvania, under Col. Stewart's command. He served with great credit throughout the war, retiring, 1 Jan., 1783, with the brevet rank of brigadier-general. He was said to be the handsomest man in the American army. He was afterward well known as a merchant of Philadelphia, and became major-general of the state militia. His full-length portrait is in Col. Trumbull's picture of the surrender of Cornwallis, on the left of the line of the American officers.

STEWART, William, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Scotland in 1802; d. in Toronto, 6 March, 1856. He was educated privately, engaged in business as a merchant, and was one of the founders of the lumber trade in Canada. He was a member of the parliament of Canada for Bytown (now Ottawa) and for the county of Russell, and framed the ollers' bill and other important acts.—His son, McLeod, lawyer, b. in Ottawa in 1847, was graduated at Toronto university in 1863. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1870, and established himself successfully in practice at Ottawa. He was elected mayor of that city in 1887, and was re-elected in 1888. Mr. Stewart is actively connected with many financial and industrial corporations, and is president of the Canada Atlantic railway company. He is a Liberal-Conservative in politics and has rendered important services to his party. He was appointed a lieutenant in the governor-general's foot-guards on the formation of that body.

STEWART, William Morris, senator, b. in Lyons, N. Y., 9 Aug., 1827. He entered Yale in 1848, and, although he was not graduated, his name was afterward enrolled among the members of the class of 1852, and he received the degree of M. S., in 1853, the names of several of his textbooks being thereon. He was elected a member of the New York bar by the way of Panama and engaged in mining in Nevada county, where he discovered the celebrated Eureka diggings. He disposed of his mining interests and began the study of law early in 1852, and was appointed district attorney in December of that year, and in 1854 became attorney-general and settled in San Francisco. Later he moved to the free city of San Francisco, where he devoted himself to his duties, studied and practiced the laws that relate to mining. ditch- and water-rights, and similar processes. In 1869 he moved to Virginia City, Nev., and was retained in almost every case of importance before the higher courts. To his efforts is mainly due the permanent settlement of the titles of nearly all the mines on the great Comstock lode. In 1881 he was elected a member of the territorial council, and in 1863 he was elected a member of the Constitutional convention. Subsequently he was twice elected as a Republican to the U. S. senate, and served from 4 Dec., 1864, till 3 March, 1875. On his retirement he resumed the practice of his profession on the Pacific coast, where his great familiarity with mining law and mining litigation created a demand for his services. In 1887 he was again elected to the U. S. senate for a full term, taking his seat on 4 March. He has published various addresses and speeches.

STICKNEY, John, musician, b. in Stoughton, Mass., in 1744; d. in South Hadley, Mass., in 1827. He was taught music while a boy, and subsequently settled in Hadfield, where he gave lessons. Later he travelled extensively through the New England states, and acquired reputation as a teacher and composer, but finally settled in South Hadley, where he continued his teaching. He published "The Gentleman and Ladies' Musical Companion." (Newburyport, 1743), a valuable collection of psalms and anthems, together with expository matter. He died learning to sing while in his 70th year.

STILES, Ezra, b. in Windham, Conn., 17 Nov., 1807; d. in New Haven, Conn., 12 May, 1875. His ancestor, John, came from Bedfordshire, England, and settled in Windsor, Conn., in 1665, and John's grandson, Isaac, the father of Ezra, was graduated at Yale in 1732 and ordained pastor of the church in North Haven, then a part of New Haven, which charge he held until his death, 14 May, 1749. He published the "Prospect of the City of Jerusalem" (New London, 1742); "Looking-Glass for Change-lings" (1749); "The Declaration of the Association of the County of New Haven concerning the REV. George Whitefield" (Boston, 1745); and "The Character and Duty of Soldiers" (New London, 1759). Ezra was graduated at Yale in 1746, and in 1749 was chosen tutor there. About this time Benjamin Franklin sent an electrostatic apparatus to Yale, and, becoming interested in the new science, Mr. Stiles made some of the first experiments in electricity in New England. Having studied theology, he was licensed in 1749, and in April, 1750, preached to the Housatonic Indians in Stockbridge, Mass., but, owing to religious differences, returned to New York. He refused an appointment to be tutor of Yale, and, remaining there, abandoned the ministry for the law, and, being admitted to the bar in 1753, practised for two years in New Haven. In February, 1755, he delivered a Latin oration in honor of Dr. Franklin on the occasion of his visit to Yale, and formed a friendship with Franklin that lasted until death. In 1756 he became pastor of the 24th church in Newport, R.I., and during his residence and addition to his professional duties, devoted himself to literary and scientific research, corresponding with learned men in almost every part of the world. In 1767 he began the study of Hebrew and other oriental languages. His congregation having been scattered by the occupation of Newport by the British, he removed in 1777 to Portsmouth, N. H., to become pastor of the church. Returning to New Haven, to accept the presidency of Yale college, which post he held from 23 June, 1778, until his death, serving also as professor of ecclesiastical history, and after the death of Prof. Naphatli Daggart as professor of divinity, also lecturing on philosophy and astronomy. He was accounted, both at home and abroad, as the most learned and accomplished divine of his day in this country. He received the degrees of A. M. from Harvard in 1754, and that of S. T. D. from Edinburgh in 1765, Dartmouth in 1780, and Princeton in 1784. Princeton also gave him the degree of LL. D. in the last-named year. His publications are "Oratio Fanumbris Prop Exquisitis Johnsoni Lavo" (New London, 1741); "Discourse on Saving Knowledge" (Newport, 1770); "The United States Elevated to Glory and Honor," a sermon before the legislature (Hartford, 1783); "Account of the Settlement of Bristol, R. I." (Providence, 1785); and "History of Three of the Judges of Charles I., Major-General Whalley, Major-General Gage, and Col. Draycol, etc., with an Account of Mr. Theophilo Whate of Narragansett," who was supposed to have been also one of the judges (Hartford, 1794). Dr. Stiles left unfinished an "Ecclesiastical History of New England." His diary and forty-five volumes of manuscripts are preserved in the library of Yale. His daughter, Mary, married Dr. Abel Holmes, who wrote his "Life" (Boston, 1798). See also the "Life of Ezra Stiles," by James Lace Kingsley, in Sparks's "American Biography." STILES, Henry Reed, physician, b. in New York city, 10 March, 1862. He is the grandson of Ezra Stiles, and was educated at the University of the city of New York and at Williams. After graduation at the medical department of the University of the city of New York and at the New York Ophthalmic hospital in 1885, he practised in New York city, in Galena, Ill., and Toledo, Ohio. In 1886 he removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., and in 1887-8, under the firm of Calkins and Stiles, published educational works, "The Declaration of the Association of the County of New Haven concerning the REV. George Whitefield" (Boston, 1745); and "The Character and Duty of Soldiers" (New London, 1759). Ezra was graduated at Yale in 1746, and in 1749 was chosen tutor there. About this time Benjamin Franklin sent an electrostatic apparatus to Yale, and, becoming interested in the new science, Mr. Stiles made some of the first experiments in electricity in New England. Jan., 1865. He removed to Chicago, where he had earned a high reputation as a lawyer.

STILES, Joseph Clay, clergyman, b. in Savannah, Ga., 6 Dec., 1795; d. there, 27 March, 1875. After graduation at Yale in 1814 he studied law at Litchfield, and practised in his native city, but in 1832 entered Andover theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1835. After his ordination in 1837 he filled the pastorate of an evangelical church in Georgia and Florida from 1829 till 1835, and gave an impetus to Presbyterianism in his native state, reviving old churches and building new ones. In 1835 he removed to Kentucky and spent nine years in the west, where he frequently engaged in public theological discussion that grew out of the division of his denomination. In 1843 he accepted a call to Richmond, Va., and in 1848 he became pastor of the Mercer street church, New York city, which charge he resigned, owing to impaired health, and became general agent for the American Bible society in the south in 1850. In 1853 he became pastor of the South church in New Haven, Conn., organized a southern aid society, and in 1860 laboured as evangelist in the south. In 1862 he returned to New York. He received the degree of D. D. from Transylvania university in 1846, and that of L. L. B. from the University of Georgia in 1860. Dr. Stiles was the author of a “Speech on the Slavery Resolutions in the General Assembly” (New York, 1839); “Modern Reform Examined, or the Union of the North and South on the Subject of Slavery” (Philadelphia, 1838); “The National Conscience, or the Voice of the Fathers upon the State of the Country” (New York, 1861); and “Future Punishment Discussed in a Letter to a Friend” (St. Louis, 1868).—His brother, William Henry, lawyer, b. in Savannah, Ga., in January, 1808; d. there, 20 Dec., 1865, received an academic education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1831, and practised in Savannah. He was solicitor-general for the eastern district of Georgia in 1833–5, and afterward elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1845. On 19 April, 1845, he was appointed chargé d'affaires in Austria, holding this office until 3 Oct., 1849, and on his return he resumed law practice in Savannah. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a regiment for the Confederate States, which he commanded, but resigned, owing to impaired health. Yale college gave him the degree of A. M. in 1857. He was the author of a “History of Austria, 1848–9” (2 vols., New York, 1852).

STILL, William, philanthropist, b. in Shamong, Burlington co., N. J., 7 Oct., 1821. He is of African descent, and was brought up on a farm. Coming to Philadelphia in 1844, he obtained a clerkship in 1847 in the office of the Pennsylvania Anti-slavery society. He was chairman and corresponding secretary of the Philadelphia branch of the “underground railroad” in 1851–56, and basied himself in writing out the narratives of fugitive slaves. His writings constitute the only full account of the organization with which he was connected. Mr. Still married the wife, daughter, and sons of John Brown while he was awaiting execution in Charlestown, Va. During the civil war he was commissioned post-survey at Camp William Penn for colored troops, and was a member of the Freedmen’s aid union and commission. He is vice-president and chairman of the board of the bank of commerce chartered for colored persons, a member of the board of trustees of the Soldiers’ and sailors’ orphans’ home, and of other charitable institutions. In 1885 he was sent by the presbytery of Philadelphia as a commissioner to the general assembly at Cincinnati. He was one of the original stockholders of “The Nation,” and a member of the board of trade of Philadelphia. His writings include: “The Underground Rail-Road” (Philadelphia, 1857); “Voting and Laboring”; and “Struggle for the Rights of the Colored People of Philadelphia.”

STILLE, Alfred, 1825–1903, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 Oct., 1825. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1842 and at the medical department of that university in 1846, after which he was elected resident physician of the Philadelphia hospital. Dr. Stille then spent two years in higher medical studies in Paris and elsewhere in Europe, and in 1851 resumed them in Vienna. During 1859–61 he was an assistant physician to the Pennsylvania hospital. In 1844 he began to lecture on pathology and the practice of medicine before the Pennsylvania association for medical instruction, and continued so until 1850, also becoming physician to St. Joseph’s hospital in 1849. He was elected professor of the theory and practice of medicine in Pennsylvania medical college in 1850, and in 1854 he was president of the Philadelphia county medical society, and in 1859, of the American medical association in 1851, and of the College of physicians of Philadelphia in 1858. Dr. Stille has contributed to medical journals, and was associated with Dr. J. Forsyth Meigs in the translation of Andre’s “Pathological Hæmatology” (Philadelphia, 1844). Among his works are “Medical Instruction in the United States” (1845); “Elements of General Pathology” (1848); “Report on Medical Literature” (1850); “The Unity of Medicine” (1856); “Humboldt’s Life and Characters” (1859); “Therapeutics and Materia Medica; a Systematic Treatise on the Actions and Uses of Medicinal Agents” (2 vols., 1858); “War as an Instrument of National Policy” (Philadelphia, 1862); “Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis, or Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis” (1867). He was associated with John M. Marsh in the preparation of the “National Dispensatory” (1879), and he edited the second edition of the “Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence,” originally written by his brother, Morton Stille, with Francis Wharton.—His brother, Charles Janeway, historian, b. in Philadelphia, 22 Sept., 1829; d. there, 11 Aug., 1899, was graduated at Yale, and, after studying law, devoted his attention to literature. During the civil war he was an active member of the executive committee of the U. S. sanitary commission, of which he afterward became the historian. In 1866 he was appointed professor of history in the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1869 became provost, which place he filled until 1889. While holding this office he convinced the trustees and faculty of the necessity of considering the demands of advanced education, especially in the scientific branches, and largely through his influence the new buildings in West Philadelphia were erected and the scientific department was established. He also presided at the dedication of the library building erected in 1886–99 on the university grounds. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Yale in 1868. In addi-
to numerous addresses and pamphlets, he has published: "How a Free People Conduct a Long War" (Philadelphia, 1862); "History of the United States Sanitary Commission" (1864); "Quoted Sayings of the United States Sanitary Commission" (1866); and "Studies in Medieval History" (1867).—Another brother, Moreton, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 31 Oct., 1822; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 20 Aug., 1852, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1841, and after studying medicine with his brother, Alfred Stillman, was graduated at the medical department of the university in 1844. Subsequently he spent three years in the medical schools of Dublin, London, Paris, and Vienna, and on his return in 1847 settled in Philadelphia, where he began practice. In 1848 he was elected one of the resident physicians of the Pennsylvania hospital, which post he held for nine months, and in June, 1849, during the cholera epidemic of that year, he was appointed to serve in the Philadelphia almshouse, where he was stricken with the disease and narrowly escaped with his life. In 1855 he was appointed lecturer on the theory and practice of medicine in the Philadelphia association for medical instruction, and compiled his first course of lectures there. Dr. Stillman contributed various articles to the medical journals of Philadelphia, and was associated with Francis Wharton in the preparation of "A Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence" (Philadelphia, 1855).

STILLMAN, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 March, 1758; d. in Boston, Mass., 12 March, 1826, was educated at Charleston, S. C., where his parents had removed when he was eleven years old. His education, classical and theological, was good, though he attended neither college nor seminary. He was ordained to the ministry in 1780, and soon afterward became pastor of a Baptist church on James island. Impaired health obliged him to leave the south, and after preaching for congregations in New Jersey, he was called in 1783 to the pastoral charge of the 1st Baptist church in Boston, which relation he sustained for more than forty years. Few clergymen in New England were held in higher esteem or exerted a wider influence. As a preacher he had no superior. In all the philanthropic movements that subsisted Boston he was an active and honored worker. He was a member for that city of the convention in 1788 that ratified the constitution of the United States. His zeal for education was evinced especially in the interest that he took in Brown university, in whose act of incorporation (1766) and first list of trustees his name appears. In 1792 he attended the convention of D. D. Dr. Stillman published a large number of sermons, among which were "A Sermon on the Repeal of the Stamp Act" (1766); "Thoughts on the French Revolution" (1794); and "A Sermon occasioned by the Death of George Washington" (1799).

STILLMAN, Thomas Bliss, mechanical engineer, b. in Westerly, R. I., 30 Aug., 1806; d. in Plainfield, N. J., 1 Jan., 1866. He was educated at Union college, and in 1822 came to New York city and took charge of the Novelty iron-works. The first line of steamships on this coast to carry passengers and freight between New York and Charleston, S. C., were built under his superintendence. During the Civil war he was U. S. inspector of steam vessels for the New York district, and superintendent of construction of revenue cutters. His last work was to put twelve armed steam cutters afloat in place of the sailing vessels that had been previously used. He was also at various times president of the board of comptrollers of the park board in New Jersey county, and of the Metropolitan police commission. For nearly twenty years he was a trustee of the New York hospital, and he was long president of the Metropolitan savings bank. He invented improved forms of machinery that have come into use.—His brother, William James, author, b. in Schenectady, N. Y., 21 June, 1808, was graduated at Union college in 1835, and elected corresponding member of the Boston Athenæum. In 1844 he went to Europe, remaining six months, and returning with a thorough belief in the new school of pre-Raphaelitism. During 1851-9 he was a regular exhibitor at the Academy of design, of which he was elected an associate member in 1854. In 1852 he went to Hungary for Louis Kossuth, to carry away the crown jewels of the kingdom, which had been hidden by Kossuth during the revolution. Thence he went to Paris, to study under Adolphe Yvon. On his return to the United States, in company with John Durand he founded the "crayon," in 1855. He returned to Europe in 1859, and was U. S. consul in Rome during 1861-3, and in Ceylon in 1863-5. Since 1870 he has devoted himself entirely to literature. During 1857-82 he acted as correspondent of the London "Times" in Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Greece, and in 1883-5 he was the art critic of the New York "Evening Post" and associate editor of the "Photographic Times." Since 1886 he has resided at Rome as the London "Times" correspondent, and was appointed vice-consul of the United States at Ephesus, and correspondent of the Athens "London, 1870; "Creetan Insurrection" (New York, 1874); "Herzegovina and the Late Uprising" (London, 1875); and "On the Track of Ulysses" (Boston, 1857). He has also edited "Poetic Localities of Cambridge" (Boston, 1854), and has contributed articles to various magazines. Mr. Stillman is an expert photographer, and in 1872-9 published two manuals of photography. In 1872 he also brought out twenty-five photographic views of Athens, and in 1886 the Autotype company of London began the publication, for the Hellenic society, of a series of photographs from his negatives of the Acropolis.

STILLWELL, Silas Moore, lawyer, b. in New York city, 5 June, 1806; d. there, 10 May, 1881. His ancestor, John, of Johnstown, was a regicide, emigrated to this country early in the 17th century, where he adopted the name Stillwell. Stephen, the father of Silas M. Stillwell, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, went in 1804 to Woodstock, Ulster co., N. Y., where he established a glass-factory. The son was educated at Woodstock free academy until 1812, when his father having failed, he went to New York and entered business. In 1814 he engaged in surveying in the west, and then settled in Tennessee, where in 1822 he was in the legislature. He afterward removed to Vir-
STIMSON, Virginia, was clerk of Tazewell county, and a member of the house of burgesses, and in 1823 was admitted to the bar. He returned to New York in 1828, and in 1829 was elected to the legislature, where he continued until 1831. In 1834 he became a candidate for lieutenant-governor on the ticket with William H. Seward. He was elected alderman in New York city in 1835, and made chairman of the board; the political parties divided, and Stimson, having cast the casting-vote on all appointments, became popularly known as King Caucus. He was the acting mayor at the time of the great fire in 1835. On Gen. Harrison's election to the presidency he was offered a cabinet appointment, but, having lost his fortune in the panic of 1837, he declined, but he was with Harrison during most of the latter's short term of office, and after his death accepted the appointment of U. S. marshal for the southern district of New York, which he held during Tyler's administration. At this time he was sent on a special mission to the Hague to inquire as to the feasibility of negotiating a loan for the U. S. government. At the end of his term he resigned the practice of law. Mr. Stimson was the author of several valuable publications, and he held the appointment of assistant commissioner for debt and to punish fraudulent debtors," which was passed, 26 April, 1831. This was commonly called the Stilwell act. He was also the author of the banking laws of the state of New York, of the general bankrupt act, and of the national banking act and system of organized credits in 1863. He wrote a great deal on questions of finance, beginning in 1837. His first pamphlet was entitled "A System of Credit for a Republic and Plan of a Bank for the State of New York" (1838). Others were "Notes Explanatory of Mr. Chase's Plan of National Finance," and "National Finances: a Philosophical Examination of Credit" (1866). Many of his articles appeared in the "Herald," from 1830 till 1872, under the pen-name of "Jonathan Oldbuck."

STIMSON, William, naturalist, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 14 Feb., 1832; d. in Dedham, Mass., 26 May, 1872. He was early led to the study of natural history, and made extensive collections. It is claimed that he was the first to enter upon the work of deepsea dredging in searching for specimens. He became a pupil of Louis Agassiz, and, with the beautiful and abundant material on an expedition to Norfolk, Va., and Charleston, S. C., to investigate the marine fauna of that region. Later in the year he was appointed naturalist to the North Pacific expedition, and spent three years and a half in making observations and collections. On his return he settled in Washington, and for nine years was engaged in classifying the results that he had obtained. In 1864 he became curator of the Chicago academy of sciences, and subsequently he was its secretary. While holding this office he organized a system of exchanges by which the library of the academy was supplied with scientific journals and transactions, and enriched its museum with specimens of natural history from all parts of the world. These collections, as well as much other valuable literature, including his own manuscripts, which represented the researches of more than twenty years, were destroyed by the fire of 1871. For several years he visited Florida on scientific expeditions, and during the early part of 1872 he was engaged in superintending deepsea dredging, under the auspices of the U. S. coast survey, in the Gulf of Mexico. The thoroughness of his researches and the accuracy of his conclusions, and his descriptions, gained for him a high rank as a scientific observer, and it was said of him that he described more new species of marine animals than any naturalist except James D. Dana. He was a member of various scientific societies, and was early elected to membership in the National academy of sciences. During his connection with the Chicago academy of sciences he edited its "Transactions" and its annual reports. Besides his various contributions to scientific proceedings, he published widely on memoirs, including A "Revision of the Synonymy of the Testacea of New England" (Boston, 1851); "Synopsis of the Marine Invertebrata of Grand Manan," in the "Smithsonian Contributions" (Washington, 1853); "trustees and Edindependants of the Pacific Shores of North America" (Boston, 1857); "Descriptions Animalium Eutochotides" (Philadelphia, 1857-1860); and "Notes on North American Crustacea" (New York, 1859). He was associated in the preparation of "Check-Lists of the Shells of North America" (Washington, 1860), and "Researches upon the Hydrobiidae and Allied Forms" (1865).

STIMSON, Alexander Lovett, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 14 Dec., 1816. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1840, and was also connected with the press of New York, and New Orleans for many years. Mr. Stimson established in 1852, and for several years edited the "Express Messenger." He is the author of a "History of the Boston Mercantile Library Association"; "Easy Nat., or the Three Apprentices." (New York, 1850; republished as "New England Boys"); "History of the Express Company, and the Origin of American Railroads" (1852; new ed. 1881); "Wallfords," a novel (1864); and many tales in periodicals.

STIMSON, Frederic Jesup, author, b. in Dedham, Mass., 20 July, 1855. He was graduated at Harvard in 1875, and at the law-school in 1878, and was assistant attorney-general of Massachusetts from 1881 till 1885. He has pursued literature with law, writing his earlier novels under the pen-name of "J. S. of Hale." He has published "Stimson's Law Glossary" (Boston, 1881); "Guernirow," a novel (New York, 1882); "The Crime of Henry Vane" (1884); "The King's Men," in collaboration (1884); "American Statute Law" (Boston, 1886); "The Sentimental Calendar" (New York, 1886); "The Stigmatic" (1887); and "A Residuary Legatee." (1888). He was also one of the authors of "Rollo's Journey to Cambridge," which first appeared in the "Harvard Lampoon" and afterwards in book-form (Boston, 1879).

STIMSON, John Ward, artist, b. in Paterson, N. J., 15 Dec., 1850. He was graduated at Yale in 1872, and then studied art at the Ecole des beaux arts in Paris, France. On his return to this country he became art instructor and lecturer at Princeton, but on the establishment of the art-schools that are connected with the Metropolitan museum in New York city he was appointed their superintendents. During the four years that he had charge of these schools Mr. Stimson increased the membership from thirty pupils to nearly four hundred, with seventy classes. Owing to differences between himself and the trustees, who showed a desire to restrict his power, he resigned. In February, 1888, he announced his desire to found a New York university for artist artisans, and he has received substantial support for his scheme from the citizens of New York city. Mr. Stimson has meanwhile continued his artistic work, and has contributed to the national collections, and has also written for periodicals, and has published "The Law of Three Primaries." (New York, 1884).
STIRLING, Sir Thomas, bart., British soldier, d. 9 May, 1808. He became captain in July, 1753, in the 34th, or Royal Highland regiment, which took part in the expeditions of 1756-9 to Lake George and Lake Champlain. It was afterward sent to assist at the siege of Niagara, and in 1760 accompanied Sir Jeffrey Amherst from Oswego to Montreal. Capt. Stirling was stationed at Fort Chartres, Ill., in 1765, and in June, 1769, he returned to Philadelphia, after a march of more than 3,000 miles, with his entire detachment of 100 men in perfect health and without accident. He became major in 1770, and lieutenant-colonel in 1771, commanding his regiment throughout the Revolutionary war. He was in the engagement at the Battle of Bunker Hill, the capture of Red Bank, the battle of the Brandwine, and that of Springfield, 7 June, 1779, where he was wounded. He was made colonel in 1779, and held the rank of brigadier-general under Sir Henry Clinton in the expedition against Charleston, S. C., in 1780. He became colonel of the 1st Highlanders in February, 1782, major-general in November following; lieutenant-general and a baronet in 1799, and was made general in 1803.

STITH, William, historian, b. in Virginia, in 1689; d. in Williamsburg, Va., 27 Sept., 1755. He was a nephew of Sir John Randolph, and brother-in-law of Peyton Randolph. After studying theology, he was ordained in England as a minister of the established church, and in 1731 became master of the grammar-school of William and Mary college. He was chaplain of the house of burgesses in 1738, and in 1738-5 returned to London to teach children of Henrico parish and president of William and Mary. He published a "History of Virginia from the First Settlement to the Dissolution of the London Company" (Williamsburg, 1747; new ed., with bibliographical notice by Joseph Sabin, limited to 250 copies, New York, 1866). Thomas Jefferson says of this work that it is "impartial and often too minute to be tolerable," and De Toqueville calls it "long and diffuse," but it is praised highly by others for its accuracy. Stith acknowledges in his preface his indebtedness to the writings of William Byrd, and he also made use of materials that Sir John Randolph had collected for a purported history, but the MSS. of which the materials used have been recently destroyed by fire. He also wrote "The Nature and Extent of Christ's Redemption," a sermon (Williamsburg, 1758).

STOBO, Robert, soldier, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1727; d. after 1770. His father, William, was a wealthy merchant. The son was very delicate in his youth, but early gained evidence of taste for arms, spending his play-hours in drilling his companions. Both his parents had died before 1742, and, after studying for some time in the university of his native place, he went to Virginia about that year and became a merchant. Here he kept open house and was a great social favorite, but met with little success in business, and in 1754 was appointed senior captain in a regiment that was raised by his own efforts. His services were mentioned in the French Campaigns. Under his direction the intrenchments called Fort Necessity were thrown up, and when finally Maj. George Washington was obliged to surrender the work, Stobo was one of two hostages that were given to the French to secure proper performance of the articles of capitulation. He was sent to Fort Frontenac, where he continued to hold a responsible position. Among the charges brought against him in the French trial was his having a plan of that stronghold, which, with a written scheme for its reduction, he sent to the commanding officer at Willis Creek. He was greatly aided in obtaining his information by the ladies in the fort, whose good graces he soon secured in gaining. He considered that the want of good faith that the French had shown in various matters absolved him "from all obligations of honor on this point." His letters fell into the hands of the French at Braddock's defeat, whereupon Stobo was closely imprisoned at Quebec. He escaped in 1756, but was captured, confined in a dungeon, and on 28 Nov., was condemned to death as a spy, the king failed to approve the sentence. On 20 April, 1757, he escaped again, but he was recaptured three days later. On 30 April, 1758, he made another attempt, and succeeded in effecting his escape with several companions in a birch-bark canoe. After meeting with many adventures and traveling thirty-eight days they reached the British army before Louisbourg, where Stobo was of much service in his knowledge of localities. He had been promoted major during his captivity, and after returning to Virginia sailed in 1760 for England, where, on 5 June, 1761, he was commissioned captain in the 15th foot. He served in the West Indies in 1762, but returned to England in 1765, and resigned in 1790. On his visit to Virginia after his early days away from the legislature there, his name for his services, and voted him the sum of $1,500. Stobo was a friend of Tobias Smollett, the novelist, who, it has been suggested, describes him as Captain Lineshagoe in "Humphrey Clinker." The original edition of Stobo's "Memoirs" (London, 1800) is now rare. A manuscript copy was obtained by James McHenry from the British public library and published with notes, additions, and a facsimile of Stobo's plan of Fort Du Quesne, by "N. B. C.," as "Memoirs of Major Robert Stobo of the Virginia Regiment" (Pittsburg, 1854). This unique work is largely written in an imitation of the classical epic style.

STOCKBRIDGE, Francis Brown, senator, b. in Bath, Me., 9 April, 1829; d. in Chicago, 30 April, 1894. He resided in Boston from 1842 till 1847, when he became a lumber merchant in Chicago. In 1854 he removed to Saugatuck, Mich., and April 1863 he resided in Kalamazoo. He had served as a colonel of Michigan militia, was successively in both branches of the legislature in 1869-71, and in January, 1887, was elected to the U. S. senate, and reelected in 1892.

STOCKBRIDGE, Levi, agriculturist, b. in North Hadley, Mass., 13 March, 1820. He was educated in New England common schools and academies, and then turned his attention to farming. His application of scientific principles to his occupation led to his appointment on the State board of agriculture, where he served for four terms of three years each. After 1888 he had been chairman of the State board of cattle commissioners. In 1867 he was called to a professorship in the Massachusetts agricultural college, Amherst, where he was also acting president in 1876-7, and president in 1880-2. Prior to the establishment of experiment stations he began and prosecuted during several years a laborious and extended investigation of the causes of the death of growing plants, especially trees, and the force that plants exert in their growth. About the same time he devised and prosecuted a series of experiments as to the effect of moisture, and with apparatus that he invented for the purpose made observations on percolation, evaporation, and dew. But his most valuable laboratory was the result of a series of investigations that he conducted during 1868-70 on the chemical composition of farm crops, and the effect of supplying to the soil on which any particular crop was to be raised the constituents of that crop. This led to the employment of the special fertilizers that are most widely used in the place of general fertilizers, or graden fertilizers, which for a special purpose might be valuable or worthless. He is a member of various agricultural associations and has made many addresses on his specialties in New England and New York.

His writings, including the results of his researches, appear in various publications, chiefly in the annual reports of the Michigan Agricultural college.

His brother, Henry, lawyer, b. in North Hadley, 31 Aug. 1822; d. in Baltimore, 11 March, 1895, was originally named Henry Smith Stockbridge, but he dropped the Smith. He was graduated at Amherst in 1845, and studied law in Baltimore, where he was admitted to the bar in 1848, and practised his profession. During the civil war he was a special district attorney to attend to the business of the war department, and in 1864, as a member of the legislature, he drafted the act that convened a constitutional convention for the abolition of slavery in the state. He took an active part in the proceedings of the convention, and defended the constitution that it adopted before the court of last resort. Afterward he instituted several cases prosecuted in the U.S. courts, proceedings by which were annulled the indentures of apprenticeship by which it was sought to evade the emancipation clause. Mr. Stockbridge thus practically secured the enfranchisement of more than 10,000 colored children. He was judge of the circuit court for Baltimore county in 1865, a delegate to the Locals' convention in 1866, and vice-president of the Republican convention of 1868. Mr. Stockbridge had been for twenty years editor of the Fund publications of the Maryland historical society, of which he was vice-president; and the author of publication No. 22: "The Archives of Maryland" (Baltimore, 1886); besides various contributions to magazines.

STOCKTON, Alfred Augustus, Canadian lawyer, b. in St. John, King's co., New Brunswick, 2 Nov. 1842. His great-grandfather, Andrew Hunter Stockton, a native of Princeton, N. J., fought on the royal side in the war of the Revolution, and afterward settled in New Brunswick. Mr. Stockton was graduated at Mount Allison college in 1864, and was admitted to the bar of New Brunswick in 1867 and became a member of the New Brunswick legislature in 1885. He is secretary of the board of governors of Mount Allison college, an examiner in political economy and constitutional history, and also an examiner in law at Victoria University, the president of the New Brunswick historical society, and register of the court of vice-admiralty of the province. He has received the degree of M.A., B. from the University of New Brunswick, and of M.C. from Mount Allison college in 1884. He edited "Rules of the Vice-Admiralty Court in New Brunswick" (St. John, 1876), and "Berton's Report of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick," with copious notes (1885).

STOCKTON, Richard, signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Princeton, N. J., 1 Oct. 1739; d. there, 28 Feb. 1781. His great-grandfather, of the same name, came from England before 1670, and, after residing several years on Long Island, purchased, about 1680, a tract of 6,400 acres of land, of which Princeton, N. J., is nearly the centre. About 1682 he and his associates formed a settlement there, and were the first Europeans in the district. Richard's father, John, inherited "Moaven," the family seat, and was for many years chief judge of the court of common pleas of Somerset county. The son graduated at Princeton in 1748, studied law with David Ogden in Newark, and in 1754 was admitted to the bar, in which he soon attained great reputation. After acquiring a competency, he visited Great Britain 1766-7, making the acquaintance of many public men and receiving the freedom of the city from the municipal authorities of Edinburgh. He exerted himself especially to remove the prevailing ignorance regarding the American colonies. While he was in Scotland his personal friend, Dr. John Witherspoon, reconsidered his refusal to become president of Princeton, and for this and other services to the college Mr. Stockton received the formal thanks of its trustees after his return in September, 1767. In 1788 he was made a member of the executive council of the province, and in 1774 he was raised to the supreme bench of New Jersey. He strove at first to effect a reconciliation between the colonies and the mother country, and on 12 Dec. 1774, sent to Lord Dartmouth "An Expedition for the Settlement of the American Disputes," in which he proposed a plan of colonial self-government, but he soon became active in efforts to organize a prudent opposition, and on 21 June, 1776, was chosen by the Provincial congress a member of the Continental congress; then in session in Philadelphia. His silence during the opening debates on the question of independence leads to the conclusion that at first he doubted the expediency of the declaration, but at the close of the discussion he expressed his concurrence in the final vote in a short but energetic address. He was re-elected to congress, where he was an active member, and in September, 1776, at the first meeting of the state delegates under the new constitution, was a candidate for governor. On the first ballot he and William Livingston received an equal number of votes, but the latter was finally elected. Mr. Stockton was then chosen chief justice by a unanimous vote, but declined. On 26 Sept. 1778, he and George Clymer were appointed a committee to inspect the northern army. On 30 Nov., at night, he was captured by a party of loyalists at the house of John Covenhoven, in Monmouth, N. J., which was then his temporary home. His best shared his fate. Mr. Stockton was thrown into the common prison in New York, and treated with such severity as to which seriously affected his health. Congress passed a resolution directing Gen. Washington to inquire into the circumstance, remonstrate with Gen. Howe, and ask "whether he chooses this shall be the future rule for treating all such, on both sides, as the fortune of war may place in the hands of either party. Mr. Stockton was exchanged shortly afterward, but never regained his health. His library, which was one of the best in the country, had been burned by the British, and his lands were laid waste. His fortune was greatly diminished by these depredations, and the depreciation of the Continental currency, and he was compelled to have temporary recourse to the aid of friends. Mr. Stockton, though of a hasty temper and somewhat haughty to those that manifested want of personal respect to him, was a man of great generosity and courtesy. He possessed much courage and agility as a horseman and swordsman. His funeral sermon was delivered in the college hall at Princeton by Rev. Remsen S. Smith, D. D. His statue was placed by the state of New Jersey in the capitol at Washington in 1888. The accompanying vignette is a representation of his residence at Princeton. His wife, Ann, sister of Dr. Elias Boudinot, was well known for her literary attainments, and contributed to periodicals. One of her poems addressed to Washington after the surrender at Yorktown, drew from him a courteous acknowledgment. She also wrote the stanzas beginning “Welcome, mighty chief, once more!” which were sung by young ladies of Trenton while strewing flowers before Gen. Washington on his passage through that city just before his first inauguration as president. They are given in full in Chief-Justice Marshall’s “Life of Washington.” — Their son, Richard, senator, b. near Princeton, N. J., 17 April, 1764: d. there, 7 March, 1828, was graduated at Princeton in 1789, studied law in Newark with Elias Boudinot, was admitted to the bar in 1794, and began to practice in his native place. He was a presidential elector in 1792, and in 1811 was chosen to the U. S. Senate as a Federalist for theexpired term of Frederick Frelinghuysen, resigned, serving from 6 Dec. of that year till 3 March, 1799, when he declined to be a candidate for re-election. He served in the lower house of congress in 1813-15, and again declined further candidacy. During his service in the house of representatives he had a debate with Charles J. Ingersoll, of Philadelphia, on free-trade and sailors' rights. In 1827 he was appointed one of the commissioners on the part of New Jersey to settle a territorial dispute with New York, and he was the author of the able argument that is appended to the report of the New Jersey commissioners. Mr. Stockton possessed profound legal knowledge and much eloquence as an advocate, and for more than a quarter of a century held the highest rank at the bar of his native state. He received the degree of L. L. D. from Queen's (now Rutgers) college in 1815, and from Union in 1816. He was often called “The Duke.” — The second Richard's son, Robert Field, naval officer, b. in Princeton, N. J., 20 Aug., 1795: d. there, 2 Oct., 1866, studied at Princeton college, but before completing his course he entered the U. S. navy as a midshipman, 1 Sept., 1811. He joined the frigate "President" at Newport, 14 Feb., 1812, and made several cruises in that ship with Com. Rodgers, with whom he went as aide to the "Guerriere" at Philadelphia: but, as the ship was unable to go to sea, Rodgers took his crew to assist in defending Baltimore. Before the arrival of the British, Stockton went to Washington and became the aide of the secretary of the navy, after which he resumed his post with Com. Rodgers and took part in the operations at Alexandria. He then went with Rodgers to Baltimore and had command in the defense of Fort McHenry against the British army. He was highly commended, and promoted to lieutenant, 9 Sept., 1814. On 10 May, 1815, he sailed in the "Guerriere," De Catine's flagship, on the Mediterranean after the declaration of war with Algiers, but he was transferred soon afterward to the schooner "Spartan," as 1st lieutenant, in which vessel he participated in the capture of the Algerine frigate "Mahound," and led the boarders at the capture of the Algerine brig "Eshkat." In June, 1815. In February, 1816, he joined the "ship-of-the-line Washington" and made another cruise in the Mediterranean, in the course of which he was transferred to the ship "Erie," of which he soon became executive officer. The American officers very often had to deal with the French officers, and frequent duels took place. At one time in Gibraltar, Stockton had accepted challenges to fight all the captains of the British regiment in the garrison, and several meetings took place. In one case after wounding his adversary he escaped arrest by knocking one of the guard from his horse, which he seized and rode to his boat. Stockton came home in command of Washington in 1821. Shortly after his return the American colonization society obtained his services to command the schooner "Alligator" for the purpose of founding a colony on the west coast of Africa. He sailed in the autumn of 1821, and after skillful diplomatic conferences obtained a concession of a tract of territory near Cape Mesurado, which has since become the republic of Liberia. In November, 1821, the Portuguese letter-of-marque "Marina Flora" fired on the "Alligator," which she mistook for a pirate. After an engagement of twenty minutes the Portuguese vessel was taken and the capture was declared legal, though the prize was returned by courtesy to Portugal. On a subsequent cruise in the "Alligator" he captured the corsair "Joue," in which was employed the right to seize slaves under a foreign flag was first established as legal. He also captured several piratical vessels in the West Indies. From 1826 until December, 1838, he was on leave, and resided at Princeton, N. J. He organized the New Jersey colonization society, became interested in the turf, and imported from England some of the finest stock of blooded horses. He also took an active part in politics, and became interested in the Delaware and Kariati canal, for which he obtained the charter that had originally been given to a New York company, and vigorously prosecuted the work. His whole fortune and that of his family were invested in the enterprise, which was completed, notwithstanding the position of railroads and a financial crisis, by which he was obliged to go to Europe to negotiate a loan. He retained his interest in this canal during his life, and the work stands as an enduring monument to his energy and enterprise. In December, 1838, he sailed with Com. Isaac Hull in the flagship "Ohio" as fleet-captain of the Mediterranean squadron and returned in December, 1841. He returned in the latter part of 1839, and took part in the presidential canvass of 1840 in favor of Gen. William Henry Harrison. After John Tyler became presi-Stockton was offered a seat in the cabinet as secretary of the navy, which he declined. The U.S. steamer “Princeton” (seeEricsson,John) was built under his supervision, and launched at Philadelphia early in 1841. He was appointed to command the ship, and brought her to Washington for the inspection of officials and members of congress. On a trial-trip down the Potomac river, when the president, cabinet, and a distinguished company were on board, one of the large guns burst and killed the secretary of state, secretary of the navy, Gardner of Gardner’s island, and several of the crew, while a great many were seriously injured. A naval court of inquiry entirely exonerated Capt. Stockton. Shortly after this event he sailed in the “Princeton” as bearer of the annexation resolutions to the government of Texas. In October, 1845, he went in the frigate “Congress” from Norfolk to serve as commander-in-chief of the Pacific squadron, on the eve of the Mexican war. He sailed around Cape Horn to the Sandwich islands, and thence to Monterey, where he found the squadron in possession under Com. John D. Sloat, whom Stockton relieved. News of the war had been received by the squadron before his arrival. Monterey and San Francisco were captured. Stockton assumed command of all American forces on the coast by proclamation, 23 July, 1846. He organized a battalion of Americans in California and naval brigades from the crews of the ships. Col. John C. Frémont also cooperated with him. He sent Frémont in the “Crane” to San Diego, while he landed at Santa Barbara and marched thirty miles with the naval brigade to the Mexican capital of California, the city of Los Angeles, of which he took possession on 13 Aug. He then organized a civil government for the state, and appointed Capt. Mr. Stockton voting in the affirmative. His vote was objected to by Charles Sumner, and on the following day, 27 March, 1866, he withdrew it, and was not seated by a vote of twenty-three to twenty-one. He then devoted himself to the practice of his profession, but in 1859 was re-elected to the senate, and served one term till 1865. While in that body he advocated the establishment of life-saving stations on the coast, and procured on the appropriation bills the first provision for their maintenance. He served on the committees on foreign affairs, the navy, appropriations, patents, and public lands and grounds; and took part in the debate on reconstruction and the question of questions of international law. In 1877 he was appointed attorney-general of New Jersey, and he was chosen again in 1882 and 1887. In this office he has sustained by exhaustive arguments the system of railroad taxation, reversing in the court of errors the decisions of the supreme court against the constitutionality of the act. Mr. Stockton has been a delegate-at-large to all the Democratic National conventions since that of 1864, where, as chairman of the New Jersey delegation, he nominated Gen. George B. McClellan for the presidency. He was also a delegate to the Unionists' convention at Philadelphia in 1866. Princevin gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1882. He has published "Equity Reports, " being the decisions of the courts of chancery and appeals (6 vols., Trenton, 1856-1900).

STOCKTON, Thomas Hewlings, clergyman, b. in Mount Holly, N. J., 4 June, 1808; d. in Philadelphia, 1866. He was a half-brother of Mrs. G. W. Stoddard, whose father, Rev. Thomas Stoddard, was a prominent clergyman in Philadelphia, but began to preach in 1829, entered the ministry of the Methodist Protestant church, and took charge of a circuit on the eastern shore of Maryland. He soon attained a reputation as a pulpit orator, and served as chaplain to the U. S. house of representatives in 1835-36 and 1839-41, and to the senate in 1862. Being unwilling to submit to the restrictions in the discussion of slavery that were imposed by the Baltimore conference, he went to Philadelphia in 1838, where he was a pastor and lecturer till 1847. He then resided in Cincinnati, Ohio, till 1850, and while there declined a unanimous election to the presidency of Miami University. From 1850 till 1856 he was associate pastor of St. John's Methodist Protestant church in Philadelphia, where he became a very popular preacher, and held a half of this period as pastor of an Associate Reformed Presbyterian church there. From 1856 till his death he was pastor of the Church of the New Testament in Philadelphia, and also devoted himself to literary work. Dr. Stockton edited at different periods the "Christian World" and the "Bible Times." He was an anti-slavery pioneer, opposed secession, and was active in his labors for all social reforms. He published editions of the Bible, each book by itself: "Floating Flowers from a Hidden Brook" (Philadelphia, 1844); "The Bible Alliance" (Cincinnati, 1850); "Ecclesiastical Opposition to the Bible" (Baltimore, 1853); "Sermons for the People" (Pittsburg, 1854); "The Blessing" (Philadelphia, 1857); "Stand up for Jesus, a ballad, with notes, illustrations, and music, and a few additional poems" (1858); "Poems, with Autobiographical and other Notes" (1862); and "Influence of the United States on Christianity" (1865). After his death appeared his "The Book above all" (1870). See "Memory's Tribute to the Life, Character, and Work of Rev. Thomas S. Stockton" (New York, 1869), and "Life, Character, and Death of Rev. Thomas H. Stockton," by Rev. John G. Wilson (Philadelphia, 1869). - His half-brother, Francis Richard, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 April, 1834, was graduated at the Central high school in his native city in 1852, became an engraver and draughtsman, and in 1865 invented and patented a double graver, but he soon abandoned this occupation for journalism. After being connected with the "Post" in Philadelphia and "Heath and Home" in New York, he joined the editorial staff of "Scrivener's Monthly," and on the establishment of "St. Nicholas," became its assistant editor. Mr. Stockton's earliest writings, under the name of Frank R. Stockton, which he has since retained, were fantastic tales for children, and appeared in the "Riverside Magazine" and other periodicals. Four of these, under the title of "The Ting-a-Ling Stories," were issued in a volume (Boston, 1871). More recently he has attained a wide reputation for his short stories, which are marked by quaintness of subject and treatment and are of the highest quality. The best known of these are: "Rudder Grange," stories, which appeared in "Scrivener's Monthly," and afterward in book form (New York, 1879); "The Lady or the Tiger?" is perhaps the most widely known. It ends by producing a problem, various solutions of which are given, and some serious and some comical, have appeared from time to time. A comic opera, based upon it, the libretto of which was written by Sydney Rosenfeld, was produced in New York in 1888. Mr. Stockton's other short stories include "The Transferred Ghost," "The Spectral Mortgage," and "A Tale of Negative Gravity." He is also the author of the novels: "The Late Mrs. Newcome" (New York, 1861); "The Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Alchemy" (1866), with a sequel, entitled "The Dantes" (1888); and "The Hundreth Man" (1887). His short stories have been collected as "The Lady or the Tiger? and other stories" (1884); "The Christmas Wreck, and other Tales" (1887); and "The Best Man of Orn, and other Fanciful Tales" (1887). He has written for children "Roundabout Rambles" (1872); "What might have been Expected" (1874); "Tales Out of School" (1875); "A Jolly Fellowship" (1880); "The Floating Prince" (1881); and "The Story of Vitae" (1884). - Francis Richard's brother, John Drean, journalist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 April, 1866; d. there, 3 Nov., 1877, was educated in his native city, and began to write at an early age on the Philadelphia "Press," and became its manager under John W. Forney. He was connected with the New York "Tribune" in 1866, and in 1867 assumed the editorship of the Philadelphia "Post," of which he became a proprietor, but he gave up his interest in 1872, and from 1873 till his death was drama critic and illustrated editor of the New York "Herald." He wrote "Fox and Geese," a comedy (1868), which ran 100 nights in New York and other cities, and more than 300 in London. Mr. Stockton's political editorials, as well as his dramatic and literary criticisms, were marked by touches of humor and poetic fancy.

STODDARD, Charles Warren, author, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 7 Aug., 1844. He was educated in New York city and in California, to which state he had removed with his father in 1855. In 1864 he went to the Hawaiian islands, where he has since passed much of his time, and as travelling correspondent of the San Francisco "Chronicle" in 1873-8, visited many islands of the South seas, Europe, Asia, Africa, and the Pacific slope from Alaska to Japan. He early began verse and short prose, but his early age, was for a short time an actor, has contributed to many magazines, and has also lectured. He was professor of English literature in Notre Dame college, Ind., in 1885-6. He has published "Poems" (San Francisco, 1867); "South Sea Idyls" (Boston, 1873); "Masallah: A Flight into Egypt" (New York, 1881); and "The Lepers of U_VOLO" (New York, 1883).

STODDARD, John F., educator, b. in Greenfield, Ulster co., N. Y., 20 July, 1825; d. in Kearney, N. J., 6 Aug., 1873. His early years were passed on a farm, and, after attending the public schools, he began teaching in 1843. Later he entered the New York normal school, and, upon his graduation in 1847, began his life-work as an educator. He was eminently successful as an instructor of mathematics and in his efforts to promote normal schools, and left a fund to Rochester university for a gold medal to be awarded to the best student in mathematics. His principal published works are "Practical Arithmetic" (New York, 1852); "Philosophical and Algebraic Arithmetics" (1857); and "The School Arithmetic" (1868). The annual sale of Stoddard's arithmetics was at one time about 200,000 copies, now 40,000, and up to July, 1897, over 2,500,000 copies had been issued.
STODDARD, Joshua C., inventor, b. in Pawlet, Vt., 26 Aug., 1814. He was educated at the public schools, and became noted as an apothecary. He also turned his attention to inventing, and in 1856 devised the steam-collchute, which is used on Mississippi steamers. He also invented the Stoddard horse-rake and hay-tedder. More than 100,000 of his rakes are now in use.

STODDARD, Richard Henry, poet, b. in Hingham, Mass., 2 July, 1832. His father, a sea-captain, was wrecked and lost on one of his voyages while Richard was a child, and the lad went in 1855 to New York with his mother, who had married again. He attended the public schools of that city, but worked for several years in an iron-foundry, at the same time reading the best authors, particularly poetry. His talents brought him into collisions with young men interested in literature, notably with Bayard Taylor, who had just published his "Views Afoot.

Stoddard had written verses from his early years, and in 1849 printed privately a collection in a small volume called "Footprints," the edition of which he afterward destroyed. In 1852 he published a riper volume of poems, became a contributor to the "Knickereeaber," and entered upon literary work. Writing as a means of subsistence became such a burden that, through Nathaniel Hawthorne, he obtained a place in the custom-house and retained it from 1853 till 1870. He was confidential clerk to Gen. George B. McClellan in the dock department in 1870-73, and city librarian in New York for about a year. He was literary reviewer on the New York "World" from 1860 to 1870, and has held the same office on the "Mail and Mail and Express" since 1880. He also edited for some time "The Alcmeon," an illustrated periodical, which was popular with artists, his mind and tastes are poetical, but he has done a good deal of booksellers' work from the urgency of circumstances. In 1853 he published "Adventures in Fairy Land" for young folks, and in 1857 "Songs of Summer," abounding in luxuriant imagination and tropical feeling. Among his other works are "Town and Country," for children (New York, 1857); "Life Travels and Skirmishes" (1862); "The Story of Little Red Riding Hood," in verse (New York, 1864); "The Children in the Wood," in verse (1865); "Abraham Lincoln, a Horatian Ode" (1865); "Putnam, the Brave" (1856) and "The Book of the Poems of Alexander von Humboldt," with an introduction by Bayard Taylor (Boston, 1860; London, 1862); "The King's Bell," a poem (Boston, 1862; London, 1864; New York, 1865); "The Story of Little Red Riding Hood," in verse (New York, 1864); "Abraham Lincoln, a Horatian Ode" (1865); "Putnam, the Brave" (1856) and "The Book of the Poems of Alexander von Humboldt." He has edited "The Last Political Writings of Gen. Nathaniel Lyon" (1861); "The Loves and Heroines of the Poets" (1861); John Guy Vassar's "Twenty-one Years Round the World" (1862); "Melodies and Madrigals, mostly from the Old English Poets" (1865); "The Late English Poets" (1865); enlarged editions of Horace, Byron, Tennyson, "Poems and Poetry of America" (1872); "Female Poets of America" (1874); and the "Brig-
STODDARD, William Osborn, author, b. in Homer, Cortland co., N. Y., 24 Sept., 1835. His father was for many years a bookseller and publisher in Rochester and Syracuse, N. Y. He was graduated at the University of Rochester in 1858, edited the "Daily Lodger" in Chicago for a short time, and the same year became editor of the "Central Illinois Gazette," near his native town, which he conducted for about three years. He was an opponent of slavery, and took an active part in the Republican presidential canvass of 1860. He was a private secretary to President Lincoln in 1861-4, was U. S. marshal for Arkansas in 1864-6, and has since been variously employed. He invented a centre-keeping printer's clasp, and has taken out several patents for apparatus and machines for desiccating processes and in machinery. He has published "Royal Decrees of Scanderbon" (New York, 1859); "Verses of Many Days" (1855); "Dismissed" (1878); "The Heart of It" (1880); "Dub Kinzer" (1881); "The Quartet" (1882); "Esu Hardley" (1882); "Saltillo Days" (1882); "Talks with a Farmer" (1882); "Caught in a Storm" (1882); "Wrecked" (1883); "The Life of Abraham Lincoln" (1881); "Two Arrows" (1886); "The Red Beauty" (1887); "The Volcano under the City," a description of the draft riots of 1863 (1887); "Lives of the Presidents"; "Inside the White House in War Times" (1890); and "Men of Business" (1898).

STODDERT, Benjamin, cabin officer, b. in Charles county, Md., in 1751; d. in Bladensburg, Md., 18 Dec., 1813. His grandfather, Maj. James Stoddert, a cadet of the Scotch family of Stoddert, settled in Maryland about 1653, and his father, Capt. Thomas Stoddert, of the Maryland contingent, was killed in Braddock's defeat, 1755. He was educated for a merchant, but in 1776 joined the Continental army as captain of cavalry, and was in active service till the battle of Brandywine, when, holding the rank of major, he was so severely wounded as to unfit him for active service. As secretary of the board of war he remained with the army till the latter part of 1781. When peace was concluded he became a successful merchant of Georgetown, D. C. In May, 1789, he was appointed secretary of the navy, being the first to hold the post, and so remained till 3 March, 1801. He was acting secretary of war after the resignation of James Henry, until his successor, Samuel Dexter, took charge. When the navy department was created in 1789, the frigates "Constitution," " Constitution," and "United States" were fitted out, and the chief of the American navy was in commission. Mr. Stoddert's experience in the merchant marine, coupled with his tact, industry, and judgment, were valuable in the formation of the naval force, through which the hostilities with France were so soon terminated. That he possessed the confidence and friendship of Presi- dent Adams is shown by his official and private correspondence. At the close of Adams's administration he returned to private life, settling his business affairs, which during his absence had become so entangled as to cause serious losses.

STOECKEL, Gustave Jacob, musician, b. in Mai-kammer, Bavarian Palatinate, Germany, 9 Nov., 1819. He was graduated at the seminar in Kaiserslautern in 1838, pursued a post-graduate course in musical composition under Joseph Krebs, and was a teacher and organist till 1847. He came to this country in that year, and since 1849 has been instructor in music at Yale, and organist of the college chapel. Yale gave him the degree of Mus. D. in 1854. Stoeckel has composed a large body of sacred music for mixed voices (New York, 1868), and "College Hymn-Book" for male voices (1866); besides compositions for the piano, songs, and overtures and symphonies for orchestra. He is also the author of the unpublished operas of "Lichtenstein," "Mahomet," "Miles Standish," and "Mesopotamia.

STOEYER, Martin Luther, educator, b. in Germantown, Pa., 17 Feb., 1820; d. there, 22 July, 1879. With the ministry in view he entered Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, and was graduated in 1858, but he was pressed into service as an instructor before he could begin his theological course, and until his death was engaged in teaching. He was principal of a classical academy in Maryland in 1858-42, and of the preparatory department in Pennsylvania college in 1842-51, professor of history in the collegiate department in 1844-51, and professor of Latin and history, to which political economy was added in 1853, from 1851 until his death in 1879. After the retirement of Dr. Charles F. Kauffman from the presidency of the college, Stoefer served as executive for a term of 30 years, until a successor was elected. The honorary degree of Ph. D. was conferred upon him in 1866 by Hamilton college, and that of LL.D. in 1839 by Union college. In 1842 the presidency of Girard college, Philadelphia, was offered to him, and in 1839 the professorship of Latin in Muhlenberg college, Allentown, Pa.; but he declined both. He was connected with the "Evangelical Quarterly Review" from its beginning in 1849, and was its sole editor from 1853 until his death. His biographical articles earned him the title of "The Plutarch of the Lutheran Church." He was the editor of the "Literary Record and Linnaean Journal," in Gettysburg, in 1847-8, and published "Memoir of the Life and Times of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, D. D." (Philadelphia, 1856); "Memorial of Philip F. Mayer, D. D." (1859); "Brief Sketch of the Lutheran Church in this Country" (1860); and "Discourse before the Lutheran Historical Society" (Lancaster, 1863).

STOKES, Anthony, British jurist, b. in England in 1736; d. in London, 27 March, 1799. He was a barrister at law of the Inner Temple, London, came to this country, was appointed chief justice of Georgia in 1789, and in 1772 became councillor of that colony, retaining those offices till the evacuation of Georgia by the British in 1782. He was a loyalist at the opening of the Revolution, and was taken prisoner, but was soon exchanged. In 1778 his estate was confiscated. He went to Charleston, S. C., after leaving Georgia, and at the evacuation of that city he returned to England. He published "View of the Constitution of the British Colonies in North America and the West Indies by the British in (Philadelphia, 1783); "Narrative of the Official Conduct of Anthony Stokes" (1784); and "Desultory Observations on Great Britain" (1792).

STOKES, James Hughes, soldier, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1814; d. in New York city, 25 Dec., 1890. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, resigned in 1861, and engaged in business, removing in 1858 to Illinois. After aiding in the equipment of volunteers, he joined the army as captain, and served in Tennessee, and afterward as assistant adjutant-general. He was made a brigadier-general on 29 July, 1863, and was mustered out a month later.

STOKES, Monford, senator, b. in Wilkes county, N. C., 20 July, 1831; d. in Fayetteville, N. C., 27 Mar., 1896. He served in the navy during the revolutionary war, and after its close lived in Salisbury, N. C., where he was for several years clerk of the superior court. He became subsequently clerk of the state senate, and was elected to the U. S. senate, but declined the office. He was again elected to the same office in 1861, and served till 1865, was a member of the state senate in 1866, and of the state house of representatives in 1829 and 1830. He was governor of North Carolina in 1830-1, which office he resigned to accept that of commissioner to superintend the removal of the Indians west of Mississippi river. He was appointed by President Jackson in 1831 Indian agent for Arkansas territory, where he remained till his death. He fought a duel near Salisbury with Jesse D. Pierson, and was severely wounded.

STOLBRAND, Carlos John Mudler, soldier, b. in Sweden, 11 May, 1821; d. in Charleston, S. C., 3 Feb., 1864. He entered the royal artillery, and took part in the campaign of Schleswig-Holstein with part of his regiment in defence of Denmark. At the close of the war he came to the United States, and in July, 1841, he enlisted in the volunteer artillery. Soon afterward he was appointed its captain and joined the 1st battalion of Illinois light artillery, and became chief of artillery under Gen. John A. Logan. He took part in the movements against Corinth, Miss., and in 1863, on Gen. Logan's assignment to the command of the 15th corps, was transferred to the command of its artillery brigade. He participated in the campaign of Atlanta and the march to the sea. In February, 1863, he was promoted to brigadier-general of volunteers, assigned to a brigade in the 20th corps, and engaged in the battle of the 17th corps. The latter brigade, being reduced in numbers, was re-enforced and reorganized under his charge. In 1865 he went with his brigade to St. Louis, Mo., and thence to Lebanon, Kan., and in February, 1866, he received an honorable discharge from the army. In 1880 Gen. Stolbrand was elected secretary of the Constitutional convention of South Carolina. He was delegate-at-large to the National Republican convention at Chicago in 1888, and served as presidential elector. He made various improvements in steam-engines and steam-boilers, and was superintendent of the U. S. government building in Charleston.

STONE, Amasa, philanthropist, b. in Charlton, Mass., 25 April, 1818; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 11 May, 1881. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in the class of 1830-1, and during twenty-one was engaged in the construction of railroad bridges, and while still young became the first bridge-builder in the country. In partnership with two friends he constructed the Cleveland, Columbus, and Cincinnati railroad, and afterward the Cleveland and Erie of which roads he was made superintendent. He was next engaged in building the Chicago and Milwaukee road. He was president and director of numerous railroads and other industrial and financial corporations, was frequently consulted by President Lincoln in regard to matters of army transportation, and was offered by him an appointment as brigadier-general. He spent a year in Europe in 1868-9. Mr. Stone gave large sums in charity to the city of Cleveland. He built and endowed the Home for aged women and the industrial school for children, and gave $600,000 to Adelbert college of Western Reserve university.

STONE, Andrew Leete, b. in Oxford, Conn., 25 Nov., 1815; d. in San Francisco, 17 Jan., 1892. His father was justice of the peace for a quarter of a century, served for several terms as judge of probate, and had been a contributor to the physicians. The latter was graduated at Yale in 1839, and was for three years as a professor in the New York institution for the deaf and dumb, studying at Union theological seminary. He then connected himself with the American Sunday-school union at Philadelphia, and in September, 1844, was ordained pastor of the South Congregational church at Middletown, Conn. In January, 1849, he was called to the pastorate of the Park street church, Boston. In 1866 he received a call to the 1st Congregational church in San Francisco, Cal. In 1881, his health failing, he was elected pastor emeritus. He is the author of "Service the End of Living" (1858); "Ashton's Mothers" (1859); "Discourse on the Death of Abraham Lincoln" (1865); and numerous printed addresses. Most of his sermons have been published, entitled "Memorial Discourses" (1866) and "Leaves from a Finished Pastorate" (1882).—His brother, David Marvin, journalist, b. in Oxford, Conn., 23 Dec., 1817; d. in Brooklyn, 2 April, 1895. He taught when he was only sixteen, and was a merchant in Philadelphia from 1838 till 1841. When he was twenty-one he went to New York city to take charge of the "Dry Goods Reporter." In December of that year he became commercial editor of the New York "Journal of Commerce," and in September, 1861, with William C. Prime, he purchased the interest of that paper, succeeding Mr. Prime in 1866. As editor-in-chief, which post he held until June, 1864. He was president of the New York associated press for twenty-five years. For several years he contributed a financial article weekly to the New York "Conservator," edited as a pastime the "Ladies' Wreath," and conducted the financial department of "Hunt's Merchants' Magazine." An important event was his support of the model by the government in 1854 for publishing a proclamation purporting to have been issued by President Lincoln, calling for volunteers to serve in the war and naming a day of fasting and prayer. It was the production of Joseph Howard, Jr., and appeared in the "Journal of Commerce," 15 May, 1864. The "Herald" printed 25,000 copies containing the so-called proclamation, but, finding that neither the "Times" nor the "Tribune" had printed it, destroyed the edition. The "World" published it, but afterward endeavored to undo the mischief.

President Lincoln immediately ordered the suppression of the "Journal of Commerce" and the "World," and the arrest and imprisonment of their editors, Gen. John A. Dix, who knew that the proclamation had been left at the newspaper offices at about three o'clock in the morning, after the responsible editors had departed, endeavored to secure a modification of this order. Some of the persons designated were arrested, but they did not include David M. Stone or Manton Marble. The government soon found that it had misinterpreted the troops that had been put in possession of the two newspaper offices were withdrawn, and the editors were released from arrest and their papers from suspension. Mr. Stone's opinions on commercial and other matters in his "answers to correspondents" were regarded as an authority by merchants throughout the country. In his younger days he wrote for the magazines, but since 1860 he had done little literary work except for his own paper. He published a volume called "Frank Forêt," which passed through twenty editions (1859), and a memorial volume containing the "Life and Letters" of his niece, Mary Elizabeth Hubbell (1857).

STONE, Barton Warren, reformer. b. near Easton, Pa., Dec. 12, 1842; d. in Hamnill, Me., Nov. 9, 1844. He was graduated at the academy in Guilford, N. C., in 1793, studied theology, and, after teaching in Washington, Ga., was licensed in North Carolina in 1796. Two years later he was ordained pastor of the churches of Camden and Concord, Ky. During the revival of 1801 in Kentucky and Tennessee, Stone, with four other ministers, announced the doctrines of Calvinism. One of the number was tried by the synod of Lexington, Ky., in 1793, for preaching anti-Calvinistic doctrines, whereupon they all withdrew from that body, formed themselves into the Springfield presbytery, and continued to preach and to form churches, the first being one at Camden of Mr. Stone's old followers. In June, 1801, they were dissolved, and they took the name of the Christian Church. Having no pastoral charge, Stone supported himself for several years by farming and teaching while he continued to found churches in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. In 1826 he edited the "Christian Messenger," and six years later, with Rev. John T. Johnson, a Baptist, at Georgetown, published the "Stoneite," and "Campbellite" churches in Kentucky. He removed to Jacksonville, Ill., in 1834, included Missouri in his circuit, and also continued his editorial labor until his death. His last preaching tour was in 1843, and a year later, while on his way home from a visit to Missouri, he died. Mr. Stone wielded a great influence through his scholarship, piety, and attractive manner. He wrote part ii. of the "Apology of the Springfield Presbytery" (1803), which has been called the first declaration of religious freedom in the western hemisphere, and the hymn "The Lord is the Fountain of Wisdom and Love." Among his other writings are "Letters on the Atonement" (1805); "Address to the Christian Churches" (1805); and "Letters to Dr. James Rhyle" (1822).
the National troops into the river with great loss. Gen. Stone was continued in the same command until 9 Feb., 1862, when he was suddenly arrested and imprisoned in Fort Lafayette, New York harbor, where he remained until 16 Aug., 1862. He was then released, no charge having been preferred against him, and waited orders until 3 May, 1863, when he was directed to report to the commanding general of the Department of the Gulf, where he served until 17 April, 1864. He participated in the 14th infantry, and was senior member of the commission for receiving the surrender of that place, 8 July, 1863. He was chief of staff to Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks, commanding the Department of the Gulf, from 25 July, 1863, to 17 April, 1864, participating in the campaign of Bayou Teche, La., in October, 1863, and the Red River campaign in March and April, 1864. He was honorably mustered out as brigadier-general of volunteers, 4 April, 1864, and resigned his commission as colonel of the 14th infantry, 13 Sept., 1864. In the autumn of 1865 Gen. Stone was appointed engineer and superintendent of the Dover mining company in Goshen county, Va., where he resided until 1870. He then accepted a commission in the Egyptian army, and was placed in temporary charge of the work of construction which capacity he bestowed much attention upon the military school that had already been formed by French officers in the Egyptian service. He created a typographical bureau, where a great number of maps were produced and the government printing was executed, and when the reports of the American officers engaged in exploration of the interior were printed, Gen. Stone was placed in temporary charge of the cadastral survey, and was president of the Geographical society and a member of the Institut Egyptien at Cairo. The American officers were mustered out of the service in 1870, as a measure of economy, by the reform government which succeeded the dethronement of Ismail. Gen. Stone alone remained, and acted as chief of the staff until the insurrection of Arabi and the army, in which he took no active part. He resigned and returned to the United States in March, 1885. Gen. Stone was decorated by Ismail Pacha with the order of the Osmania, was made grand officer of the Medjidieh and Osmanieh, and was created a Ferik pacha (general of division). In May he was appointed engineer-in-chief of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, and directed a preliminary survey across the northern part of the peninsula. On 3 April, 1886, he became engineer-in-chief to the committee for the construction of the pedestal of the Bartholdi statue of "Liberty enlightening the World," and upon its successful completion he acted as grand marshal in the military and civic ceremony that accompanied the ceremonies of the pedestal.

STONE, Collins, clergyman and educator, b. in Guilford, Conn., 7 Sept., 1812; d. in Hartford, Conn., 23 Dec., 1870. He was graduated at Yale in 1832, and in the following year became a teacher in the American deaf-mute asylum at Hartford. In 1852 he was called as principal to the Ohio state asylum for the deaf and dumb at Columbus, but he resigned in 1853, and returned to Hartford, where he remained until his death. He studied theology, and was ordained to the ministry in 1853 while in Ohio. For nearly forty years Mr. Stone was prominent in his department of education, and merits the credit of laying the foundations of the future prosperity of the Ohio institution, and of carrying the Hartford asylum through difficulties. He published annual reports of the Ohio institution (1852-65) and of that at Hartford (1865-70). His other educational writings, including an address on "The History of Deaf-Mute Instruction" before the Ohio institution (1860), were published in the "American Annual of the Deaf and Dumb." A railroad accident was the cause of his death.

STONE, David, senator, b. in Hope, N. C., 17 Feb., 1795; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 7 Oct., 1878. His father, Zeelochick Stone, was a member of the Provincial Congress in 1776. His paternal great-grandfather and great-great-grandfather were for many years a state senator. David was graduated at Princeton in 1788, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1790. He was a member of the legislature in 1791-4, judge of the supreme court of North Carolina in 1796-7, and a member of congress in 1799-1801, having been chosen as a Democrat. In the latter year he was sent to the U. S. senate, but he resigned in 1805 to become judge of the state supreme court. He was governor of North Carolina in 1808-10, and in the two following years sat again in congress. In 1813 he was again sent to the U. S. senate by a legislature whose majority supported the measures of President Madison and the war with England; but, opposing these measures, he was censured by the legislature, and resigned to return to the Senate.

STONE, Ebenezer Whitten, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 June, 1801; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 18 April, 1880. In 1817 he enlisted in the U. S. army, from which he was discharged in 1821. He was connected with the Massachusetts militia in 1823-50, receiving the appointment of adjutant-general in 1851 and filling the post till the close of his service. In 1830 he was a member of the legislature, serving on the military committee. The first full battery of light artillery in the United States, except those in the regular army, was organized by him in 1853, and through his efforts Massachusetts was the first state to receive the new rifled musket of the pattern of 1853. From experiments that he made with this musket, Gen. Stone conceived the idea that cannon could also be rifled, and after successful tests in 1859, he ordered a model from John P. Schnell, the inventor of the Schnell shell. It is claimed that this was the first rifled cannon that was made in the United States, and that the invention was original with Gen. Stone, though rifled cannon had been in use in Europe for several years. From April till October, 1861, Gen. Stone, as chief of ordnance, armed and equipped twenty-four regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and three light batteries of artillery. He was for twelve years a member of the Ancient and honorable artillery company, and became its captain in 1841. He prepared, under an act of the legislature, a "Digest of the Militia Laws of Massachusetts" (Boston, 1851), and a "Compend of Instruction in the Explosive and Percussion Arms," and "The Manual of Percussion Arms" (1857).
STONE

in 1784, of which he was a charter member. During that time he also served on the Providence school committee. In 1848–83 he was librarian of the Rhode Island Historical Society; and contributed antiquarian and miscellaneous matter to his annual reports. He was also a member of many learned societies. He has published “Life of Elijah Winchester” (Boston, 1836; Salem, 1838); “Hymns for Sabbath-Schools” (1857); “Hymns and Tunes for Vestry and Conference Meetings” (4th ed., 1844); “History of Beverley, Mass., 1630–1837” (1837); “History of Re副本ary and Industry in Bowdoin” (Providence, 1857); “History of the Providence Association of Mechanics and Manufacturers” (1860); “The Invasion of Canada in 1775,” including the journal of Capt. Simeon Thayer, with notes and appendix (Providence, 1867); “The Architect and Montanist: a Brief Memoir of Thomas Alexander Telfe” (1869); and “Our French Allies” (1869). Assisted by his son, Edwin W., he edited the “Adjutant-General’s Report of Rhode Island for 1865,” which contains a roster of the Rhode Island soldiers in the civil war. He left unpublished a “Life of Rev. Dr. Manasseh Cutler” and a history of Providence—

His son, Ewom Winchester (1855–78), served in the Rhode Island artillery during the civil war, was ordained a deacon in 1882, and became a priest, and published “Rhode Island in the Rebellion” (Providence, 1884).

STONE, James Samuel, clergyman, b. in Shipton-on-Stour, Worcestershire, England, 27 April, 1852. He emigrated to Philadelphia in 1872, and studied theology in the divinity-school in that city, in which he was graduated in 1876, and ordained priest by the bishop of Toronto, Canada, in 1877. He was rector of St. Philip’s church, Toronto, from 1878 till 1882, of St. Martin’s, Montreal, Grace church, Philadelphia, and since January, 1895, has been rector of St. James’s church, Chicago. He was professor of ecclesiastical history in Wycliffe college, Toronto, in 1877–82. He is well known in Canada as a lecturer, some of his topics being “Love in ye Olden Time,” “Trials of a Parson,” “Robin Hood,” and “John Bunyan.” He received the degree of B.D. from Cambridge (Mass.) Episcopalian theological school in 1880, and those of B.D. and D.D. from the University of Bishop’s college, Lennoxville, Canada, in 1886. Besides many pamphlets and periodical and magazine articles, Dr. Stone has published “Simple Sermons on Simple Subjects” (Toronto, 1879) and “The Heart of Merrie England” (Philadelphia, 1887).

STONE, John Augustus, dramatist, b. in Concord, Mass., in 1801; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 June, 1834. He appeared on the stage in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. In 1814 he wrote “Metamora,” “The Ancient Briton,” and “Fontaineiro”; and among other plays he published “La Rophe,” “The Demonicke,” and “Tancred.” He was drowned in a fit of temporary insanity in the Schuykill at Philadelphia, and his monument there bears the inscription: “Erected to the memory of the author of Metamora,” by his friends.

STONE, John Osgood, physician, b. in Salem, Mass., 1 Feb., 1813; d. in New York city, 7 June, 1876. He was graduated at Harvard in 1833, and at the medical department there in 1836. After hospital experience in London and Paris he began practice in New York city, identifying himself with medical charities and public organizations, and attaining eminence in his profession. He was long a surgeon at Bellevue hospital, but resigned in 1857 on account of his extensive private practice. In 1866 he was a member of the first Metropolitan board of health, and subsequently its president, in which connection he served with special distinction to the sanitary condition of tenement-houses and in the management of quarantine were of great value. Dr. Stone published many surgical papers, including “Amputations and Compound Fractures, with Statistics” (1840); “Treatment of Suppurative Inflammation of the Joints” (1832); “Necessary Amputation of the Lower Extremities in Animal Infants and of the Heart.”

STONE, John Seely, clergyman, b. in East Barrington, Mass., 7 Oct., 1795; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 16 Jan., 1882. He was graduated at Union college in 1823, and thence went to the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, preparatory to taking orders. He was ordained deacon in St. Mark’s church, New York, 4 Jan., 1826, by Bishop Hobart, and priest in Christ church, Hartford, Conn., 7 June, 1827, by Bishop Brownell. He was tutor in Greek and Latin in Hobart college in 1827–32. He was rector of St. Michael’s church, Litchfield, Conn., in 1827, of All Saints’ church, Frederick city, Md., in 1828–9, of Trinity church, New Haven, in 1839–2, and of St. Paul’s church, New Haven, in 1829–31. He received the degree of D.D. from Harvard in 1855; next became rector of Christ church, Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1841, and in 1852 of St. Paul’s church, Brooklyn, Mass., where he remained till 1862. He accepted the post of professor in the divinity-school of the Protestant Episcopal church in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1862, which he held for five years. In 1867 he became dean of the newly established theological school in Cambridge, Mass. In 1870 he resigned active work. Dr. Stone attained reputation as a pulpit orator. In theological position he was prominent among the evangelical Episcopal clergy, and it was largely due to his efforts and influence that the theological school in Cambridge, Mass., was founded. Dr. Stone’s publications were “Memor of Bishop Griswold” (Philadelphia, 1844); “The Mysteries Opened” (New York, 1844; republished, with the title “Christian Sacraments,” 1866); “The Christian Sabbath” (1844: enlarged ed., with the title “The Divine Rest,” 1867); “The Church Universal” (1846; republished, under the title of “Living Temple,” 1866); “Memoir of Rev. Dr. Minor” (1848; abridged by the author), etc. Dr. Stone was twice married: his second wife was a daughter of Chancellor Kent, of New York.—Their son, James Kent, clergyman, b. in Boston in 1840, was graduated at Harvard in 1861. After studying for two years at the University of Gottingen and in Italy, he returned to this country and entered the National army, from which he was discharged after the close of the war. He became professor of Latin in Kenyon college, Ohio, in 1863, and professor of mathematics in 1867, and was soon afterward appointed president. In 1868 he became president of Hobart college, but resigned in 1890, and a few months later united with the Roman Catholic church. He entered the congregation of the Passionists, at the priory of St. Paul the Apostle, in New York city, and soon became one of the best-known preachers of that body. Afterward he joined the Passionists, in which order he is known as Father Fidelis. He published “The Invitation Heeded,” in which he gave his reasons for becoming a Roman Catholic.

STONE, Luke, former, b. in West Brookfield, Mass., 13 Aug., 1818; d. in Dorchester, Mass., 18 Oct., 1893. Her paternal grandfather was a colonel STONE, Thomas Treadwell, clergyman, b. in Waterford, Me., 9 Feb., 1801; d. in Bolton, Mass., 13 Nov., 1866. He was graduated at Bowdoin, and was pastor of the Congregational church at Andover, Me., in 1824-90, of that at East Machias in 1832-49, of the first church at Pekin, in 1850-60, and of the first Congregational church at Bolton, Mass., in 1852-66, and of the ecclesiastical society, Brooklyn, Conn., from 1864 till 1871, when he retired from the active duties of the ministry. He afterward removed to Bolton, Mass., where he had since resided. He received the degree of D. D. from Bowdoin in 1868, was principal of Bridgeland academy, 1830-32, one of the early members of the Transcendental school, contributed to various religious periodicals, and published "Sermons on War" (Boston, 1829); "Sketches of Oxford County, Me." (Portland, 1830); "Sermons" (Boston, 1854); "The Rod and the Staff" (1856); and separate sermons and addresses.

STONE, Warren, physician, b. in St. Albans, Vt., in February, 1834; d. in New Orleans, La., Dec., 1872. He studied medicine in Massachusetts, settled in New Orleans, and soon became one of the chief physicians there. He began teaching anatomy in 1856, in 1857 was appointed professor of that branch in the University of Louisiana, and afterward accepted the chair of surgery, which he held till his death. Dr. Stone was at the head of the medical profession in the south, and when Gen. Grant was thrown from his horse near New Orleans in September, 1863, he was called to attend him. He contributed numerous articles to medical journals.

—His son, Warren, physician, b. in New Orleans in 1843; d. there, 3 Jan., 1883, was educated at the Jesuits' college, New Orleans, and served in the Confederate army during the civil war. On returning to New Orleans, he began practice, and was graduated at the University of Louisiana in 1867, and at the opening of the Charity hospital medical college of New Orleans, in 1874, was appointed to the chair of surgical anatomy. In 1875 he made what is thought to be the first recorded cure of traumatic aneurism of the subarachnian artery by digital pressure.

STONE, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Hartford, England, 30 July, 1802; d. in Hartford, Conn., 29 July, 1875. He was a freemason of Hartford. Cotton Mather's statement in his "Magnalia," that Samuel was the son of a non-conformist clergyman of the same name, has been recently disproved, by the register of the Church of All Saints, Hertford, to be the fact. Born a student at Emmanuel college, Cambridge, in 1652-53. Fleeting to the American colonies to escape religious persecution, he landed at Boston, Mass., 3 Sept., 1633, having as companions in his flight Rev. John Cotton and Rev. Thomas Hooker. With the latter he was an associate in a church at Cambridge until 1656, when he was removed to the present site of Hartford, Conn., which was his home ever after, the spelling being confounded to the English pronunciation. He was distinguished as a controversialist and celebrated for his wit and humor. Being a man of strong convictions, he engaged during the latter part of his life in theological disputes which caused part of his congregation to secede and found another church. On his decease, his old companion, Hooker, succeeded him in the ministry. Mr. Stone published "A Congregational Church is a Catholic Visible Church: Examination of Mr. Hudson's View" (London, 1652), and he left two works in manuscript, a "Body of Divinity" and a confirmation of the Antinomians. Of the former, Cotton Mather says: "This rich treasure was often transcribed by the vast crowds of our candidates for their minutes, and has made some of our most considerable divines."

Stone, Melville Elijah, journalist, b. in Hudson, N. Y., 13 Aug., 1829. When he was twelve years of age his parents removed to Chicago, where he graduated from the high-school in 1847. Two years later he purchased an interest in a foundry and machine-shop, and was doing a good business when his earnings were swept away in the great fire of 1871. He then resorted to journalism, and a successful experience of four years as correspondent and editor prompted him to establish an evening paper. On Christmas-day, 1853, he published the first number of "The Daily News," since which time he has been its controlling spirit. He soon became associated with Victor F. Laws in the management of the journal, which has an average circulation of a million copies a week.

Stone, Ormond, astronomer, b. in Pekin, Ill., 1 Aug., 1803; was graduated at the Chicago public schools and at the University of Chicago, where he devoted much attention to astronomy. In 1861 he became a tutor in Racine college, and in 1868 he was made professor of mathematics at Northwestern female college, Evanston, Ill. He was appointed assistant at the U. S. naval observatory in Washington, D. C., in 1859, and in 1855 was given charge of the Cincinnati observatory. In 1862 he was called to the chair of practical astronomy in the University of Virginia, with care of the Leander McCormick observatory, both of which places he now (1899) holds. Prof. Stone is a member of scientific societies, and is the author of various papers on astronomy. He edited the "Publications of the Cincinnati Observatory" (No. 1 to 6, Cincinnati, 1852-82), containing observations of nearly all the known double stars between the equator and 30° south declination, and since 1883 has edited "The Annals of Mathematics" at the University of Virginia.

The Revolution, and led 400 men in Say's rebellion. Her father was a prosperous farmer in Hertford. He attained a collegiate education, he was largely influenced by her desire to learn to read the Bible in the original, and satisfy herself that the texts that were quoted against the equal rights of women were correctly translated. She was graduated at Oberlin in 1847, and in the same year gave her first lecture on woman's rights in Ohio. In 1855, when her husband was appointed lecturer for the Massachusetts antislavery society in 1848, travelling extensively in New England, the west, and Canada, and speaking also on woman's rights. In 1855 she married Henry B. Blackwell (brother of Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell, a merchant of Cincinnati and an Abolitionist, retaining by his consent her own name. A few years later, while she lived in New Jersey, her property was seized for taxes, and she published a protest against "taxation without representation." In 1859 Mrs. Stone was instrumental in forming the American woman's suffrage association. In the following year she became co-editor of the "Woman's Journal" in Boston, and from 1872 to the time of her death she was editor-in-chief, with her husband, and day by day as associates. Mrs. Stone again lectured in the west, in behalf of the woman suffrage amendments, in 1867-68. She had held various offices in the national, state, and local woman suffrage associations. "Lacy Stone," says Mrs. Stanton, "first really stirred the nation's heart on the subject of woman's wrongs."

Stone, Warren, physician, b. in St. Albans, Vt., in February, 1834; d. in New Orleans, La., Dec., 1872. He studied medicine in Massachusetts, settled in New Orleans, and soon became one of the chief physicians there. He began teaching anatomy in 1856, in 1857 was appointed professor of that branch in the University of Louisiana, and afterward accepted the chair of surgery, which he held till his death. Dr. Stone was at the head of the medical profession in the south, and when Gen. Grant was thrown from his horse near New Orleans in September, 1863, he was called to attend him. —His son, Warren, physician, b. in New Orleans in 1843; d. there, 3 Jan., 1883, was educated at the Jesuits' college, New Orleans, and served in the Confederate army during the civil war. On returning to New Orleans, he began practice, and was graduated at the University of Louisiana in 1867, and at the opening of the Charity hospital medical college of New Orleans, in 1874, was appointed to the chair of surgical anatomy. In 1875 he made what is thought to be the first recorded cure of traumatic aneurism of the subarachnidian artery by digital pressure.

STONE, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Hartford, England, 30 July, 1802; d. in Hartford, Conn., 29 July, 1875. He was a freemason of Hartford. Cotton Mather's statement in his "Magnalia," that Samuel was the son of a non-conformist in the southwest, he left his home and large practice and travelled about from one stricken village or town to another, giving his services gratuitously. Dr. Stone became a member of the American public health association in 1880.

STONE, William, colonial governor, b. in Northampton, England, about 1663; d. in Charles county, Md., about 1661. He emigrated to the eastern shore of Virginia, where he settled Northeaston county. There was a settlement of Puritans in Nansemond county, and, their condition becoming uncomfortable from the attitude and treatment of the Episcopalians of Virginia, Stone arranged with Cecilius Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, to remove 500 settlers to Maryland. On 8 Aug., 1648, Baltimore appointed Stone governor of his province, and he arrived there as early as 1649. His Puritan emigrants from Virginia settled at a place on Severn river, which they called Providence and which is now Annapolis. In 1653 Stone was removed from the governorship by William Claiborne and Richard Bennet, parliamentary commissioners. But on 23 March, 1655, at the head of the Cavalier forces of the province, he attacked the Roundhead forces under Capt. William Fuller at Severn, where he was routed, taken prisoner, and condemned to death by martial. His life was spared at the entreaty of the men of the victorious party. After this he does not appear to have taken part in public affairs, but lived and died on his manor of Avon on Nansemond river, in Charles county. Md. In consideration of his faithful services to the proprietary, he was granted as much land as he could ride around in a day.—His great-grandson, Thomas, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Charles county, Md., in 1743; d. in Alexandria, Va., 5 Oct., 1787, daily rode ten miles to school in order to acquire a classical education, bought money to enable him to study law in Annapolis, began practice in Frederick about 1770, and two years later removed to Charles county, purchasing a farm near Port Tobacco. He early espoused the cause of his country in the disputes with the British government, and was elected to the Continental congress when two members were added to the Maryland delegation, 8 Dec., 1774, taking his seat on 15 May, 1775. In July he was re-elected for a year longer, and again on 21 May, 1776, till the end of the next session of the convention.

The Maryland delegates, notwithstanding their instructions in favor of reconciliation, voted for the resolution of 15 May, 1776, declaring that the authority of the crown had ceased. Late in June the instructions were recalled, leaving them free to vote for the Declaration of Independence on 4 July. On the same day Stone and his colleagues were re-elected without restrictions on their action. Although he bore no active part in the debates of congress, he served on committees that were intrusted with important matters, such as the augmentation of the flying camp, the failure of the Canada expedition, the consideration of some of Gen. Washington's letters, and the elaboration of a scheme of a confederation and confederation, which was appointed on 12 June, 1776, he was the only member from his province. Being re-elected to congress in February, he labored in this committee till the articles of confederation were finally settled on and agreed to by the vote of 15 Nov., 1777. The Maryland convention refused to enter the confederacy, and expressed a hope that the confederation might be made to the mother country might yet be accommodated. Stone declined a re-election to congress, and entered the Maryland senate, where he could be more useful to the patriotic cause. In 1783 he was again elected to congress, and in the session of 1784 he served on most of the important committees. Toward its close he acted as president pro tem.—He declined re-election, and devoted himself thenceforth to his profession and to his duties as a member of the state senate, in which he opposed in 1785 a proposition to establish a paper currency. After the death of his wife in June, 1787, he abandoned his large legal practice in Annapolis, sank into a settled melancholy, and died when he was about to be removed to a sea-bathing place.—Another great-grandson, John Hoskins, 2nd. b. and d. in Charles county, Md., in 1745; d. in Annapolis, Md., 5 Oct., 1804. On 2 Jan., 1776, the convention of Maryland elected him captain in Col. Smallwood's battalion, and in December of the same year he was promoted to the rank of colonel. He served with credit in the battles of Long Island, White Plains, Princeton, and Germantown, and removed in the last-mentioned battle a wound that maimed him for life, and on 1 Aug., 1779, resigned his commission. In 1781 he was clerk in the office of Robert R. Livingston, secretary of state, and afterward was one of the executive council of Maryland. He was governor from 1394 till 1797.—Another great-grandson, William Murray, P. E. Bishop, b. in Somerset county, Md., 1 June, 1779; d. in Salisbury, Md., 26 Feb., 1838. He entered Washington college, Md., was graduated in 1799, and studied theology, preparatory to taking orders in the Episcopal church. He was ordained deacon in St. Paul's church, Prince George co., Md., 17 May, 1802, by Bishop Chaggett, and priest in the same church, 27 Dec. 1803, by the same bishop. He was re-elected to congress as the state's member for the county of Somerset (now Wicomico) county. This position he held for twenty-three years, and he was very diligent and successful in his pastoral work. In 1829 he accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's church, Chestertown, Kent co., Md. The following year, at the convention in May, after a failure to elect either of two prominent clergymen, he was nominated and elected bishop by a nearly unanimous vote. He was consecrated in St. Paul's church, Baltimore, Md., 21 Oct., 1838. The same year he received the degree of D. D. from Columbia. Bishop Stone's publications were "A Charge to the Clergy and Laity of Maryland." (1801); "A Pastoral Letter to the Diocese of Maryland." (1806); and "The Sermon before the General Convention of the P. E. Church." (1825).

—Thomas's brother, Michael Jenifer, jurist, b. in Charles county, Md., about 1750; d. there in 1812, received a classical education. He was a member of the Maryland convention that ratified the Federal constitution, and was elected to the Ist congress, serving from 8 June, 1789, till 3 March, 1791. Under the state government he was a judge of the general court, and was on the bench till the judicial system was reorganized in 1806.—Michael Jenifer's grandson, Frederick, congressman, b. in Virginia, 7 Feb., 1820, was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, and studied and practised law at Port Tobacco, Charles co., Md. He was elected by the general assembly in 1852 one of the commissioners to simplify the rules of pleading and practice in the state courts. He was elected to the Constitutional convention to form a new constitution for the state in the spring of 1864, but declined to take his seat. In the following November he was elected to the house of delegates from Charles county and permitted that session. He was re-elected in 1866, and re-elected in 1868. In 1871 he was again elected to the house of delegates, and served his term. He was chosen judge of the court of appeals in 1881, which place he held until February, 1890.

STONE, William Leece, author, b. in New Paltz, N. Y., 30 April, 1792; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 15 Aug., 1844. His father, William, was a soldier of the Revolution and afterward a Presbyterian clergyman, who was a descendant of Gov. Samuel Leete. The son removed to Southbury, N. Y., in 1808, where he assisted his father in the care of a farm. The country was at that time a wilderness, and the adventures of young Stone during his early pioneer life formed material that he afterward wrought into border tales. At the age of seventeen he became a printer in the office of the Cooperstown "Federalist," and in 1813 he was editor of the Herkimer "American," with Thurlow Weed as his journeyman. Subsequently he edited the "Northern Whig" at Hudson, N. Y., and in 1817 the Albany "Daily Advertiser." In 1818 he succeeded Theodore Dwight as the editor of the Hartford "Mirror." While at Hartford, Jonathan M. Wainwright (afterward bishop), Samuel G. Goodrich (Peter Parley), Isaac Trowbridge, and himself alternated in editing a literary magazine called "The Knights of the Round Table." He also edited while at Hudson "The Lounger," a literary periodical which was noted for its pleasantry and wit. In 1821 he succeeded Zachariah Lewis in the editorship of the New York "Commercial Advertiser," becoming at the same time one of its proprietors, which place he held until his death. Brown unites him the editorship of A. M. in 1825. Mr. Stone always advocated in its works the abolition of slavery by constitutional action, and at the great anti-slavery convention at Baltimore in 1825 he originated and drew up the plan for slave emancipation which was recommended at that time to congress for adoption. In 1824 his sympathies were strongly enlisted in behalf of the Greeks in their struggles for independence, and he wrote a series of letters on Masonry and Anti-Masonry to John Quincy Adams, who, in his retirement at Quincy, had taken an active part in the anti-slavery movement. In these letters, which were afterward collected and published (New York, 1827), the author maintained that Masonry should be abandoned, chiefly because it had lost its usefulness. The writer also cleared away the mists of slander that had gathered around the name of De Witt Clinton, and by preserving strict impartiality he showed that Masonry could, if it could, obtain, however ingenious. In 1838 he originated and introduced a resolution in the New York historical society directing a memorial to be addressed to the New York legislature praying for the appointment of an historical mission to the governments of England and Holland for the recovery of such papers and documents as were essential to a correct understanding of the colonial history of the state. This was the origin of the collection known as the "New York Colonial Documents" made by John Romey Brodhead, who was sent abroad for that purpose by Gov. William H. Seward in the spring of 1841. He was the first superintendent of public schools in New York city, and while holding the office, in 1844, he had a discussion with Abigail Smith Bingham in the authorization of the Bible in the public schools. Although the influence of Col. Stone (as he was familiarly called), from having held that rank on Gov. Clinton's staff) extended throughout the country, it was felt more particularly in New York city. He was active in religious enterprises and benevolent associations. His works are: "History of the Great Albany Constitutional Convention of 1821" (Albany, 1822); "Narrative of the Grand Erie Canal Celebration," prepared at the request of the New York common council (New York, 1825); "Tales and Sketches," founded on aboriginal and Revolutionary traditions (2 vols., 1834); "Matthias and His Impositions" (1835); "Maria Monk and the Nunnery of the Hotel Dieu," which put to an end to an extraordinary mania (see Monk, Maria) (1836); "Lips and Downs in the Life of a Distressed Gentleman," a satire on the fashionable follies of the day (1836); "Border Wars of the American Revolution" (1837); "Life of Joseph Brant" (1838); "Letters on Animal Magnetism" (1838); "Life of Red Jacket" (1840); new ed., with memoir of the author by his son, William L. Stone, (1856); "Poetry and History of the American Revolution," with an introduction by Robert Hopkins' "Gertrude of Wyoming" (1841; with index, Albany, 1854); and "Uncas and Mantonamount" (1842). His only son, William Leece, author, b. in New York city, 4 April, 1835, entered Brown, but left college in 1856 and spent several months in Germany in acquiring a knowledge of the German language with a view of translating into English several of the leading works of the revolutionary history. On his return in 1858 he was graduated at Brown, and in 1859 took the degree of L. L. B. at Albany law-school. He practised law at Saratoga Springs during 1860-1, and in 1864-7 was city editor of the New York "Journal of Commerce." In 1870-7 he was editor and proprietor of "Leaves of the North," a paper published in the interests of American college and university associations of the Saratoga monument association since its incorporation by the legislature of the state of New York in 1871, and is also one of its original trustees and incorporators. At the laying of the cornerstone of the monument on 17 Oct., 1877, the centennial of Burgoyne's surrender, he delivered the historical address, and he is the author of "The Life and Times of Sir William Johnson, Bart." for the surrender of the government property to the secessionists, evacuated the fort, and went to New York by steamer. He became major of the 1st cavalry on 9 May, 1861, and served in western Virginia till 13 Aug., when he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers and chief of cavalry of the Army of the Potomac. He organized the cavalry of that army and commanded during the Virginia peninsula campaign of 1862. After the evacuation of Yorktown by the Confederate troops his cavalry and artillery pursued and overtook them, and thus brought on the battle of Williamsburg, 5 May, 1862. He took command of Gen. Philip Kearny's division after the second battle of Bull Run, succeeded Gen. Samuel P. Heintzman as commander of the 3d army corps, 15 Nov., 1862, and led it at Frederickburg on 13 Dec. He was promoted major-general, 20 Nov., 1862, led a cavalry corps in the raid toward Richmond from 13 April till 2 May, 1863, and commanded the 23d corps from January till April, 1864. On the reorganization of the armies operating against Richmond by Gen. Grant, Gen. Stone was appointed to a cavalry corps in the Department of the Ohio, was engaged in the operations of the Atlanta campaign in May-July, 1864, and conducted a raid for the capture of Macon and Augusta and the liberation of prisoners, but was captured at Clinton, Ga., 31 July, and held a captive till 27 Oct. He led a raid to southwestern Virginia in December, 1864, commanded the district of east Tennessee in February and March, 1865, conducted a raid in eastern Tennessee in March-April, 1865, and was engaged at Wytcheville, the capture of Salisbury, N. C., and at Asheville. He became colonel of the 21st infantry, 28 July, 1866, and was brevetted colonel, brigadier- and major-general for gallant conduct. He retired from the army, 16 Aug., 1874. After the war he resided in California, of which he was governor in 1884-5, having been chosen as a Democrat.

STONE. William Oliver, artist, b. in Derby, Conn., 26 Sept., 1809; d. in Newport, R. I., 15 Sept., 1853. He studied with Nathaniel Dower at New Haven, and in 1831 removed to New York. In 1836 he was elected an associate of the National academy, and he became an academician three years later. He gained distinction in portraiture, and devoted himself entirely to that branch of art. Among his most remarkable portraits are those of Bishops William of Connecticut (1857), Littlejohn of Rhode Island (1858), and Rip of California (1854), by W. Ellinger (1856), owned by the National academy; Rev. Henry Athorn (1860); Cyrus W. Field (1865); and James Gordon Bennett (1871).

STONEMAN, George, soldier, b. in Busti, Chautauqua co., N. Y., 8 Aug., 1822; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 5 Sept., 1894. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846. He acted as quartermaster to New York by steamer. He became major of the 1st cavalry on 9 May, 1861, and served in western Virginia till 13 Aug., when he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers and chief of cavalry of the Army of the Potomac. He organized the cavalry of that army and commanded during the Virginia peninsula campaign of 1862. STORER. Bellamy, jurist, b. in Portland, Me., 9 March, 1798; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 1 June, 1873. He was educated at Bowdoin, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1817, and the same year began practice at Cincinnati. In 1824 he advocated the election of John Quincy Adams to the presidency by his party. He served in congress in 1835-7, declined renomination, and in 1844 was a presidential elector on the Henry Clay ticket. He was for many years a professor in the Cincinnati law-school, and served for nineteen years as judge of the supreme court of that city. He was popular as a speaker at both political and religious meetings, and in one of his early lectures on the subject of poetry, a leading spirit in a religious band of young men called "Flying Artillery," he went from town to town to promote revivals. He received the degree of L.L. D. from Bowdoin in 1821. His brother, David Humphreys, physician, b. in Portland, Me., 26 March, 1801; d. in Boston, 10 Sept., 1891, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1822, and, after studying medicine with Dr. John C. Warren, was graduated at the medical department of Harvard in 1825. Settling in Boston, he there began his practice, residing there until his death. In 1857 he originated the Tremont street medical school, and in 1854 he was called to the chair of obstetrics and medical jurisprudence in the medical department of Harvard. His larger publications include translations from the French of Louis C. Kiené's "Genera, Species, and Iconography of Recent Shells" (Boston, 1857); "Report on the Ichthyology and Herpetology of Massachusetts" (1863); "Synopsis of the Fishes of North America" (Cambridge, 1846); and "History of the Fishes of Massachusetts" (in parts, Boston, 1853-65).—David's son, Horatio Robinson, surgeon, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 Feb., 1839, was graduated at Harvard in 1860, where he devoted special study to natural history. He received a private degree of Louis Agassiz and A. G. Nuttall, and he then turned his studies to the private degree of Harvard in 1853, and then spent two years in Paris, London, and Edinburgh, during one of which he was the assistant, in private practice, to Sir James Y. Simpson. In 1855 he established himself in Boston and made a specialty of gynecology. For some years he served as assistant to his father while the latter lectured at Harvard, and in 1863 he was chosen to the chair of obstetrics and medical jurisprudence in Berkshire medical college, which he held for four years. To better fit himself for teaching medical jurisprudence, he attended the Harvard law-school, and was graduated in 1868. For several years he declined offers to fill judicial offices, but when a large number of attorneys graduated upon the surgical diseases of women, refusing to admit any applicant that was not in good standing in the American medical association. These lectures were attended by physicians from all parts of the country. In 1872 his health failed and he went to Europe, where he spent five years, studying practically the fevers of southern Italy. On his return he settled in Newport, R. I., where he has since resided. While in Boston he was physician to the Boston lying-in hospital, to St. Elizabeth’s hospital, and to St. Joseph’s home, consulting surgeon to Carney general hospital, and surgeon to the New England hospital for women and children. Dr. Storer is a member of many scientific and medical societies in this country and abroad, and was one of the foundation members of the Progress Association of Massachusetts. In 1862 he was elected president of the Gynecological society of Boston, of whose journal he was also the active editor in 1869–73. He was also in 1871 president of the Association of American medical editors. He has been a frequent attendant at the meetings of the American medical association, of which he was secretary and vice-president in 1866 and 1868, and in 1871, by special invitation of the California state board of health, he delivered a lecture in Sacramento on “Female Hygiene.” He was a vice-president of the gynecological section of the Ninth international congress. Dr. Storer has been a very large contributor to medical journals, and the titles of his papers exceed 125 in number. In book-form he has published, with Dr. William O. Priestley, “The Obstetric Memoirs and Contributions of Sir James Y. Simpson” (Edinburgh, 1853; Philadelphia, 1859); “Crimes and Punishment in America” (Philadelphia, 1860); “Why Not? A Book for Every Woman” (Boston, 1866); “Is it I? A Book for Every Man” (1867); with Franklin F. Heard, “Crimes and Punishment; Its Nature, Its Evidence, and Its Laws” (1868); “On Nervous Prostration with Special Reference to the Management of Sick Women” (1868); and “Southern Italy as a Health Station for Invalids” (Naples, 1875).—Another son, Francis Humphreys, chemist, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 March, 1832, entered the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1850, and there made a specialty of chemistry, studying under Isaiah P. Cooke, whose assistant he was for several years. In 1851 Prof. Cooke’s laboratories at Cambridge and at Harvard medical school in Boston, where he also instructed a private class in chemical analysis. In 1853 he was appointed chemist to the U. S. North Pacific exploring expedition, and visited the principal islands of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. On his return he completed his course at the Lawrence scientific school, was graduated B. A. in 1855, and then studied abroad with Bunsen in Heidelberg, Richter in Freiburg, Stockart in Tharanitz, and with Emil Kopp in Paris. He returned in 1857, and was chemist to the Boston gas-light company till 1871, also opening a private laboratory as an analytical and consulting chemist. In 1865 he was appointed professor of general and industrial chemistry at the Massachusetts institute of technology, where, with Charles W. Eliot, he devoted himself to teaching chemistry in its application to the arts and as a means of mental training in general education, and to the task of organizing and perfecting a system of instructing students in large classes by the experimental method. He spent several months abroad during 1867 for the purpose of studying the chemical departments of the World’s fair in Paris and the processes actually employed in the chemical manufacture of the U. S. During 1870 he was appointed to the chair of agricultural chemistry at Harvard, and he has since occupied that post, and is dean of the Bussey institution. Prof. Storer received the honorary degree of A. M. from Harvard in 1870, and is a member of scientific societies at home and abroad. His papers exceed 100 in number. For some time he was American editor of the “RÉPERTOIRE DE CHIMIE APPLIQUEE,” and has conducted the “Bulletin of the Bussey Institution.” In book-form he has published “Dictionary of the Solubilities of Chemical Substances” (Cambridge, 1864); with Charles W. Eliot, “Manual of Inorganic Chemistry” (New York, 1868) and “Manual of Qualitative Chemistry Analysis” (1869); “Cyclopeedia of Quantitative Analysis,” in two parts (Boston, 1875); and “Handbook of the Analysis and Applications of Chemistry” (2 vols., New York, 1887).—David’s cousin, George Washington, naval officer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1789; d. there, 8 Jan., 1864, entered the navy as a midshipman, 16 Jan., 1800, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 24 July, 1813. He served in the ship “Independence,” on the Mediterranean station in 1815–16, commanded the schooner “Lynx,” on the New England coast and in the Gulf of Mexico in 1817, cruised in the frigates “Congress” and “Java” in the West Indies in 1818–19, and in the frigate “Constitution” in the Mediterranean in 1820–4. He was commissioned master-commandant, 24 April, 1828, and captain, 9 Feb., 1837, commanded the receiving-ship “Constellation” at Boston in 1839, the frigate “Potomac,” of the Brazil station, in 1840–2, the navy-yard at Portsmouth in 1843–5, and was command-in-chief of the Brazil squadron in 1847–50. He was on leave and served as member of boards, president of the board of inquiry, and other duty in 1851–4. In 1855–7 he was governor of the naval arsenal at Philadelphia. He was retired, 21 Dec., 1861, on account of age, and promoted to rear-admiral on the retired list, 16 July, 1882. In 1861–2 he served on special duty in Brooklyn, after which he was unemployed for one year.
years later he went to La Porte, Ind., and had there his first experience in publishing a newspaper, which was unsuccessful. He kept a drugstore for some time, and edited a country weekly, and, growing tired of Indiana, went to Jackson, Mich., and studied law for two years. He next established the "Patriot" in that town, of which he was appointed postmaster under Polk's administration, whereupon he sold the paper. Having been removed by Taylor in 1849, he set up another drugstore, was chosen the year following a member of the legislature of the state, and subsequently appointed state-prison inspector. In 1853 he removed to Detroit, bought an interest in the "Free Press," and ere long rose to be its editor and sole owner. He went to Chicago in 1861 and purchased the "Times," which then had a very small circulation. His energy, enterprise, and fearless expression of his views on every subject gave the paper notoriety. No man in the northwest has made so much as he both to benefit and injure journalism. Without faith in any one, as a consequence no one placed faith in him. He was independent in an extreme and unwholesome sense, boasting that he had no friends and wanted none, and apparently doing his utmost to create enemies. His judgment of men was no new idea of what constitutes news being frequently morbid and indecorous. He was daring to a degree of recklessness and repellent cynicism, but his course yielded him a large fortune. About 1877 his health began to fail, and he went abroad. In the summer of 1878 he had a paralytic stroke, and was found at home. He was adjudged of unsound mind in 1884, and a conservator of his estate was appointed by the courts.

STORK, Charles Augustus Gottlieb, clergyman, b. in Helmsfoeld, duchy of Brunswick, Germany, 16 June, 1764; d. in Salisbury, N. C., 27 March, 1831. The family name was originally Storc. He received his classical and theological education in the University of Helmsfoeld, in 1785 became a private tutor, and in 1788 accepted a call as pastor and missionary among Lutherans in North Carolina. He was examined and ordained to the ministry, and arrived in Baltimore, Md., in June, immediately after his arrival he took charge of congregations in Cabarrus county, N. C., where he remained until he retired from the active duties of his ministry, in 1790, on account of serious enterprises of the church. When, on 2 May, 1803, the synod of North Carolina was organized, he was elected the first president, and was annually re-elected whenever he could be present. During the latter part of his life he removed to a farm ten miles south of Salisbury, where he spent the remainder of his days. He was a man of learning and piety, and had the reputation of being a supernal linguist. See "The Stork Family in the Lutheran Church," by John G. Morris, D. D. (Philadelphia, 1886).—His son, Theophilus, clergyman, b. near Salisbury, N. C., in August, 1814; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 28 March, 1874, was graduated at Pennsylvania college, Gettysburg, in 1833, and at the theological seminary there in 1837. In the same year he was licensed to preach by the synod of Maryland, and assumed pastoral charge of the Lutheran congregation at Winchester, Va., where he remained until 1841. In the latter year he moved to Philadelphia as pastor of St. Matthew's congregation, the second English Lutheran congregation in the city. In 1849 he was one of the leaders in the movement that resulted in the organization of the East Pennsylvania synod. In 1850 he resigned as pastor of St. Matthew's congrega-gation and organized St. Mark's congregation, building a new church. In 1856 he accepted the presidency of Newberry college, S. C., but in 1860 he removed to Baltimore, Md., as pastor of a new congregation. Here he remained until 1865, when he retired on account of failing health. For the next few years, until 1871, he was engaged in pastoral and editorial duties in Philadelphia, as well as in literary pursuits. In 1871 he received the degree of D. D. from Pennsylvania college. He removed to Chicago at a time when some of his journalistic friends had been deprived of the "Free Press," and then had a large fortune. In 1873 he was ordained to the ministry. He was pastor of St. James's Lutheran congregation in Philadelphia for a few months in 1861, of St. Mark's congregation in Baltimore, Md., 1862-63, and professor of theology in Gettysburg seminary, and chairman of the faculty from 1881 until his death. In 1874 he received the degree of D. D. from Pennsylvania college. He published numerous articles in periodicals, and was for a time co-editor of the "Lutheran Missionary Journal" and the "Lutheran Observer in Philadelphia. Some of his fugitive writings have been collected in a posthumous work entitled "Light on the Pilgrim's Way," edited by his brother, Theophilus B. Stork (Philadelphia, 1895).

STORRS, Emery Alexander, lawyer, b. in Hillsdale, Cattaraus co., N. Y., 12 Aug., 1856; d. in Ottawa, Ill., 12 Sept., 1885. He first studied law with his father, and then went to Buffalo, where he was admitted to the bar. In 1867 he went to New York, remaining there for two years. He then settled in Chicago, and soon took a prominent place among the lawyers of the country. As an orator he had few superiors. Politically a Republican, he devoted his great talents to that party, taking an active part in the presidential campaigns of the last thirty years. In 1868, 1872, and 1876 he was a delegate-at-large from Illinois to the National Republican convention, being on each occasion one of the foremost in shaping the policy and formulating the platform of his party. His friends urged his appointment as attorney general under the administrations of Hayes and Arthur, but without success. Within a few months before his death he accepted a large retainer to defend the Mormons in the U. S. courts of Utah.

STORRS, Henry Randolph, b. in Middletown, Conn., 3 Sept., 1857; d. in New Haven, Conn., 29 July, 1897. He was graduated at Yale in 1884, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1897, and practised at Champion, Whiston, and Utica, N. Y., serving for five years as judge of the county. He was elected to congress as a Federalist from Utica, and served with re-elections from 6
Dec. 1819, till 3 March, 1831, except during the 17th congress. Mr. Storrs subsequently settled in New York city, and attained a high rank at the bar. He was possessed of magnificent powers of discursiveation, great logical exactness, and a ready and powerful eloquence, and as a debater in congress was in the first rank. Several of his speeches have been published.—His brother, William Lucius, jurist, b. in Middletown, Conn., 35 March, 1735; d. in Hartford, Conn., 25 June, 1801, was graduated at Yale, in 1801, and from 2 Dec., 1802, till June, 1840, when he resigned to accept the appointment of associate judge of the court of errors, and in 1857 was appointed chief justice. He held the professorship of law in Yale during 1846-7, and the degree of L.L. D. was conferred on him by Western Reserve in 1846. His decisions, which are regarded as exceedingly able, are published in the "Connecticut Reports."

STORRS Richard Salter, clergyman, b. in Long Meadow, Mass., 6 Feb., 1787; Lin Braintree, Mass., 11 Aug., 1873. His grandfather, John, served as a chaplain in the Revolution, and his father, Richard Salter, was pastor of the Congregational church at Long Meadow, Mass. The son received his early education at home and entered Yale in 1802, but, his health failing, he taught in the Clinton academy at East Hampton, L. I., where he had been invited to the pastorate. Of the Lyman Beecher. Meanwhile he continued his studies, and, entering the senior class, was graduated at Williams in 1807. He then returned to Long Island and studied theology under Rev. Aaron Woodworth in Bridgehampton. A year later he was licensed by the Suffolk presbytery, and had charge of the parishes of LIsip and Smithtown, but soon resigned from his work, and entered again at the Congregational theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1810. He was then ordained pastor of the 1st Congregational church of Braintree, which charge he retained until his death, except during an interval of five years, when he was engaged in the service of the Home missionary society of Massachusetts. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Union college in 1835, and by Harvard in 1836, and that of L. L. D. by Columbia in 1887. In 1855 he delivered the Graham lectures, before the Brooklyn institute, "On the Wisdom and Goodness of God," his subject being "The Constitution of the Human Soul," and in 1879 he delivered the L. P. Stone lectures at Princeton theological seminary. He also gave the lectures on "Preaching Without Notes," at the Union theological seminary, in New York, in 1875, and those on the "Divine Origin of Christianity," in the same institution, in 1881, which were repeated before the Lowell institute in Boston. Dr. Storrs has attained reputation as one of the most eloquent pulpit orators in the United States. In 1875 he made an address on the "Apology of Romans to educated Protestants," before the Long Island historical society. He is well known for his historical studies, and has delivered frequent addresses on public occasions. In 1875 he made the address before the New York historical society on its seventieth anniversary, in 1876 the centennial oration in New York city, and in 1881 the FBB oration at Harvard. Dr. Storrs was elected a trustee of Amherst in 1863, and since 1875 he has been, with the Rev. Edward Long Island historical society. In 1887 he was chosen president of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions. He was one of the editors of "The Independent" from 1848 till 1861, and, in addition to numerous articles in periodicals, prepared a "Report on the Revised Edition of the English Version of the Bible." His published works further include: "A Compendium of the Human Soul" (1856); "Conditions of Success in Preaching without Notes" (1855); "Early American Spirit and the Genesis of It" (1875); "Declaration of Independence, and the Effects of It" (1876); "John Wydiffe and the First English Bible" (1880); "Recognition of the Supernatural in Letters and in Life" (1881); "Manliness in the School" (1883); "The Divine Origin of Christianity indicated by its Historical Effects" (1884); "The Prospective Advance of Christian Missions" (1885); "Fifty Years of Pastoral Life" (Brooklyn, 1886); and "The Broader Range and Outlook of the Modern College Training" (1887).

STORY, George Henry, artist, b. in New Haven, Conn. 22 Jan., 1835. When he was fifteen years of age he apprenticed himself to a wood-carver for three years. At the expiration of this term he was a pupil under Charles Hine for three years. He then studied in Europe and was appointed by President Madison an associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. His circuit embraced four states—Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island—and his judicial duties were onerous in the extreme.

On his return home, he was re-elected to the Massachusetts house of representatives, and in 1851 became its speaker. In November of the same year, at the early age of thirty-two, Story was appointed by President Polk as a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and held his office, with but one year of intermission, until his death in 1886. He was a man of regular habits and of strong moral force, and his influence among his contemporaries was wide and lasting. He was a man and a judge of power, and his influence and authority were respected throughout the state.

In 1831 Judge Story was offered the chief justiceship of Massachusetts, but he declined. After the death of Chief Justice Marshall, being the senior member by appointment, he presided over the deliberations of his associates until the confirmation of Chief Justice Taney. It had been the wish of Marshall that Story should succeed him, but, as he was not in sympathy with the administration, that was impossible. During the illness of Taney in 1844 he again filled the chief justice's place for a few months. Judge Story had nearly completed his preparations for retiring from the bench and devoting his energies exclusively to the law-school, when he was stricken with a fatal illness. In 1848 he was elected an overseer of Harvard, and that university conferred on him the degree of LL. D. in 1851, while Brown similarly honored him in 1815, and Dartmouth in 1824. For many years he was president of the Merchants' bank in Salem, and in 1842 he was active in establishing the alumni association of Harvard, of which he became vice-president. Though for thirty-three years a laborious judge of the supreme court of his native state, his life was one of continuous friendly enjoyment. In 1827 he had married his favorite and devoted follower, Margaret Meigs, by whom he had eight children. After the death of his wife, he devoted the remainder of his life to his favorite profession, and his last years were spent in writing his great works, which are perhaps the most valuable contributions to the science of law that have been made in our country.

His book "Digest of Law" in three manuscript folio volumes, which is in the Harvard law library. The secret of these colossal achievements was ceaseless, systematic industry, an extraordinary memory equally tenacious of principles and of cases, frequent change of labor, and concentration of mind. He economized odd moments, changed his work when weary, and wrought with all the force of his intellect. Judge Story had fine colloquial powers, which manifested themselves not in wit or epigram, but in a continuous flow of genial and sparkling remark. His favorite English poets were Pope and Gray; his favorite Latin poet was Virgil, of whose works, when travelling, he always carried with him a well-thumbed pocket edition. A collection of his "Miscellaneous Writings" was published during his lifetime (1855), and an enlarged edition, edited by his son, William W. Story, appeared after his death (2 vols., Boston, 1851). See also "Life and Letters of Joseph Story," by William W. Story (2 vols., 1851).

His son, William Wetmore, artist, b. in Salem, Mass., 12 Feb., 1819, d. in Vallambrosa, Italy, 7 Oct., 1893, was graduated at Harvard in 1838, and studied law under his father's direction. He was admitted to the bar, and devoted his attention largely to the preparation of the "Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Circuit Court of the United States for the First Circuit" (3 vols., Boston, 1842-7); "Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal" (1841); and "Treatise on the Law of Sales of Personal Property" (1847). At the same time he was a frequent contributor of both prose and verse to the "Boston Miscellany" and other periodicals. Mr. Story was the poet of his class, and in 1844 delivered the Phi B K poem at Harvard on "Nature and Art," in which he indicated the tastes which were to govern his future life. His first volume of "Poems" was published in 1847, and in 1856 he delivered a poem at the dedications of the statue of Beethoven at the Boston music-hall. In 1848 his fondness for art led to his going to Italy, where he had since resided, devoting his attention chiefly to sculpture. His statue of his father in the chapel of Mount Auburn cemetery, of Edward Everett in the Boston public garden, busts of James Russell Lowell, Theodore Parker, and Josiah Quincy, are well-known examples of his art, and he modeled a bronze statue of George Peabody, which was erected in London in 1869, and a replica of which was presented in 1888 to the city of Baltimore through the liberality of Robert Garrett. He was a U. S. commissioner on fine arts to the World's fair at Paris in 1878, and had received decorations from France and Italy. Mr. Story held a professorship in the Academia degli arcadi at Rome, and had received the degree of D. C. L. from the University of Oxford and an honorary degree from the University of Bologna on its 500th anniversary. Among his other works are "Sappho"
STOUGHTON, Edward Wallace (ste-ton), lawyer, b. in Springfield, Vt., 1 May, 1818; d. in New York city, 7 Jan., 1882. He came to New York city when he was eighteen years old, and there studied law. After his admission to the bar in 1840 he became connected with important cases, including some famous patent trials, notably those of the War of 1812. He was engaged in the case of Isaac Winslow against the Erie Railroad, and was counsel for the latter in the receiver cases in the U. S. courts in 1868. Mr. Stoughton was retained by William M. Tweed at the beginning of his legal troubles, though he took no active part in the defence; and he conducted the suit of the stockholders in the Emma mine litigation. During the administrations of President Lincoln he published in Mr. Stoughton's issue in book-form "An Epistle from Yarico to Huckle" (Marblehead, 1792); "Consolatory Odes, dedicated to those Unfortunate Beings who labor under the Malignant Influence of the Democratic Manna" (Worcester, 1799); and "A Parnassian Shop opened in the Pindaric Style, by Peter Quince, Esq." (Boston, 1791).

STOUGHTON, Edwin Henry, soldier, b. in Springfield, Vt., 28 June, 1838; d. in Boston, Mass., 27 Dec., 1868, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1859, and assigned to the 6th infantry. During 1839-60 he served in garrison at Fort Columbus, N. Y., and on scouting duty in the western territories, but he resigned on 4 March, 1861, from the regular army. In September he was commissioned colonel of the 4th Vermont volunteers, and with his regiment joined the army of the Potomac. He served during the pen- sular campaign, and was engaged in the siege of Yorktown, the action at Lee's Mill, the battles of Williamsburg and Savage Station, and the operations before Richmond. His services gained for him promotion to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers on 3 Nov., 1862, and he was assigned to the command of the 3d Vermont brigade, covering the defences of Washington. While stationed at Fairfax Court-House, Va., he was captured by Gen. John S. Mosby on 8 March, 1863, but, after confinement for several weeks in Libby prison, he was released. His commission had expired by constitutional limitations four days before his capture. Gen. Stoughton then resigned from the army and entered on a practice of law in New York city, but failing health compelled his removal to Boston, where he died.

STOUGHTON, Israel, settler, b. in England; d. in Lincoln, England, in 1645. He emigrated to Massachusetts and early settled in Dorchester. In November, 1633, he was admitted as a freeman, and he was a member of the first general court, which was elected on that occasion. He was also elected a member of the second general court, and was re-elected in both 1634 and 1635.

STOUGHTON, John, soldier, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 16 March, 1813; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 20 June, 1880. He was graduated at the United States Military Academy in 1835, and appointed a second lieutenant in the 4th United States Artillery in the same year. He was transferred to the 2d Artillery in 1836. He served in the army of the United States in the Mexican war, and served in the United States regular army during the Civil War. He was killed in the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., 13 December, 1862.
end of his life, and at the time of the death of Sir William Phips became acting governor. He was appointed chief justice of the superior court of the colony on 22 Dec., 1692, and held that office during the witchcraft trials. When others acknowledged that they had been deluded, he persistently contended that he had acted up to his best judgment.

STOWE, William, clergyman, b. in New York, 29 March, 1817; d. in Sturgis, Mich., 6 June, 1888. He early removed to Sturgis, Mich., and, after being admitted to the bar in 1841, he settled in the practice of his profession. In 1844 he was elected prosecuting attorney of his county, and in 1861 he was appointed by President Lincoln U. S. district attorney for Michigan. This office he resigned in the beginning of the civil war, and entered the 11th Michigan volunteers, in which he became lieutenant-colonel. His services were principally in the west, and at Stone River he attained his colonelcy and commanded a brigade in Gen. George H. Thomas's corps at Chattanooga, Mission Ridge, Resaca, New Hope Church, Rauf's Station (where, while directing the fire of a battery, he lost a limb), and Atlanta. He continued with his regiment until wounded, and on 13 March, 1865, he received the brevets of brigadier-general and major-general of volunteers. In 1866 he was elected attorney-general of Michigan, when he was chosen as a Republican to congress, and served, with re-election, from 4 March, 1869, till 3 March, 1873. Subsequently he retired to Sturgis.

STOW, Baron, clergyman, b. in Croydon, X. H., 16 June, 1801; d. in Boston, Mass., 27 Dec., 1889. He was graduated at Columbian college, Georgetown, D. C., in 1825, and in 1827 was ordained to the ministry in Portsmouth, X. H., where he was settled as pastor of the Baptist church. In 1829 he was called to the pastorate of the Baldwin place Baptist church in Boston, in which connection he had a successful ministry of sixteen years. At the close of this term of service he became pastor of the Rowe street (now Clarendon avenue) church, and continued in this relation until 1867, when he retired from regular ministerial labors. He twice visited Europe for the benefit of his health. Dr. Stow performed a large amount of work as a member of the executive committee of the American missionary union. He was a graceful and vigorous writer, as well as one of the most eloquent and successful preachers of his denomination. He was one of the compilers of the "Psalmist," a hymnal (1849), and editor of "Daily Manna" and the "Missionary Enterprise" (1846), a volume of sermons on missions, to which he contributed one of great merit. He is the author of "Harriet Dow" (Boston, 1832); "History of the Baptist Mission to India" (1833); "History of the Danish Mission on the Coast of Greenland" (1837); "Daily Manna" (1842); "The Whole Family in Heaven and Earth" (1845); "Christian Brotherhood" (1859); and "First Things" (1859).

STOWE, Calvin Ellis, clergyman, b. in Natchez, Miss., 6 April, 1802; d. in Hartford, Conn., 11 Aug., 1886. His ancestors came from London to Boston in 1634. Mr. Stowe was a lad of six years when his father died, leaving a widow and two boys to struggle with poverty, and at the age of twelve he was apprenticed to a paper-maker. He was early distinguished for his insatiable craving for books, and acquired the rudiments of Latin by studying at odd moments during his apprenticeship in the paper-mill. His earnest desire and determined efforts to gain an education attracted the attention of benevolent people, who resolved to assist him, and in November, 1820, he was sent to the academy in Gorham, Me. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1824, remained there one year as librarian and instructor, and in September, 1825, entered the theological seminary at Andover. In the same year he was admitted to the Historical Society of Maine. In the following year he was installed as pastor of the church in Cumberland, Me. In 1827, he was appointed professor of Greek in Dartmouth, and in 1833 Elisha, daughter of Rev. Bennett Tyler, of Portland, Me. The same year he removed to Walnut Hills, near Cincinnati, Ohio, having been called to the chair of sacred literature in Lane theological seminary. In August, 1834, his father died, and in 1837 he married Harriet Elizabeth, daughter of Dr. Lyman Beecher, the president of the seminary. Prof. Stowe became convinced by his experience as an instructor that the great need of the west at that time was an efficient common-school system, and, without neglecting his professional duties, he devoted himself heart and soul to this work. In May, 1836, he sailed for England, primarily to purchase a library for Lane seminary, but he received at the same time an official appointment from the state legislature to visit as agent the public schools of Europe, particularly those of Prussia. On his return he published his "Report on Elementary Education in Europe." In 1850 Prof. Stowe accepted a professorship at Andover, and in 1852 he was appointed to fill the chair of sacred literature at Andover seminary. In 1853 and 1856 he visited Europe with Mrs. Stowe. In 1864, owing to failing health and increasing infirmities, he resigned his professorship and removed to Hartford, Conn. Besides the works mentioned above, he published "Introduction to the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible" (Cincinnati, 1833); "The Religious Element in Education," a lecture (1844); "The Right Interpretation of the Sacred Scriptures," inaugural address (Andover, 1853); and "Origin and History of the Books of the Bible, both Canonical and Apocryphal" (Hartford, 1867).

—His wife, Harriet Elizabeth Beecher, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 14 June, 1812; d. in Hartford, 1
July, 1850. She was the third daughter of Rev.
Dr. Lyman Beecher. When she was a mere child
Mrs. Beecher died, and she never ceased to influence the lives of her children. Mrs. Stowe wrote:
"Although my mother's bodily presence disappeared from our circle, I think that her memory and example had more influence in moulding her family than the living presence of many mothers."

After her death, Mrs. Stowe was placed under the care of her grandmother at Guilford, Conn. Here she listened, with uniring interest, to the ballads of Sir Walter Scott and the poems of Robert Burns.
The "Arabian Nights," also, was to her a dream of delight—an enchanted palace, through which her imagination ran wild. After her father's second marriage, her education was continued at North-Litchfield academy on the plantation of Sarah Pierce and John Brave. Of Mr. Brave and his methods of instruction Mrs. Stowe ever spoke with the greatest enthusiasm. "Mr. Brave excited all teachers that I ever knew in the faculty of teaching composition," she wrote. "Much of the inspiration and training of my early days consisted not in things I was supposed to be studying, but in seeing what was noticed at my desk. The conversation of Mr. Brave with the older people, indeed, were the influences in her home less stimulating to the intellect. Dr. Beecher, like the majority of the Calvinistic divines of his day, had his system of theology vast and comprehensive enough to embrace the fate of men and angels, and to fathom the counsels of the Infinite. His mind was kept in a state of intense and jurious intellectual activity by constantly elaborating and defending this system. Consequently his children grew up in an atmosphere surcharged with mental and moral enthusiasm. There was no trace of morbid melancholy or ascetic gloom in Dr.
Beecher. He was sound in body, sound in mind, and the religious influence which he exerted on the minds of his children was healthy and cheerful. Under such circumstances it is not surprising to find a bright and thoughtful child of twelve years writing a school composition on the profound theme "Can the Immortality of the Soul be proved from the Light of Nature?" The writer took the negative side of the question, and argued with such power and originality that Dr. Beecher, when it was read in his presence, not knowing the author, asked with emphasis. "Who wrote that?" "Your daughter, sir," quickly answered Mr. Brave. Said Mrs. Stowe, speaking of this event: "It was the premature moment of my life. There was no mistaking father's face when he was pleased, and to have interested him was past all juvenile triumphs.

Dr. Beecher read with enthusiasm, and encourgaged his children to read. Both Byron and Scott when nine or ten years of age, Mrs. Stowe was deeply impressed by reading Byron's "Corsair.
"I shall never forget how it electrified and thrilled me," she wrote. "I went home absorbed and wondering about Byron, and after that listened to everything that father and mother said at table about him." Byron's death made an enduring, but at the same time solemn and painful, impression on her mind. She was eleven years old at the time, and usually did not understand her father's sermons, but the one that he preached on this occasion she remembered perfectly, and it had a deep and lasting influence on her life. At the time of the Missouri agitation Dr. Beecher's sermons and prayers were burdened with the anguish of his soul for the cause of the slave. His passionate appeals drew tears down the hardest faces of the old farmers who listened to them. Night and morning, in family devotions, he appealed to heaven for the suppression of the time of deliverance might come. The effect of such sermons and prayers on the mind of an imaginative and sensitive child can be easily conceived. They tended to make her, what she had been from earliest childhood, the enemy of all slavery. In 1834, when thirteen years of age, Mrs.
Stowe went to Hartford to attend the school that had been established there by her eldest sister, Catherine. Here she studied Latin, read Ovid and Virgil, and wrote metrical translations of the former, which displayed a very respectable knowledge of Latin, a good command of English, with considerable skill in versification. At the age of fourteen she taught with success a class in "Butler's Analogy," and gained a good grounding in knowledge of French. As scholar and teacher she remained with her sister in Hartford till the autumn of 1832, when both removed with their father to Cincinnati, Ohio, where Dr. Beecher assumed the presidency of Lane theological semiinary and the pastorate of the 2d Presbyterian church. At this time Mrs. Stowe compiled an elemental geography for a religious class which was extensively studied, and again engaged in teaching with her sister in Cincinnati. She wrote lectures for her classes in history, and, as a member of a literary club, called the Semi-Colon, humorous sketches and poems.

In January, 1836, she married Mr. Stowe. During her residence in Cincinnati she frequently visited the semi-colon, attended the lectures, and acquainted herself with the knowledge of southern life that was so conspicuously displayed in her subsequent writings. Fugitive slaves were frequently sheltered in her house, and assisted by her husband and brothers to escape to Canada. During the riots in 1836, when James G. Birney's press was destroyed and free negroes were hunted like wild beasts through the streets of Cincinnati, only the distance from the city and the depths of mud saved Lane seminary and the Yankee Abolitionists at Walnut Hills from a like fate. Many a night Mrs. Stowe sank into uneasy slumber, expecting to be roused by the howlings of an angry mob, led by the agents of exasperated and desperate slave-holders. In 1849 Mrs. Stowe published "The Mayflower or the Descendants of the Pilgrims" (New York: new ed., with additions, Boston, 1855), being a collection of papers which she had from time to time contributed to various periodicals. In 1850 she removed with her husband and family to Brunswick, Me., where the former had just been called to a professorship in Bowdoin. It was at this time that the question of the right of the exod under the passage of the fugitive slave law. It seemed to her as if slavery were about to extend itself over the free states. She conversed with many benevolent, tender-hearted, Christian men and women, who were blind and deaf to all arguments against it, and concluded that it was because they did not realize what slavery really meant. She determined, if possible, to make them realize it, and, as a result of this determination, wrote "Uncle Tom's Cabin, or Life among the Lowly." In the mean time Prof. Stowe was appointed to the chair of biblical literature in the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., and removed thither with his family about the time that this remarkable book was published. Neither Mrs. Stowe nor any of her friends had the least conception of the future that awaited the book. It was her hope very self-dependently. It does not seem on the face of it to have been written with any specific desire to appear in the "National Era," at Washington, D. C., from June, 1851, till April, 1852, before it was issued in book-form (Boston, 1852). Mrs. Stowe says: "It seemed to me that there was no hope; that nobody would hear; that nobody would read, nobody would pity; that this frightful system which had pursued its victims into the free states might at last threaten them even in Canada. Nevertheless, nearly 500,000 copies of this work were sold in the United States alone in the five years following its publication. It has been translated into Armenian, Bohemian, Dutch, Finnish, French, German, Hungarian, Italian, Polish, Portuguese, modern Greek, Russian, Servian, Spanish, Swedish, Wallachian, Welsh, and other languages. Several volumes containing copies of the book were issued in the British museum in London, together with the most extensive collection of the literature of this book. In reply to the abuse and retribution that its publication called forth, Mrs. Stowe published, in 1853, "A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin, presenting the Original Facts and Documents upon which the Story is founded, together with Corroboration of Statements verifying the Truth of the Work." She also wrote "A Peep into Uncle Tom's Cabin, for Children" (1853). The story has been dramatized in various forms; once by the author as "The Christian Slave; a Drama" (1855). The character of Uncle Tom was suggested by the life of Josiah Henson (q. e.).

So reduced was Mrs. Stowe's health by her severe physical labor and that of her husband, and the strain of her sufferings, that at one time the Medical Professor of the city of New York, Dr. Whately, pronounced her case hopeless. It was then that Dr. Whately and Mrs. Stowe's son, Edward Charley Stowe, then a medical student, and later the famous pathologist, took the lily lowness of tone and quiet truth, contrast as charmingly with the timid veneration of the modern school of novel-writers as the "Voyage of Wakefield" itself; and we are greatly mistaken if it do not prove to be the most characteristic of Mrs. Stowe's works, and that on which her fame will "chirly rest with posterity." Mrs. Stowe received letters containing similar expressions of commendation from William E. Gladstone, Charles Kingsley, and Bishop Whately.

In 1864 Prof. Stowe resigned his professorship at Andover and removed to Hartford, Conn., where the family continued to reside, making their winter home in Mandarin, Fla., until Prof. Stowe's increasing infirmities made the journey no longer possible. In 1889 Mrs. Stowe published "Old-Time Folks," a tale of New England life, and in September of that same year, invited thence to reading the Countess Guiccioli's "Recollections of Lord Byron," contributed a paper to the "Atlantic Monthly" on "The True Story of Lady Byron's Life." In reply to the tempest of adverse criticism that this paper evoked, she published "Lady Byron vindicated: a History of the Byron Controversy" (Boston, 1889). Her seventieth birthday was celebrated with a garden party, mainly of literary people, in Cambridge, Mass. She spent the summer of 1888, in failing health, at North Haven, Long Island. George Sand has paid the following tribute to the genius of Mrs. Stowe: "I cannot say she has taken as one understands it in the world of letters, but she has genius as humanity feels the need of genius—the genius of goodness, not that of beauty. Her novels are like a well-digging, dignified, penetrating, and profound, the spirit that thus fathoms the recesses of the human soul." The accompanying steel engraving represents Mrs. Stowe as she appeared in middle life; the vignette, at threecorse and ten.

Besides the works that have been mentioned, Mrs. Stowe had written "Geography for my Children" (Boston, 1854); "Fruits of the Temple," with her husband (1850). "Doings of the Tip-Top Club" (1860); "The Dog's Breakfast," with her husband (1863); "Old-Timer" (1869); "Little Foxes" (1869); "Uncle Tom's Cabin," with her husband (1851), and what to do with him." she published "The Pearl of Otr's Island; a Story of the Coast of Maine" (1862); "Ages of Sorrento" (1862); "Reply on Behalf of the Women of America to the Christian Address of many Thousand Women of Great Britain" (1868); "The Ragwah of a Carpet" (1864); "House and Home Papers, by Christopher Crayford" (1864); "Religious Poems" (1865); "Stories about our Dogs" (1865); "Little Foxes" (1865); "Queer Little People" (1867); "Daisy's First Winter, and other Stories" (1867); "The Chimney Corner, by Christopher Crayford" (1868); "Men of our Times" (Hartford, 1898); "The American Woman's Home," with her sister Catherine (Philadelphia, 1899); "The Last Battle of Pownal, on the Black Horse and White Tyranny" (1871); "Sam Lawson and inside Stories" (1871); "My Wife and I" (1872); "Palmetto Leaves" (1873); "Betty's Bright Idea, and other Tales" (1875); "We and Our Neighbors" (1875); "Footsteps of the Master" (1876); "Bible Heroes" (1878); "Pagan People" (1878); and "A Dog's Mission" (1881). Most of these works have been issued in the form of selections from her writings entitled "Golden Fruit in Silver Baskets" (London, 1859). In 1868 she became co-editor with Donald G. Mitchell of "Hearth and Home" in New York. Her life has been written by her son, the Rev. Charles Edward Stowe, who is pastor of Windsor avenue Congregational church in Hartford (Boston, 1890).
STRACHAN, John, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, 12 April, 1778; d. in Toronto, 1 Nov., 1867. He was graduated at King's college, Aberdeen, in 1796, studied theology at St. Andrew's, and taught in a village school until 1799, when he emigrated to Canada. He opened a school at Kingston and taught for three years, preparing himself in the meanwhile to take orders in the Church of England. He was ordained a deacon by Bishop Mountain in May, 1803, a priest, 3 June, 1804, and appointed to the mission of Cornwall, where he opened a grammar-school, and had among his pupils several that have since become eminent in Canada. In 1812 he removed to York (now Toronto), and became rector in that place. In 1818, after the expedition by which Gen. Zebulon M. Pike was killed at the old fort York, he visited Gen. Henry Dearborn, and was successful in dissuading him from invading the town. In 1818 he was nominated an executive councillor, took his seat in the legislative council, and remained a member of the government till 1836, and of the upper council till 1841, when he was appointed to the office of principal of Queen's College, and in 1839 bishop of Toronto. After 1818 he took an active part in politics, and a bitter strife arose between his party on the one side and that of William L. Mackenzie on the other, which eventually culminated in the rebellion of 1837. During the time that he was a member of the executive council fifty-seven rectories were established in Upper Canada at his suggestion, and the foundation of Trinity college, Toronto, was largely owing to his efforts. He received the degree of LL.D. from the University of St. Andrew's, and that of D.D. from the University of Aberdeen in 1807. Bishop Strachan published seventy essays in the “Kingston Gazette” in 1821 under the name of “Dickoner,” and several letters and pamphlets. He practically taught music in Upper Canada during his lifetime, and did more than any other person to establish it securely in that part of the country.

STRAIT, William, colonist. He left England in 1609 on the “Sea Venture” with Sir Thomas Gates, and was wrecked on the Bermudas, but in 1610 received Virginia a boat that had been constructed from the wreck, and was secretary of the colony for three years. Strachey wrote: “A True Reportery of the Wrecke and Redemption of Sir Thomas Gates upon and from the Islands of the Bermudas,” which was published in the fourth volume of Purchas’s “ Pilgrims.” He also compiled for the colony in Virginia “Laws Divine, Moral, and Martiall” (London, 1612), and was the author of “Historie of Travaille into Virginia Brittania.” (1618), published by the Hakluyt society, from an original manuscript, in 1849.

STRAIN, Isaac G., naval officer, b. in Roxbury, Pa., March 7, 1823. He entered the United States navy in 1843, and was advanced to the grade of passed midshipman in 1848. While in the South Atlantic ocean in 1845 he led an exploring expedition into the interior of Brazil, and in 1848 he visited the peninsula of Lower California. In 1849 he obtained permission to take his vessel Valparaiso for the sake of making the voyage journey to Rio Janeiro, where he rejoined his ship. The result of his experiences he gave to the public as “The Cordillera and Pampa: Sketches of a Journey in Chili and the Argentine Provinces in 1849” (New York, 1853). He was promoted lieutenant, 2 Feb., 1859, and was attached to the commission that in 1859 located the boundary-line between Mexico and the United States, and had charge of the expedition to survey the Isthmus of Durien. The extremities to which his party were reduced were so unusual to the public, and the heroism with which he sustained his command under extraordinary difficulties, brought him to the notice of the public. In the summer of 1859 he sailed in the “Arctic” on a voyage to ascertain by soundings in the North Atlantic ocean the possibility of an ocean telegraphic cable between the United States and Great Britain. Lieut. Strain was a member of the American ethnological society, and to its proceedings and those of the American geographical society he contributed interesting accounts of his expeditions, including a paper on “The History and Prospects of Interoceanic Communication” (New York, 1876). His death was the result of undue exposure while he was on the isthmus.

STRAKOSCH, Maurice, musician, b. in Breslau, Moravia, 15 Jan., 1833; d. in Paris, France, 9 Oct., 1887. His father removed to Germany in 1828, and young Strakosch there began the study of music. He soon gained a reputation as an excellent pianist, and was engaged on the Paris and English circuits in which he travelled. In 1848 he came to the United States, and soon devoted himself entirely to managing operatic troupes, organizing his first company in 1853. In 1852 he married Amalia Patti, a sister of Adelina. His compositions for the piano were at one time very popular, and among them the music of one of Bayard Taylor’s songs. He wrote a small volume of “Souvenirs” in French not long before his death.—His brother, MAX, b. in Brunn, Moravia, 27 Sept., 1833; d. in New York city, 17 March, 1862, was associated with him in most of his enterprises, and some of the most famous artists travelled under their management, including Parepa-Rosa, Carletta and Adelina Patti, Karl Formes, Pasquale Brignoli, P. Pasquini, and T. Tijens, Christine Nilsson, and Marietta Alboni.

STRAKAHAN, James Samuel Thomas, capitalist, b. in Peterboro, N. Y., 23 April, 1898; d. in Saratoga, N. Y., 3 Sept., 1898. He was educated in the common schools, where he afterward taught, and then studied civil engineering. In 1892 he visited the region of the upper lakes for the purpose of opening trade with the Indians; but, finding this unfeasable, he engaged in the wool trade. He became associated in 1892 with Gerrit Smith in developing the manufacturing interests of Oneida

At and in Brooklyn, in 1844, that his large artillery was elected president of the University of the Pacific in 1877, and held that post for ten years, during which time the attendance rose from about 100 to more than 400. The buildings and appliances increased correspondingly, and the annual income of the institution was advanced from about $7,000 to $25,000.

In 1887 he accepted the presidency of Mills college, Oakland, Cal., which place he held three years. He was a delegate to the general conference of the Methodist church in Brooklyn, New York, in 1872, and to that in Cincinnati in 1880. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Northwestern and Willamette universities in 1873. He edited the department of "The Christian History" (New York, 1883), and has prepared a volume of the sermons and lectures of Bishop Haven.

STRATTON, Charles Sherwood, b. in Bridgeport, Conn., 4 Jan., 1818; d. in Middleborough, Mass., 15 July, 1883. He was first exhibited as a dwarf by Phineas T. Barnum at his American museum in New York city on 8 Dec., 1842, who gave him the title and name of Gen. Tom Thumb. At that time he was not more than two feet high, and weighed less than sixteen pounds. He was engaged at a salary of three dollars a week and travelling expenses; but, as he proved a great success, his salary was soon increased to twenty-five dollars a week, and at the end of his second year he received fifty dollars a week. In 1844 he visited En-at Columbia college in 1871 and at its law-school in 1873. He practised law until 1881, and then entered mercantile life, retaining his interest in literature. In 1887 he was appointed by Cleveland U. S. minister to Turkey, and reappointed by McKinley in 1898. Mr. Strawbridge is a close student of American history, on which he has lectured and written articles for periodicals, and he has published: "The Origin of the Republican Form of Government in the United States of America
(New York, 1866); "A Digest of Taxation in the United States." (Albany, 1863); a collected edition of his poems (2 vols., 1890); and; "The Indian Pass," describing explorations in Essex county, N. Y. (1860). He also contributed sixteen poems to John A. How's "Forest Pictures in the Adirondacks" (1864), and published various poems
that he read at different colleges, including Geneva
(now Hobart) (1850). Brady (1841); and a poem on the battle-field of Saranac.

STRAWBRIDGE, Robert, pioneer, b. inDrum-mer's Nave, near Carrick-on-Shannon, County Leitrim, Ireland; d. in Maryland in 1781. He came to this country some time between 1750 and 1765, settled on Sam's creek, Frederick co., Md., and soon opened his house for religious services. Shortly afterward a Methodist society was formed, and a place of worship, known as the Log meeting-house, was erected. Mr. Strawbridge now travelled constantly through the state, forming new societies, and in order that he might go on these journeys
his farm was cultivated for him by his neighbors.
After residing on Sam's creek about sixteen years he removed to Long Green, Baltimore county, where the meeting-house was built for him in 1770. He lived in this town until 1777, after which he settled in Philadelphia where he died. In his last years he was one of his preaching tours. It is a matter of dispute whether he or Philip Embury founded the first Methodist society and built the first chapel in this country, but most authorities give Embury priority. A full discussion of the point may be found in Joseph B.
Wakeley's "Lost Chapters Recovered from the Books of the Methodist Society" (New York, 1858), and John Atkinson's "Centennial History of American Methodism" (1884).

STRAZNIKY, Edward R. (straz-ny-ki), librarian, b. in Moravia, Austria, in 1820; d. in New York city, 9 Feb., 1876. He was educated at the University of Vienna, taking degrees in the departments of medicine and philosophy, and acquired by travel a familiar knowledge of modern languages. During the Hungarian rebellion he served as an officer in the revolutionary army.
At the defeat of the Nationalists he went into exile, and his property was confiscated. After a brief residence in England, he came to the United States, and found mercantile employment in Philadelphia. In 1849 he became a teacher in Moravia, New York city, and in 1872 he was appointed superintendent, which office he held the time of his death. He was also secretary of the American geographical society.

STREET, Alfred Billings, author, b. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 18 Dec., 1811; d. in Albany, N. Y., 2 June, 1881. He removed at an early age to Monticello, N. Y., and was educated at Dutchess county academy, after which he studied law with his father, Randall S. Street, and practised in Monticello. In 1839 he removed to Albany, in 1843-'44 edited the "Northern Light," and from 1848 till his death he was state librarian. Mr. Street began at an early age to write poetry for the magazines, and his attainable a respectable rank as a poetical writer. His productions are highly praised by critics, and several of his poems have been translated into German. His publications include "The Burning of Scheherazade, and other Poems" (Albany, 1842): "Drawings and Tintings" (New York, 1844); "Fugitive Poems" (1846); "Frontenac, or the Atocharo of the Iro-quos, a Metrical Romance" (London, 1849; New York, 1850); "The Council of Revision of the State of New York," a history (Albany, 1859);
"Woods and Waters, or the Summeras and the Racket," describing a trip in the Adirondack region (New York, 1860); "A Digest of Taxation in the United States." (Albany, 1863); a collected edition of his poems (2 vols., 1890); and; "The Indian Pass," describing explorations in Essex county, N. Y. (1860). He also contributed sixteen poems to John A. How's "Forest Pictures in the Adirondacks" (1864), and published various poems
that he read at different colleges, including Geneva
(now Hobart) (1850). Brady (1841); and a poem on the battle-field of Saranac.

STREET, Augustus Russell, donor, b. in New Haven, Conn., 5 Nov., 1791; d. there, 12
June, 1866. He was graduated at Yale in 1812, and studied law, but was compelled to abandon it on account of feeble health, and remained an invalid during the greater part of his life. From 1843 till 1848 he resided in Europe, travelling and devoting himself to the study of art and the modern languages. Mr. Street inherited a fortune, and gave largely to benevolent objects. He presented to Yale its school of the fine arts, one of its finest buildings, also making partial provision for its endowment. He founded the Street professorship of modern languages, and made provision in his will for a scheme of professorships in producing theological department. His daughter married Admiral Andrew H. Foote.

STREET, Whitting, philanthropist, b. in Wallingford, Conn., 25 March, 1790; d. in Northampton, Mass., 31 July, 1878. He was educated at public schools in West Springfield, Mass., and was successively a farmer, a freighter, and a merchant.
He accumulated a large fortune, and at his death left $100,000 to the city of Holyoke and twenty-one adjacent towns.

STREIBLING, Cornelius Kinchloe, naval officer, b. in Pendleton, S. C., 22 Sept., 1790; d. in Martinsburg, W. Va., 17 Jan., 1880. He entered the navy as a midshipman 18 June, 1812, and served in the frigate "Mohawk" on Lake Ontario in 1813, where he participated in the blockade of Kingston.
He was commissioned lieutenant, 1 April, 1818, cruised on the Brazil station in 1818-20, and then in the West Indies suppressing piracy. He commanded the sloop "Peace" on the East Indies station in 1823-24, and the frigate "Needle" in 1824-25. He returned to the U.S. in 1826, and was commissioned commander, 2 Jan., 1829, and in 1842-'43 had the sloop "Cyan" and frigate "United States" successively on the Pacific station. For the next two years he had command of the receiving-ship at Norfolk, and he then went out as fleet-captain in command of the ship-of-the-line "Ohio," of the Pacific squadron, during the greater part of the Mexican war, returning to New York in April, 1850. He was superintendent of the naval academy at Annapolis in 1850-3, was commisioned captain, 1 Aug., 1853, and commanded the steam sloop "San Jacinto" on special service in 1854-5. He was commandant of the Penasco nay-yard 1851-9, and served as flag-officer in command of the East India squadron in 1850-14.
When the civil war opened he returned home, and,
notwithstanding the secession of his native state, he adhered to the Union. He served on the board to regulate the compensation of government officers in 1861, and on the light-house board in 1862. By operation of law he was placed on the retired list in December, 1861, but he continued to render valuable service in command of the sloop Philadelphia in 1862-4, and from February till July, 1865, as commander-in-chief of the Eastern Gulf blockading squadron; after which he was a member of the light-house board until 1872. He was commissioned commodore on the retired list, 16 July, 1862, and rear-admiral, 25 July, 1866.

STRICKLAND, Samuel, Canadian author, b. in Rydon Hall, Suffolk, England, in 1809; d. in Lakefield, Upper Canada, in 1867. He entered the military service, attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and emigrated to Canada in 1826. He was a brother of Susanna Moodie, Agnes Strickland, and to both of them belonged the "Twenty-seven Years in Canada West, or the Experience of an Early Settler," edited by Agnes Strickland (2 vols., London, 1853).

STRICKLAND, William, architect, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1787; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 7 April, 1854. He studied under Benjamin H. Latrobe, and in 1809 became a landscape-painter. At this time, and subsequently he did considerable work as an aquatint engraver, producing a series of views of Philadelphia and a few portraits of decided merit. His first important architectural work was the old Masonic hall, Chestnut street, Philadelphia, which was opened for use, 27 Dec., 1810. The style was Gothic. His next important work was the U. S. bank, modelled after the Parthenon at Athens, and finished in 1814. From 1815 to 1824, he took his place as one of the chief architects in the country, and as such built the new Chestnut street theatre, the Arch street theatre, U. S. custom-house, St. Stephen's Episcopal church, the Merchants' exchange, U. S. mint, and the U. S. naval asylum, all in Philadelphia. Mr. Strickland was one of the first architects and engineers that turned his attention to the construction of railroads, and he went to Europe to study the system. On his return he built the Delaware breakwater for the U. S. government. His last work was the state-house at Nashville, Tenn., and he died while engaged in superintending its construction. By a vote of the legislature of the state his remains were placed in a crypt in that building. He published "Triangulation of the Entrance into Delaware Bay" (Philadelphia); "Report on Canals and Railways" (1826); and, with Gill and Campbell, "Public Works of the United States" (London, 1841).

STRICKLAND, William Peter, clergyman, b. in Pittsburg, Pa., 17 Aug., 1809; d. in Ocean Grove, N. J., 15 July, 1884. He was educated at Ohio university, Athens, Ohio, from which he afterward received his A.M. In 1839 he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church in Ohio, and, after serving in the itineracy and also for five years as an agent of the American Bible society, he removed to New York in 1856, where he was connected with the Methodist book concern, and was an associate editor of the "Christian Advocate." From 1865 till 1874 he supplied the pulpit of the Presbyterian church in Bridgehampton, L. I., and then he was installed as its regular pastor, but three years later he resigned on account of his wife's health. Afterward he labored as an evangelist, and, In 1862 he served as chaplain of the 48th New York regiment at Port Royal, S. C. Dr. Strickland published "History of the American Bible Society" (New York, 1854); "History of the Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church" (Cincinnati, 1859); "Genius and Mission of Methodism" (Boston, 1851); "Manual of Biblical Literature" (New York, 1853); "Light of the Temple" (Cincinnati, 1854); "The Astrologer of Chaldea, or the Life of Faith" (1855); "Christianity demonstrated by Facts" (1855); "Pioneers of the West" (New York, 1856); "The Pioneer Bishop, or the Life and Times of Francis Asbury" (1858); "Old Mackinaw, or the Fortress of the Lakes and its Surroundings" (Philadelphia, 1859); and "Life of Jacob Laiper" (New York, 1850). He also edited numerous volumes of sermons and other works, among them the "Autobiography of Peter Cartwright" (1855), and was editorially connected with several journals in the west, besides the one mentioned above.

STRICKLAND, Samuel, physician, b. in Maryland in 1754; d. in Albany, N. Y., 11 July, 1874. He studied medicine in Philadelphia with Dr. Thomas Bond, was appointed to the medical department of the army in 1765 by Gov. William Shirley, and served in the campaign of 1768 at Ticonderoga. He then settled in Albany, and on 14 Sept., 1775, was appointed director and physician of the hospitals of the northern department, and authorized to appoint a surgeon for the fleet that was then fitting out upon the lakes. He accompanied the troops in the invasion of Canada, but was dismissed the service by congress, 9 Jan., 1777; and in February that body ordered an inquiry to be made concerning medicines that he had bought. Gen. Philip Schuyler remonstrated against his removal, and on 15 March, 1777, he was reprimanded by congress. Dr. Strickland afterward practised in Albany with great reputation till his death.

STRICKLAND, James S., physician, b. in New York city in 1775; d. in St. Croix, W. I., 28 June, 1817. He was graduated at Columbia in 1793, and began to study theology, but abandoned it for medicine, which he pursued first under Dr. Samuel Bard and Dr. David Hosack in New York, and then at the University of Edinburgh, where he received his degree in 1799. He was professor of chemistry in Columbia in 1802-'13, and of medical jurisprudence in the College of physicians and surgeons from 1813 till his death. He was the first to lecture here on the latter science, and may be regarded as its founder in the United States. Dr. Strickland was one of the most efficient of the early promoters of science in this country. He was a physician of the New York hospital, a member of the Royal medical society of Edinburgh, and a fellow of the New York literary, philosophical, and historical societies. He published "De Absorbentium Systemate," his inaugural dissertation; and various essays and papers in medical journals.

STRICKLAND, Silas Horton, naval officer, b. in Middletown, Orange co., N. Y., 7 Nov., 1798; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1876. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 15 Nov., 1819, and in the frigate "President" participated in the engagements with the "Little Belt" and "Belvidera." He was commissioned lieutenant, 9 Dec., 1814, and served in the schooner "Spark" in the Mediterranean in 1815, participating in the Algerine war. During a storm at Gibraltar, upon one occasion, he went in a boat with six men to rescue the crew of a French brig that had capsized. He succeeded in getting the crew, but was unable to get back to port, and was blown off to Algiers, where his boat capsized in the surf on the beach, and one of his crew and two Frenchmen were drowned. In 1819-21 he served in the sloop "Cyan" on the coast of Africa, and brought home four slaves as prize-master. He was executive officer of the "Hornet" in the West Indies in 1821-24, for the suppression of piracy, and assisted in the capture of the "Moscow," the most dreaded piratical vessel in these waters. He was commissioned commander, 3 March, 1831, and captain 8 Sept., 1841, was commandant of the New York navy-yard in 1844-6, and with the ships of his command took part in the bombardment of4 New Orleans in 1847. He was in charge of the Norfolk navy-yard in 1848-53, and the Boston navy-yard in 1856-60, and in 1853-6 commanded the Mediterranean squadron as flag officer. When the civil war began he was summoned to Washington to advise upon the preparations for war, especially in relation to the relief of Fort Sumter, which he strongly urged, but his advice was not followed until it had become too late to be feasible. He took command of the North Atlantic blockading fleet, and planned the expedition to Hatteras inlet. Gen. Benjamin F. Butler accompanied him with nine hundred men. The squadron bombarded the forts, sailing in an ellipse, by which means the vessels concentrated their fire on the forts while the smaller vessels fired away. Both forts surrendered after the bombardment, and the troops were landed to garrison them on 29 Aug., 1861. Not one of the National troops was injured. The Confederates lost twelve killed and thirty-five wounded, and seven hundred and fifteen prisoners, and large quantities of guns and stores were captured. This was the first naval engagement of the war. Strong declined further active service on account of his age, and was retired, as commodore, 21 Dec., 1861. He continued to render valuable service as commandant of the Boston navy-yard in 1862-5, and was promoted to rear-admiral on the retired list, 16 July, 1862. He was port-admiral at New York in 1870-2, and was on waiting orders until 1874.

STROBEL, William Daniel, clergyman, b. in Charleston, S. C., 7 May, 1808; d. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 6 Dec., 1884. He received his classical education in his native place, and pursued his theological course at Hartwick seminary, where he was graduated in 1829. In the same year he was licensed to preach by the ministers of New York, and in 1830 he was ordained to the ministry by the synod of South Carolina. He served as missionary among the destitute Lutherans in South Carolina in 1829-30, was pastor in Columbus, S. C., in 1830-4, and in New York city in 1831-41, principal of Hartwick seminary, N. Y., in 1841-4, and held other pastorates in New York state and Maryland till 1857, when he retired from the active discharge of his office on account of advancing age and failing health, and lived in retirement at Rhinebeck, N. Y., until his death. He was president of the general synod in 1835-36, and held other offices. He received the degree of D. D., in 1846, from Hamilton college, and was the author of numerous articles in periodical of the church, which were afterward published separately. Among them are "Jubilee Tract" (Baltimore, 1867), "Influence of the Death and Resurrection of the Saviour upon the World"; and an introduction to Dr. George B. Miller's posthumous sermons (New York, 1860).

STRONG, Augustus Hopkins, educator, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 5 Aug., 1836. His great-grandfather, Phillips, was first cousin to Jedediah, noticed below. His father, Alvah Strong, published for thirty years the Rochester daily "Democrat." The son was graduated at Yale in 1857, and at Rochester theological seminary in 1859. He then spent some time abroad, studying in the German universities and travelling in Europe and the East. In 1861 he became pastor of the 1st Baptist church of Haverhill, Mass., and was ordained to the ministry. In 1865 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church in Cleveland, Ohio, and remained there until 1872, when he was elected president and professor of biblical theology in Rochester theological seminary. This place he still holds. Brown gave him the degree of D. D., in 1870. He preaches often, and gives much time to the general affairs of the denomination with which he is identified. He is a trustee of Vassar college. Dr. Strong has written much for reviews and newspapers on a variety of subjects, literary as well as theological. He is the author of "Systematic Theology" (Rochester, 1886), which has received high commendation for its ability and learning, and also of "Philosophy and Religion" (New York, 1888).

STRONG,George Crockett, soldier, b. in Stockbridge, Vt., 16 Oct., 1822; d. in New York city, 30 July, 1863. Losing his father early in life, he was adopted by his uncle, Alfred L. Strong, of Easthampton, Mass. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1857, assigned to the ordnance department, and became assistant at Waterford, N. Y., to 1861. He was delivered to the United States arsenal, of which he took command in May, 1861. He was ordnance officer on Gen. Irvin McDowell’s staff at Bull Run, and was then attached successively to the staffs of Gen. George B. McClellan and Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, whose chief of staff he became in May, 1862. He had previously been engaged in the organization of the New Orleans expedition, and on 1 Oct., 1861, had been commissioned major and assistant adjutant-general. He commanded the expedition from Ship island to Biloxi, Miss., in April, 1862, and then to Ponce de Leon, Florida, where he destroyed a large train and inflicted much damage on the enemy. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, and was on sick leave in New York from the following December till June, 1863. He then commanded a brigade in the operations against Charleston, S. C. He had been commissioned captain of ordnance, 3 March, 1863. He led the successful attack on Morris Island, where he was the first to land. At the assault on Fort Wagner on 18 July, while he was leading and cheering on the storming column, he was mortally wounded. He was at once removed to New York city, where he died. Strong was the author of “Cadet Life at West Point” (Boston, 1862).

STRONG,James, scholar, b. in New York city, 14 Aug., 1822; d. in Round Lake, N. Y., 7 Aug., 1894. His father came to this country in 1815. The son was left an orphan at an early age, and began the study of medicine, but the failure of his health led to its abandonment. He was graduated at Wesleyan in 1844, taught two years in Poultney, Vt., and then failing health again compelled his retirement to a farm in Newtown, Long Island. Eighteen months later he settled at Flushing, where he followed biblical studies. He held various local offices, took an active interest in the development of the town, and projected and built the Flushing railroad, of which he was president. Gave gratuitous private instruction and assisted in the prosecution to his first literary labor, the preparation of brief manuals of Greek, Hebrew, and Chaldee grammar, which were afterward published (1856-69). From 1858 till 1861 he was professor of biblical literature and acting president of Troy university, where in the former year he delivered an inaugural on “Scripture Education and Biblical Interpretation” (Troy, 1859). He also worked with the result of speaking to Flushing to engage in public improvements. Since 1868 he had been professor of exegetical theology in Drew theological seminary, Madison, N. J. Wesleyan gave him the degrees of D. D. and LL. D. in 1856 and 1881 respectively. Dr. Strong travelled in Egypt and Palestine in 1874, and was a member of the American branch of the Palestine exploration committee. He was also one of the Old Testament committee of the committee for the revision of the authorized version of the Bible. In 1872 he was a lay delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. He was the author of “A New Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels” (New York, 1852); “Harmony in Greek” (1854); “Scripture History delineated from the Biblical Records and all other Accessible Sources” (Madison, N. J., 1878); “Trencis, a Series of Essays showing the Virtual Agreement between Science and the Bible” (New York, 1883); and “The Tabernacle of Israel in the Desert” (1888). He had edited, for the American edition of Lange’s commentary, the parts on “Daniel” (1876) and “Esther” (1877), and published a “Literal Translation of Ecclesiastes” (1873). The chief work of his life is the “Cyclopaedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature” (10 vols., 1867-81; supplement, 2 vols., 1885-7). In the preparation of the first three volumes of this work, which was begun in 1853, he was the associate of its editor, Dr. John McClintock (q. v.), who took charge of the theological part, while he attended to the department of biblical literature, but since the death of Dr. McClintock Dr. Strong had had sole charge. He had also prepared various question manuals for Sunday-schools and Bible classes, based on his “Harmony of the Gospels;” several of which were edited by Daniel P. Kidder, D. D., (New York, 1853-4), and with Orange Judd and Mrs. Julia M. Olin lessons for every Sunday in the year (4 vols., 1862-3), on the plan afterward used in the “International Lessons.”

STRONG,James Hooker, naval officer, b. in Canandaigua, N. Y., 26 April, 1814; d. in Columbia, S. C., 23 Nov., 1882. He was appointed a midshipman in the navy while he was a student in the Polytechnic college at Chittenango, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1829, but remained at the college until he was graduated in 1833. He made his first cruise on the Brazil station in 1833-5, and, while attached to the sloop “Lexington,” commanded a boat expedition that captured a piratical establishment in the Falkland islands, where he had a hand-to-hand conflict with the pirates, and won credit by his valor and ability. The vessels that had been captured were restored to their crews, and the pirates were taken to Buenos Ayres for trial by the Argentine government. He became passed midshipman, 4 June, 1836, and lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, and after various cruises commanded the store-ship “Relief” in 1850. He was commissioned commander, 24 April, 1861, and had the steamer “Mohawk” and “Flag” on the South Atlantic blockade in 1861-2, and the steamer “Monongahela” on the Western Gulf blockade in 1863-5, in which he rendered good service at Arkansas post and especially at the battle of Mobile bay, where he was the first to ram the iron-clad “Tennessee,” and was highly commended. After being commissioned commodore, 3 Aug., 1865, he was on duty at the Brooklyn navy-yard in 1866-7, and commanded the steamer “Canandarigua,” of the Mediterranean squadron, in 1869-70. He was commissioned commodore, 2 March, 1870, and served as light-house inspector for two years. He was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, 10 Sept., 1873, was commodore-in-chief of the South Atlantic squadron from 1873 till 1875, and was placed on the retired list, 25 April, 1876.

of Private Civil Law." He had also delivered a course of lectures to the professors and students of the Union theological seminary of New York, and for several years lectures to the law department of Columbia university, Washington. Lafayette gave him the degree of L.L.D. in 1867, and Yale and Princeton in 1870. The portrait of Justice Strong is copied from an engraving that appeared in the "Democratic Review" in 1850.

STRONG, Josiah, clergyman, b. in Napierville, Du Page co., Ill., 19 Jan., 1817. He received, at the same time, the degree of D.D., in Hudson, Ohio, where the son was graduated at Western Reserve college in 1869. He studied at Lane theological seminary in 1839-71, and after holding Congregational pastorates in Hudson, Sandusky, and Cincinnati, Ohio, became in 1886 general agent of the Evangelical alliance in the United States, resigning in 1898. He has published "Our Country and other works (New York, 1886)."

STRONG, Nathan, clergyman, b. in Coventry, Conn., 16 Oct., 1718; d. in Hartford, Conn., 25 Dec., 1816. His father, of the same name, was pastor at Coventry, Conn. The son was graduated at Yale in 1739, and was tutor there in 1742-5. He had begun to study law, but abandoned it for divinity, and on 5 Jan., 1774, was ordained pastor of the church in Strawtown, and served as a chaplain in the Revolutionary army, and served the patriot cause ably with tongue and pen. Princeton gave him the degree of D.D., in 1801. Dr. Strong was a man of wide erudition, and great natural powers. His sermons were clear and pithy, and he had great facility in extemporizing. In 1793 he invested part of the estate that his father left in a mercantile establishment, but his losses involved him in pecuniary difficulties. He projected and sustained the "Connecticut Evangelical Magazine," which was continued from 1800 till 1813; and he also was the chief founder of the Connecticut missionary society in 1798, and its principal manager till 1806. Besides separate discourses, he published "The Doctrine of Eternal Misery consistent with the Infinite Benevolence of God," in reply to a work by Rev. Dr. Joseph Huntington (Hartford, 1796), and two volumes of "Sermons" designed to give aid and direction to revivalists (1798 and 1800). He also projected and was the principal compiler of the "Hartford Collection of Hymns," several of which he wrote (1799).—His brother, Joseph, clergyman, in Coventry, Conn., 21 Sept., 1758; d. in Norwich, Conn., 18 Dec., 1834, was graduated at Yale in 1772, and was for fifty-six years pastor of the 1st church in Norwich. He was known for his wide information, winning manners, and the fervency and solemnity of his prayers. Princeton gave him the degree of D.D. in 1807. He published several single discourses.

STRONG, Newtiah, elder, b. in Northampton, Mass., 24 Feb., 1799; d. in Bridgeport, Conn., 12 Aug., 1867. He was graduated at Yale in 1821, was tutor there in 1835-60, and served as pastor of a church at Granby, Conn., in 1761-78. In December, 1770, he became the first professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Yale, which chair he held till 1781. He then resigned and studied law at New York. In 1786, after residing in New Milford, Conn., removed to Bridgeport. Prof. Strong married a woman whose first husband, as was universally believed, had perished at sea, but he returned unexpectedly, and claimed his wife, who left her second husband for her first. President Timothy Dwight spoke of him as "a man of vigorous understanding." He published "Astronomy Improved" (New Haven, 1844).—His brother, Simeon, jurist, b. in Northampton, Mass., 6 March, 1756; d. in Amherst, Mass., 13 Dec., 1865, was graduated at Yale in 1776, and studied law, but after practicing several years, and declining offers of parishes on account of his health, left the ministry and studied law in Springfield, Mass. He was admitted as an attorney in 1811, and attained reputation at the bar. He was a representative in the general court in 1765-9, a state senator in 1785, and a judge of the state supreme court from 1800 to 1824. Harvard gave him the degree of D.D., in 1805;—in 1822, Mr. Marshall Mason, lawyer, b. in Amherst, Mass., 15 Sept., 1832; d. in Racine, Wis., 9 March, 1864, was the son of Bezekiah W. Strong, who attained reputation as a lawyer in Troy, N. Y. The son studied two years at Amherst and one at Union college, read law and was admitted to the bar at Troy, and in June, 1856, removed to Racine, Wis. In 1859 he was elected to the territorial council, where he was one of a committee to revise the laws of the territory, and he served again in 1841-7. In 1816 he was in the convention that framed a state constitution, where he took an active part, but resigned before the close of the session, and labored successfully for its defeat at the polls. In 1849 he was elected again to the legislature, and took an independent part. He was a member of the committee of corre- Mr. Strong was an active supporter of the National government during the civil war. He was a large contributor toward the establishment of Racine college.—Marshall Mason's nephew, Latham Cornelii, poet, b. in Troy, N. Y., 12 June, 1855; d. in Tarrytown, N. Y., 17 Dec., 1872, was the son of Henry Wright Strong, a lawyer of Troy, who was himself a graduate of Union college, and served in the state senate. The son was graduated at Union college, where he was class poet, and, after studying at Heidelberg, was for three years associate editor of the Troy "Daily Whig," subsequently devoting himself to literature. His first verses were written when he was fifteen years old, and he continued to contribute poetry to periodicals till his death. He was also the author of letters from Europe, and "Sleepy Hollow Sketches" in Troy newspapers. His published volumes include "Castle Windows" (Troy, 1876); "Poke O'Moonshine" (New York, 1878); and "Midsummer Dreams" (1878).—Simeon's great-grandson, William Emorson, soldier, b. in Granville, N. Y., 10 Aug., 1810; d. in Elmore, Ohio, 11 April, 1864. He was the eldest son of John F. Strong, a merchant, who in 1833 removed to Wisconsin and became a farmer. The son studied law in Racine, Wis., in 1857-61, and was admitted to the bar in the latter year. He then raised a company, which was assigned to the 3d Wisconsin regiment, and as its captain served at Blackford's Ford and Bull Run. He was promoted major of the 129th Illinois regiment, and served in Missouri, Kansas, and New Mexico. He was then on staff duty with the Army of the Tennessee, with rank of lieutenant-colonel, served in the Vicksburg campaign, and in 1864 became inspector-general of the Department and Army of the Tennessee. He was chief of staff to Gen. Oliver O. Howard in the march through the Carolinas, was pro- moted colonel, and ordered to "lead the volunteer infantry on the field of battle," at Atlanta; and on 21 March, 1865, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. He was inspector-general of the Freedmen's bureau from May, 1865, till September, 1866, and from 1867 till 1873 was secretary of the Peshtigo lumber company in Chicago, Ill., of which he had been president since the latter year. William Kerley, soldier, grandson of Simeon's first cousin, Josiah, b. in Danesburg, N. Y., 30 April, 1805; d. in New York city, 15 March, 1898, became an extensive wool merchant in New York city, but early retired from business to his estate in Geneva, N. Y. He returned to his former occupation for a time in 1843, but at the opening of the civil war was in Egypt. He had been active in politics as a Democrat, but at once set out for France, where he met his old friends, Frémont and others, and was instrumental in the purchase of arms for the National government. On his return he made patriotic addresses, and on 28 Sept., 1861, on the solicitation of merchants in New York, was made a brigadier-general of volunteers. He served for some time under Frémont, and was in command at Cairo, Ill., but on 20 Oct., 1863, resigned his commission. On his return to New York, while riding in Central Park, he was thrown from his carriage, receiving injuries that paralyzed him for life, and finally caused his death.

STRONG, Paschal Neilson, clergyman, b. in Setauket, Suffolk co., N. Y., 16 Feb., 1793; d. in St. Croix, W. I., 7 April, 1855. He was graduated at Columbia in 1816, at the head of his class, studied in the office of John S. Mason, and was ordained as one of the pastors of the Collegiate Dutch Reformed church, New York, 14 July, 1816. In 1824 he was seized with a pulmonary affection, which was the cause of his early death. He had received the degree of D. D., and served as a trustee of Columbia in 1829-33. During his short pastorate he obtained a reputation as a pulpit orator. Dr. Strong published "The Netherlands: A Punishment for Public Sin; a Sermon preached after the Cessation of the Yellow Fever" (New York, 1822), which attracted much attention.—His brother, Thomas Morris, clergyman, b. in Cooperstown, N. Y., 20 April, 1797; d. in Flatbush, Long Island, N. Y., 14 June, 1861, was graduated at Columbia in 1816, studied at Princeton theological seminary, and was pastor of the Dutch Reformed church in Flatbush from 1822 till his death. He published a "History of the Town of Flatbush" (New York, 1842).

STRONG, Samuel Henry, Canadian jurist, b. in Dorsetshire, England, in 1825. He accompanied his father, the Rev. Samuel S. Strong, to Canada where he received a classical education at Toronto. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1849, and began practice in Toronto. In 1856 he was appointed a member of the commission for consolidating the public general statutes of Upper Canada, and Canada, and labored at this work till its completion in 1859. He was elected a teacher of the Laurier society of Upper Canada in 1860, appointed queen's counsel in 1863, and made vice-chancellor for Ontario, 27 Dec., 1869. He was transferred to the court of error and appeal, and later was appointed chief-justice of the supreme court. In 1893 he was knighted.

STRONG, Selah, jurist, b. in Setauket, Suffolk co., N. Y., 25 Dec., 1797; d. there, 4 July, 1815. He was a delegate to the Provincial congress in 1775, served as a captain in the Revolutionary war, was a state senator in 1792-93, and first judge of the county court of common pleas from 1793 till 1795.

—His grandson, Selah Brewster, jurist, b. in Setauket, 1 May, 1792; d. there, 29 Nov., 1872, was the son of Thomas S. Strong, who was first judge of the common pleas for his county in 1810-23. He was graduated at Yale in 1811, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1814, and was district attorney of Suffolk county from 1829 till 1841. He was a member of congress in 1843-5, having been chosen as a Democrat, and in 1847-60 was a judge of the state supreme court. In 1867 he was a member of the State constitutional convention. Judge Strong gained a high reputation by his opinions on the bench.—Another grandson, Oliver Smith, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 11 Dec., 1806; d. in Mount Vernon, N. Y., 30 April, 1874, was the son of Benjamin Strong (1770-1851), a merchant of New York, who was president of the Dry Dock society, and agent in New York city for Daguerre's savings bank in 1834-51, and for 31 years engineer of the fire department. Oliver was graduated at Columbia in 1825, became a merchant in New York, and from early youth was active in philanthropic measures. From 1856 till his death he was president of the Society for the reformation of juvenile delinquents, of which he had long been a director, and the prosperity of the House of Comfort is largely due to his efforts. He was also a director of the New York institution for the deaf and dumb, made himself familiar with methods of deafenmate instruction, and by his earnest efforts before the legislature secured many measures for their moral and mental improvement. He resided for many years in Jersey City, and in 1848 was appointed a professor of the American School of Cairo. His grandson, George Templeton, lawyer, b. in New York city, 26 Feb., 1829; d. there, 21 July, 1875, was the son of George Washington Strong (1783-1855), a lawyer of much repute in his day, who was successively the partner of John Wells, George Griffin, and Marshall S. Bulwell. The son was graduated at Columbia in 1858, became a lawyer, and married a daughter of Samuel B. Ruggles. During the civil war he was treasurer and one of the executive committee of the U. S. sanitary commission, in which capacity he rendered valuable service. Mr. Strong was an accomplished scholar, and his library was among the finest in the city. It was sold in New York city in November, 1878.

STRONG, Theodore, mathematician, b. in South Hadley, Mass., 26 July, 1790; d. in New Brunswick, N. J., 1 Feb., 1869. He was graduated at Yale in 1812, and became a tutor in mathematics at Hamilton. He held the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy from 1816 until 1827, and then accepted a call to Queen's college (now Rutgers), where he filled a similar chair, and married a daughter of Samuel R. Ruggles. During the civil war he was treasurer and one of the executive committee of the U.S. sanitary commission, in which capacity he rendered valuable service. Mr. Strong was an accomplished scholar, and his library was among the finest in the city. It was sold in New York city in November, 1878.

His papers, about 60 in number, are devoted almost exclusively to mathematics, and appeared principally in the "American Journal of Science," and in the "Mathematical Miscellany." Among the papers of this last journal that are before the National academy of sciences are "Notes on the Parallelogram of Forces and on Virtual Velocities" (1844); "On the Integration of Differential Equations of the First Order and Higher Degrees" (1864); "A New STURGEON, George McDowell, jurist, b. in Stroudsburg, Pa., 12 Oct., 1795; d. in German- town, Pa., 23 Oct., 1869. He was graduated at Princeton in 1817, and admitted to the bar of Pennsylvania in 1819. For many years he was judge of the district court of Philadelphia. He was a contributor to law magazines and the author of a volume entitled "Sketch of the Laws relative to Slavery in the Several States" (Philadelphia, 1857; enlarged ed., 1866).

STURMEE, Karl (stroo-en-zay), German navigator, b. in Bremen about 1565; d. in Amsterdam about 1630. He was the son of a pilot, entered the service of the Dutch East India company, and acquired the reputation of a successful navigator. The discovery of the Strait of Lemaire, which allowed the Dutch to reach the Pacific ocean in a few days, greatly annoyed the Spanish authorities. He was ordered to fortify the strait, which they claimed to be a Spanish possession. The states-general of Holland, with the intention of anticipating Spain, ordered Struensee with a fleet to choose a favorable point for constructing a fortress. Sailing from the Texel in 1643, Struensee entered the Strait of Lemaire in December, and stopping at Maurits bay, he made a survey of the small Southward islands, which he found the most convenient for building a fort to command the strait. He afterward sailed around Staten-land, taking exact astronomical observations at different points of the coast, and on his return to the Strait of Lemaire made numerous soundings. After his arrival in Amsterdam he presented his report to the states-general, but the project of fortifying the strait was afterward abandoned, as impracticable. A narrative of his journey was written by his clerk under the title "Beschrijving der Reis ondernomen onder gezag en voor kosten van de Hr. Heeren der Staten Generaal, naar de Zee- enge lage van Le Maire en de Zuidzijde door Karel Struensee van Bremen" (Amsterdam, 1645; French version 1647; Latin, 1648).

STUVE, Gustav von, German agitator, b. in Munich, Bavaria, 11 Oct., 1805; d. in Vienna, Austria, 21 Aug., 1870. He studied law, spent a short time in the diplomatic service of the duke of Oldenburg, then settled as an advocate in Mann- heim, Baden, and soon became known as a Liberal journalist and political speaker. He also gave attention to phrenology, and published three books on the subject, each of which was well received. In his "Journal," he was repeatedly condemned to imprisonment. When he was compelled in 1846 to retire from the management of this paper, he founded the "Deutsche Zauscher," in which he addressed his radical sentiments to a larger circle of readers. He was one of the leaders of the Baden rising of 1848, and attempted, with Friedrich Hecker, to establish a republic in the failure of the first insurrection, he fled to France, and thence to Switzerland, where he and Carl P. Heine- sen drew up a "plan for revolutionizing and re- publicanizing Germany." In September, 1848, he returned with a body of followers to Baden, and stirred up a second insurrection. After his defeat at Stotten, he was arrested, 25 Sept., 1848, and...
STUART, Alexander Hugh Holmes, b. in Staunton, Va., 2 April, 1807; d. there, 13 Feb., 1871. His father, Archibald Stuart, saw service in the war of the Revolution, studied law under Thomas Jefferson, was a member of the convention that ratified the U. S. constitution, and became president of the state senate and judge of the general court of Virginia. He graduated at Williamsburg Academy, and then studied law at the University of Virginia, where he graduated in 1828. The same year he was admitted to practice in Staunton. He began his political career as a member of the Young men's convention held in support of Henry Clay at Washington in 1832. He was elected to the Virginia house of delegates in 1836, and the two succeeding years, but declined re-election in 1839. He was a member of congress from 1841 till 1843, and took an active part in the debates. He was a presidential elector on the Clay ticket in 1844, and on the Taylor ticket in 1848, and was appointed by President Fillmore secretary of the interior, serving from 12 Sept., 1859 till 3 March, 1855. He was delegate to the national convention that nominated Millard Fillmore for the presidency in 1856, sat in the Virginia senate from 1857 till 1861, and was a member of the Virginia convention of 1861. As an Old Line Whig he opposed the secession of his state to the last. After the surrender of Gen. Robert E. Lee at Appomattox, he was one of the leaders of the first movement in that state to re-establish peaceful relations with the U. S. government, and presided at a mass meeting at Staunton with that object on 8 May, 1865. He was elected to congress in the same year, but was excluded by the oaths that were required. In December, 1866, he began what was known as "the new movement" of the "committee of nine," which, with the cooperation of President Grant, redeemed the state from military rule and secured the removal of objectionable provisions in the Underwood constitution. He was rector of the University of Virginia from 1876 till 1882, and from 1884 till 1886, when he resigned because of advanced age. He was a member of the board of trustees of the Georgia Peabody educational fund, and the last survivor of the Fillmore cabinet. Mr. Stuart was for many years president of the Virginia Historical Society. He was a member of the Virginia bar.

James Ewell Brown, soldier, b. in Patrick county, Va., 6 Feb., 1833; d. in Richmond, Va., 12 May, 1864, entered the U. S. military academy after spending two years at Emory and Henry college, was graduated in 1854, joined the regiment of mounted riflemen that was then serving in Texas, and took a creditable part in actions with the Apache Indians. In 1855 he was transferred to the 1st U. S. cavalry, and was made captain and the rank of 2d lieutenant. He married Flora, a daughter of Col. Philip St. George Cooke, on 14 Nov., 1855, and on 20 Dec., was promoted 1st lieutenant. In 1856 his regiment was engaged in quelling the Kansas disturbances, and in 1857 in Indian warfare. He was wounded in an action with the Cherokees on Solomon's river. In 1859 he went to Washington to negotiate with the war department concerning the sale of a sub-attachment that he had invented. Going to Harper's Ferry with Robert E. Lee as a lieutenant in the infantry and identified John Brown. He rejoined his regiment at Fort Riley, but in March, 1861, obtained leave of absence, being resolved to direct his course by the action of his state, and sent in his resignation after Virginia seceded. It was accepted on 7 May, just after he had received notification of his promotion to a captaincy, to date from 22 April, 1861. He was commissioned as lieutenant-colonel of infantry in the service of the state of Virginia, and as colonel of cavalry on 16 July. He performed important services in charge of the outposts of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army. At Bull Run he contributed to the Confederate victory by efficiently guarding Gen. Thomas J. Jackson's left flank, and driving back the National artillery by a combination of fire and charge. In the succession of operations he perfected his system of pickets, was engaged in many cavalry skirmishes, and became brigadier-general on 24 Sept., 1861. He was defeated by Gen. Edward O. C. Ord at Dranesville. When the Confederates retired from Yorktown to Richmond, his cavalry guarded their rear. In the middle of June, 1862, he conducted a daring raid in the rear of Gen. McClellan's army, which, by the destruction of the Chancellorsville line of communication, in order to determine the position of the National right. He was incessantly engaged during the seven-days' fight before Richmond. On 25 July, 1862, he was commissioned as major-general of cavalry. On 22 Aug. he crossed the Rappahannock, penetrated Gen. John Pope's camp at Catlett's station, captured his official correspondence and personal effects, and made prisoners of several officers of his staff. In the following night he made an attack on Manassas Junction, and sent into the town a brigade of infantry, which took many prisoners and carried off stores of great value. His cavalry was engaged in the second battle of Bull Run, and led the advance of Stonewall Jackson's corps in the ensuing invasion of Maryland. He performed important services at Antietam, guarding with artillery an eminence on Jackson's left that was essential to the security of the Confederate position, and at Sharpsburg, that resulted in the repulse of Gen. Edwin V. Sumter's corps. A few weeks later he crossed the Potomac near Williamsport at the head of 1,800 picked troopers, gained the rear of the National army, rode as far north as Mercersburg and Chambersburg, Pa., returned on the other side of McClellan's position, and recrossed the river below Harper's Ferry. At Fredericksburg Stuart's cavalry guarded the extreme right of the Confederate line. In a raid to Dumfries he ascertained the intended movements of the National troops by means of forged telegrams that he sent to Washington. In March, 1863, he encountered the National cavalry at Kelly's Ford. At Chancellorsville the cavalry screened Stonewall Jackson's march to the right of the National army, and Stuart was mortally wounded, and Gen. Ambrose P. Hill was dismissed from the command of Jackson's corps devolved temporarily on Stuart, who took command in the night of 2 May and directed its movements during the severe fighting of the following day. He led two charges in person, and carried the ridge of Hazel Grove, which was the key to the field. He was sent forward to guard the flanks of the advancing column of Life Guards in the Gettysburg campaign, but was opposed and checked by the National cavalry at Fleetwood Hill and Stevenson's, with heavy losses on both sides. At Abbie he was successful in an encounter with the National cavalry, but at Middleburg and Upperville he was defeated. He was directed to cross the Potomac in advance of the infantry column, and take position on its right. He held the pass in the Blue Ridge for a while, and then made a raid in the rear of the National army, rejoining the main body at the close of the conflict at Gettysburg. The responsibility for this movement and its influence on the event have been the subject of much controversy. In the retreat from Gettysburg Stuart guarded the gaps in the mountains. While the Confederate army was entrenched on the northern bank of the Potomac, he engaged in indecisive conflicts with the cavalry of Gen. Jackson Kilpatrick and Gen. John Buford. While the cavalry held the line of the Rappahannock, during the rest of the summer of 1863, he evaded Gen. Kilpatrick at Culpeper Court-House, retired from Gen. Buford at Jack's Shop, after a severe conflict, compelled back the National cavalry under Gen. Alfred Pleasonton to Cedar Station, and by a rush routed the brigade of Gen. Henry E. Davies near Buckland. After Gen. Grant crossed the Rapidan, Stuart led the advance of Gen. Ambrose P. Hill's corps. When Gen. Philip H. Sheridan with his cavalry moved on Richmond, Stuart, by a rapid circuitous march, interspersed his cavalry, crossed the Rapidan below Fredericksburg, where he was mortally wounded in the obstinate engagement that ended in the defeat of the Confederates. See "Life and Campaigns of Major-General J. E. B. Stuart," by his chief-of-staff, Maj. Henry B. McClellan (Boston, 1885).
Acadia college, Horton, Nova Scotia, where, after teaching in Providence, R. I., and North Danvers, Mass., he returned in 1856 as professor of mathematics and chemistry, but in 1858 he resigned and for three years studied chemistry at Göttingen and Heidelberg. On his return he was called to the charge of the Worcester academy, and later became assistant instructor of chemistry in the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard. In 1860 he accepted the chair of chemistry in the industrial university, where he remained until 1874. Prof. Stuart has since resided chiefly in Lincoln, Neb., where he is interested in various financial institutions. He is a member of the Chemical society of Berlin, a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and a corresponding member of the New York academy of sciences. His chemical researches have been published in the transactions of societies of which he is a member and in technical journals.

STUART, Charles, author, b. in Jamaica, West Indies, about 1783; d. near Lake Simcoe, Canada, in 1865. His father was a British officer, who fought at Banker Hill and in other battles of the Revolution, and was subsequently stationed in the United States. In 1795, at the age of eighteen, when living at Belfast, Ireland, received a lieutenant's commission in the Madras army. He was promoted captain, received a severe wound in an encounter with native insurgents, and after thirteen years service, returned to England, and was retired with a pension. Some time later he received a grant of land in Lake Simcoe, and was commissioned as a local magistrate. About 1802 he settled in Utica, N. Y., as principal of the academy, which he taught for several years. From that period he spent much of his time in the United States. He was one of the early emancipators, and took part with Gerrit Smith in anti-slavery meetings. Capt. Stuart was the author of several pamphlets that were published by the British and foreign anti-slavery society, the most effective of which was "Prejudice Vindicated," which was reprinted in this country. He published a volume of short poems, and a religious novel entitled "Paran"al of Lum Sing, or the Missionary and the Mountain Chiefs." His principal other works were: "The West India Question: Immeisistion, Emancipation, and the Slave and Profit" (New Haven, 1838); "Memoirs of Granville Sharp" (New York, 1836); and "Omeada and Oberlin: the Extermination of Slavery in the United States" (Bristol, 1841).

STUART, Charles Beebe, engineb, b. in Chittenango Springs, N. Y., 4 June, 1814; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 4 Jan., 1881. He entered upon the profession of civil engineering, was for some time state engineer of New York, entered the service of the U. S. government, and completed the Brooklyn bridges. He was appointed engineer-in-chief of the U. S. navy on 1 Dec., 1839, and resigned on 30 June, 1853. He published: "The Naval Dry-Doeks of the United States" (New York, 1851); "The Naval and Mail Steamers of the United States" (1853); "Railroads of the United States and Canada" (1855); "Water-Works of the United States" (1855); and "Civil and Military Engineers of America" (1857).

STUART, Charles E., senator, b. in Columbia county, N. Y., 23 Nov., 1810; d. in Kalamazoo, Mich., 29 May, 1887. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and settled in Kalamazoo, Mich. From 1841 till 1846 he was a member of the state legislature, during which he entered the National house of representatives as a Democrat, serving from 6 Dec., 1847, till 3 March, 1849. He was defeated in 1848, but at the next election was again successful, and at the close of his second term was elected to the U. S. senate, serving from 4 March, 1853, till 3 March, 1859. In the senate he was chairman of the committee on public lands. He attended the National Union convention at Philadelphia in 1866.

STUART, George, educator, b. in Saratoga county, N. Y., about 1834. He was taken to Philadelphia at the age of six years, passed through the Girard college school, afterward seminary, and after graduation, in 1852, engaged in teaching. He was assistant professor of mathematics in the high-school in 1855-6, tutor of Latin and Greek in Haverhill college in 1856-9, professor of English branches in Girard college in 1859-62, then principal of a grammar-school till 1866, and since that date has been professor of Latin in the high-school. As co-editor of the "Clavis and Stuart Classical Series" he has published, with Prof. Thomas Chase, elementary Latin books and school editions of Casar's "Gallic War"; Cicero's "Select Orations"; and works of Sallust, Corneli, Nepos, Tacitus, Virgil, and Ovid. He is also the author of an educational tract on "The Raison d'être of the Public High-School."}

STUART, George Hay, philanthropist, b. in County Down, Ireland, 2 April, 1816; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 11 April, 1890. He came to Philadelphia in 1831, and was a merchant. During the civil war he was president of the U. S. Christian commission. He presided over the international conventions of the Young Men's Christian associations in 1859 and 1861, and over the Presbyterian national convention in Philadelphia in November, 1867, was an officer in the American Sunday-school union, the American Bible society, and the American tract society. He twice declined a seat in President Grant's cabinet, but consented to serve on the first board of Indian commissioners, and was chairman of its purchasing committee. Mr. Stuart was a munificent giver to foreign missions and other religious and charitable objects.

STUART, Gilbert, artist, b. in Narragansett, R. I., 3 Dec., 1755; d. in Boston, Mass., 27 July, 1828. The name Charles was given to him by his father, an ardent Jacobite, but Stuart dropped it, and used only his first name. He attempted portrait painting when a mere boy, and produced several pictures which, if not remarkable as paintings, were at least good likenesses. Two of these early attempts, portraits of Mr. and Mrs. John Rannister, are now in the Redwood library, New York. He had no regular instruction until he became, in 1770, the pupil of Cosmo Alexander, a Scotchman. When Alexander returned to his native land, about two years later, he took his young pupil with him. Unfortunately for Stuart, his master died soon after arriving in Edinburgh, and left his position chargeable to Sir George Chalmers. The latter did not long outlive Alexander, and Stuart was thus thrown on his own resources. It is said that he worked his passage home on a 'collier bound to Nova Scotia,' and while on board he seems to have experienced much rough usage; but he never spoke of this matter, and any reference to it gave him evident pain. On arriving in this country, after an absence of about two years, he began to practise as a portrait painter in New York. He had a strong desire to revisit Europe, in order to gain a more complete knowledge of his art, and especially to study under his countryman, Benjamin West. As in the event of war, which then appeared inevitable, it would be impossible for him to visit England for some time, he embarked for London in the spring of 1755. There he had much difficulty in finding employment for his pencil, and suffered from poverty at times. He had been several years in London before he summoned courage to go to West, who in 1758 received him kindly and gave him much assistance and instruction. Stuart lived with him for several years, during which time, his earnings being as yet scanty, his knowledge of music was of great service to him. He had always been greatly interested in the art, and had learned to play upon several instruments. He now accepted a position as organist in a church, with a salary of £30 a year. After several years, at the advice of West, he opened a studio. The first portrait that brought the young artist into notice was a full-length of W. Grant, of Congalton, which he had painted while still a pupil of West. When it was copied as a miniature by Peale, his pupil, and brought to attention, and Stuart soon became a fashionable artist in London. He married Charlotte Coates in 1786, and two years later, on an invitation from the Duke of Rutland, went to Dublin, where many noblemen and people of wealth and fashion sat to him. After a stay in Dublin of about four years he returned to the United States in 1792. He spent some time at first in what, under his pupilship, he called the national portraits, among them those of Sir John Temple, John Jay, and Gen. Matthew Clarkson. He went, in 1794, to Philadelphia, with a letter to Gen. Washington from John Jay. His long-cherished wish, to paint the portrait of Washington, was thus to be fulfilled. Washington sat to him the following year, but Stuart was not satisfied with his first effort, and the work was suspended. On his return to England the portrait was, for some time, kept an object of curiosity, but eventually was sold. After his death, his widow sold it, together with the companion portrait of Mrs. Washington, for $1,500. It belongs to the Boston Athenaum. While in Philadelphia Stuart painted a large number of portraits, and when the city of Washington was founded, and congress removed to that place in 1790, he followed them. During his stay he was intimately associated with the library, the most eminent men of the country, and his pencil was kept as busy as ever. In 1805 he removed to Boston, where he afterward resided. There were no signs of failing health until 1805-6, when his left arm showed symptoms of paralysis. Yet he still tried to paint, and succeeded in finishing several heads. But soon the want, which had caused him severe suffering at times, settled on his chest and stomach. This was in 1828, and Stuart, after bearing his pains with great fortitude for three months, expired during July of that year. Washington, Boston was asked to pronounce a eulogy on Stuart, but his feeble health forced him to decline. He wrote an obituary, however, which was printed in the Boston "Daily Advertiser." Personally Stuart was a great favorite in society, of which he was very fond. He had a true artist's nature, and was frequently brought into trouble by his reckless expenditures; but his family was left quite destitute. His remarkable conversational powers were usually employed to good effect while he was occupied with his sitters. At such times it was his custom to draw on his store of narratives and anecdotes, and, as Allston says, "by banishing all restraint, to call forth, if possible, some involuntary traits of the natural character. . . . It was this which enabled him to animate his canvas, not with the appearance of a mere general life, but with that peculiar, distinctive life, which separates the humblest individual from his kind. . . . Were other evidence wanting, this talent alone were sufficient to establish his claims as a man of genius." Stuart produced during his career an exceedingly large number of portraits—how many no one can be certain. Besides the catalogue of the exhibition of his portraits, held in 1850 in Boston, gives a list of 554 numbers, and even this is not quite complete. Some of the more important, besides those already mentioned, are: the Duke of Northumberland and his children; John Kemble; James Greenleaf and Robert Morris (1785); John Trumbull; Theodore Sedgwick; John Copley; Gen. Henry Knox; Gen. Marquis de Lafayette; Thomas Jefferson; Mr. and Mrs. James Madison; Mr. and Mrs. John Quincy Adams (1818); Madame Jerome Bonaparte; Josiah Quincy (1806 and 1824); John Adams (1825); Fisher Ames; Joseph Story; and John Jacob Astor. His last portrait was that of John Quincy Adams, a full-length, of which only the head was completed when Stuart died. Copley, who was his pupil, says: 'I painted the body and accessories. Most of these portraits are in the possession of private individuals, but several are owned by the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts, the Lenox library, New York, the New York historical society, the Boston art museum, the Redwood library, the Maryland historical society, and Harvard university.' He had a remarkable eye for "color"—"color" was one of Stuart's strong points," as his daughter says—and was a master in the rendering of flesh. In painting flesh his practice was to lay the pure colors directly on the canvas, and then drag them together by a large brush. He was especially successful in his heads, the figure and drapery, at least in some of his portraits, being at times quite carelessly executed. Very few of Stuart's portraits have frequently copied by himself and others, and a large number have been engraved. See "Life and Works of Gilbert Stuart," by George C. Mason (New York, 1879.—His daughter, Jane, b. about 1819; d. in Newport, R. I., 28 April, 1888, followed for many years the profession of portrait-painting. She con-1838 he removed to Texas, where he established the "Civilian," an independent Democratic journal, which he continued for nearly forty years. He had resided in Galveston since its foundation, was its mayor in 1838-39, and served as a member of the legislature in 1847-48. During the republic he enjoyed the confidence of Presidents Houston and Jones, and was opposed to the policy of annexation followed in Texas by Mr. S. S. Jones. He was unwilling to annul the compact. He was appointed collector of customs of Galveston in 1851, and held that office until 1861, when, owing to his opposition to secession, his services were not retained by the Confederate government.

Mr. Stuart was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1866, and subsequently came one of the editors of the Galveston "News."

STUART, James, traveller, b. in Dunearn, Fifeshire, Scotland, in 1753; d. in London, England, 3 Nov., 1849. Having killed in a duel Sir Alexander Boswell, the eldest son of Dr. Johnson's biographer, he came to North America, and in 1782-23 travelled in the United States. His views on the natural resources of the country were much characterized by keenness of observation, and, when published in book-form, under the title of "Three Years in North America" (Edinburgh, 1833), attracted much attention, and his sketch in it of his visit to the Saratoga battlefield, including a description of its topographical features is, next to Prof. Silliman's in "Silliman's Tour," the best extant. The book contains several adverse criticisms from those of the English reviews that were unfriendly to republican institutions, which elicited a reply from him in a work entitled "A Refutation of Aspersions on Stuart's "Three Years in North America."" (London, 1834). He edited for several years the London "Courier." The violent partisan attitude that he assumed in politics called for chivalry-shrieking frequently in the pages of "Blackwood's Magazine," especially from John Wilson, in the "Noteos Ambrosianas," where he figures under the name of the "Stu" (steer). Stuart was noted for his taste in art, and his social qualities rendered him welcome in society, although his adherence to principles frequently led him into serious difficulties. He was educated of Dr. Fileshire, in England about 1700; d. there in 1779. He came to this country in 1733 with Gen. James E. Ogilverthe. When Fort Loudoun was invested by the Cherokees in the French war, he made terms with Oconostota, who consented that the garrison should march out with their arms and have free passage to Virginia. They were massacred on the route, but Stuart, who was popular with the Indians, was spared. In 1763 he was appointed general agent and superintendent of Indian affairs for the southern department. On 14 Oct., 1768, he concluded a treaty with the Cherokees, fixing the western boundary of Virginia at Kanawha river, to the chagrin of the people of that province. He had a deputy with each tribe, and exerted great influence over the southern Indians. When the Revolutionary war began, he conceived the idea of suppressing the revolt of the colonies by the aid of the savages. The British cabinet approved his plan, which was to land a body of troops in western Florida, which should march through the territory of the Creeks, Chickasaws, and Cherokees, and with the several tribes thus adjoined destroy the settlements and exterminate the Whigs by a sudden blow, their attention being diverted by the landing of an army from Boston and an attack on Charleston by the British fleet. Letters were distributed by Stuart among the loyalists in South Carolina, urging them to join the royal standard as soon as it should be raised in the Cherokee country. He circulated among the tribes in the spring of 1776, and arranged for the murderous raid to take place simultaneously with the appearance of Sir Peter Parker's naval force on the coast. But it was frustrated by the vigilance of the prominent Indians of Tennessee (D. W. Crockett and Stuart). Stuart, after the defeat of the Indians and the discovery of his plans, which Sir Henry Clinton made two earlier attempts to carry out, fled to Florida, and in 1779 returned to England. His property was confiscated in 1782.—His son, Sir John, British soldier, b. in Georgia in 1761; d. in Kingston, England, 1 April, 1809. He attended Westminster school, entered the foot-guards as ensign in January, 1779, served under Lord Cornwallis in this country, and was dangerously wounded at Guilford. He was a major-general during the Napoleonic wars, gained a victory over Gen. Jean Louis Reynier at Maida, Sicily, 4 July, 1806, for which he was knighted, and was subsequently made a general.

STUART, John, clergyman, b. in Harrisburg, Pa., 24 Feb., 1740; d. in Kingston, Canada, 15 Aug., 1811. He was the son of a Presbyterian emigrant from the north of Ireland, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1767, entered the connexion of the English church, studied and was ordained priest in England, and, after his return in 1789, labored for seven years as missionary among the Indians of the Mohawk valley, into whose language he translated the gospel of Mark and the church catechism. After the revolt of the colonies, his loyalist principles and supposed connection with efforts to raise the Indians against the Americans led to his expulsion by the Whigs. His house and church were plundered, and he took refuge in Schenectady in 1788, and in 1791 emigrated to Canada, where he was soon afterward appointed chaplain of a provincial regiment. He labored as a missionary among the Indians of Upper Canada, and laid the foundations of the Church of England among the white inhabitants of the province, his parish covering its entire area. For some years he taught an academy in Kingston, in which he died. He was chaplain to the legislative council some time before his death.—His son, George Okill, clergyman, b. in Fort Hunter, N. Y., in 1776; d. in Kingston, Ontario, 5 Nov., 1862, was graduated at Harvard in 1801, after first studying in Windsor college, Nova Scotia, was ordained priest in 1804, and was rector of a church in York (now Toronto) till 1811, when he removed to Kingston to succeed his father. In 1820 he was made archdeacon of Kingston. He received the degree of LL D from Windsor college in 1832, and in 1848 that of D. D. from Harvard. In 1882 he became dean of the newly created diocese of Ontario.—Another son, Sir James, bart., jurist, b. in Fort Hunter, N. Y., 2 March, 1790; d. in Quebec, Canada, 14 July, 1862, studied at Windsor college, Nova Scotia, read law with Jonathan Sewell, and was admitted to the bar in 1801. He was assistant secretary to the lieutenant-governor, Sir Robert S. Milnes, for several years, at the same time practising law in Quebec, and in 1825 was appointed solicitor-general for Lower Canada. In 1836 he was elected to represent Montreal in the legislature. He was removed from office in 1836 in consequence of a difference with the executive. He remained in the assembly till 1817, and was in that body the foremost representative of the English party and an eloquent opponent of Chief-Justice Sewell. In 1822 he was sent to England as a delegate of the people of Montreal to advocate the reunion of the provinces, and while there received the appointment of attorney-general for Lower Canada. He became an executive councillor in 1827, and the same year was elected to represent Sorel in the provincial parliament. His political course led to his suspension from office in March, 1831. This act of the governor-general was approved by the British minister for the colonies in November, 1832. The succeeding colonial minister, to repair the injury done, appointed Mr. Stuart, after him the post of chief justice of Newfoundland; but he declined, and resumed the practice of law in Quebec. In 1838 the Earl of Durham, at the conclusion of his inquiry into the state of the Canadian provinces, appointed Stuart chief justice of Lower Canada in the place of Jonathan Sewell, who was retired. During Sir John Colborne's administration he acted as chairman of the special council of Lower Canada, and framed the law for the registration of titles and mortgages, the corporation acts for Quebec and Montreal, and a general municipal system for the province. He prepared the act of union that was passed by the British parliament in 1840, and in that year was created a baronet. —Another son, Andrew, lawyer, in Kitchener, Ont., Feb. 27, 1876. Mr. Stuart, on Feb. 21, 1810, was educated in the school of Rev. John Strachan, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1807. He established his reputation as an eloquent advocate in 1810, when defending Justice Pierre Bédard, and from that time till his death was employed in nearly every difficult or important suit. He entered the provincial parliament in 1816 as a member of the Upper House of the legislative council of Quebec, and afterward represented the upper town until the constitution was suspended in 1838, except in 1834, when his defeat and that of others who sought to curb popular passions led to the formation of the Constitutional association, of which he was chosen chairman, and by which he was nominated as a member of the House in England for the purpose of promoting the union of Lower and Upper Canada. From 1838 till his death he held the office of solicitor-general. He contributed five papers on historical and antiquarian topics to the "Transactions" of the Quebec literary and historical society and published "Notes upon the Southwestern Boundary-Line of the British Provinces of Lower Canada and New Brunswick, and the United States of America" (Quebec, 1830); "Review of the Proceedings of the Legislature of Lower Canada, 1831" (Montreal, 1832); and, with William Badgley, an "Account of the Endowments for Education in Lower Canada" (London, 1838).

STUART, John Todd, lawyer, b. near Lexington, Ky., 10 Nov., 1807; d. in Springfield, Ill., 28 Nov., 1883. His father, Robert Stuart, was a Presbyterian elder and his maternal grandfather was Levi Todd, one of the survivors of the disastrous Indian battle at the Blue Licks in 1782. He was graduated at Centre college, Kentucky, in 1826, was admitted to the bar, and removed to Springfield, Ill., at the age of twenty-one. He took at once a high place in his profession, and held it nearly for nearly sixty years, to the day of his death. He was a Whig until the formation of the Republican party, served in the legislature from 1832 till 1836, and was defeated in a congressional contest in the latter year, being then the recognized leader of his party. He renewed the contest in 1838, with Stephen A. Douglas as his opponent, and was successful after a campaign that excited national attention. After two terms in congress he declined a re-election. Mr. Stuart was a member of the state senate from 1836 till 1832, and was distinguished for the part he took in settling the charter of the Illinois central railroad, from the provisions of which the state derives an annual revenue that amounted in 1887 to $396,315.67, the total revenue of the state in the same year being $3,853,690.56. He remained out of public life until 1862, when he was again elected to congress, but now as a Democrat, serving one term, in the special position of chairman of the committee to which Mr. Stuart was assigned in the erection of the new state-house. He was also chairman of the executive committee of the National Lincoln monument association. He served as a major in the Black Hawk war in 1832, and this title was always used in addressing him. In this campaign he met Abraham Lincoln, and thus began a life-long intimacy. They were fellow-members of the legislature in 1834. He induced Mr. Lincoln to study law, but him the necessary books, and took him as a partner so soon as he was admitted to practice. This partnership lasted until April, 1841; in 1843 Mr. Stuart associated with himself in legal business Benjamin S. Edwards, and in 1850 his son-in-law, Christopher C. Brown, and their firm was Mr. Stuart's daily life in the state. In personal character Mr. Stuart was kind, liberal, and modest, and in his busy career as a lawyer and legislator he found time for the exercise in many directions of a wise public spirit, which made him for more than half a century one of the most notable citizens of the community in which he lived.

STUART, Moses, Hebraist, b. in Wilton, Conn., 26 March, 1750; d. in Andover, Mass., 4 Jan., 1852. He was graduated at Yale in 1790, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1802, but did not enter on the practice of his profession, being called to a tutorship in Yale college the same year. After two years of teaching he studied theology, and in 1806 he was ordained as pastor of a Congregational church in New Haven. He gained high repute as a forcible and effective preacher and as a writer of religious work in 1810, when he was elected to the professorship of sacred literature in Andover seminary, although at that time he possessed but a limited knowledge of Hebrew. He applied himself diligently to the language, learning German in order to study the philological treatises of Friedrich W. Gesenius, and in 1816 completed a grammar, which was passed round in manuscript, and copied by his pupils. When he obtained type for printing the work, he could find no composers acquainted with the Hebrew characters, and therefore began the composition with his own hands. His first Hebrew grammar, which was without the diacritical points, was superseded eight years later by his grammar with critical marks, that was officially used in the United States, and was republished in England by Rev. Dr. Edward B. Pusey, regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford. Prof. Stuart was the first to make Americans acquainted with the works of Rosenmüller, Ewald, and other German Orientalists, and, by applying their scientific methods of philological and archæological investigation, founded a new method of biblical exegesis. He retired from his professorship on account of advancing age and infirmities. His publications include a "Sermon" on resigning his pastoral charge (1810) and other discourses; "Grammar of the Hebrew Language without Points" (Andover, 1813); "Letters to Rev. William E. Channing, containing Remarks on his Sermon recently preached and published at Baltimore" (Andover, 1819); "Discourses of John and Others on the Best Method of studying the Languages of the Bible," translated, with notes (1821); "Grammar of the Hebrew Language, with a Copious Syntax and Praxis" (1821); "Elements of Interpretation," translated from the Latin of Johann A. Ernesti, with notes (1822); Two Discourses on the Asiatic Expedition with A. J. Robinson, a translation of George P. Winship's "Greek Grammar of the New Testament" (1825); "Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews" (2 vols., 1827–28); "Hebrew Chrestomathy, designed as a Course of Hebrew Study" (2 vols., 1829–30); "Practical Rules for Greek Accents and Quantity" (1829); "Exegetical Essays upon Several Words relating to Future Punishment" (1830); "Letter to William E. Channing on the Subject of Religious Liberty" (Boston, 1830); "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, with a Translation and Various Excerpts" (Andover, 1832); "Is the Mode of Christian Baptism prescribed in the New Testament?" (1833), to which Prof. Henry J. Ripley replied (1837); "Cicero on the Immortality of the Soul" (1835); "Reminiscences of James L. Kingsley's in the "American Monthly Review"; "Grammar of the New Testament Dialect" (1834); "On the Discrepancies between the Sabelian and Athanasian Methods of representing the Doctrine of a Trinity in the Godhead," translated from the German of Friedrich Schleiermacher, with notes and illustrations (1835); "A New System of Geology" (1835); "Hints on the Interpretation of Prophecy" (1842); "Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon" (1845); "Commentary on the Apocalypse" (Andover, 1845); "Miscellanea," comprising his letters to Channing and sermons on the atonement (1846); "Hebrew Grammar of Gesenius, as edited by Rohrer, translated, with Additions, and also a Hebrew Chrestomathy" (1846), which drew forth a volume of strictures from the first translator, Thomas J. Conant (New York, 1847); "A Letter to the Editor of the 'North American Review' on Hebrew Grammar," replying to Conant's criticisms (1847); "Conscience and the Constitution, with Remarks on the Speech of Webster on Slavery," a defence of Daniel Webster, which drew forth allusions in the speeches for and against the compromise (Boston, 1856), to which Rev. Rufus W. Clark replied (1856); "Commentary on the Book of Daniel" (1856); "Commentary on Ecclesiastes" (New York, 1851); and "Commentary on the Book of Proverbs" (1852). See also his "Funeral Sermon," preached by Rev. Edwards A. Park (Andover, 1857); and "Discourses on the Life and Services of Moses Stuart," by Rev. William Adams (New York, 1852).—His son, Isaac William, educator, b. in New Haven, Conn., in 1809; d. in Hartford, Conn., 2 Oct., 1861, was graduated at Yale in 1828, and taught in Hartford, Conn., till 1835, when he became professor of Greek and Roman literature in the South Carolina college, Columbia. He resigned in 1829, and subsequently resided in Hartford, where he was three times elected to the state senate. He was the owner of the Wyliss estate, on which stood the charter oak. He was a student of Oriental literature, and became interested in Egyptology, publishing a translation of Abel Héron Greppi's "Essai sur le système hiéroglyphique de Champlain le jeune," with notes and a preface by his father. In 1830, as an expert on South Carolina college, he produced an annotated edition of the "Géopis Tyrrains" of Sophocles (New York, 1837). In later life he gave much attention to American history and antiquities, publishing "Hartford in the Olden Time," by "Seaver" (Hartford, 1856); "Life of Captain Nathan Hale, the Martyr Spy" (1856); and "Life of Jonathan Trumbull, the Revolutionary Governor of Connecticut" (Boston, 1859).
land, in 1805, and died in 1826. The son succeeded to the management of the business, and in 1828 formed a partnership with his brother, Alexander. They began refining sugar by steam in 1832, and were the first to succeed in this process. They abandoned candy-making in 1836, devoting themselves solely to sugar-refining, and in 1872 they retired from active business. He was president of the American Museum of natural history and of the Presbyterian hospital. New York, was connected with various charitable, scientific, and social organizations, and was known also as the possessor of a large and valuable library and gallery of paintings, and a magnificent giver to educational and religious institutions. In Princeton theological seminary, $100,000 to Princeton college, and $50,000 to the San Francisco theological seminary. Mr. Stuart's charities were continued by his widow, whose New York residence was among the finest in the country.—His brother, Alexander, b. in New York city, 22 Dec., 1810; d. there, 20 Dec., 1872, was a generous donor to philanthropic objects. The brothers began in 1852 to devote each year a certain minimum sum to works of benevolence, chiefly connected with the Presbyterian church, and before the death of Alexander had given away $1,391,000, which was increased by the subsequent gifts of Robert L. to nearly $2,000,000.

STUART, William, journalist, b. in Galway, Ireland, 7 July. 1821; d. in New York city, 27 Dec., 1886. His real name was Edmund O'Flaherty. He was educated at Eton college, and soon after being graduated became interested in Irish politics. He was elected to parliament, and identified himself with a group that opposed the ecclesiastical-titles bill, but made terms with Lord Aberdeen's coalition ministry in 1852. Edmund O'Flaherty receiving the appointment of commissioner of the income tax. Two years later, becoming peculiarly embarrassed by election expenses and losses on the turf, he attempted to raise money by a fraud, and fled to Paris to avoid prosecution, and thence to New York city. Taking the name of his mother's family, he wrote newspaper articles for a livelihood, and gained a good name in dramatic criticism by saucy stricture in the New York "Tribune" on Edwin Forrest's style of acting, enhancing the popular interest in his criticisms by sarcastic replies that he wrote for the "Evening Express." He became a theatrical manager in Washington and Philadelphia, and then the lessee of the Winter Garden theatre in New York city, where Edwin Booth gained a jury verdict in a damaging suit by Hamlet and Dion Boucicault and Agnes Robertson were introduced to the public in the "Octo-

STURGEON, John Henry Willburn, clergyman, b. in Beaufort, Hanover, Germany, 6 Jan., 1883. He emigrated in early life to the United States, and was graduated at Wittenberg college, Springfield, Ohio, in 1857, after which he returned to Germany to study theology in the universities of Göttingen, Berlin, and Tübingen. He was ordained as a Lutheran minister in 1860, and held pastoral charges in Iowa and Pennsylvania, besides efficiency in 1862-63 as chaplain of the 45th Pennsylvania volunteers. He was professor of theology at Wittenberg college from 1873 till 1880, and since that time has been pastor of the American church in Berlin, Germany. He is a member of the Berlin philosophical society. In addition to contributions to religious periodicals, he has published "German Rationalism in its Rise, Progress, and Decline" from the German of Carl Rudolf Hagenbach, in conjunction with William L. Gage (Edinburgh, 1865); "Ninety-five Theses" (Baltimore, 1867); "History of the Augsburg Confession from its Origin till the Adoption of the Formula of Concord" (Philadelphia, 1869); "Christian Sociology" (New York, 1870; London, 1876); "Introduction to the Study of Philosophy." (1882); and "Introduction to the Study of Philosophy.

STUDEBER, Henry, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1770; d. there in 1828. He was of German extraction. After graduation at the University of Pennsylvania in 1784, and at the medical department in 1788, he obtained a clerkship in a government office and began the study of law, but soon died of pulmonary disease, after establishing a reputation as a small-scaled scholar and original thinker. Besides contributions to periodical literature, he wrote a sequel to Benjamin Franklin's "Autobiography," containing an account of his discoveries in electrical science. A memoir was published shortly after his death.

STUNG SERPENT (or Le Serpent Précie), chief of the Natchez Indians, d. in Louisiana, about 1725. The Natchez having killed some Frenchmen in 1712, and Bienville having been sent to punish them, a deputation, headed by Stung Serpent and other chiefs, came to negotiate with him. After Bienville's expedition had ended successfully, he made peace with the Natchez, and released their chiefs. In 1722 several Natchez villages rose against the French, who had given them corn, and were sent to reduce them, but Stung Serpent, who was then great chief, endeavored to make separation by fining the villages. He acted as interpreter to the French, and is described as being their best friend among the Natchez. Some authorities place his death later than 1725.

STURGE, Joseph, English author, b. in Elverton, Lancashire, England, in 1763; d. in Birmingham, 1 May, 1859. He was a member of the Society of Friends, established himself as a corn-factor in Birmingham in 1820, acquired great wealth, and devoted himself, among other philanthropic objects, to the abolition of slavery. To familiarize himself with the subject of slavery, he visited the West Indies in 1857, and four years later the British West Indies in 1861. He published "A Visit to the United States in 1841" (London, 1842), and "Visit to the United States in 1847" (London, 1848), and "Visit to the United States in 1841" (Boston, 1842). The "Memoirs of Joseph Sturge" were written by Henry Richard (London, 1864).

STURGEON, Daniel, senator, b. in Adams county, Pa., 27 Oct., 1789; d. in Uniontown, Fayette co., Pa., 2 July, 1878. He was educated at Jefferson college, Pa., studied medicine in Fayette county, and in 1813 began practice. In 1818 he was chosen a member of the Pennsylvania house of representatives, serving three terms, and in 1825 he was elected to the state senate, being speaker of that body the last three years of his term. In 1839 he was appointed auditor-general of the state, which office he filled six years, and in 1838 and 1839 he was state treasurer and ended the "Backshot war" by refusing to honor Gov. Ritner's vouchers for payment of the troops. He was elected U. S. senator as a Democrat for the term that began 4 March, 1839, and was re-elected to that body, his last term expiring 3 March, 1851. In 1853 President Polk appointed him treasurer of the U. S. mint at Philadelphia, which post he held until 1858. Although he was called the "silent senator," he was considered a hard-working committee member. He made but one speech, and that to reiterate a remark he had made in committee: "Any senator who says anything that would tend to the disruption of the Union is a black-hearted villain."

STURGES, Jonathan, member of congress, b. in Fairfield, Conn., 29 Aug., 1749; d. at Charleston, S. C., 6 Oct., 1814. He was graduated at Yale in 1769, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced at Fairfield. He took an active part in the pre-Revolutionary movements, and was a representative from Connecticut in the 1st and 2d congresses, serving from 4 March, 1789, till 2 March, 1793. He was a judge of the state supreme court in 1793-1805, and was a president in elector in 1797 and 1805. He received the degree of LL. D. from Yale in 1806. His grandson, Jonathan, merchant, b. in Southport, Conn., 24 March, 1802; d. in New York City, 28 Nov., 1874, went to New York in 1821 and became a clerk in a mercantile house, in which he rose to be a junior partner in 1828, and senior partner in 1838. He remained connected with the firm till 1865, when he retired with a large fortune. He was one of the chief promoters of the Illinois and Cincinnati railroad and a director, during the civil war, was among the most liberal and outspoken supporters of the government, and took an active part in establishing the Union league club, of which he was president in 1863. He was active in the measures to break up the Tweed ring and to promote municipal reform in the government of the city of New York. He was distinguished for philanthropy, and was liberal as founder or supporter of many charities in that city. He was at one time vice-president of the New York chamber of commerce, an active member of the Century club, and a generous patron of art. Mr. Sturges was an intimate friend of the poet Bryant, and was among the most active in the movement that led to the presentation of the case, known as the "Bryant case," now in the Metropolitan museum of art.

STURGIS, Frederic Russell, physician, b. in Maniln, Luzon, Philippine Islands, 7 July, 1844. He was educated in London, England, and Boston, Mass., was graduated as a physician at Harvard in 1867, practising in New York city. He has been visiting surgeon of the Charity hospital, New York, from 1872, was surgeon of New York dispensary in 1877-8, and became house physician there in 1878. He was appointed in 1874 clinical lecturer on venereal diseases in the University of the city of New York, in 1880 professor of that department in the same institution, and in 1882 professor of gynecology at the Post-graduate medical school and hospital. Prof. Sturges was president of the New York county medical society in 1881-2, and a member of its board of censors in 1878-81. He has published "Students' Manual of Venereal Diseases" (New York, 1880), annotated and edited Diday's work on "Infantile Syphilis" (1883), and is the author of many articles on medical subjects.

STURGIS, Samuel Davis, soldier, b. in Shippenburg, Pa., 11 June, 1822; d. in St. Paul, Minn., 28 Sept., 1889. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, entered the 2d dragoons, served in the war with Mexico, and was made prisoner before the battle of Buena Vista, but was exchanged before the conclusion of the war. He was in Mexico, and the territories, and was commissioned captain, 3 March, 1855. At the opening of the civil war he was in command of Fort Smith, Ark., but, all his officers having resigned and joined the southern Confederacy, he evacuated the fort on his own responsibility, and thus saved his command and the government property. He was appointed major of the 4th cavalry, 2 May, 1861, and served in Missouri under Gen. Nathaniel Lyon, whom Sturges succeeded in command after his death at the battle of Wilson's Creek. He was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 10 Aug., 1861, was assigned to the Army of the Tennessee, and afterward to the command of the Department of Kansas. In 1862 he was called to Washington to assist the military government, and was given command of the fortifications around the city. At the battles of South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg he commanded the 2d division of the 9th army corps, and was engaged in the operations in Kentucky from April till July, 1863. He was chief of cavalry of the Department of the Ohio from July, 1863, till April, 1864. He was graduated and his commission, 13 Jan., 1864. He was engaged at Bohar, Tenn., 10 May, 1864, and in the expedition against Gen. Nathan Forrest, and in the fight near Gunson, Miss., 10 June, 1864. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 6th cavalry, 27 Oct., 1865, colonel of the 7th cavalry, 6 May, 1869, and was retired, 11 June, 1896. He had been brevetted colonel for Fredericksburg, and brigadier-general and major-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865.— His son, James Garland, b. in Albu-querque, N. M., 24 Jan., 1844, was graduated at the United States military academy in 1865, and was killed in the Indian massacre on Little Big Horn river, 25 June, 1876.

STURM, Daniel, French author, b. in Huguenot, Alsace, in 1802; d. there in 1844. He received his education at the University of Strasbourg, and was graduated in medicine in 1789. In the following year he was appointed assistant surgeon of a regiment in Santo Domingo, but he fled to the United States during the civil war in 1793, and settled in Philadelphia, where he practised his profession. After the peace of Amiens he returned to France, re-enlisted in the army as a surgeon-major, and served till 1814, when he was retired on a pension. His works include "Dictionnaire de médecine thérapeutique, ou exposé des moyens curatifs employés dans les Antilles, La Louisiane et l'Amé-STUYVESANT, Peter, governor of New York, b. in Holland in 1592; d. in New York city in August, 1682. He was the son of a clergyman of Friesland, and at an early age displayed a fondness for military life. He served in the West Indies, was governor of the colony of Curacoa, lost a leg during the unsuccessful attack on the Portuguese island of St. Martin, and returned to Holland in 1644. Being appointed director-general of New Netherlands, he took the oath of office on 28 July, 1646, and reached New Amsterdam on 11 May, 1647, amid such vehement firing of guns from the fort that nearly all the powder in the town was consumed in salutes. Soon after his inauguration on 27 May he organized a council and established a court of justice. In deference to the popular will, he ordered a general election of eighteen delegates, from whom the governor and his council selected a board of nine, whose power was advisory and not legislative. Among his first proclamations were orders to enforce the rigid observance of Sunday, prohibit the sale of liquor and fire-arms to the Indians, and protect the revenue and increase the treasury by heavier taxation on imports. He also endeavored to erect a better class of houses and taverns, establish a market and an annual cattle-fair, and was also interested in founding a public school. One of the first acts of the new governor was to enter into a correspondence with the other colonies regarding the decisive settlement of the boundary question; but New England would not agree to terms. He also became involved in a controversy with Gov. Theophilus Eaton of Connecticut, over the claim of the Dutch to jurisdiction in that state. In 1649 a conflict arose between him and Van Slechtenhorst, the commissary of the young patron of Reusserswijk at Beverwick, Stuyvesant claiming power irrespective of the special feudal privileges that had been granted in the charter of 1629. In 1649 Stuyvesant marched to Fort Orange with a military escort, and ordered certain houses to be razed to permit of a better defence of the fort in case of an attack of the Iroquois. He also commanded that stores and timber should be taken from the patron's land to repair the fortifications. This Van Slechtenhorst refused to do, and the director sent a body of soldiers to enforce his orders. The controversy that followed resulted in the commissary's maintaining his rights and the director's losing some popularity. The first two years of his administration were not without serious discussions with the patroons, who interfered with the company's trade and denied the authority of the governor, and he was also embroiled in contentions with the council, which sent a deputation to the Hague to report the condition of the colony to the states-general. This report was published as “Vertoog van Nieuw Nederland.” (The Hague, 1650). The states-general afterward commanded Stuyvesant to appear personally in Holland; but the order was not confirmed by the Amsterdam chamber, and Stuyvesant refused to obey, saying: "I shall do as I please."

In September, 1650, a meeting of the commissioners on boundaries took place in Hartford, whether Stuyvesant travelled in state. The line was arranged much to the disadvantage of the Dutch, who declared that the governor had ceded away enough territory to form fifteen colonies each fifty miles square. Stuyvesant grew hasty in his treatment of the Burghomasters, and threatened to dissolve the council. A plan of municipal government was finally arranged in Holland, and the name of the new city—New Amsterdam—was officially announced on 2 Feb., 1655. Stuyvesant made a speech on this occasion, showing that his authority would remain unimpaired. The governor was now ordered to Holland again; but his order was soon revoked on the declaration of war with England. Stuyvesant prepared against a attack by ordering his subjects to make a ditch from the North river to the East river, and to erect breastworks. In 1653 he sailed into the Delaware with a fleet of seven vessels and about 700 men and took possession of the country of New Sweden, which he called New Amstel. In his absence New Amsterdam was ravaged by Indians, but his return inspired confidence. Although he organized militia and fortified the town, he subdued the hostile savages chiefly through kind treatment. In 1653 a convention of two deputies from each village in New Netherlands had demanded reforms, and Stuyvesant commanded this assembly to disperse, saying: "We derive our authority from God and the company, not from a few ignorant subjects."

The spirit of resistance nevertheless increased, and the encroachments of other colonies, with a depleted treasury, harassed the governor. In 1661 Charles II. ceded to his brother, the Duke of York, a large tract of land, including New Netherlands; and four English war vessels, bearing 450 men, commanded by Capt. Richard Nicholls, took possession of the harbor. On 30 Aug. Sir George Cartwright bore to the governor a summons to surrender, promising life, estate, and liberty to all who would submit to the king's authority. Stuyvesant read the letter before the council, and, fearing the concurrence of the people, tore it into pieces. On his appearance, the people who had assembled around the city hall greeted him with shouts of "The letter! the letter!" and, returning to the council-chamber, he gathered up the papers, which he gave to the burgomasters to do with the order as they pleased. He sent a defiant answer to Nicholls, and ordered the troops to prepare for an attack, but yielded to a petition of the citizens not to shed innocent blood, and signed a treaty at his Bouwarme house on 9 Sept., 1664. The burgomasters proclaimed Nicholls governor, and the town was called New York. In 1665 Stuyvesant went to Holland to report, and labored to secure from the king the satisfaction of the sixth article in the treaty with Nicholls, which granted free trade. During his administration commerce had increased greatly, the colony obtaining the privilege of trading with Brazil in 1648, with Africa for slaves in 1652, and with other foreign parts in 1659. Stuyvesant endeavored unsuccessfully to introduce a state currency and to establish a mint in New Amsterdam. He was a thorough conservative in church as well as state, and intolerant of any approach to religious freedom. He refused to grant a meeting-house to the Lutherans, who were growing numerous, drove their minister from the colony, and frequently punished religious offenders by fines and imprisonments. On his return from Holland after the surrender, he spent the remainder of his life on his farm of sixty-two acres outside the city, called the Great Bouwarme, beyond which stretched woods and swamps to the little village of Haarlem. The house, a stately specimen of Dutch architecture, was erected at a cost of 6,400 guilders, and stood near what is now Eighth Street. Its gardens and lawn were tilled by about fifty negro slaves. A pear-tree which he brought from Holland in 1647 remained at the corner of Thirteenth Street and Third Avenue until 1867, bearing fruit almost to the last. The house was destroyed by fire in 1777. He also built an executive mansion of hewn-stone called Whitehall, which stood on the site of the old town-house, and which Stuyvesant added to his name, Stuyvesant's House, and which was above medium height, with a fine physiognomy. He dressed with care, and usually wore slashed hose fitted at the knee by a knotted scarf, a velvet jacket with slashed sleeves over a full pulled shirt, and rossettes upon his shoes. His lost leg was replaced by a wooden one with silver bands, which accounts for the tradition that he wore a silver leg. Although abrupt in manner, unconventional, cold, and haughty, full of prejudice and passion, and sometimes unapproachable, he possessed large sympathies and tender affection. His clear judgment, quick perception, and extent of reading were remarkable. Washington Irving has humorously described him in his "Knickerbocker's History of New York." The illustrations represent the old Stuyvesant House, and the tombstone of and, and only one of their four sons, Peter, b. in 1727, left descendants. He married Margaret, daughter of Gilbert Livingston, and their sons were Peter Gerard and Nicholas William. Their daughters were Judith, who married Benjamin Winthrop; Cornelia, who married Dirck Ten Broeck; and Elizabeth, who married Col. Nicholas Fish, and became the mother of Hamilton Fish.

—Peter's son, Peter Gerard, lawyer, b. in New York city in 1778; d. at Niagara Falls, N. Y., 16 Aug., 1857, was graduated at Columbia in 1793, and studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practiced for a short time in New York city. He was a founder of the New York historical society, of which he was president from 1836 till 1840. His residence, "Petersfield," and that of his brother Nicholas William, the "Bowery House," were built before the Revolution, and were situated on their father's Bowerie farm. The chief portion of this extensive property was deeded to his nephew, Gerard Stuyvesant, Hamilton Fish, and Rutherford Stuyvesant.

SUARD, Nicolas (soo-ar), Haytian patriot, b. in Jacmel about 1740; d. in Port au Prince, 26 Feb., 1791. He was a mulatto, and a rich merchant of Cape Français at the beginning of the French revolution. In 1790 he tried vainly to assemble a revolutionary committee, and, being defeated on account of his color, went to Paris, where he became a member of the club "Les amis des noirs," and devoted his large fortune to the cause of the emancipation of the slaves, and to gain equal political rights for the mulattoes. The assembly having negatively a motion for emancipation, Suard and his countryman, Vincent Ogé, resolved to leave the colony. They went to Philadelphia and New Orleans, enlisted 250 men, and, with a supply of arms and ammunition, landed near Cape Français, 23 Oct., 1790, where they were joined by Jean Baptiste Chavannes and other insurgents. Suard shared in Ogé's defeat, fled with him to the Spanish part of the island, and was deposed by the French authorities and executed.

SUAREZ, Jose Bernardo, Chilian author, b. in Santiago, 20 Aug., 1822. He received his education in the colleges of Merced and San Francisco, and finished his studies in 1842 in the normal school. In 1845 he was appointed inspector of the lyceum of San Felipe, Aconcagua, and in 1847-9 he occupied the chair of humanities in several colleges of Chile. In 1850 he was reinstated in these schools in Valparaiso, and in 1856 director of the first fiscal school of Santiago, which was founded by order of President Montt. He established in Valparaiso and Santiago the first free evening-schools for artisans, became in 1860 director of the model college, and in 1861 visitor-general of schools for the republic, retiring in 1862 on a pension. He is the author of a number of geographical works, in which he has connected with various journals, and has written about twenty historical and didactic works, among which are "Hombres célebres de Chile" (Santiago, 1859); "Plutario de los Jóvenes" (1861); "Tesoros de Bello Arte" (1862); "Recibo del soldado Chileno" (1864); "Rascgos Biográficos de Ninfas Chilenas" (1865); "Descripción de la Patagonia" (1867); "Manual del Ciudadano" (1878); and "Principios de Derecho Internacional" (1883).

SUAZUE, Juan (soo-ah-ref), Spanish colonist, b. in Andalucia about 1540; d. in Aracan in 1588. He served as captain in the expedition of Diego Flores de Valdes and Pedro Sarmento, who sailed from Seville, 23 Sept., 1584, to found a colony in the Strait of Magellan. After five ships were wrecked, the fleet, reduced to sixteen vessels, arrived, 24 March, 1582, at Rio Janeiro. Having made several vain attempts to go on land and anchor, but were forced out again by a gale. They returned the following year, when the fleet was reduced to five ships, and were again carried back by the strength of the ebb tide, but anchored close to Cape de las Virgenes, and the landing of the settlers began immediately under the direction of Suazue. With great energy they were obliged to quit their anchorage on the same day Diego de Ribero left for Spain during the night, taking with him the whole fleet except the vessel of Suazue, who refused to abandon the colony. Sarmento had 400 men, 30 women, and provisions for eight months. They immediately built a city, Nombre de Jesus, near the mouth of the strait, and about eighty miles south founded San Felipe. Sarmento, leaving the command to Suazue, sailed on 25 May, 1584, for Brazil, and subsequently went to Spain in April, 1585. In August, 1584, the two colonies united, but subsequently Suazue removed with 200 men to Nombre de Jesus. Many died during the winter, and by the hands of the Indians, who ruined the crops, and the beginning of the Spanish settlements made by the colonists of San Felipe to build two forts, but they were wrecked, and in January, 1587, only eighteen men survived. One of these was rescued by Thomas Cuvendish, and one other lived to be taken from the strait in 1589 by Andrew Merrick. He belonged to the colony of Nombre de Jesus. The latter suffered, perhaps, greater hardships than those that were about the colony of San Felipe. Nearly all of them set out toward the middle of 1587 in hope of reaching by land the establishments of the Plate river, but they were either killed by the Indians or died from hunger in the deserts of Aracan. Accounts of the expedition are to be found in Hakluyt's and James Burney's collections, and in the "Noticias de las expediciones al Magallanes." (Madrid, 1788.)

SUAREZ, Lorenzo, Mexican missionary, b. in Mexico about 1560; d. in San Gregorio in 1627. He was employed among the Indians of northern Mexico, attained great distinction as an orator both in Spanish and native Mexican languages, and in 1620 was appointed rector preacher. His works include "Sermónes" (Mexico, 1617); "Cien Láminas" (Mexico, 1617), an extremely rare work, which was among the first printed in the New World. A copy of it was sold at public auction in Brussels in 1847 for $2,500.

SUAREZ PERALTA, Juan, b. in the city of Mexico about 1539. Nothing further is known of his life than that he was a son of one of the Spanish officers who were conquered by the Aztecs and educated and studied. A manuscript chronicle of events in Mexico, written by him in 1589, was some years ago discovered by Marcos Toledo. Although many of its conceptions are erroneous, it has a special merit as containing information not furnished by any previous work. The manuscript was published by Justo Zaragoza, under the original title of "Relación de los hechos del descubrimiento de la Nueva España" (Madrid, 1828).

SUAREZ Y ROMERO, Anselmo, Cuban writer, b. in Havana in 1818; d. there in 1882. He was educated in his native city, devoted himself to teaching, and did a great deal in behalf of public education. His literary career began with the publication of his "Biografía de Carlota Valdes," Havana, 1881, which was followed by a series of masterly sketches and descriptions of Cuban scenary and customs, which was afterward collected in a large volume under the title of "Colecion de Articuos" (1859). Some of these sketches have been translated into English and French. In New York he published, in 1800, his novel "Francisco," a powerful picture of the horrors of Cuban slavery, written many years before the publication of Mrs. Stone's "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Suarez was admitted to the bar in 1866. He has published also "Escuelas Primarias," a series of essays on public education and school reforms (Havana, 1862), and "Cartas criticas sobre asuntos juridicos" (1870), and has left many unpublished works.

SUBERCASE, Daniel Anger de, governor of Acadia, b. in Limousin, France, 1661; died in 1715. He was sent early to Canada as an ensign and rose rapidly in the service. In 1680, with 100 men, he occupied the Isle d'Orleans, and this movement aided in compelling the British to raise the siege of Quebec. He served during the following years in the war against the Iroquois, and in 1696 was major-general in Frontenac's expedition that burned the villages of the Onondagas. In 1703 he was appointed governor of Fort St. Louis of Placentia, and waged war against the English. His main object was to expel them from Newfoundland, and this being approved by court, he set out, 15 Jan., 1706, at the head of 450 well-armed men, soldiers, Canadians, privates, and Indians, all accustomed to Indian warfare. They captured several outposts in several districts and four rivers filled with floating ice, and they were also delayed two days by a heavy fall of snow. On 26 Jan. they surprised Belon, took Petty Harbor, three leagues from St. John, and burned every house in the latter place, but they were unable to capture the large fort that protected St. John. Returning by way of Ferryland, which he burned, Subercase sent out parties in several directions and ruined the English trade in Newfoundland. On 10 April, 1706, having succeeded Breton as governor of Acadia, he continued the war with renewed vigor, and attracted to Acadia several West India buccaneers, whom he employed against the English commerce. The English besiegéd Port Royal in June and again in August, 1707, much to the satisfaction of the invaders, who retired with losses. The governor in vain urged Louis XIV, to make a permanent establishment in Acadia, whose strategic value he also demonstrated; but he could not even obtain money to return the advances that had been made by the settlers. This may account for the fact that Subercase made no resistance when he was attacked in 1710. On 2 Oct., he surrendered Port Royal to Sir Francis Nicholson, and obtained the honors of war for his garrison of 156 men. No provisions were found in the place, and on the next day Nicholson had to issue rations to the French soldiers. Subercase was conveyed to La Rochelle, and in 1711 court-martialed at Rochefort for the surrender of Port Royal, but was acquitted by the former court. See "An Acadia Governor," in the "International Review" for 1881.

SUCRE, Antonio José de (soo-ray). South American soldier, b. in Camuá, Venezuela, 3 Feb., 1753; d. near Pasto, Colombia, 4 June, 1830. He studied mathematics at Caracas, was graduated at the College of military engineers in 1810, and, joining the patriot cause, was sent in May of that year as post-commander to the province of Barcelona, and in 1811 called to the personal staff of Gen. Miranda. After the capitulation of the latter, Sucre fled to his native province and joined the invading forces of Santiago Mariño, with whom he took part in the campaign of 1813. In March, 1814, he joined Bolivar, who appointed him to the staff of the Army of the Orient, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. After the defeat of Gen. Ribas at Urica, 5 Dec., 1814, Sucre took refuge in Trinidad, and on Bolivar's landing in Venezuela in 1816, Sucre joined Maríno's forces; but when the latter refused allegiance to Bolivar in Caracas, 8 May, 1817, Sucre abandoned his command to join Bolivar in Guayaquil, and was appointed chief of staff of Bermúdez's division. In 1818 he was promoted brigadier and commissioned by Bolivar to solicit arms and supplies to the French fleets and to the United States. After the conclusion of peace he held for three years the office of king's lieutenant at Tobago, but returned subsequently to Santo Domingo, retiring with a pension in 1874. He devoted the remainder of his life to literary labor and historical works, and made several voyages to Paris for researches in the libraries and in the archives of the navy department. Being driven from Santo Domingo by the risings of 1791, he made Nantes his residence, but was arrested during the reign of terror and executed as a pensioner of the monarchy. His published works include "Exposiçao historique des progres, du commerce, et de la navigation dans les Antilles" (1795); "Histoire de la guerre contre la France dans les Antilles," 2 vols. (1796); "Histoire des campagnes du Comte de Bouillé dans les Antilles" (1799). His manuscript works, preserved in the National library at Paris, include "Histoire generale des Antilles" and "Memoires pour servir a l'histoire de l'administration Françoise dans les Antilles.

SUCRE, George, physician, b. in the city of New York in 1830; d. there, 30 July, 1889. He was graduated at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York, in 1851, served as resident surgeon in the New York hospital in 1852, and was assistant surgeon in the U. S. army in 1853-'5. He became brigade surgeon in 1861, and major and staff surgeon. In 1877, vol. xxxii., issued by the Academy of Medicine, Washington, and Oriental Territories." New York, 1889.

SUCRE, Thomas Holy, philanthropist, b. in New York city, 21 Nov., 1810; d. in Rhinebeck, N. Y., 9 Feb., 1858. He inherited great wealth from his father, an Englishman of good family, who had been engaged in business in New York city. The son was never engaged in any active business. He was a member of the board of a number of the missions of the Methodist church, and was a benefactor of the Children's aid society, the Brooklyn Methodist Episcopal hospital, and the Society for the prevention of cruelty to animals. He established the Mount Rutson home for aged Methodist ministers near Rhinebeck, and endowed it liberally.

SUCRE, Pierre Joseph (soo-ray), Haitian historian, b. in Port Dauphin in 1734; d. in Nantes, France, in December, 1823. He was the son of a wealthy creole, received his education in Paris, entered the colonial administration, and was for several years commander of the province of the west in Santo Domingo. He was transferred to Dominica as king's lieutenant in September, 1778, was provisional governor of St. Eustatius in 1781, and during the whole of the war with England did his utmost to forward re-enforcements and supplies ammunition in the West Indies, and, pledging his personal credit, he soon returned with 9,530 stand of arms, twelve cannon, and a plentiful supply of ammunition. Being appointed second chief of the general staff, he displayed such energy in the reorganization of the forces that Bolívar called him the "soul of the army." In this office he assisted in the victorious invasion of New Granada in 1819, and was subsequently commissioned by Bolívar to arrange for a six-months' armistice, which was signed in Tunjillo, 25 Nov., 1820. He was then sent to the south to take command of the forces operating against the Spanish president of Quito, who refused to recognize the validity of the treaty of Tunjillo. He reorganized the patriot forces, marching to the port of Buenaventura, embarked his army, and in May, 1821, suddenly landed in Guayaquil, to protect the republican government that had been established there. On 19 Aug. he defeated the Spaniards at Yaguanal, but he was routed on 12 Sept. at Guachí, and in November obtained a suspension of hostilities, which he employed to reorganize his forces and obtain auxiliary troops. He now marched upon Quito, and on 24 May defeated the enemy in the battle of Pichincha, granting him a capitulation, which finished the Spanish domination in Ecuador, the province declaring itself incorporated in the republic of Colombia. Sucre was promoted major-general and intendant of the department of Quito, and in May, 1823, was sent with a Colombian auxiliary division to Peru. Refusing the command-in-chief, he remained with his forces in the defence of Callao, and sent, on 4 July, a division to assist Santa Cruz in the south. After the arrival of Bolívar, 1 Sept., who assumed the supreme command, Sucre co-operated with him in reorganizing the army for the final campaign against the Spanish dominion. In July, 1824, they marched across the Andes to attack the army of Cautece, and defeated him at Junín on 6 Aug. Bolívar, being obliged to leave for Lima to organize the government, appointed Sucre to the command-in-chief of the allied army, ordering him to force a decisive campaign on the viceroy, La Serena. On 9 Dec., Sucre met with 5,800 men the column of 9,300 men on the plateau of Ayacucho, and totally defeated it, capturing the viceroy and ending the Spanish power in Peru. Sucre was created by the Peruvian congress grand marshal of Ayacucho, and marched at once to upper Peru to subdue Olaya, who refused to submit to the capitulation of Ayacucho. He convoked a congress of delegates to decide upon the future of the country, which, meeting at Chuqiusaca, declared upper Peru an independent republic, under the name of Bolivia, on 10 Aug., 1825. The constituent congress, which met 25 May, 1826, elected Sucre president for life. He accepted the executive, however, only for two years; but the revolution of January, 1827, in Peru, against the authority of Bolívar, caused several mutinies in La Paz, and finally, on 18 April, 1828, a Colombian regiment revolted in Chuquisaca. Sucre was dangerously wounded, and, on his recovery, he returned to Guayaquil. When finally Ecuador was invaded by the Peruvian troops, Sucre was appointed commander-in-chief, and totally defeated the invaders under Gen. La Mar at Tarqui, 26 Feb., 1829. He now retired to private life, but was sent as deputy for Guayaquil to the Colombian congress at Bogota, 20 Jan., 1830, and was elected president of the republic and commissioner to Rosario de Oanta to arrange the difficulties with Venezuela. Seeing the hopelessness of the task, he soon returned to Bogota, and when congress closed its sessions, he was returning to his home in Guayaquil when he was shot from ambush in the mountain of Berruecos. At first it was asserted by Gen. José María Obando, district commander of Pasto, that the murder had been committed by robbers, but it is generally believed that the crime was instigated by Obando himself, though he tried to implicate Gen. Juan José Flores. The latter was implicated by his son, Antonio, in his "El Gran Mariscal de Ayacucho" (New York, 1883). Sucre's remains were transported by his family to the Church of San Francisco in Quito, where the still-crust in Guayaquil, the government of Bolivia in 1845, and that of Venezuela in 1875, asked permission to transport them to their respective pantheons.

SUCRE, Étienne Henry (soo-ray), French painter, b. in Port Royal, Acadia, in 1703; d. in Paris in 1745. He was the son of a rich settler who returned to France after the taking of the colony by the English. Young Étienne received his early education at Caen, but finished his studies at the College of the Jesuits at Paris, and became afterward a pupil of the Academy of designs. In 1728 he exhibited in the Academy gallery a "Descente de croix" that was much admired, and in 1741 he was given the title of royal painter with a pension of 1,200 livres. His works include "Portrait de l'Abbe de Crébillon" (1746); "Christ at the Cradle" (1756); "An Episode of the War in Acadia" (1737); "Acadians driven Away from their Home" (1758); and "Portrait of Louis XV." (1741).

SUDDS, William, clergyman, b. in Bradford, England, in 1863. He emigrated to the United States in 1882, was ordained to the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church in 1883, and the same year became rector of St. James's church, Zanesville, Ohio. In 1884 he assumed the rectorship of Grace church, Philadelphia. He received the degree of D.D., was for fifteen years either associate or sole editor of "The Episcopal Recorder," and edited "The British pulpit" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1874).

SUDDARDS, William F., musician, b. in London, England, 5 March, 1843. At the age of seven he came with his parents to the United States. While he was yet a boy he learned to play on several instruments but he had no regular music-lessons until 1864. Nine years later he became a pupil at the Boston conservatory of music. Mr. Suds resides at Governor; St. Lawrence co., N.Y., where he keeps a music-store. The compositions comprise both vocal and instrumental music, and some of his pieces have become very popular. He has also published "National School for the Piano-Forte" (1881), and several collections of music in book-form, including "Anthem Gems" (Philadelphia, 1881-3) and "Modern Sacred Duets" (Cincinnati, 1888).
SULLIVAN, Edward, Canadian bishop, b. in Lurgan, Ireland, 18 Aug., 1832; d. in Toronto, 9 Jan., 1899. He was ordained a priest of the Church of England in 1857, was assistant minister at St. George's church, Montreal, afterward rector of Trinity church, Chicago, and then took charge of a parish in Montreal. He became bishop of Algoma in 1882, resigned in 1892, and was elected bishop of Port Huron. He received a D.C.L. degree.

SULLIVAN, Jeremiah, lawyer, b. in Harrisonburg, Va., 21 July, 1794; d. in Madison, Ind., 6 Dec., 1850. He was educated at William and Mary college, and was admitted to the bar in Winchester, Va., in 1814. He served for some time as a major of volunteers in the war of 1812, and in 1816 removed to Indiana, and settling at Madison, engaged in practice. In 1821 he was elected to the legislature, and while a member of that body proposed Indianapolis as the name for the state capital. From 1831 till 1835 he was one of the fund commissioners for the state, in 1835 he was appointed one of the judges of the state supreme court, and he was judge of the criminal court of Jackson county, Ind., from 1837 to 1839. He was once an unsuccessful candidate for congress, and had been appointed by the governor of the state a commissioner to adjust the land question that arose between Ohio and Indiana out of the construction of the Wabash and Erie canal.—His son, Albergoon Sydney, lawyer, b. in Madison, Ind., 5 April, 1836; d. in New York city, 4 Dec., 1887, was educated at Indiana university, and Miami university, Ohio, and graduated at the latter in 1859. Having been admitted to the bar, he practiced for several years, in 1835 removed to Cincinnati, and in the spring of 1839 to New York, where he soon attracted attention by his legal talent and his oratory. Shortly after the opening of the civil war he was elected to several positions that had been vacant and taken by the state, and his acting in that capacity having caused him to be suspected by the authorities, he was arrested and confined in Fort Lafayette for three months. He was assistant district attorney of New York for three years, and public administrator from 1853 till 1889, resigning each of these offices to attend to his private practice. He was a member of the Southern society, and connected with many charitable associations.—Another son, Jeremiah Gutter, soldier, b. in Madison, Ind., 1 Oct., 1839; d. in Oakland, Cal., 21 Oct., 1890, served during the civil war, became brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 April, 1862, and resigned 11 May, 1863.

SULLIVAN, John, soldier, b. in Berwick, Me., 17 Feb., 1749; d. in Durham, N. H., 23 Jan., 1795. Derived, chief of Bear and Bantry, Ireland, who was killed in his castle of Dunboy in 1549, was his well-known linage ancestor. His father, Owen, who died in 1536 at the age of 165, was born in Limerick during the siege in 1591, and came to this country in 1743. The son studied law, practiced as a lawyer in Durban, and from 1722 held the commission of major in the militia. He was sent from New Hampshire in May, 1744, to the Continental congress at Philadelphia at the age of thirty-three, and was appointed in June, 1753, one of the eight brigadier-generals of the Continental army, then engaged in the siege of Boston. He commanded the left wing under Gen. Charles Lee. Before this, in December, 1743, he had led, with John Langdon, a successful expedition against Fort William and Mary, near Portsmouth. He took a principal part in the siege of Boston, but for a brief period was detached for the defense of Portsmouth. By his influence, when the time was up for the stipulated service of the troops from Connecticut, the army was re-enforced by 2,000 men from his own state of New Hampshire. After the evacuation of the city, Sullivan took command on 18 June, 1746, of the northern army on the borders of Canada. He made an unsuccessful attack on the British at Three Rivers, and the troops were prostrated by smallpox and measles by greatly superior numbers, and he led them in a skillful retreat to join Washington at New York. After holding for a brief period the chief command on Long Island, and being appointed major-general, he yielded command on the island to Gen. Benjamin Lincoln, his senior in years and date of commission. With Lord Stirling and about 6,000 men on Long Island they held a vast bay for a time 32,000 British troops, better equipped and disciplined. Sullivan and Stirling were captured, but soon exchanged. The former did good service in the operations of Westchester, receiving the thanks of Washington in general orders at the close of the campaign. When Gen. Charles Lee, lodging apart from his troops, was taken prisoner, Sullivan led the right wing to join Washington on the Delaware, and commanded the right wing in the passage of the river on Christmas night, and the capture of the Hessians at Trenton. He also took part in the battle of Princeton. While waiting for the British to attack Philadelphia, Sullivan made a night descent on the enemy's island, and took a large number of prisoners that were posted there, and took 100 prisoners. He received the approbation of congress. He then marched rapidly to join Washington, and, in command of the right wing, fought at the Brandywine and at Germantown, where he defeated the British left. When, early in 1778, the alliance was made with France, Sullivan was sent by Washington to take command in Rhode Island, and when DeEstaing arrived with his fleet he did his part to raise 10,000 men in a few weeks to cooperate with it against Newport, which was then garrisoned by 7,000 British and Hessian soldiers. The volunteers were discovered by the withdrawal of the French fleet, which sailed away to fight the English, and being instructed by Washington that 5,000 more troops were on their way to reinforce the garrison, Sullivan marched the army, now reduced to 6,000 men, to Barr's hill, and from 7 A.M. to 7 P.M. on 29 Aug. fought what Lafayette pronounced the best-contested battle of the war, 6,000 on each side, virtually ending about 4 P.M. in driving the enemy from the battlefield at the point of the bayonet. While waiting in the summer of 1779 for the promised return of DeEstaing from the West Indies to cooperate against Canada, Sullivan, in command of 4,000 men, to prepare the way, entered the Iroquois country in the state of New York to punish and prevent the devastations of the Indian tribes and their English allies, and defeating all that ventured to oppose him, including a force under Joseph Brant and Sir John Johnson at New York on 29 Aug., 1779, drove out of the country thousands of Indian warriors and destroyed their villages and crops. After moving several hundred miles through the wilderness, he returned to Pennsylvania to learn that D'Estaint had fruitlessly spent his strength in the siege of Savannah and sailed for France. His health being shattered by five years' active and continuous service in the field, he resigned, and was again selected to the Continental congress, where he helped to reorganize the army and to establish the finances and public credit. He was chairman of the committee that aided in suppressing the mutiny of Pennsylvania troops in 1781. Resuming his practice in New Hampshire, he was president of the state in 1789-90, a member of the State constitutional convention of 1784, councillor in 1785, and a commissioner to settle the "New Hampshire grant" troubles with Vermont. In 1786, by intrirepidity and good management, he saved his state from anarchy, and in 1788 he was active in securing the adoption of the constitution of the United States. From 1789 till his death he was U. S. judge for his state. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1789. See his life by Oliver W. B. Peabody, in Sparks's "American Biography"; his "Military Services and Public Life," by Thomas C. Amory (Boston, 1805); and "Journals of the Military Expedition of Major-General John Sullivan against the Six Nations of Indians in 1799, with Records of Centennial Celebrations," prepared by order of the state government (Auburn, N. Y., 1888).—son, George, statesman, b. in Durham, N. H., 29 Aug., 1711; d. in Exeter, N. H., 14 June, 1808, was graduated at Harvard in 1790, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise at Exeter in 1786. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1806, attorney-general of New Hampshire in 1785-9, a member of congress in 1811-13, and of the state senate in 1814-15, and was again attorney-general in 1816-20. He published orations and pamphlets—Gen. John's brother, James, statesman, b. in Berwick, Me., 22 April, 1744; d. in Boston, Mass., 10 Dec., 1808, was intended for a military life, which he was prevented from following by the fracture of a limb. He studied law under his brother, was admitted to the bar, began practice at Biddeford, and in 1770 received the appointment of alic's attorney for York county. He early took an active part in the Revolution, was a member of the Provincial congress of Massachusetts in 1775, and with two others ably executed a difficult mission to Ticonderoga. In the early part of 1776 he was appointed a judge of the superior court, which post he resigned in February, 1782. In 1779-80 he was a member of the State constitutional convention, and in 1784-5 he was a delegate from Massachusetts to the Conticontinental congress. He repeatedly represented Boston in the state assembly, and in 1784 was a commissioner to settle the controversy between New York and Massachusetts regarding their claims to western lands. In 1787 he was of the executive council and judge of probate of Suffolk county, and he served as attorney-general from 1799 till 1807, when he was elected governor of Massachusetts by the Republican party, and re-elected in 1808. He was one of the commissioners appointed by Washington to settle the boundary-line between this country and the British settlements, and the projector of the Middlesex canal, which was constructed under the superintendence of his son, John Langdon. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences from its institution, and one of the principal founders of the Massachusetts historical society, and for many years its president. Harvard gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1790. He published "Observations on the Government of the United States" (Boston, 1791); "The Path to Riches, or Dissertation on Banks" (1792); "History of the District of Maine" (1796); "The Altar of Bath thrown Down, or the French Nation Defended" (1796); "Impartial Review of the Causes of the French Revolutions" (1798); "History of Land Title in Massachusetts" (1803); "Disputations on the Constitution of Liberty of the Press" (1801); "Correspondence with Col. Pickering" (1805); and "History of the Penobscot Indians," in "Massachusetts Historical Collections." His life, with selections from his writings, was published by his grandson, Thomas C. Amory (2 vols., Boston, 1880).—James's son, William, author, b. in Saugus, Me., Nov. 7, 1774; d. in Boston, Mass., 3 Sept., 1830, was graduated at Harvard in 1792, admitted to the bar in 1795, and practised successfully for many years in Boston, where he was long president of the Suffolk bar association. He was frequently a member of the state legislature and council of Massachusetts between 1804 and 1830, and was a delegate to the State constitutional convention in 1830. He was a brigadier-general of militia, a member of the Academy of arts and sciences, the Massachusetts historical society, and the American philosophical society. Mr. Sullivan was a fine belles-lettres scholar, and a persuasive orator. Harvard gave him the degree of L. L. D. in 1828. He published "Political Class-Book" (Boston, 1831); "Moral Class-Book" (1832); "Historical Class-Book" (1832); "Familiar Class-Book" (1833); "Familiar Letters on the Public Men of the Revolution, including Events, 1783-1815" (1834; new ed., with a biographical sketch of the author, by his son, John T. S. Sullivan, Philadelphia, 1847); "Sea Life" (Boston, 1837); "Historical Causes and Effects, A. D. 476-1517" (1839); and many addresses.—William's son, John Turner Sargent, b. in Berwick, Me., 12 Feb., 1788, was educated in Germany, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Philadelphia, Pa., and St. Louis, Mo. SULLIVAN. The priority of invention being fully shown.

In 1824 he was appointed by President Monroe associate civil engineer of the board of internal improvements, which post he resigned in 1825, after reporting the practicability of a canal across the Alleghenies. He then studied medicine, received his degree at Yale in 1827, and engaged in practice at New Haven, adopting the views of the homeopathists. In 1847 he removed to New York.

Dr. Sullivan made some important inventions and discoveries in medicine and surgery, and published pamphlets on steamboat navigation.—John Langdon's son, Thomas Russell, clergymen, b. in Brookline, Mass., in 1799; d. in Somerville, Mass., 23 March, 1875. After spending some years in that place, he was appointed in 1808 lecturer in anatomy in Queen's college, and upon the establishment of the Royal college of physicians and surgeons in affiliation with Queen's, he became its professor of anatomy. He is now (1888) professor of surgery and histology in the same college and of anatomy in the female medical college, a position he has held for some years. He was a member of the Ontario medical council, and was president of the Medical association of Canada in 1888. He was mayor of Kingston in 1854 and 1855, an unsuccessful candidate for the Dominion parliament in the Conservative interest in 1852, and was appointed senator, 29 Jan., 1884. He was pure-vot-e general during the northwest rebellion in 1883, and received the thanks of the Legislative Assembly for his services.

SULLIVAN, Peter John, soldier, b. in County Cork, Ireland, 15 March, 1821; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 2 March, 1883. He was descended from Gen. William O'Sullivan of the British army, came to this country with his parents when he was two years old, passed his early years in Philadelphia, and was educated at the University of Pennsylvania. He omitted the prefix "O" from his name on reaching manhood. He served through the Mexican war, attaining the rank of major, and at its close was appointed an official topographer in the U. S. senate. In 1848 he removed to Cincinnati, studied law, and was a draughtsman for the U. S. topographical corps. In 1855 he was elected colonel of the Ohio volunteer infantry, and was present at Shiloh, where he captured a Confederate flag and was wounded three times. In consequence of his injuries he was unfit for service for nine months, but he was present at the fall and capture of Vicksburg, was post-commander at Memphis and Fort Pickering, and during the last days of the war was the presiding judge of the military court of claims. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1863, for gallant and meritorious services, and immediately after was appointed by President Johnson minister to the United States of Colombia, serving till 1869, when his health compelled him to resign. He subsequently practiced occasionally in the U. S. supreme court, in the court of claims, and in the government departments at Washington, D. C. He was the author of the "Don Felix Letters, or Pen-Poems of Members of the Bar."

SULLIVANT, William Starling, botanist, b. in Frankfort, near Columbus, Ohio, 15 Jan., 1803; died in Columbus, 30 April, 1873. He was educated at Ohio university, and at Yale, where he was graduated in 1828. The death of his father, Lucas, gave him a legacy, and he was called to the charge of the family property. This duty led to his becoming a surveyor and practical engineer, which occupation he followed until late in life. Meanwhile he turned his attention to botany, and collected and studied the plants of central Ohio, publishing "A Catalogue of Plants, Native or Naturalized, in the Vicinity of Columbus, Ohio" (1840). Soon afterward he turned his attention to mosses, which became the subject of his special study until he was recognized as the most accomplished botanist that this country has ever produced, and it is doubtful whether his superior existed anywhere. His first publication in this branch of botany was "Msses Alleghanienis" (1843), the materials of which he gathered on a botanical excursion along the Alleghany mountains from Maryland to Georgia in 1843. His next work of importance was "Contributions to the Bryology and Hepaticology of North America" (2 parts, 1846-59), which appeared originally in the "Memoirs of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences." The description of the Musci and Hepaticae according to the system of "M. Hildreth" in the "Manual of the Botany of the Northern United States" was prepared by him and issued separately as "The Musci and Hepaticae of the United States East of the Mississippi River" (New York, 1856). In association with Leo Lesquereux (q. v.) he published "Muscæ Boreali Americanæ Exsiccatæ" (1856), containing the results of a journey through the mountains of Pennsylvania and Ohio, in which he examined the specimens that were collected by Charles Wright in Cuba, and issued "Muscæ Cubaenses" (1869); also those gathered by August Fendler in Venezuela and by Charles Wright on the North Pacific exploring expedition, but the results had not been published at the time of his death. The mosses collected by the South Pacific exploring expedition under Capt. Charles Wilkes, and of those of the Pacific railroad exploration under Lieut. Amiel W. Whipple, were examined by him, and his results appeared in the government's reports of the expeditions. His greatest work was "Icones Muscoærium" (1844; Supplement, 1854), consisting of figures and descriptions of most of those mosses occurring in the United States, similar to those represented up to that time. The name of Sullivantia Ohionis was given by his associates, Asa Gray and John Torrey, to a rare saxifragaceous plant which he had discovered in Ohio. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Gambier in 1864, and, besides his membership in scientific societies in the United States and Europe, he was elected to the National academy of sciences in 1872. His botanical books and his collections and preparations of mosses were given to the Gray herbarium of Harvard university, and the remainder of his botanical library, his choice microscopes, and other collections were bequeathed to the University of Ohio and to Stanford medical college, which was founded by his uncle, and of which he was the senior trustee. — His brother, Michael Lucas, farmer, b. in Franklinton, Ohio, Aug. 16, 1807; d. in Henderson, Ky., 29 Jan., 1879, was educated at Ohio university and at Centre college, Kentucky, and afterward engaged in farming. He proceeded at once to improve the immense tract of land that he inherited from his kin. He sold mules and blooded horses, and was an originator of the Ohio stock importing company, which introduced a new era of stock-breeding in the west. In 1854 he sold his Ohio estate, bought 80,000 acres of land in Illinois, and engaged in farming on a larger scale than had ever been attempted before. He introduced new methods and improved machinery on his farm of "Broadlands," but, meeting with reverses, he sold part of his property and retired to his farm of 40,000 acres at Burr Oaks, Ill. The estate embraced sixty-five square miles.

SULLY, Thomas, painter, b. at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, England, 8 June, 1787; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 Nov., 1872. At the age of nine he was brought by his parents to the United States. His father placed him in 1795 in an insurance broker's office, but it soon became evident that art was his true vocation. In 1799 he joined his brother Laurence, a miniature-painter, at Richmond, Va., and two years later removed with him to Norfolk. Thomas soon surpassed his brother, and began to try his hand at oil portraits, aided somewhat by Henry Rembridge. He determined to go to London for study, and worked hard to gain sufficient money to carry him there. But the death of his brother in 1804 decided him to remain and protect the latter's family, whom he was engaged to wed for. In 1806, after marrying his brother's widow, Sully went to New York, where he resided until 1808. In 1807 he made a short visit to Boston, where he had some instruction and advice from Gilbert Stuart. He returned to Philadelphia in 1809, and went the same year to London. Here he studied for some time under Benjamin West, and made copies after old masters that had been contracted for in this country, after which he embarked for New York in 1810. He now settled permanently in Philadelphia. During the following years he executed numerous portraits, notably those of George Frederick Cooke as Richard III., which is owned by the Pennsylvania academy; Benjamin Rush (1814); and Com. Decatur, in the city hall, New York. In 1818 the legislature of North Carolina applied to him for two full-length portraits of Washington, Sully, in reply, proposed to paint a historical picture which should represent some memorable action of the great commander, and suggested the crossing of the Delaware. This was agreed upon; but when Sully wrote for the dimensions of the space that the picture was to occupy, he received no answer. Neverthelesss he proceeded with the work on a canvass of large size. When, after a considerable expense of time and money, the picture was finished, he was informed that there was no place fitted to receive it, and it was thrown upon his hands. The picture finally came into the possession of the Boston museum. Sully was perhaps most successful in his portraits of women. Henry T. Tuckerman says of him: "His organization fits him to sympathize with the fair and lovely rather than the grand and commanding. Sully's forte is the graceful. Among his numerous portraits, of which many have been engraved, are those of Gen. Jonathan Williams (1815); Bishop William White, of Pennsylvania; Lafayette, in Independence hall, Philadelphia; Thomas Jefferson, painted for the United States military academy (1821); Fanny Kemble and her father, Charles Kemble; Reynolds Johnson; Charles Carroll, of Carrollton; Ohio, and the grand portrait, painted in 1857-8 for the St. George society, Philadelphia; Rembrandt Peale; Percival Drayton (1827); Alexander J. Dallas; Dr. Philip Syng Physick; Joseph Hopkinson; George M. Dallas; and Robert F. Stockton (1851). The Corcoran gallery owns the portraits of James Madison, Andrew Jackson (1825), John Marshall, and a portrait of George Washington, the Sterry, and a set of historical pictures, among which are "Capture of Major Andre" (1812) and "Miranda" (1815). Sully wrote an autobiographical sketch, "Recollections of an Old Painter," which appeared in "Horns at Home" for November, 1869. His "Hunts to Young Painters," which he prepared for the press in 1851 and revised in 1871, was published after his death (Philadelphia 1871). — His daughter, Jaxy, afterward Mrs. John C. Darby, followed her father's profession. — Another son, Alfred, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1821; d. in Fort Vancouver, Washington territory, 17 April, 1879, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1841, assigned to the 2d infantry, which was then engaged in the Seminole war, and participated with credit in the attack on the Seminole camp, 25 Jan., 1842. He was on garrison duty on the great lakes till the Mexican war, and after the siege of Vera Cruz in 1847 was ordered to the north on recruiting service. He was then stationed in California, and on 22 Feb., 1849, was promoted to captain. In 1853 he was sent with others to re-enforce the governor of Oregon in his mission to the Indians. He returned the same year, and in December of that year, while on his way to New York, he was wrecked off the California coast and remained six days on a desert island. He was then in Minnesota, Nebraska, and Dakota till 1858, and, after spending a year in Europe on leave of absence, took part in operations against the Cheyenne Indians in 1860-1. He then served in the defense of Washington till 4 March, 1862, when he became colonel of the 1st Minnesota regiment. He led a brigade during the change of base to James river, and was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, for gallantry at Fair Oaks, and colonel for Malvern Hill. After engaging in the northern Virginia and Maryland campaigns, he was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 1 Oct., 1862. He led his brigade at Antietam, and in May, 1863, was assigned to the command of the Department of Dakota, where he soon gained note by his expeditions against hostile northwestern Indians, especially in the engagement at White Stone Hill, 3 Sept., 1863, that at Tah-kah-ha-lanty, 28 July, 1864, and the skirmish in the Bad Lands, 8 Aug., 1864. He was given the effect of major-general of volunteers, and that of brigadier-general in the regular army, at the close of the war, and subsequently served on the board of promotion, and was on special service in the interior department at Washington. He was made lieu-SUMNER, Benjamin, Canadian author, b. in Three Rivers, Quebec, 3 July, 1841. He early devoted himself to literary pursuits, became editor of "Le Canada" in 1866, entered the service of the Canadian parliament as one of its translators in November, 1867, and in 1870 became attached to the department of militia and defence. He established in Three Rivers the literary institute, of which he was the first president. He was elected in 1866 correspondent member of the "Cercle artistique et litteraire" of Brussels, Belgium, president of the Institute Canadien-Français in 1874-6, and was corresponding delegate of "L'Institution ethnographique de France" in 1879. He became a member of the Royal society of Canada in 1892, and in 1895 was made president of its first section. He is also connected with various learned societies in the United States, Canada, and Europe. He has contributed to periodicals, and published "Les Laurentiennes" (Montreal, 1870); "History of Three Rivers" (1870); "Les chants nouveaux" (1876); "Mélanges d'histoire et de littérature" (Ottawa, 1876); "Chronique trivulienne" (Montreal, 1875); and "Histoire des Canadiens-Français" (8 vols. 1876-83). SUMMERFIELD, John, clergyman, b. in Preston, England, 31 Jan., 1798; d. in New York city, 13 June, 1825. He was educated at a Moravian school, and removed to Dublin in 1813, where he plunged into a life of dissipation, and was finally expelled by the society. A period of contrition succeeding, he united in 1817 with the Wesleyans, where his pulpit talents attracted universal attention, and in 1819 he was preaching to immense congregations in Dublin and doing missionary labor. His health failing, he removed to New York in 1821, and was appointed to the Methodist conference of that state. In 1822 he visited Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, his eloquence everywhere arousing enthusiasm. The same year he visited France and England, again in quest of health, and having been appointed a delegate to the anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Bible society in Paris. Upon his return, in April, 1824, he preached in the large cities with great success, and formed missionary societies till the following February. He was a founder of the American tract society a short time before his death. Princox gave him the degree of M. A. in 1822. His biography was written by John Holland (New York, 1829) and by William M. Willett (Philadelphia, 1875), and his "Sermons and Sketches of Sermons" were published (New York, 1842).

SUMMERS, Thomas Osmond, clergyman, b. in Dorsetshire, England, 11 Oct., 1812. He came to the United States in 1839, united with the Methodist church, was admitted to the Baltimore conference in 1853, and appointed to the Augusta circuit, Va. In 1840 he was one of the organizers of the first Texas conference, four years later he was transferred to the Alabama conference, of which he was a member till 1876, and in 1843, as secretary of the Methodist conference, he took the organization of the Methodist Episcopal church, south. The following year he was appointed editor of the "Southern Christian Advocate" and chairman of the committee to compile a new hymn-book. In 1859 he was elected by the general conference editor of their books and tracts and of the Sunday-School and Free-Will Society, and he took charge of "The Quarterly Review." During the civil war he returned to Alabama and performed pastoral work till 1866, when he was appointed editor of the Nashville "Christian Advocate." He became professor of systematic theology in Vanderbilt university, Nashville, Tenn., in 1874, was dean of the theological faculty, and ex-officio pastor of the institution. He has been secretary of every general conference of his church. The degrees of B.D. and LL.D. have been conferred upon him. Dr. Summers has revised and edited hundreds of church books with introductions, notes, and additions. Among his works are "Commentaries on the Gospels and on the Acts of the Apostles" (6 vols.); "Commentary on the Ritual of the M. E. Church," (2 vols.); the "Golden Censer"; "Refutation of Thomas Paine's Theological Writings, not Answered in Bishop Warren's Apology." Watson's "Biblical and Theological Dictionary," enlarged and revised; and many tracts, pamphlets, and sermons.

SUMNER, Charles, statesman, b. in Boston, Mass., 6 Jan., 1811; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 March, 1884. The father of Charles, James, Sumner, from whom Charles was descended in the seventh generation, came to America about 1635 with his wife and three sons, and settled in Dorchester, Mass. The Sumners were generally farmers. Job, grandfather of Charles, entered Harvard in 1774, but in the next year he joined the Revolutionary army, and served with distinction during the war. He was not graduated, but he received in 1785 an honorary degree from the college. He died in 1789, aged thirty-three. Charles P. Inkhart, Sumner (b. 1776, d. 1839), father of Charles, was graduated at Harvard in 1796. He was a lawyer and was sheriff of Suffolk county from 1825 until a few days before his death. In 1830 he married Rebecca Jacobs, of Hanover, N. H., and they had eight children. Charles was the eldest and twins. Matilda died in 1832. Sheriff Sumner was an upright, grave, formal man, of the old Puritan type, fond of literature and public life. His anti-slavery convictions were very strong, and he foretold a violent conflict in slavery in this country. In his family he was austere, and, as his income was small, strict economy was indispensable. Charles was a quiet boy, early matured, and soon showed the bent of his mind by the purchase for a few cents of a Latin grammar and "Liber Primus" from a comrade at school. In his eleventh year he was placed at the Latin-school where Wendell Phillips, Robert C. Winthrop, James Freeman Clarke, and other boys, afterward distinguished men, were pupils. Sumner was included in the classes in general information, and in writing essays, but he was not especially distinguished. Just as he left the Latin-school for college he heard President John Quincy Adams speak in Faneuil hall, and at about the same time he heard Daniel Webster's eulogy upon Adams and Jefferson. It was in a New England essentially unchanged from what he left, and into the Sumner grew up. At the age of fifteen he was reserved and thoughtful, caring little for sports, slender, tall, and awkward. His thirst for knowledge of every kind, with singular ability and rapidity in acquiring it, was already remarkable. He had made a compend of English history in eighty-six pages of a copy-book, and had read Gibbon's history.

In September, 1826, he began his studies at Harvard. In the classics and history and forensics, and in belles-lettres, he was among the best scholars. But he failed entirely in mathematics. His memory was extraordinary and his reading extensive. Without dissipation of any kind and without sensibilities to humor, generous in his judgment of himself, distant and cold in character, little into society, he was a general favorite, although his college life gave no special promise of a distinguished career. In his junior year he made his first journey from home, in a pedestrian tour with some classmates to Lake Champlain, returning by the Hudson river and the city of New York. In 1830 he was graduated, and devoted himself for a year to a wide range of reading and study in the Latin classics and in general literature. He resolutely grappled with mathematics to repair the defect in his education in that branch of study, wrote a prize essay on commerce, and listened carefully to the Boston orators, Webster, Everett, Cheate, and Channing. No day, no hour, no opportunity for study was lost, and he left Harvard a first-class student. His first interest in public questions was awakened by the anti-Masonic movement, which he held to be "a great and good cause," two adjectives that were always associated in his estimate of causes and of men. Mindful of Dr. Johnson's maxim, he diligently maintained his friendships by correspondence and intercourse. On 1 Sept., 1831, he entered the law-school, in which Joseph Story was the chief professor. Story had been a friend of Sumner's father, and his friendly regard for the son soon ripened into an affection and confidence that never ceased. Sumner was now six feet and two inches in height, but weighing only 120 pounds, and not personally attractive. He was never ill, and was an unerring walker; his voice was clear, his smile quick and sincere, his laugh loud, and his intellectual industry and his memory were extraordinary. He began the study of law with the utmost enthusiasm, giving himself a wide range, keeping careful notes of the moot-court cases, writing for the "American Jurist," and preparing a catalogue of the library of the Law-school. He joined the temperance society of the professional schools and the college. His requirements were already large, but he was free from vanity. His mental habit was so serious that, while his talk was interesting, he was totally disinclined to a jest or gay repartee. He had apparently no ambition except to learn as much as he could, and his life then, as always, was pure in word and deed.

Sumner said the question of slavery had already begun. The "Liberator" was established by Mr. Garrison in Boston on 1 Jan., 1831. The "nullification movement" in South Carolina occurred while Sumner was at the Law-school. He praised President Jackson's proclamation, and saw civil war impending; but he wrote to a friend in 1833, "Politicians begin to loathe: they are for a day, but the law is for all time." He entered the law-office of Benjamin Rand, in Boston, in January, 1834, wrote copiously for the "Jurist," and went to Washington for the first time in April. The favor of Judge Story opened to Sumner the pleasantest houses at the capital, and his professional and general accomplishments seemed an ever-welcome welcome. But Washington only deepened his love for the law and his aversion to politics. In September, 1834, he was admitted to the bar. During the month that he passed in Washington, Sumner described his first impression of the unfortunate race to whose welfare his life was to be devoted:

"For the first time I saw slaves [on the journey through Maryland], and my worst preconception of their appearance and ignorance did not fall as low as their actual stupidity. They appear to be nothing more than moving masses of flesh, unendowed with anything of intelligence above the brute. I have now an idea of the plight upon which the court of the emancipators of which they form a part. Anticipating hearing Calhoun, he says: "He will be the last man I shall ever hear speak in Washington." In 1835 he was appointed by Judge Story a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States and reporter of Story's judicial opinions, and he began to teach in the Law-school during the judge's absence. This service he continued in 1836-7, and he aided in preparing a digest of the decisions of the supreme court of Maine. He wrote upon literary and legal topics, he lectured and edited and pleaded, and he was much overworked in making a bare livelihood. In 1835 his interest in the slavery question deepened. The first newspaper for which he subscribed was "The Liberator," and he read Francis Lieber, then professor in the college at Columbia, who had laid down it [slavery]. Should it ever exist? Is not emancipation practicable? We are becoming Abolitionists, at the north, fast." The next year, 1836, his "blood boats" at an indignity offered by a slave-master to the Boston counsel of a fugitive slave. Sumner now saw much of Channing by whose wisdom and influence his intellectual life had been deeply influenced. His articles in the "Jurist" had opened correspondence with many eminent European publicists. His friends at home were chiefly among scholars, and already Longfellow was one of his intimate companions. In the summer of 1836 he made a journey to Canada, and in December, 1837, sailed for France.

He carried letters to distinguished Americans to distinguished Europeans, and his extraordinary diligence in study and his marvellous memory had equipped him for turning every opportunity to the best account. During his absence he kept a careful diary and wrote long letters, many of which are printed in the memoir by Edward L. Pierce, and there is no more graphic and interesting picture than their present of the social and professional life at that time of the countries he visited. Sumner remained in Paris for five months, and carefully improved every hour. He attended 150 university lectures by the most renowned professors. He walked the hospitals with the great surgeons. He frequented the courts and theatres and opera and libraries and museums. He was a guest in the most beautiful houses he saw and noted everything, not as a loiterer, but as a student. On 31 May, 1838, he arrived in London, where he remained for ten months. No American had ever been so universally received and liked, and Carlyle characterized him as "Popularity Sumner." He saw and studied England in every aspect, and in April, 1839, went to Italy and devoted himself to the study of art, history, and literature, with which, however, he was already familiar. In Rome, where he remained for some months, he met the sculptor Thomas Crawford, whom he warmly befriended. Early in October, 1839, he left Italy for Germany, in the middle of March, 1840, he was again in England, and in May, 1840, he returned to America.
He showed as yet no sign of political ambition. The "hard-cider campaign" of 1840, the contest between Harrison and Van Buren, began immediately after his return. He voted for Harrison, but without especial interest in the measures of the Whig party. In announcing to a brother, then in Europe, the result of the election, he wrote: "I take very little interest in politics." The murder of Lovejoy in November, 1837, and the meeting in Faneuil hall, where Wendell Phillips made his memorable speech, and the local disturbances that attended the progress of the anti-slavery agitation throughout the northern states, had plainly revealed the political situation. But Sumner's letters during the year after his return from Europe do not show that the question of slavery had especially impressed him, while his friends were in the most socially delightful circles of conservative Boston. But in 1841 the assertion by Great Britain, of a right to stop any suspected slaver to ascertain her right to carry the American flag, produced great excitement. Sumner at once showed his concern for freedom and his interest in great questions of the day. Articles were published in a Boston newspaper early in 1842, the right and the justice of such an inquiry. Kent, Story, Chafee, and Theodore Sedgwick approved his position. This was his first appearance in the anti-slavery controversy. In 1842 Daniel Webster, as secretary of state, wrote his letter upon the case of the "Creole," contending that the slaves who had been against the ship's officers should not be liberated by the British authorities at Nassau. Sumner strongly condemned the letter, and took active part in the discussion. He contended that the slaves were manumitted by the common law upon passing beyond the domain of the local law of slavery, and if this were not so, the piracy charged was an offense under the local statute and not under the law of nations, and no government could be summoned to surrender offenders against the municipal law of other governments. In April, 1842, he writes: "The question of slavery is getting to be the absorbing one among us, and growing out of this is that other of the Union." He ad- jured Longfellow to write verses that should move the world, and that he himself would interpret in his books. His relations were still unclouded, and his unbounded admiration of Webster showed his generous mind. "With the moral devotion of Channing," he said of Webster, "he would be a prophet."

In July, 1843, Sumner published in the "North American Review" an article defending Col. Alexander Sidell Mackenzie for his action in the case of the "Somers" mutiny, when a son of John C. Spencer, secretary of war, was executed. He published also a paper upon the political relations of slavery, justifying the moral agitation of the question. In this year he contributed largely to the "Law Reporter," and taught for the last time in the Law-school. In the election of 1844 Sumner took no part. He had no special sympathy with Whig views of the Union, and his local work, and already slavery seemed to him to be the chief public question. He was a Whig, as he said in 1848, because it seemed to him the party of humanity, and John Quincy Adams was the statesman whom he most admired. He was overwhelmed with professional work, which brought on a serious illness. But his activity was unabated, and he was elected a member of various learned societies. His letters during 1844 show his profound interest in the slavery question. He speaks of the "atrocious immorality of John Tyler in seeking to absorb Texas," and "the disgusting vilification of slavery" by Calhoun, which he regrets that he is too busy to answer. In 1845 he was deeply interested in the question of popular education, and was one of the intimate ad- visers of Horace Mann. Prison-discipline was another question that commanded his warmest interest, and his first public speech was made upon this subject at a meeting of the Prison-discipline society, in May, 1845. This was followed, on July 4, by the annual oration before the civil authorities of Boston, upon "The True Grandeur of Nations." The oration was a plea for peace and a vehement denunciation of war, delivered, in com- memoration of an armed revolutionary contest, to an audience largely military and in military array. This discourse was the prototype of all Sumner's speeches, for an elaborate treatise, full of learning and precedent and historical literature, forcible argument and powerful moral appeal. The effect was immediate and striking. There were great indignation and warm protest on the one hand, and upon the other sincere congratulation and high compliment. Sumner's view of the absolute wrong and iniquity of war under all circum- stances was to grow and deepen. In the great purpose of a peaceful solution of international disputes he never relinquished. The oration revealed to the country an orator hitherto unknown even to himself and his friends. It showed a moral conviction, intrepidity, and independence, and a relentless vigor of statement, which were worthy of the best traditions of New England. After four months later, on 4 Nov., 1845, Sumner made in Faneuil hall his first anti-slavery speech, at a meeting of which Charles Francis Adams was chairman, to protest against the admission of Texas. This first speech had all the characteristics of the last important speech he ever made. It was brief, but sternly bold, uncompromising, aggressive, and placed Sumner at once in the van of the political anti-slavery movement. He was not an Abolition- ist in the Garrisonian sense. He held that slavery was sectional, not national; that the constitution was meant to be a bond of national liberty as well as of union, and nowhere connotation was the theory that there could be property in men; that it was to be judicially interpreted always in the interest of the free-born, that the right of property in human beings was to be the subject of legal restriction and the moral force of public opinion. Slavery would be forced to disappear. This was subse- quently the ground held by the Republican party. Sumner added to his reputation by an elaborate oration at Cambridge, in August, 1846, upon "The Scholar, the Jurist, the Artist, the Philanthropist," of which the illustrations were his personal friends, then recently dead. John T. Woolworth, Judge Story, Washington Allston, and Dr. Channing. The reference to Channing gave him the opportunity, which he improved, to urge the duty of anti-slavery ac- tion. It was the first time that the burning ques- tion of the hour had been discussed in the scholas- tic seclusion of the university.

In September, 1846, at the Whig state conven- tion held in Boston, Sumner spoke upon the "Anti-Slavery Duties of the Whig Party," concluding with an impassioned appeal to Mr. Webster to lead the Whigs as an anti-slavery party. He sent the speech to Mr. Webster, who, in replying coolly, politely regretted that they differed in regard to political duty. In October, Sumner wrote a public letter to Robert C. Winthrop, representative in congress from Boston, censuring him severely for his vote in support of the Mexican war. He wrote as a Whig constituent of Mr. Winthrop's, and during his absence from Boston he was nominated for congress, against Mr. Winthrop, by a meeting of Whigs, including Charles Francis Adams and John A. Andrew. But he immediately and peremptorily declined, and he warmly supported Dr. Samuel G. Howe, who was nominated in his stead. During this period, when "Conscience Whigs" were separating from "Cotton Whigs," Sumner was active in public activity. He spoke often, and he argued before the supreme court of the state the invalidity of enlistments for the Mexican war, and delivered a lecture upon "White Slavery in the Barbary," which was a model, and was a valuable historical study of the subject. In June, 1847, a speech upon prison-discipline showed his interest in the question to be unabated. On 29 Sept., 1847, he spoke for the last time as a Whig, in the State convention at Springfield, in support of a resolution that Massachusetts Whigs would support only an anti-slavery man for the presidency. The resolution was lost, and upon the Whig nomination of Gen. Zachary Taylor, 1 June, 1848, a convention of anti-slavery men of both parties was called at Worcester on 28 June, at which Sumner, Charles Francis Adams, Samuel Hoar (who presided), and his son, E. Rockwood Hoar, with many other well-known Whigs, withdrew from the Whig party and organized the Free-soil party. The frontiers of Kansas was presented to him, and in his speech, answering to Cass and Taylor, "I will take neither." Sumner was chairman of the Free-soil state committee, which conducted the campaign in Massachusetts for Van Buren and Adams, nominated at the Buffalo convention. In October, 1848, he was nominated for congress in the Boston district, receiving 2,230 votes against 1,490 for the Democratic candidate, but Mr. Winthrop received 7,726, and was elected. In May, 1849, he renewed his plea for peace in an exhaustive address before the American Peace society on "The War System of the Commonwealth of Nations," and on 5 Nov., 1850, his speech, after the passage of the Fugitive-slave law, was like a warcry for the Free-soil party, and was said to have made him senator. In the election of members of the legislature the Free-soilers and Democrats united, and at a caucus of members of the Free-soil party, Sumner was unanimously selected as their candidate for U. S. senator. He was more acceptable to the Democrats because he had never been an extreme Whig, and the Democratic caucus, with almost equal unanimity, made him its candidate. The Free-soil party nominated G. W. Hand, the Whig governor, Henry W. Cushman lieutenant-governor, and Robert Ramond, Jr., senator for the short term. These were all Democrats. The house of representatives voted, on 14 Jan., 1851, for senator, casting 81 votes, with 191 necessary to a choice. Sumner received 196, Robert G. Winthrop 167, sustaining 28, blanks 3. On 22 Jan., of 38 votes in the senate, 1,490 for the Democratic candidate, and 14, and H. W. Bishop 1, and Sumner was chosen by the senate. The contest in the house continued for three months. Sumner was entreated to modify some expressions in his last speech; but he refused, saying that he did not desire the office, and on 22 Feb., he asked Dennis Ward Wilson, president of the senate and the Democratic leaders, to abandon him whenever they could elect another senator. On 24 Apr., Sumner was elected senator by 203 votes, precisely the necessary number of the votes cast. When he took his seat in the senate he was as distinctly the uncompromising representative of freedom and the north as Calhoun had been of slavery and the south. But it was not until 26 Aug., 1852, just after the Democratic and Whig national conventions had acquiesced in the compromise of 1850, that Sumner delivered his first important speech, "Freedom National, Slavery sectional," explaining the relations of the national government to slavery, and the true nature of the constitutional provision in regard to fugitives. The speech made a profound impression. The general view was accepted at once by the anti-slavery party as sound. The argument seemed to the anti-slavery sentiment to be unanswerable. Seward and Chase both described it as "great," and Webster was evidently of another mind. The thoroughly equipped man was now to be encountered by the slave power. On 23 Jan., 1854, Stephen A. Douglas introduced the Kansas-Nebraska bill by which the Missouri compromise was repealed, and on 21 Feb., 1854, Sumner opposed it in a speech characteristically comprehensive and exhaustive, reviewing the history of the restriction of slavery. On the eve of the passage of the bill he made a solemn and impressive protest, and his reply to assailants, 28 June, 1854, stung his opponents to madness. He was now the most unspiring, the most feared, and the most hated opponent of slavery in congress. On 17 March, 1856, Mr. Douglas introduced a bill for the admission of Kansas as a state. On 19 and 29 May, Sumner delivered a speech on the "Crime against Kansas" which again aroused the country, and in which he spoke, in reference to the slave and free-soil factions in Kansas, of the "fury of the propagandists and the calm determination of their opponents," who through the whole country were "marshalling hostile divisions, and foreshadowing a conflict which, unless happily averted by freedom, will become a--fratricidal, parricidal war." It provoked the bitter rejoinders in the senate, to which Sumner replied contemptuously. In his speech he had sharply censured Senator Butler of South Carolina, and Senator Douglas, and two days after the delivery of the speech, as Sumner was sitting after the adjournment writing at his desk alone in the senate-chamber, Preston Smith Brooks, a relative of Butler's and a representative from South Carolina, entered the chamber, and, after speaking a few words to Sumner, struck him viciously upon the head with a bludgeon, and while Sumner was crying in vain to extricate himself from the desk and seize his assailant, the blows continued until he sank bloody and senseless to the floor. This event startled the country as a presage of civil war. The excitement was universal and profound. The house of representatives refused to give the two-thirds vote necessary to expel Brooks, but he resigned and appealed to his constituents, and was unanimously re-elected. Sumner was long incapacitated for public service. On 3 Nov., 1856, he returned to Boston to vote, and was received with acclamation by the people and with the highest honor by the state and city authorities. On 13 Jan., 1857, he was re-elected senator, receiving all but ten votes, and on 7 March, 1857, he said he had been a "miserable failure in Europe, where he submitted to the severest medical treatment. With characteristic energy and industry, in the intervals of suffering, he devoted himself to a thorough study of the art and history of engraving. For nearly four years he was absent from his seat in the senate, which he resumed on 5 Dec., 1859, at the opening of the session. He was still feeble, and took no part in debate until the middle of March, and on 4 June, 1860, on the question of admitting Kansas as a free state, he delivered a speech upon "The Barbarism of Slavery," which showed his powers untouched and his ardor unquenched. Mr. Lincoln had been nominated for the presidency, and Sumner's speech was the last comprehensive word in the parliamentary debate of freedom and slavery. The controversy could now be settled only by arms. This conviction was undoubtedly the explanation of the angry silence with which the speech was heard in the senate by the friends of slavery. During the winter of secession that followed the election Sumner devoted himself to the prevention of any form of compromise, but in vain. He was to be found no more in the forum, surrendering the constitutional principles. He made no speeches during the session. By the withdrawal of southern senators the senate was left with a Republican majority, and in the reconstruction of committees on 8 March, 1861, Sumner was made chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. For this place he was peculiarly fitted. His knowledge of international law, of the history of other states, and of their current politics, was comprehensive and exact, and during the intense excitement arising from the seizure of the "Trent" he rendered the country a signal service in placing the surrender of Sidelii and Mason upon the true ground. (See Mason, James Murray.) While there was universal acquiescence in the decision of the government for the capture of commissioners, there was not universal satisfaction and pride until on 9 Jan., 1862, Sumner, in one of his ablest speeches, showed incontrovertibly that our own principles, constantly maintained by us, required the surrender. One of the chief dangers throughout the civil war was the possible action of foreign powers, and especially of England, where iron-clad cruisers were building for the Confederacy, and on 10 Sept., 1863, Sumner delivered in New York a speech upon "Our Foreign Relations," which left nothing unsaid. Happily, on 8 Sept., Lord Russell had informed the American minister, Charles Francis Adams, that the rams would not be permitted to leave English ports.

Throughout the war, both in congress and upon the platform, the elevation of Sumner's name was unanimous. And when the war ended he was equally anxious to secure entire equality of rights for the new citizens. But while firm upon this point, and favoring the temporary exclusion of recent Confederates from political power, he opposed the proposition to change the jury law for the trial of Jefferson Davis, and disclaimed every feeling of vengeance. He was strong in his opposition to President Andrew Johnson and his policy. But the great measure of the Johnson administration, the acquisition of Alaska by treaty, was supported by Sumner in a speech on 9 April, 1867, which is an exhaustive history of Russian America. He voted affirmatively upon all the articles of impeachment of President Johnson, which in a long opinion he declared to be one of the last great battles with slavery.

Early in the administration of President Grant, 10 April, 1869, Sumner opposed the Johnson-Clarendon treaty with England, as affording no means of adequate settlement of our British claims. In this speech he asserted the claim for indirect or consequential damages, which afterward was proposed as part of the American case at the Geneva arbitration, but was discarded. In his message of 5 Dec., 1870, President Grant, regretting the failure of the treaty to acquire Santo Domingo, strongly urged its acquisition. Sumner strenuously opposed the project on the ground that it was not the wish of the "black republic," and that Baez, with whom, as president of the Dominican republic, the negotiation had been irregularly conducted, was an adventurer, held in his place by an unconstitutional use of the navy of the United States. Sumner's opposition led to a personal rupture with the president and the secretary of state, and to alienation from the Republican senators, a succession of which, on 10 March, 1871, he was removed, by the Republican majority of the senate, from the chairmanship of the committee on foreign affairs. He was assigned the chairmanship of the committee on privileges and elections; but, upon his own motion, his name was stricken out. On 24 March, 1871, he introduced a powerful speech, severely arraigning the president for his course in regard to Santo Domingo. In December, 1871, he refused again to serve as chairman of the committee on privileges and elections. Early in 1872 he introduced a supplementary civil-rights bill, which, since January, 1870, he had vainly sought to bring before the senate. It was intended to secure complete equality for colored citizens in every relation that law could effect; but it was thought to be unwise and impracticable by other Republican senators, and as drawn by Sumner it was not supported by them. He introduced, 12 Feb., 1872, resolutions of inquiry, aimed at the administration, into the sale of arms to France during the German war. An aeronautical debate arose, during which the platform was sharply criticized by some of his party colleagues, and he and Senators Trumbull, Schurz, and Fenton were known as anti-Grant Republicans.

Sumner was urged to attend the Liberal or anti-Grant Republican convention, to be held at Cincinnati, 1 May, which nominated Horace Greeley for the presidency, and the chairman of the committee to write the platform were offered to him as inducements. But he declined, and in the senate, 31 May, declaring himself a Republican of the strictest sect, he denounced Grantism as not Republicanism in a speech implying that he could not support Grant as the presidential candidate of the party. The Republican convention, 5 June, unananimously re-nominated his predecessor. After the convention on 9 June, adopted the Cincinnati platform and candidates. In reply to a request for advice from the colored citizens of Washington, 29 July, Sumner, in a long letter, advised the support of Greeley, on the general ground that principles must be preferred to party. In a sharp letter to Speaker Blair, 5 Aug., he set forth the reasons of the course he had taken.

But the strain of the situation was too severe. His physicians ordered him to seek recreation in Europe, and he sailed early in September, leaving the manuscript of a speech he had proposed to deliver in Faneuil hall at a meeting of Liberal Republicans. He opposed the election of Grant upon the ground that he was unfit either for the constitution or to Republican principles, and otherwise unfitted for the presidency; and he supported Greeley as an original and unserving Republican, nominated by Republicans, whose adoption as a candidate by the Democratic party proved the honest acquiescence of that party in the great results of the civil war. He returned from Europe in time for the opening of the session, 2 Dec., 1872. The Republican majority omitted him altogether in the arrangement of the committees, leaving him to be placed by the Democratic minority. But Sumner declined to serve upon any committee, and did not attend the Republican caucus. On the first day of the session he introduced a bill forbiding the names of battles with fellow-citizens to be continued in the army register or placed on the regimental colors Republicans in the United States could not for the time take any part and make no political speech, pleading only for equality of civil rights for colored citizens. At the next session, 1 Dec., 1873, he was placed on several committees, not as chairman, but as one of the minority, and he did not refuse to serve, but attended no meetings. During this session the cordial relations between Sumner and the Southern constitutionally restored, and in Massachusetts the Republican feeling for him was very friendly. Again, promptly but vainly, 2 Dec., 1873, he asked consideration of the civil-rights bill. On 27 Jan., 1874, he made for the bill a last brief appeal, and on 11 March, 1874, after a short illness, he died. The bill that was his last effort to serve the race to whose welfare his public life had been devoted was reported, 14 April, 1874, substantially as originally drawn, and passed the senate, 22 May. But it failed in the house, and the civil-rights bill, approved 1 March, 1875, was a law of less scope than his, and has been declared unconstitutional by the supreme court.

Sumner's death was universally lamented. One of the warmest and most striking encomiastics was that of his old friend Mr. O. C. Benson, in congress from Mississippi, who had been a sincere disciple of Calhoun and a Confederate officer, but who recognized in Sumner a kindred earnestness and fidelity. The later differences with his party were forgotten when Sumner died, and only his great service to the country in the most perilous hour, and his uncompromising devotion to the cherished race, were proudly and enthusiastically remembered. Among American statesmen his life especially illustrates the truth he early expressed, that politics is but the application of moral principles to public affairs. Throughout his public career he was the distinctive representative of the moral conviction and political purpose of New England. His ample learning and various accomplishments were rivaled among American public men only by those of John Quincy Adams, and during all the fury of political passion in which he lived there was never a whisper or suspicion of his political honesty or his personal integrity. He was fortunate in the peculiar adaptation of his qualities to his time. His profound conviction, supreme conscientiousness, indomitable will, were all in line, and it was easy to recognize, in his legal training, serious temper, and untiring energy, were indispensable in the final stages of the slavery controversy, and he had them all in the highest degree. "There is no other side," he said to a friend with fervor, and Cromwell's innoutes did not ride into the fight more ably. He persistently said that they were doing the will of God through him. In legal contests he had no taste, and at another time and under other circumstances he would probably have been an all-accomplished scholar or learned judge, unknown in political life. Of few men could it be said more truly than of him that he never lost a day. He knew most of the famous men of the world in the course of his time, and he was familiar with the contemporary and artistic movement in every country. In public life he was often accounted a man of one idea; but his speeches upon the "Trent" case, the Russian treaty, and our foreign relations showed the fulness of his knowledge and the variety of his interest. He was dogmatic, often irritable with resolute opposition to his views, and of generous self-esteem, but he was of such child-like simplicity and kindness that the poisonous sting of vanity and malice was wanting. During the difference between Sumner and his fellow Republicans in the senate, one of them said that he had no enemy but himself, and Sumner refused to speak to him for the rest of the session. But the next autumn his friend stepped into an omnibus in New York in which Sumner was sitting, and, entirely forgetting the breach, greeted him with the old warmth. Sumner responded as warmly, and at once the old intimacy was reestablished, and the last remnant of ill-will he was wholly free. No man was more constant and unsparing in the warfare with slavery and in the demand of equality for the colored race; but no soldier ever fought with less personal animosity. He was absolutely fearless.

During the heat of the controversy in congress his life was undoubtedly in danger, and he was urged to carry a pistol for his defense. He laughed, and said that he had never fired a pistol in his life, and, in case of extremity, before he could possibly get it out of his pocket he would be shot. But the danger was so real that, unknown to himself, he was for a long time under the constant protection of armed friends in Washington. The savage assault of Brooks undoubtedly shortened Sumner's life, but he declined to impute it to the assassin. As to a brick that should fall upon my head from a chimney. He was the unconscious agent of a malignant power." Personally, in his later years, Sumner was of commanding presence, very tall, and of a stalwart frame. His voice was full, deep, and resonant, his elevation declamatory, stately, and earnest. His later speeches in the senate he read from printed slips, but his speech upon Alaska, which occupied three hours in the delivery, was spoken from notes written upon a single sheet of paper, and it was subsequently written out. Few of the bills drawn by him became laws, but he influenced profoundly legislation upon subjects in which he was most interested. He was four times successively elected to the senate, and when he died he was the senior senator of the United States in consecutive service. In October, 1866, when he was fifty-five years old, Sumner married Mrs. Alice Mason Hooper, of Boston, daughter-in-law of his friend, Samuel Hooper, representative in congress. The union was very brief, and in September, 1867, Mr. and Mrs. Sumner, for reasons that were never divulged, were separated, and she never saw him again. Of the "Memoir and Letters of Charles Sumner," written by his friend and literary executor, Edward L. Pierce, two volumes, covering the period to 1845, have been published (Boston, 1877). His complete works in fifteen volumes are also published (Boston, 1870-89). The notes by himself and his executors supply a chronology of his public career. Mr. Pierce's "Life of Charles Sumner" is a biography in the strict sense. A crayon drawing by Eastman Johnson (1846) hung in Longfellow's study, and is engraved in Pierce's memoir. A large daguerreotype (1853) is also engraved in the memoir. A crayon by William W. Story (1854) for Lord Morpeth is now at Castle Howard, York-shire. An oil portrait by Moses Wight (1856) is in the Boston public library. There is a portrait of Mr. Sumner by Thomas Ender in Harvard college. A portrait by Edgar Parker was painted several years before his death. There is a photograph in the "Memorial History of Boston;" a photograph (1889) engraved in his works; another (1871) engraved in the city memorial volume of Sumner; a full-length portrait by Henry Ulie (1875) for the Haytian government—copy presented to the state of Massachusetts by James.
SUMNER, Charles Allen, stenographer, b. in Great Barrington, Mass., 2 Aug., 1855. His father, Judge Increase Sumner, was a distant relative of the celebrated orator. The family have, for many generations, studied at Trinity, but was not graduated. He subsequently studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but his chief attention was given to the practice of stenography. In 1856 he sailed for California, and reported for the legislature in 1857-58. He settled at San Francisco, and between the legislative sessions he was engaged, in the state and county courts, in law-reporting, and general editorial duties till 1860, when he entered the Republican canvass. The following year he edited the "Herald and Mirror," in which his opposition to the "Shafter" land bill succeeded in defeating it. Removing to Virginia City, Nev., Mr. Sumner was made assistant-quartermaster in the U. S. forces in 1862, became colonel in 1864, and served as state superintendent of military affairs during one session. Meanwhile he had been twice an unsuccessful Republican candidate for congress. He returned to San Francisco in 1865, and began to advocate a government postal telegraph bill. Trinity gave him the degree of A. M. in 1897. In 1856 he published "Short-hand and Reporting" (New York, 1889); "Golden Gate Sketches" (1884); "Travel in Southern Europe" (1885); and "Sumner's Poems," with his brother, Samuel B. Sumner (1887).

SUMNER, Edwin Vose, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass. 30 Jan., 1857; d. in Syracuse, N. Y., 21 March, 1863. Young Sumner was educated at Milton (Mass.) Academy, and entered the army in 1889 as 2d lieutenant of infantry. He served in the Black Hawk war, became captain of the 2d dragoons in 1888, and was employed on the western frontier, where he distinguished himself as an Indian fighter. In 1888 he was placed in command of the 2d School of cavalry practice at Carlisle, Pa. He was promoted major in 1886, and in the Mexican war led the cavalry charge at Cerro Gordo in April, 1847, commanded the reserves at Contreras and Churubusco, and at the head of the cavalry at Molina del Rey checked the advance of 5,000 Mexican lancers. He was governor of New Mexico in 1883-3, when he visited Europe to report on improvements in cavalry. In 1895 he was promoted colonel of the 1st cavalry, and made a successful expedition against the Cheyennes. In command of the Department of the West in 1898 he rendered efficient service during the Kansas troubles. In March, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general in the regular army, and sent to relieve Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, in command of the Department of the Pacific, but was recalled in the following year to the command of the 1st cavalry of the Army of the Potomac. He commanded the left wing at the siege of Yorktown. At Fair Oaks, where McClellan's army was divided by the Chickahominy and the left wing was heavily attacked, the orders to Sumner to cross the river and re-enforce that wing found him with his corps drawn out and ready to move instantly. In the seven days' battles he was twice wounded. In 1862 he was appointed major-general of volunteers, led the 2d corps at the battle of Antietam, where he was wounded, and commanded one of the three grand divisions of Burnside's army at Fredericksburg, his division being the first to cross the Rappahannock. At his own request he was relieved in 1863, and, being appointed to the Department of the Missouri, he was on his way thither when he died. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel for Cerro Gordo, colonel for Molina del Rey, and major-general in the regular army for services before Richmond. Gen. Sumner's last words, as he with great effort waved a glass of wine above his head, were: "God save my country, the United States of America." —His son, Edwin Vose, served major-general of the 5th cavalry in 1879, and inspector of rifle practice. In 1889 he was made brigadier-general of volunteers and ordered to the front.
SUMNER, George, physician, b. in Pomfret, Conn. 19 Dec., 1783; d. in Hartford, Conn. 29 Feb., 1855. He was graduated at Yale in 1803, and at the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1817. Two years later he established himself at Hartford, Conn., where he was professor of botany at Trinity college from its foundation in 1824 till his death. He was an active friend of the college, and to his taste and liberality the beautiful grounds of the former college site owed much of their attractiveness. For many years he was also a lecturer on botany. He published a "Compendium of Physiological and Systematic Botany" (Hartford, 1830).

SUMNER, Increase, jurist, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 27 Nov., 1746; d. there, 5 June, 1839. His ancestor, William, emigrated from England to Dorchester, Mass., about 1635, and his father, Increase, was a prosperous farmer and a select-man of Roxbury in 1783 and 1756. The son, after graduation at Harvard in 1767, studied law under Samuel Adams while teaching at Roxbury, was admitted to the bar in 1770, and began practice in his native town. He was a member of the lower house of the legislature in 1776-'80, and senator till 1782. In the mean time he was a member of the convention of 1777 for agreeing on a form of government, and of the State constitutional convention in 1779. He was elected to congress in 1782, but preferred to accept an appointment as associate justice of the supreme judicial court, remaining on the bench till 1797. He was one of the committee on the revision of the laws of the state in 1785, a delegate to the convention that adopted the constitution of the United States in 1789, and at the close of his judicial term, and elected governor for three successive terms. Judge Sumner's ability and intimate relations with his kinsman, John Adams, and other statesmen, gave him great influence in public affairs.—His son, William Hyslop, soldier, b. in Roxbury, 4 July, 1780; d. in Jamaica Plains, Mass., 24 Oct., 1861, was graduated at Harvard in 1799, admitted to the bar in 1802, and in 1806-'79 was a member of the legislature. In 1814 he was sent to put the coast of Maine in a state of defence against a threatened invasion, and in 1818-'35 he served as adjutant-general of the state, with the rank of brigadier-general. He organized in 1830 the East Boston company. He was one of the original members of the Massachusetts horticultural society. His works include "An Inquiry into the Importance of the Militia" (Boston, 1823); "Observations on National Defence" (1824); "Reminiscences" (1854); "Memoir of Increase Sumner, Governor of Massachusetts" (1854); "Reminiscences of General Warren and Banks Hill" (1858); "History of East Boston" (1858); and "Reminiscences of Lafayette's Visit to Boston" (1859).

SUMNER, Jedidiah, soldier, b. in Virginia about 1759; d. in Warren county, N. C. about 1790. His father, William, came from England and settled near Suffolk, Va., about 1690. Jedidiah was active in the measures that preceded the Revolution, and in 1760 was paymaster of the provincial troops of North Carolina and commander at Fort Cumberland. In 1776 he was appointed by the Provincial congress colonel of the 5th North Carolina regiment, and served under Washington in the north. He was commissioned brigadier-general by the Continental congress in 1778, was ordered to join Gen. Horatio Gates in the south, and was at the battle of Camden in 1780. He then served under Gen. Nathanael Greene, and at the battle of Eutaw, 8 Sept., 1781, made a bayonet charge, after which he was active in keeping the Tories in check in South Carolina until the close of the war.

SUMNER, John, soldier, b. in Middletown, Conn. in May, 1755; d. in February, 1878. He was commissioned, 24 March, 1779, captain in the regiment of foot of which Phineas Lyman was colonel, and in this service he was in the battles of Lake George and Ticonderoga, and at the capture of Crown Point and the surrender of Montreal. At the opening of the Revolution he was a zealous patriot, and he entered the Colonial army in June, 1776, being commissioned major in a battalion of which John Durkee was colonel, and continued in the service until 1 Jan., 1781. He was in the battles of Long Island, Harlem, White Plains, Germantown, Trenton, and Monmouth, where he was in the thickest of the fight and one of many that were overcome by the swept-back regiments in the great heat of that day, from the effects of which he never recovered. He was one of the founders of the Society of the Cincinnati.—His son, Joshua, b. in Middletown, Conn. 11 Oct., 1761; d. March, 1832, was a surgeon in the army of Gen. St. Clair during his unfortunate expedition against the Miami Indians in 1791, and subsequently in his native state and in Massachusetts.—Another son, William, b. in Middletown, Conn. 22 Jan., 1780; d. 28 Sept., 1838, was colonel of an Ohio regiment in the war of 1812, and camped his command in the forest on the site of Columbus, the capital of the state.

SUMNER, William Graham, political economist, b. in Paterson, N. J., 39 Oct., 1849. He was graduated at Yale in 1868, and studied at Gottingen, Germany, and Oxford. He was a tutor at Yale in 1866-'8, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1867, and was for some time assistant at Calvary church, New York city. In 1872 he was appointed professor of political and social science at Yale. Prof. Sumner is an earnest advocate of the so-called laissez-faire principle in political economy. He favors the gold standard in currency and free-trade. He has done much to promote liberal methods of instruction in his department, and, among other innovations, has established a loan library of political economy for the use of his classes. He is a member of the American social science association, to whose "Transactions" he has contributed papers, including one on "American Finance" (1844). Besides articles in periodicals, he has published a translation of Lange's "Commentary on the Second Book of Kings" (New York, 1872); "History of American Currency" (1874); "Lectures on the History of Protection in the United States" (1855); "Life of Andrew Jackson," in the "American Statesmen" series (Boston, 1882); "What Social Classes Owe to Each Other" (New York, 1858); "Economic Problems" (1884); "Essays in Political and Social Science" (1885); and "Protectionism" (1885).

SUMTER, Thomas, soldier, b. in Virginia 14 July, 1756; d. at South Mount, near Camden, S. C., 1 June, 1832. Little is known of his parentslate and early life. He was present at Braddock's defeat in 1755, and seems afterward to have been engaged in military service on the frontier. In March, 1776, he was appointed by the Provincial congress lieutenant-colonel of the 3d regiment of South Carolina riflemen, and was sent to overawe the Tories and Indians, who were threatening the upper counties of that state. But he does not seem to have distinguished himself until after the fall of Charleston, in May, 1780. About three weeks after that event Sir Henry Clinton wrote home to the ministry: "I may venture to assert that there are few men in South Carolina who are not either our prisoners or in arms with us." Among the few who were neither the one nor the other was Col. Sumter. After hiding for a while in the swamps of the Santee, he made his way to North Carolina, where he collected a small force of refugees, and presently returned to carry on a partisan warfare against the British invaders. On 12 July he surprised and cut to pieces Capt. Christian Hack's company of mounted infantry. Among Sumter's comrades on this occasion was Col. William Neale, whose regiment Lord Cornwallis was attempting to impress into the British service. On hearing of the approach of Sumter, these men made haste to join him and place themselves under his former commander. Small parties of Whigs, coming in from the Waxhaw settlements, still further swelled the numbers of the little partisan force, and Sumter was promoted by Gov. Rutledge to the rank of brigadier-general in the state militia. Having now more than 600 men under his command, on 30 July he crossed Broad river and made a desperate assault upon the log-fortress at Rocky Mount, which was held by a strong body of New York and South Carolina loyalists under Col. George Turnbull. Finding the place too strong to be reduced without artillery, of which he had none, Sumter withdrew, and marched suddenly against the fortified post of Hanging Rock. This place was defended by 300 men, of whom at least 100 were British regulars from Tarleton's legion; the rest were Tories from the two Carolinas and Georgia. They were surprised by Sumter and, after a severe struggle, the Tories were put to flight, but the British held their ground until sixty-two of their number had been killed or wounded. By that time Sumter's ill-disciplined men, thinking victory assured, had begun to disperse in quest of plunder and liquor, until he found himself unable to bring up four hundred enough for his final assault, and he accordingly ordered a retreat. On this occasion Andrew Jackson made his first appearance as a fighter.

Gen. Sumter now crossed the Catawba river and undertook to act in cooperation with Gen. Gates, who re-enforced him with 400 good troops and two field-pieces, and on 15 Aug. Sumter succeeded in cutting Cornwallis's line of communications and capturing his supply-train with its convoy. This brilliant exploit was more than neutralized by the overwhelming defeat of Gates at Camden, 16 Aug., which made it necessary for Sumter to retreat with all possible haste, encompassed as he was with prisoners and fifty wagons laden with spoliis. About noon of the 18th he encamped on the north bank of Fishing creek, a small stream that flows into the Catawba forty miles above Camden. Here he was surprised by the indefatigable Tarleton. As the jaded men were resting under the trees, they were assaulted by the British dragoons, who, by a forced march, had passed the stream in their rear. The Americans were routed with a loss of nearly 500 in killed, wounded, and prisoners; the remnant of their force was dispersed, and the stores were recovered by the British. After this staggering blow, Sumter fled to the mountains, where his men gradually came together, and within a few weeks he was able to take the field again and smite the country between the Edisto and Tiger rivers. In October, Cornwallis sent Maj. James Wemyss against him, with the 63d regiment and a few of Tarleton's dragoons. In a night attack upon Sumter's camp on Broad river, 8 Nov., Wemyss was badly defeated and taken prisoner. Tarleton himself was now sent up with re-enforcements, and advanced upon Sumter, who retreated to Blackstock hill, where he planted himself in an exceedingly strong position. Here Tarleton, assaulting him, 20 Nov., was repelled with a loss of about 200 killed and wounded, while Sumter lost three killed and four wounded; and the disaster of Fishing creek was thus avenged. In this action Gen. Sumter received a wound in the right shoulder which kept him inactive for three months.

In February, 1781, in which Greene dislodged Rawdon from Camden and reconquered the interior of the state, Sumter's service was of a more decisive nature. He was ordered as far as his strength would allow to act independently, and was supplied with small arms and ammunition. He was able to do much annoyance and annoyance and to hinder Lord Rawdon, whom Cornwallis left in command in South Carolina, while he followed Gen. Greene's army northward to the Dan. During the subsequent campaigns, April to July, 1781, in which Greene dislodged Rawdon from Camden and reconquered the interior of the state, Sumter's operations in harassing the enemy's communications and dispersing parties of Tory militia, were very valuable, although he usually chose an independent course of action, and was sometimes regarded by Greene and his officers as inordinate. Before the end of the campaign he was obliged by failing health to quit active service, and by the time he was again fit for duty the enemy had been cooped up in Charleston. After the war, Gen. Sumter was interested in politics, and at the time of the adoption of the constitution he was a zealous Federalist. He was a member of congress in 1789-93 and 1797-1801, and U.S. senator in 1801-9. He was the last surviving general officer of the Revolutionary war. His eldest son Charles W. Peck, represented in the accompanying vignette. His son Thomas was in the diplomatic service.
